About the Author

MICHAEL GRAY is a distinguished critic, writer and broadcaster. He graduated in History & English Literature at York University, England, in the 1960s, where he studied under the controversial, brilliant critic Dr. F.R. Leavis, and where as a student journalist he interviewed, among others, the eminent British historian A.J.P. Taylor and the legendary American guitarist Jimi Hendrix. His pioneering study of Bob Dylan's work, Song & Dance Man, first published in the 1970s in Britain, America and Japan, was the first full-length critical study of this crucial 20th century cultural figure. It is now recognised as a classic in its field. A selection of pieces on Dylan, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, published in 1987, was co-edited by Gray and included work by several distinguished academics in the fields of English & American Literature and Music. In 1996, Michael Gray co-authored The Elvis Atlas: A Journey Through Elvis Presley's America, published in hardback in New York by Henry Holt. The massive Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan was published by Continuum in March 2000. A special reprint appeared in the US in April 2001, when Gray delivered talks at a number of US universities; a fourth reprint was published in New York and London in 2002 and a fifth in 2004. Michael Gray is recognised as a world authority on the work of Bob Dylan and is an expert on rock'n'roll history and the blues, with a special interest in pre-war blues.

FROM REVIEWS OF SONG & DANCE MAN III: THE ART OF BOB DYLAN
by Michael Gray

GREIL MARCUS:
'Extraordinarily useful . . . I have always admired Gray's reach, tone, and acuity but the research here is just amazing.'

ANDREW MOTION, British Poet Laureate, The Observer, London:
'One of my three best books of the year. . . . The best book there is on Dylan, now better than ever.'

THE NEWS & OBSERVER, US:
'Notably, there is a fat, new edition of Michael Gray's huge and wonderful critical work, Song & Dance Man. . . . Gray's book proves that scholarship can be fun to read.'

ROLLING STONE:
'Monumental, endlessly illuminating.'

BLOOMSBURY REVIEW, US:
'An engaging, intellectual discussion of the passion, pain and trends that have poured out of Bob Dylan . . . anyone who is interested in the artistic impact of music on an intellectual level will jump at the chance to have a truly highbrow discussion about rock'n'roll.'

CHRISTOPHER RICKS:
'Immense and immensely illuminating. . . . It is wonderfully comic and serious and sharp. I am enjoying it hugely and learning from every page.'

THE TIMES, London:
'In examining the influences that shaped Dylan into one of the most influential post-war artists, Gray draws on everyone from Elvis to Eliot, Robert Johnson to Rimbaud . . . This huge work is overwhelming. . . . "It's all been written in the book," sang Bob Dylan. Now it really has.'

NEWSDAY, US:
'Illuminating, wry and exhaustive.'

DER BUND, Switzerland:
'Gray's monumental study . . . dissects Dylan's songs to reveal their literary and musical origins . . . provide insight into Dylan's methodology and reveal hidden layers . . . His precision identifies the essence of Dylan. . . . Michael Gray writes exuberantly, critically and is never lost for a judgment. . . . His evaluations are refreshing and accurate.'

UNCUT, London:
'Now comes the third (and allegedly final) edition of Michael Gray's pioneering tome, which helped launch the Zimmerman book industry. It runs to a colossal 900 pages and confirms once again Gray's position as the doyen of Dylan scholars . . . even in its initial modest form, [it] was profoundly significant . . . a revelation . . . thrilling. . . . His book invented a new school of rock criticism which made most of the writing that had gone before seem superficial, irrelevant and trivial. . . . The third edition of Gray's lifetime study displays an almost insane degree of scholarship . . . a quite dazzlingly brilliant essay on Dylan's use of imagery borrowed from old blues songs. A similar essay on the use of nursery rhyme and fairy tale . . . [and] the final chapter is an intellectual tour de force. . . . Of course there will always be those who prefer simply to enjoy the songs rather than to analyse them. But anyone who is remotely curious about the richness of the man's extraordinary imagination will find Gray's work an essential companion. * * * * * '

STEPHEN SCOBIE, University of Victoria, Canada & author of Alias Bob Dylan: 'Indispensable. . . . His research is formidable, and his knowledge encyclopedic . . . great cogency, confidence and authority . . . a quite splendid critic. . . . Gray can explain how the text [of a song] works poetically. It's a rare gift: . . . [his] expositions of 'Every Grain of Sand', 'Angelina', 'Jokerman' and 'Under the Red Sky' are utterly definitive . . . at the heart of this book is some of the finest critical writing ever done about Bob Dylan.'

BRYAN APPLEYARD, Sunday Times, London:
'Serious Dylan criticism . . . intricate analyses . . . monumental.'

AUSTIN CHRONICLE, US:
'A startling piece of scholarship. By scrutinizing Dylan's canon, Gray achieves a fresh read of his life. . . . Song & Dance Man III overshadows others' accounts of secret marriages and mythic motorcycle crashes, and it entirely outdoes other analyses . . . frank, insightful, unassailably excellent.'

RECORD COLLECTOR, London:
'The original Song & Dance Man was a pioneering piece of rock scholarship. . . . Written with great intelligence and passion . . . the result was the first important book about a rock artist's output, not just their life. . . . But these 250 pages are merely a fragment of the 900-page monster which Gray has [now] unleashed . . . magnificent . . . soaked in insight.'

DAVID HAJDU, author of Positively 4th Street:
'It is the most penetrating and clear-headed work on his work ever done—a monumental achievement.'

FOLK ROOTS, London:
'This major update of a seminal work deserves to be read and studied by anyone with even the slightest interest in song lyrics and it's essential as a storehouse of knowledge on folk, country and blues records.'

BLUEPRINT, British blues magazine:
'Fascinating, scholarly and very readable. . . . The longest and most relevant chapter for Blueprint readers ["Even Post-Structuralists Oughta Have the Pre-War Blues"] is . . . packed solid with informative and enthralling reading. I cannot congratulate Gray enough for this outstanding chapter . . . [a] very important study. A thoroughly enjoyable and informative book by an author who writes knowledgeably, with style and with great insight—very highly recommended to all.'

Q, London:
'This book is an event . . . delivering prodigious analyses of Dylan's artistry and his polymath sources in pre-war blues, nursery rhymes, fairy tales and Hollywood movie dialogue. . . . Gray maintains a ruthless integrity regarding Dylan himself. * * * * * '

EVENING STANDARD, London:
'The definitive critical work.'

THE OBSERVER, London:
'Paperback of the Week. A mammoth work of scholarship, often enthralling and never less than illuminating. His chapter on Dylan's sources in the blues . . . is almost worth the price of admission alone. . . . This is trenchant and thought-provoking stuff, and pretty much characterises Gray's style and his approach to a subject who has suffered more than most at the hands of lesser, and less well-informed, critics. A must for anyone interested in the great adventure that is Bob Dylan's work.'

BOSTON GLOBE:
'Michael Gray's Song & Dance Man . . . has grown across three decades and as many editions into a comprehensive critical companion.'

LONDON REVIEW OF BOOKS:
'The last word on Dylan is neither possible nor desirable . . . perhaps the closest that anyone has come . . . is Michael Gray in his awesome and encyclopedic Song & Dance Man, currently in its third, extensively revised edition.'

SALON.COM:
'. . . to study some of the finest work found in American song . . . requires someone with the boldness and the breadth of knowledge shown by Michael Gray, whose hefty study . . . puts the bulk of rock-crit writing about Dylan to shame.'

NEW YORK REVIEW OF BOOKS:
Michael Gray . . . probably Dylan's single most assiduous critic.

THE BOB DYLAN ENCYCLOPEDIA

MICHAEL GRAY

NEW YORK • LONDON

2006

The Continuum International Publishing Group Inc
80 Maiden Lane, New York, NY 10038

The Continuum International Publishing Group Ltd
The Tower Building, 11 York Road, London SE1 7NX

www.continuumbooks.com

This book is printed in the United States of America on New Leaf EcoBook 50, made with 100% recycled fiber, 50% post-consumer waste and processed chlorine free.

Cover art by Stefan Killen Design

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Gray, Michael, 1946–
The Bob Dylan encyclopedia / Michael Gray.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 0-8264-6933-7 (leatherbound hardcover : alk. paper)
1. Dylan, Bob, 1941—Encyclopedias. I. Title.
ML420.D98G68 2006
782.42164092—dc22
[b] 2006012728 to Magdalena

Contents

Thanks and Acknowledgements

SPECIAL THANKS TO

Sarah Beattie; John Baldwin; Alan Balfour; David Barker; Derek Barker; Glen Dundas; Dave Engel; the Council, SCR & Library of Girton College, Cambridge, and especially Dr. Alastair Reid; Terry Kelly; Andrew Muir; Gabriella Page-Fort and Tony Russell.

THANKS TO

Jerome B. Abrams, Bill Aikins, Russell Alexander, Rhonda Allende, Audre John & Mose Allison, Karl Erik Andersen, Suzanne Ashley, Lillian Baharestani, Helen Bailey, Gordon Ball, Tracy Barker, Dylan Beattie, Zuleika Benitez, Toby Berger, Olof Björner, Terence Blacker, Simon Blackley, Judy Brown at Denver Public Library, Chris Bucklen, Gary Burke, Hanns Peter Bushoff, Jane Butler, Larry Campbell, Eric Campos, Anne Cartwright, Flo Castner, Lynn Castner, Rick Clark, Jim Clements, Andy Cohen, Chris Cooper, Neal Cooper, Michael Corcoran, Neil Corcoran, Jonathan Cott, Chris Coughlan-Smith, Ben Covington, Jan Cox, Richard Crooks, Adam Crothers, Jones Cullinan, Arline Cunningham, Jenny Curtis, Andrew Darke, Aidan Day, Mary Dean, Adrian Deevoy, Nick Dodd, Robert L. Drew, Tim Dunn, Hans Eisenbeis, David Evans, Robert Forryan, Alan Fraser, Denny Freeman, Frances Gandy, Paul Garon, Jeffrey Gaskill, Karl Gedlicka, Charlie Gillett, Toby Gleason, Tony Glover, Rob Goetz, Steven Goldberg, Lily Goodwin, Barbara Ribakove Gordon, Al Gorgoni, Robert Gover, Mike Gray, Mark Greenberg, Greyhound Soul & Duane, Michael Gross, Malcolm Guite, David Hajdu, Si Halley, Peter Hues Harrison, Mary Amelia Cummins Harvey, Todd Harvey, Nicholas Hawthorne, April C. Hayes, John Herdman, Carolyn Hester, Clinton Heylin, John Hinchey, Terri Hinte, Nigel Hinton, Historic Waco Foundation, Jan Høiberg, John Hopkins, Barney Hoskyns, Duncan Hume, Patrick Humphries, Don Hunstein, Ira Ingber, A.J. Iriarte, John Jackson, Elana James, Craig Jamieson, Peter Jesperson, Janet Joyce, Ric Kangas, Daniel Karlin, Larry Keenan, Roy Kelly, Mark Kidel, Kaitlin King, Malcolm Kirton, Freddy Koella, Robert Köhler, Sandy Konikoff, Daniel Kramer, Michael Krogsgaard, Jeff Laine, Jon Landau, Bruce Langhorne, Jonathan Lauer, Eric LaBlanc, C.P. Lee, Bob

Levinson, Dan Levy, John Lindley, Dennis Lloyd, Charlie McCoy, Regina McCrary, Brian McMahon, Dave Madeloni, Toby Manners, Marc at Double M Management, Greil Marcus, Mike Marqusee, Kathy Mattea, John May, Jesse Meehl, Vince Melamed, Pat Missin, Dave Morton, Wayne Moss, Geoff Muldaur & Mary, Joy Munsey, Michele Murino, Rab Noakes, Tanya Nolan, Brendan O'Brien, Brendan O'Dwyer, Joe Offer, Robert Oermann, Eric Oliver, Eric Olsen, Hoyle Osborne, Eyolf Østrem, Bill Pagel, Jon Pankake, Alan Pasqua, Faith Petric, Sue Phelps, David Pichaske, Michel Pomarède, Andy Prevezer, Darrell Redmond, Sy Ribakove, Amadee Ricketts, Alan Rinzler, John Roberts, BA Robertson, Christopher Rollason, Jahanara Romney, Jeff Rosen, Fred Rothwell, Howard Rutman, Barbara Sandlin at Waco-McLennan County Library, Mala Sharma, Jerry Schatzberg, Burkhard Schleser, Sandra Hale Schulman, Cameron Sclater, Stephen Scobie, Carl Sealove, Joel Selvin, Brad Shipp, Neil Slaven, Larry Sloman, Chris Smith, Howard Sounes, Minton Sparks, Leyla Spencer, Wes Stace, Lucas Stensland, Rob Stoner, Marilyn Strathern, Bryan Styble, Ed Suthon, Gregg Sutton, Christer Svensson, David Tedeschi, Happy Traum, Rainer Vesely, Vin Vincent, Peter Viney, Paolo Vites, Elijah Wald, Melanie Watson, Winston A. Watson, Lisa Mattioni Weber, Miriam Weissman, Dave Whitaker, Sean Wilentz, Ruth Williams, Nigel Williamson, Val Wilmer, Terry Winston, Stefan Wirz, Richard Wissolik, Robin Witting, Daniel Wolfe, John Wraith, Bob Yellin, Richard Younger, Zimmy's proprietors Bob & Linda, Matthew Zuckerman.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The author and the publishers wish to express their thanks to the undermentioned copyright owners for the use of material written and composed by Bob Dylan. Quotations are taken from Bob Dylan recordings and may in some cases differ slightly from the printed sheet-music versions and/or the anthology Bob Dylan: Lyrics: 1962–2001:

(a) Copyright by Duchess Music (now MCA Music): Song to Woody, © 1962, renewed 1990; Talking New York, © 1962, renewed 1990; Talking Bear Mountain Picnic Massacre Blues, © 1962, renewed 1990.

(b) Copyright by Dwarf Music: Rainy Day Women # 12 and 35, © 1966, renewed 1994; Pledging My Time, © 1966, renewed 1994; Visions of Johanna, © 1966, renewed 1994; Stuck Inside of Mobile with the Memphis Blues Again, © 1966, renewed 1994; Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat, © 1966, renewed 1994; Just Like a Woman, © 1966, renewed 1994; Absolutely Sweet Marie, © 1966, renewed 1994; Temporary Like Achilles, © 1966, renewed 1994; 4th Time Around, © 1966, renewed 1994; Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands, © 1966, renewed 1994; Too Much of Nothing, © 1967, renewed 1995; Please, Mrs. Henry, © 1967, renewed 1995; Down in the Flood, © 1967, renewed 1995; You Ain't Goin' Nowhere, © 1967, renewed 1995; Tears of Rage (Words by Bob Dylan, Music by Richard Manuel), © 1968, renewed 1996; This Wheel's on Fire (Words & Music by Bob Dylan & Rick Danko), © 1967; renewed 1995; Open the Door, Homer, © 1968, renewed 1996; John Wesley Harding, © 1968, renewed 1996; All Along the Watchtower, © 1968, renewed 1996; The Ballad of Frankie Lee and Judas Priest, © 1968, renewed 1996; I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine, © 1968, renewed 1996; Drifter's Escape, © 1968, renewed 1996; I Pity the Poor Immigrant, © 1968, renewed 1996; I Shall Be Released, © 1967; Nothing Was Delivered, © 1968, renewed 1996; I'll Be Your Baby Tonight, © 1968, renewed 1996; She's Your Lover Now, © 1971; I Wanna Be Your Lover, © 1971, 1976.

(c) Copyright by Big Sky Music: I Threw It All Away, © 1969, renewed 1997; Lay, Lady, Lay, © 1969, renewed 1997; One More Night, © 1969, renewed 1997; Country Pie, © 1969, renewed 1997; Tonight I'll Be Staying Here With You, © 1969, renewed 1997; Minstrel Boy, © 1970; In Search of Little Sadie, © 1970; All the Tired Horses, © 1970; Day of the Locusts, © 1970; Time Passes Slowly, © 1970; Went to See the Gypsy, © 1970; Winterlude, © 1970; New Morning, © 1970; Sign on the Window, © 1970; One More Weekend, © 1970; The Man in Me, © 1970; Three Angels, © 1970; Father of Night, © 1970; Watching the River Flow, © 1971; When I Paint My Masterpiece, © 1971, 1972.

(d) Copyright by Ram's Horn Music: George Jackson, © 1971; Going, Going, Gone, © 1973, 1974; Tough Mama, © 1973, 1974; Hazel, © 1973, 1974; Something There Is About You, © 1973, 1974; Dirge, © 1973, 1974; You Angel You, © 1973, 1974; Never Say Goodbye, © 1973, 1974; Wedding Song, © 1973, 1974; Planet Waves sleevenote © 1973, 1974; Nobody 'Cept You, © 1973, 1976; You're Gonna Make Me Lonesome When You Go, © 1974, 1975; You're a Big Girl Now, © 1974, 1975; Tangled Up in Blue, © 1974, 1975; Shelter from the Storm, © 1974, 1975; Idiot Wind, © 1974, 1975; If You See Her, Say Hello, © 1974; Buckets of Rain, © 1974, 1975; Call Letter Blues, © 1974; Hurricane (words written with Jacques levy), © 1975; Isis (written with Jacques Levy), © 1975, 1976; Oh, Sister (written with Jacques Levy), © 1975, 1976; Joey (written with Jacques Levy), © 1975, 1976; Romance in Durango (written with Jacques Levy), © 1975, 1976; Sara, © 1975, 1976; Rita May (words written with Jacques Levy), © 1975, 1976; Abandoned Love, © 1975, 1976; Sign Language, © 1976.

(e) Copyright by Warner Bros. Music and renewed by Special Rider Music: Blowin' in the Wind, © 1962, renewed 1990; Let Me Die in My Footsteps, © 1963, 1965, renewed 1991, 1993; Girl of the North Country, © 1963, renewed 1991; Tomorrow Is a Long Time, © 1963, renewed 1991; I Shall Be Free, © 1963, renewed 1991; Down the Highway, © 1963, renewed 1991; With God on Our Side, © 1963, renewed 1991; Ballad of Hollis Brown, © 1963, renewed 1991; When the Ship Comes In, © 1963, renewed 1991; Don't Think Twice, It's All Right, © 1963, renewed 1991; Masters of War, © 1963, renewed 1991; The Times They Are a-Changin', © 1963, renewed 1991; Only a Pawn In Their Game, © 1963, renewed 1991; Bob Dylan's Dream, © 1963, renewed 1991; Walls of Red Wing, © 1963, renewed 1991; Eternal Circle, © 1963, renewed 1991; Hero Blues, © 1963, renewed 1991; Quit Your Low Down Ways, © 1963, 1964, renewed 1991, 1992; Whatcha Gonna Do, © 1963, 1966, renewed 1991, 1994; Percy's Song, © 1964, renewed 1992; It Ain't Me, Babe, © 1964, renewed 1992; My Back Pages, © 1964, renewed 1992; Restless Farewell, © 1964, renewed 1992; To Ramona, © 1964, renewed 1992; Motorpsycho Nightmare, © 1964, renewed 1992; Chimes of Freedom, © 1964, renewed 1992; Black Crow Blues, © 1964, renewed 1992; Spanish Harlem Incident, © 1964, renewed 1992; Ballad in Plain D, © 1964, renewed 1992; One Too Many Mornings, © 1964, renewed 1992; I Don't Believe You (She Acts Like We Never Have Met), © 1964, renewed 1992; Lay Down Your Weary Tune, © 1964, renewed 1992; Mr. Tambourine Man, © 1964, renewed 1992; Positively 4th Street, © 1965, renewed 1993; Gates of Eden, © 1965, renewed 1993; Subterranean Homesick Blues, © 1965, renewed 1993; Outlaw Blues, © 1965, renewed 1993; She Belongs to Me, © 1965, renewed 1993; Love Minus Zero/No Limit, © 1965, renewed 1993; Bob Dylan's 115th Dream, © 1965, renewed 1993; It's All Over Now, Baby Blue, © 1965, renewed 1993; It's Alright, Ma (I'm Only Bleeding), © 1965, renewed 1993; Farewell Angelina, © 1965, renewed 1993; Desolation Row, © 1965, renewed 1993; Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues, © 1965, renewed 1993; Ballad of a Thin Man, © 1965, renewed 1993; It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry, © 1965, renewed 1993; Queen Jane Approximately, © 1965, renewed 1993; Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?, © 1965, renewed 1993; Highway 61 Revisited, © 1965, renewed 1993; Like a Rolling Stone, © 1965, renewed 1993; From a Buick 6, © 1965, renewed 1993; Sign on the Cross, © 1971, renewed 1999; California, © 1972, renewed 2000.

(f) Copyright by Special Rider Music: 11 Outlined Epitaphs, © 1964, renewed 1992; Advice to Geraldine on Her Miscellaneous Birthday, © 1964, renewed 1992; Talkin' John Birch Paranoid Blues © 1970; I Shall Be Free No. 10, © 1971; Last Thoughts on Woody Guthrie, © 1973; My Life in a Stolen Moment, © 1973; Some Other Kinds of Songs . . . , © 1973; Ain't Gonna Go to Hell for Anybody, © 1980; Ain't No Man Righteous, No Not One, © 1981; Angelina, © 1981; Legionnaire's Disease, © 1981; You Changed My Life, © 1982; Band of the Hand, © 1986; Biograph interview, © 1985; Bringing It All Back Home sleevenotes, © 1965, renewed 1993; Where Are You Tonight? (Journey Through Dark Heat), © 1978; Changing of the Guards, © 1978; No Time to Think, © 1978; True Love Tends to Forget, © 1978; Is Your Love in Vain?, © 1978; Senor (Tales of Yankee Power), © 1978; Baby, Stop Crying, © 1978; New Pony, © 1978; Do Right to Me Baby (Do Unto Others), © 1979; When He Returns, © 1979; Precious Angel, © 1979; Man Gave Names to All the Animals, © 1979; Gotta Serve Somebody, © 1979; I Believe in You, © 1979; Gonna Change My Way of Thinking, © 1979; Slow Train Coming, © 1979; Trouble in Mind, © 1979; Saving Grace, © 1980; Solid Rock, © 1980; In the Garden, © 1980; What Can I Do for You?, © 1980; Covenant Woman, © 1980; Saved, © 1980; Lenny Bruce, © 1981; Every Grain of Sand, © 1981; The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar, © 1981; Let's Keep It Between Us, © 1982; Need a Woman, © 1982; Jokerman, © 1983; Sweetheart Like You, © 1983; Man of Peace, © 1983; Don't Fall Apart on Me Tonight, © 1983; I and I, © 1983; Blind Willie McTell, © 1983; Foot of Pride, © 1983; Lord Protect My Child, © 1983; Someone's Got a Hold of My Heart, © 1983; Clean-Cut Kid, © 1984; Tight Connection to My Heart (Has Anybody Seen My Love), © 1985; I'll Remember You, © 1985; Never Gonna Be the Same Again, © 1985; Seeing the Real You at Last, © 1985; When the Night Comes Falling from the Sky, © 1985; Emotionally Yours, © 1985; Something's Burning, Baby, © 1985; Dark Eyes, © 1985; Caribbean Wind, © 1985; Driftin' Too Far from Shore, © 1986; Maybe Someday, © 1986; Brownsville Girl (lyrics co-written with Sam Shepard), © 1986; Had a Dream About You, Baby, © 1987; Where Teardrops Fall, © 1989; Man in the Long Black Coat, © 1989; Most of the Time, © 1989; Ring Them Bells, © 1989; What Was It You Wanted, © 1989; Shooting Star, © 1989; Dignity, © 1989; Wiggle Wiggle, © 1990; Under the Red Sky, © 1990; Unbelievable, © 1990; 10,000 Men, © 1990; Handy Dandy, © 1990; Cat's in the Well, © 1990; World Gone Wrong sleevenotes, © 1993; Love Sick, © 1997; Standing in the Doorway, © 1997; Million Miles, © 1997; Tryin' to Get to Heaven, © 1997; Not Dark Yet, © 1997; Highlands, © 1997; Mississippi, © 1997; Things Have Changed, © 1999; Lonesome Day Blues, © 2001; Floater (Too Much to Ask), © 2001; Po' Boy, © 2001. Under Your Spell (co-written with Carol Bayer Sager), © 1986 Special Rider Music & Carol Bayer Sager Music. Silvio (co-written with Robert Hunter), © 1988 Special Rider Music & Ice Nine Music.

The author is once again grateful to Jeff Rosen at Special Rider Music for his cooperation, and to Bob Dylan for consenting to the quoting of so much from his extraordinary body of work.

The author and publishers also wish to thank the following for permission to quote from copyright works: to Thames & Hudson for permission to quote from The Uses of Enchantment by Bruno Bettelheim, © Bruno Bettelheim, 1976; to HarperCollins Publishers Ltd. and Houghton Mifflin Company for permission to quote from The Lord of the Rings by J.R.R. Tolkien, © 1954–55; The Land where the Blues Began by Alan Lomax, © Alan Lomax, 1993, reprinted by permission of Pantheon Books, a division of Random House Inc. For permission to quote from an interview with Bob Dylan by Jann Wenner in Rolling Stone, November 29, 1969, © by Straight Arrow Publishers Inc., 1969, all rights reserved, reprinted by permission; quotation from The Oxford Dictionary of Nursery Rhymes, by Iona and Peter Opie, 1951 revised edition, © Iona and Peter Opie, 1951, by permission of Oxford University Press; from '23rd Street Runs Into Heaven' by Kenneth Patchen, from The Collected Poems of Kenneth Patchen, copyright © 1957 by New directions Publishing Corp., reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp.; 'Bob Dylan: Genius or Commodity' by David Horowitz, © 1964, quoted by kind permission of Peace News, London; 'Sounds Authentic: Black Music, Ethnicity and the Challenge of a Changing Same' by Paul Gilroy, © 1991, quoted by kind permission of Paul Gilroy; 'From Refrain to Rave: the Decline of Figure and the Rise of Ground' by Philip Tagg © 1993, quoted by kind permission of Philip Tagg; and 'Bob Dylan and the Poetry of Salvation' by Steven Goldberg, used with permission.

Finally, the author wishes to thank those who commissioned articles from him from which small amounts of published and unpublished material have been revised within the present work, from fragments of an October 1967 article in OZ through to observations on Meridian MS made possible by the commissioning of the article on trains in Mississippi by the Weekend Telegraph, September 25, 2004. In between, the author thanks in particular commissioning editors at Melody Maker in the 1970s, the Telegraph fanzine and The Independent in the 1980s, Homer, the slut and Isis fanzines, The Times and Daily Telegraph and the part-work The Blues Collection plus Germinal Verlag, the publishers of the book Bob Dylan: Funfzig Jahre . . . in the 1990s, and Judas!, Uncut, the Weekend Telegraph and the Observer Music Monthly in the 2000s.

Preface

This is essentially the book of a critic. It was prompted by a number of people being kind enough to urge that material 'hidden' within the long and discursive chapters of my critical study Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, including the fruits of a great deal of research undertaken for that work, should be made available in a more accessible, more reference-based way. But as the present book grew, and ever greater amounts of non-Song & Dance Man material demanded inclusion, it seemed more fun and more interesting to base the entries on people, where possible, rather than on, say, tours or even songs. I hope that what emerges, as well as a gathering together of much disparate information in one place, is a sense of the boundless, obdurate creativity of large numbers of people, coming and going and bumping into the world of Bob Dylan in their greatly differing ways en route.

What I hope emerges too is a proper sense that to burrow into Dylan's art at length and in detail is not to shut the door on the wider world in pursuit of a narrow obsession but rather to open up that wider world, to be sent down a thousand boulevards, to hear different musics and read other authors, and to listen out for the myriad voices of the clamorous past: not least the voices of those who did not make records or write books but whose lives and labours have helped inform our own.

Bob Dylan's reach is too wide, too deep and too long for any book about him to cover it all. He's a senior citizen. His career spans 45 years of American history, and that history has intersected with his prolific songwriting, recording, touring, acting, filmmaking, TV appearances and interviews. He has published a novel and a book of drawings, composed for film soundtracks and written a best-selling first volume of memoirs. He has found a place in the world of literature and academic study as well as in popular music. He is important to the history of the times, having given voice to a generation at a time of huge social change and political struggle; his songs are enmeshed in the story of the US civil rights movement as well as the Folk Revival movement. His busy life has embraced everything from bohemian excess to being Born Again.

His work has revolutionised song, reaching into every area of popular music from folk to blues to rock to gospel. He has met and worked with untold hundreds of musicians, politicians, celebrities, singers, poets, writers, painters, film-makers, actors and activists. He has released several dozen albums, written many hundreds of songs, in many cases adapting them from older folk and blues material, and recorded songs by many other composers. He has been the subject of an enormous number of books, academic conference papers, showbiz stories, essays and concert reviews. He has attracted more fanzine enthusiasm, and inspired more websites, than almost anyone in the world.

In order to resist the forces of infinity pushing the book beyond all bounds, in principle I have omitted background business people such as concert promoters, accountants, lawyers, managers, music publishers, booking agents, film producers and so on. No doubt a scrutiny of these would make an interesting book but this is not it. I have also omitted most photographers, album-cover designers and magazine editors, though a very few photographers whose Dylan shots are iconic are included. I have also omitted people whose only connection with Dylan is that they have made cover versions of his songs.

The different kinds of entry that are here include: some key moments from Dylan's career and life; singers, musicians, songwriters and composers who have influenced Dylan and/or worked with him; writers, poets and other non-musical cultural figures who have impacted on Dylan's work and/or who are mentioned within it, in each case delineating the sometimes surprising ways in which they connect to Dylan's work; critical assessments and factual details (including place and date of recording, date of release and original catalogue numbers) for all Dylan's albums and for individual songs from all through Dylan's decades of work; critical assessments and factual details on Dylan's own books and films; relevant music critics, authors of books and major websites on Dylan; and topics like artists v. critics, angels, Dylan interpeters, the co-option of real music by advertising, early 1960s pop music, Beat poetry, rock'n'roll, country blues, pre-20th century American poetry, Dylan fanzines, cowboy heroes, the use of film dialogue in Dylan's lyrics and many more.

In other words, there are entries about songs and about albums, about famous and 'obscure' individuals, about ideas and history.

Naturally, though, it is Bob Dylan's art that is the heart of the book: it is his art that has got inside our heads, has changed the world around us and justifies his being paid so much attention. If in 100 years' time Dylan's art goes unheard and discounted, well, in 200 years' time it may bounce back. If not, The Bob Dylan Encyclopedia might help some scholar of the future to sift through the rusted nuts and bolts of our mistaken enthusiasm. We can't know. But this book is my own large bet that we were on the right track all along.

How to Read This Book

Like the instructions on how to play a perfectly simple board game, what follows sounds far more complicated than the actual practice it tries to explain. If, therefore, the explanation below makes you want to throw the book across the room, please remember that the book is very heavy; also that you can of course read it how you like, and without referring to this guidance ever again.

Song titles, essay/article titles and television programmes and series are given inside single quotation marks; album titles, book titles and film titles are given in italics. Short quotations from other works and other people are given within single quotation marks; longer quoted passages are given as inset paragraphs.

For most entries, there is a main text and then, inside square brackets and in smaller print, some endnotes. Each main text is complete in itself, and you need feel no duty to wade through the endnotes at all. But should you demand to know publication details of the particular sources drawn upon for the facts offered in the entry, or for particular books or articles quoted, or discographical details of records mentioned, this is where those details will be, so that you don't have to go backwards and forwards between the entry and somewhere else hundreds of pages away in the process.

Within the main text, the appearance of CAPITALS or ITALIC CAPITALS inside an entry indicates that the topic receives an entry of its own—with the exception of works of Dylan himself, in order to avoid an unnecessary blizzard of capitals.

If an entry relates to a person, the entry heading will include the year of birth for that person, where known, and the year of death if known and applicable. If the entry relates to a work—a song, an album, a film—never officially released, or released only in a much later retrospective collection, the entry heading will include the year that piece of work was created; if the entry relates to an officially issued work, the date will be the year of its first release.

Within the endnotes, publication details will follow convention. That is, details about a book will be author, title, place of publication, name of publisher, year of publication. There may be additional information. Example:

> Levon Helm (with Stephen Davis), This Wheel's on Fire: Levon Helm and the Story of The Band, New York: William Morrow, 1993 & Chicago: A Capella Books, 2000.

Details given about an article will be author, title, name of journal, issue number and date, place of publication, date. Example:

> Brian Walden, 'Questionnaire: John Lee Hooker', Q no.85, London, Oct 1993.

Details given about an online source will be author where stated, nature or title of text where stated, date of composition where stated, URL and when accessed online. The URL as given begins by including 'http://' only when this is not followed by 'www'. Example:

> Jim Keltner quoted from interview by Don Zulaica, seen online 6 Jan 2006 on the Drummerworld website at www.drummerworld.com/drummers/Jim_Keltner.html.

Film details given will be the title, the director's name, the production company or companies, country of origin and year of release. Additional information may be given. Example:

> Heaven's Gate, dir. & written Michael Cimino; Partisan Productions/UA, US, 1980.

Discographical data: the amount of discographical information offered varies. At its fullest it will give, in this order:

name of artist
name of track or album place and date of recording label and catalogue number for release city or country of issue year of issue

but recording data is not always included. If place and date of recording are given, they always appear ahead of the name of the record label. Example:

> Fats Domino: 'The Fat Man', New Orleans, 10 Dec 1949, Imperial 5058, LA, 1950.

This indicates that Domino's record 'The Fat Man' was recorded in New Orleans on December 10, 1949, and was released as a single on Imperial Records, catalogue no. 5058, and issued from Los Angeles, the label's HQ, in 1950. Sometimes the track will only have been issued on an album, and therefore the information will proceed like this:

> Bo Diddley: 'Hey, Red Riding Hood', Chicago, 25 Jul 1965, 500% More Man, Checker LP(S) 2996, Chicago, 1965.

However, if no recording information were given, the example above would go straight from the title to the release information, like so:

> Bo Diddley: 'Hey, Red Riding Hood', 500% More Man, Checker LP(S) 2996, Chicago, 1965.

Sometimes, when information ought to be there but is not known, the letters nia (meaning no information available) are inserted in place of the missing data—e.g. here, where the catalogue no. of the album is not known:

> Merle Haggard: Strangers, Hollywood, 1965, Capitol, nia, US, 1965.

NB. In this example, where the record referred to is the whole album, rather than a specific track, the place and date of recording come after the album title; but as ever, this information still precedes the naming of the record label. It should therefore be clear that 'Hollywood 1965' is place and date of recording, and that 'US, 1965' is place and date of release.

In the case of pre-war recordings, the release data will relate to its first release on vinyl—the purpose of this being to clarify when it would most likely have first become accessible to the post-war listener. Example:

> Frank Hutchison: 'Stack a Lee', NY, 28 Jan 1927, American Folk Music, Folkways FP 251–253, NY, 1952.

Sometimes CD-reissue information is also given, and again this will normally be data on the first CD reissue, unless otherwise stated.

A

Aaronson, Kenny [1952 -] Kenny Aaronson was born on April 14, 1952 in Brooklyn, New York. After playing drums, he switched to bass (the bass line to THE BYRDS' 'Mr. Tambourine Man' was learnt very early); he dropped out of high school to play in a group called Dust, which cut two albums, and then joined Stories and played on 'Brother Louie', which became a US no.1 hit in 1973. The band shriveled away, Aaronson toured with Hall & Oates, who were the support to LOU REED; then with Leslie West, then—and this was for three years and six albums—with Rick Derringer, mostly touring as support to mega-groups like Aerosmith, Foreigner, Boston and Led Zeppelin. In the 1980s it was Edgar Winter, Billy Squier, Foghat, Sammy Hagar, Brian Setzer and then Billy Idol. An impressive list of the truly dreadful.

From there he joined Bob Dylan, to be the first bass player on what would later be known as the Never-Ending Tour, starting on June 7, 1988 in Concord, California, and completing a total of 70 more concerts by the end of the year. He was great, too: he sounded punk and funky, and he looked fabulously skinny and modern. In 1989, after Dylan finished recording Oh Mercy in New Orleans and went back on the road, Aaronson was there again, rehearsing in New York in mid-May and then beginning the concerts on May 27 in Andarum, Sweden. After Stockholm came Helsinki, Dublin, Glasgow, Birmingham and London, but Aaronson was unable to play the first of the two nights in Dublin on June 3—his friend TONY GARNIER stepped in—and had to drop out again after the London concert on June 8.

He was suffering from skin cancer, and left to return to the US for surgery, believing he'd been reassured that he could come back in when he was ready. In the meantime, Tony Garnier replaced him. The tour continued through Holland, Belgium, France, Spain, Italy and Greece, where the band played Athens on June 28. Three days later they opened in the States, beginning in Peoria, Illinois, and playing a further 43 concerts by the end of August.

Aaronson came back in the middle of this run—he turned up, and played in place of Garnier, at Wantagh, New York, on July 23: but Dylan wouldn't take him back after all, and this was the last time he played. Notoriously, Dylan is reported to have told him: 'I don't give a shit who plays bass.' Inertia kept the less interesting player in the band instead. Kenny Aaronson had played at a total of some 75 Dylan concerts.

Since then he's gone back to his old ways: Dave Edmunds, Joan Jett . . .

Abrams, Harvey [1938 -] Harvey Alan Abrams was born in Hennepin County, Minnesota, on June 18, 1938. He was a student near a contemporary of Dylan's in Minneapolis in 1960—and he's the one who gave ROBERT SHELTON that great quote, 'Dylan was the purest of the pure. He had to get the oldest record and, if possible, the Library of Congress record, or go find the original people who knew the original song.'

Abrams met Dylan in the summer of 1960, and told Shelton that by that point Dylan 'had already written a couple of beautiful songs, like "The Klan"' (in fact Dylan hadn't written this song at all; he'd picked it up from WALT CONLEY in Colorado).

Dylan, Abrams added, 'was playing weekends at the [10 O'Clock] Scholar, earning five dollars a night.' Abrams and a friend rented an old house to turn into a coffee-house, which they called the Bastille. (Dylan mentions it in Chronicles Volume One as the place he first met FLO CASTNER.) At some point he, Dylan and another friend, DAVE MORTON, shared an apartment at 714 15th Avenue SE. Abrams, like DAVE WHITAKER, tried to educate Dylan about politics, and says Dylan 'got a lot of exuberance about it from us', but that Dylan never did deal well with political dogma: 'he probably just identifies with the underdog'.

By 1966, when Dylan was changing the world, Abrams was a social worker, and, according to Shelton, 'bright, tough, articulate'. No update on him could be found for this entry, except that he's believed to be living in Florida.

[Harvey Abrams, quoted in Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Music and Life of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., 1987, pp. 68–69. Other data from the Minnesota Births Index 1935–2002, file no. 1938-MN-019893.]

Ace, Johnny [1929 - 1954] The death, by Russian roulette, of R&B singer and pianist Johnny Ace, backstage in Houston, Texas, in December 1954, is better known now than at the time, though Ace had scored many R&B hits in his brief recording career. Signed to Duke Records in 1952, the following year saw his first hit, 'My Song', after which came eight hits in a row, including 'Cross My Heart', 'Please Forgive Me' and 'Never Let Me Go'.

Born John Marshall Alexander Jr. in Memphis on June 29, 1929, Johnny Ace shot himself on December 24 during a break in the show he was a part of, and died on Christmas Day. 'Pledging My Love' became, posthumously, his biggest hit, in 1955.

His 'Never Let Me Go' was performed as a duet by Dylan and JOAN BAEZ at 21 of 1975's Rolling Thunder Revue shows.

[Johnny Ace: 'Never Let Me Go', Houston, 1954, Duke 132, Houston, 1954.]

Acuff, Roy [1903 - 1992] Roy Acuff was born in miniscule Maynardville, Tennessee, on September 15, 1903, though his family later moved to Knoxville. He grew up wanting to be a sportsman but after suffering from a severe sunstroke that precipitated a nervous breakdown he turned instead to music, learning violin, joining a medicine show and then the Tennessee Crackjacks, who had a radio outlet on WROL in Knoxville.

Acuff's first session, as by Roy Acuff & His Crazy Tennesseeans, yielded him a big hit with an old gospel song, 'Great Speckle Bird' (cut in Chicago in 1936), and he went on to record 120 pre-war sides, including 'Wabash Cannonball'. When he sang 'Bird' on the Grand Ole Opry in 1938 it was a sensation all over again, clinching him a regular slot (on condition that the group change its name to the Smoky Mountain Boys) and launched his climb to huge stardom. He swiftly became so big a cultural figure that when Japanese troops went into battle at Okinawa in WWII, reputedly they shouted 'To hell with Roosevelt, to hell with Babe Ruth, to hell with Roy Acuff!' as they charged. Postwar Acuff flourished but chose to concentrate more on touring than recording. (He released no singles between 1947 and 1958.) In 1962 he became the first living person to be inducted into the Country Music Hall of Fame.

One of Acuff's pre-war recordings was of the popular song 'Drifting Too Far from the Shore', also recorded pre-war by the Monroe Brothers (and by country acts the Carolina Gospel Singers, Arty Hall and Judie & Julie). Dylan re-used the title, though nothing else in the song, in his own Knocked Out Loaded number 'Driftin' Too Far from Shore'. In the MARTIN SCORSESE film No Direction Home the era of country music Dylan heard on the radio when he was growing up, and the kind of 78rpm records people had in their homes up in Hibbing, Minnesota, are suggested by the playing of a post-war recording of the Acuff song by Bill Monroe & the Blue Grass Boys . . . which is problematic, to say the least, because Bill Monroe & the Blue Grass Boys didn't record the song till 1962, and then only released it on an LP; so it was never a 78 and didn't exist when Dylan was growing up. Nor is the version played in No Direction Home the pre-war Monroe Brothers recording—though that was a 78rpm record, recorded at their first session back in 1936, so it's possible that's what should have been illustrated in the film.

Dylan sings a version of Roy Acuff's 'Freight Train Blues' (one of Acuff's earliest hits) on his first album. It is not widely known that the vocal on Acuff's version was not by him but by band member Sam 'Dynamite' Natcher; Acuff's are the train whistle effects. Dylan also says in Chronicles Volume One that his own 'Let Me Die in My Footsteps' is based on an old Acuff ballad—though he doesn't say which, and it's hard to think of any relevant Acuff song. Dylan also remembers that Acuff, always introduced as the 'King of Country Music', was MC on the Grand Ole Opry the first time he heard HANK WILLIAMS.

One more song strongly associated with Acuff, 'Wait for the Light to Shine', was introduced to Dylan's concert repertoire at Spokane, Washington, on October 5, 2001. Between then and the end of the year, he performed it 22 more times, adding a further seven renditions in 2002.

Acuff co-founded the Acuff-Rose music publishing company with Fred Rose in 1942, and among other achievements nurtured the career of Hank Willams. Acuff-Rose sold recently for 100 million dollars. Roy Acuff died in Nashville on November 23, 1992, aged 89.

[Roy Acuff: 'Drifting Too Far from the Shore', Memphis, 6 Jul 1939; 'Freight Train Blues' Chicago, 21 Oct 1936; 'Wait for the Light to Shine', Chicago or Nashville, Dec 1944. Bill Monroe & His Blue Grass Boys: 'Drifting Too Far from the Shore', Nashville, 16 May 1962, I'll Meet You in Church Sunday Morning, Decca DL 4537, NY, 1962; Monroe Brothers: 'Drifting Too Far from the Shore', Charlotte, NC, 17 Feb 1936. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, pp.270 & 95.]

Aikins, Bill [1940 -] Bill Aikins was born on July 16, 1940 in Glen Ridge, New Jersey, but his place in history is that he played keyboards on the Blonde on Blonde session of February 14, 1966 in Nashville. His overriding memory of the session is that 'Dylan would sit there at the piano for hours with the Bible, and then he'd come and say "OK. I'm ready"'. That day they laid down, if you include fragments, a total of 38 takes, including 13 fruitless takes of 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat' and 19 failed takes of '4th Time Around'—but in this case with take 20 they achieved the version released on the album and, after hardly any takes at all, the album version of 'Visions of Johanna'. Not a bad day's work. After which it seems ludicrous to mention that Bill Aikins also did sessions for ex-Joy of Cooking women Toni & Terry's 1973 album Cross Country (produced by WAYNE MOSS) and for Area Code 615 stalwart Mac Gayden's 1976 album Hymn to the Seeker, and, more interestingly perhaps, also played on Bobby Darin's 1969 pseudo-hip album Commitment, which included Dylanesque harmonica on the track 'Mr. & Mrs. Hohner', while another track was called, er, 'Hey Magic Man'. Aikins was, in fact, Darin's Musical Director and conductor, from March 1969 until Darin's death in December 1973. He also played on the SIMON & Garfunkel sessions that yielded 'I Am a Rock'.

These days, Bill Aikins works as a Worship Leader in a Praise and Worship band at a Las Vegas branch of the California-based Church of the Foursquare Gospel.

[Background detail and quote re Dylan from Bill Aikins, phone call to this writer 12 Apr 2006.]

Alarm, the The Alarm began in 1978 as a band called Seventeen in Rhyl, North Wales, comprising Mike Peters, Nigel Twist, Dave Sharp and Eddie MacDonald. Then they became Alarm Alarm, and then the Alarm. They moved to London at the start of the 1980s, found a manager, Ian Wilson, and got a record deal with IRS. BONO saw them live and offered them a U2 support slot in the US in 1983, which led to a small headline tour of their own. Then they had hits, opened for the Pretenders' 1985 world tour, had more hits, met Elliot Roberts, sometime Bob Dylan manager, dumped Ian Wilson in Roberts' favour, made friends with NEIL YOUNG, went on another huge tour behind their album Eye of the Hurricane and in June 1988 found themselves as Dylan's support act: the first support act of the Never-Ending Tour. On August 4, at his concert in Hollywood, Dylan brought them on to augment his own band for the last encore number of the night, 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'. Peters, Twist and MacDonald shared vocals, and Dave Sharp played guitar. The same thing happened again on August 7 in Santa Barbara, the Alarm's last night with Dylan. They had played 40 shows. It did them no good—they were disintegrating anyway, and within a couple of years had broken up—and it's doubtful it did Bob Dylan any good either. Dave Sharp subsequently made two solo albums, Hard Travelin' (1991) and Downtown America (1994), produced by ex-Dylan producer BOB JOHNSTON.

[The Alarm's non-Dylan history potted from the unused liner notes intended for the 1998 album The Best of the Alarm and Mike Peters by Steve Fulton, seen online 27 Oct 2005 at www.thealarm.com.]

'Alberta' [1970] The song 'Alberta', which Dylan sings twice on Self Portrait—as 'Alberta No.1' and then as the not very different 'Alberta No.2', seems first to have come together as a DOC WATSON rag doll of traditional black and white lyric off-cuts, pinned and dressed up with a few arty chords, with Doc sounding not unlike Jim Reeves. It was issued on his LP Southbound in 1966. Dylan scraps the arty chords and some of the words, and tacks in some others. The results, though casually reminiscent of 'Corrina Corrina', 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down' and 'Girl of the North Country', are dull, but not as dull as Doc's.

[Doc Watson: 'Alberta', Southbound, Vanguard VSD-79213, NY (Fontana TFL 6074, London), 1966, CD-reissued Vanguard VMD 79213-2, NY, 1988 (London, 1995). His 'Alberta' was also reissued on The Essential Doc Watson, nia, 1973 (Vanguard 45/46, London, 1976), CD-reissued The Essential Doc Watson Vol.1, Vanguard VMCD 7308, NY, 1987.]

Alexander, Arthur [1940 - 1993] Arthur Alexander was born on May 10, 1940 in Florence, Alabama, just five miles from Sheffield and Muscle Shoals. His father played gospel slide guitar (using the neck of a whiskey bottle); his mother and sister sang in a local church choir.

Dylan covers Arthur Alexander's début single, 'Sally Sue Brown', made in 1959 and released under his nickname June Alexander (short for Junior), on his Down in the Groove album. You can't say he pays tribute to Alexander with this, because he makes such a poor job of reviving it. (See also recording quality and cynicism.)

It was really with 'You Better Move On' that Arthur Alexander made himself an indispensable artist. He wrote this exquisite classic while working as a bell-hop in the Muscle Shoals Hotel. And then he made a perfect record out of it, produced by Rick Hall at his original Fame studio (an acronym for Florence, Alabama Music Enterprises), which was an old tobacco barn out on Wilson Dam Highway. Leased to Dot Records in 1961, 'You Better Move On' was a hit and helped Hall to build his bigger Fame Studio, which later attracted the likes of Aretha Franklin and Wilson Pickett. In 1969 Fame's studio musicians opened their own independent studio, Muscle Shoals Sound, where Dylan would later make his gospel albums Slow Train Coming and Saved.

Despite this hit and its influence on other artists, however, while an EP of his work was highly sought-after in the UK, Arthur Alexander was generally received with indifference by the US public, and his career stagnated. After years of personal struggle with drugs and health problems (he was hospitalized several times in the mid-1960s, sometimes at his own request, in a mental health facility in southern Alabama), he returned in the 1970s, first with an album on Warner Brothers and then with a minor hit single in 1975, 'Every Day I Have to Cry Some'.

One of Arthur Alexander's innovations as a songwriter was the simple use of the word 'girl' for the addressee in his songs. When he first used it, it had a function: it was a statement of directness, it instantly implied a relationship; but soon, passed down through LENNON and McCARTNEY to every 1964 beat-group in existence, it became a meaningless suffix, a rhyme to be paired off with 'world' as automatically as 'baby' with 'maybe'. This couldn't impair the precision with which Arthur Alexander wrote, the moral scrupulousness, the distinctive, careful way that he delineated the dilemmas in eternal-triangle songs with such finesse and economy. All this sung in his unique, restrained, deeply affecting voice. Rarely has moral probity sounded so appealing, so human, as in his work. Listen not only to 'You Better Move

On' but to the equally impeccable 'Anna' and 'Go Home Girl' and the funkier but still characteristic 'The Other Woman'.

Arthur Alexander is also one of the many R&B artists whose work was happy to incorporate children's song, as so much of Dylan's work does (most especially, of course, the album Under the Red Sky in 1990). Alexander's 1966 single 'For You' incorporates the title line and the next from the children's rhyming prayer 'Now I lay me down to sleep' (the next line is 'And pray the Lord my soul to keep'), which first appeared in print in Thomas Fleet's The New-England Primer in 1737.

The ROLLING STONES covered 'You Better Move On'; THE BEATLES covered 'Anna'; and it was after Arthur Alexander cut Dennis Linde's song 'Burning Love' in 1972 that ELVIS PRESLEY covered that one. Add to that the fact that Dylan covered 'Sally Sue Brown', and you have a pretty extraordinary level of coverage for an artist who remains so far from a household name.

After his 1975 hit, he went back on the road briefly but didn't enjoy it; he felt he'd received no money from the record's success and meanwhile he 'had found religion and got myself completely straight', so he quit the music business and moved north. By the 1980s he was driving a bus for a social services agency in Cleveland, Ohio, when, to his surprise, Ace Records issued its collection of his early classics, A Shot of Rhythm and Soul—which included reissue of that first (and by now super-rare) single, 'Sally Sue Brown'. His attempt at another comeback, in the early 1990s, yielded an appearance at the Bottom Line in New York City, another in Austin, Texas, and the Nonesuch album Lonely Just Like Me, which included several re-recordings. 'Sally Sue Brown' was one of them. As on the original 'You Better Move On', the musicians included SPOONER OLDHAM.

It all came too late. Arthur Alexander died of a heart attack in Nashville on June 9, 1993. A few months earlier, on February 20, his biographer, Richard Younger, went to interview him, at a Cleveland Holiday Inn. 'He told me,' wrote Younger, that 'he had no old photos of himself, nor any of his old records, and had never even heard many of the cover versions of his songs. I had anticipated this and brought along a copy of Bob Dylan's version of "Sally Sue Brown". With the headphones pressed to his ears, Arthur moved back and forth in his seat. "Bob's really rocking," he said.' It was a generous verdict.

[Arthur Alexander: 'Sally Sue Brown', Sheffield, AL, 1959, Judd 1020, US, 1960; 'You Better Move On' c/w 'A Shot of Rhythm and Blues', Muscle Shoals, AL, 2 Oct 1961, Dot 16309, US, 1962; 'Anna', Nashville, Jul 1962, Dot 16387, 1962; 'Go Home Girl', Nashville, c.Sep 1962, Dot 16425, 1963; '(Baby) For You' c/w 'The Other Woman', Nashville, 29 Oct 1965, Sound Stage 7 2556, US, 1965; 'Burning Love', Memphis, Aug 1971, on Arthur Alexander, Warner Bros. 2592, US, 1972; 'Every Day I Have to Cry Some', Muscle Shoals, Jul 1975, Buddah 492, US, 1975; A Shot of Rhythm and Soul, Ace CH66, London, 1982; Nashville, 12–17 Feb 1992, Lonely Just Like Me, Elektra Nonesuch 7559-61475-2, 1993. Special thanks for input and detail to Richard Younger, author of Get a Shot of Rhythm & Blues: The Arthur Alexander Story, Tuscaloosa, AL: University of Alabama Press, 2000; quote is p.168.]

Alk, Howard [1930 - 1982] Howard Alk was born on October 25, 1930 in Chicago. He was described as a great 'bear of a man' not only by LARRY SLOMAN, who encountered him on the Rolling Thunder Revue in 1975, but by Bernard Sahlins, who remembered Alk from Chicago in the 1950s.

Sahlins and Alk plus director Paul Sills were the three founders of the theatre company the Second City, which took premises on the corner of Wells Street and Lincoln Avenue and opened its first production on December 16, 1959. All three were graduates of the University of Chicago; Sills was already a theatre director, Sahlins an enthusiast who had sold his shares in a tape-recorder factory to pursue the theatrical life, and Howard Alk was their 'pipeline to the counterculture'. This was crucial, since what they were attempting with the Second City was less a conventional theatre than a coffee-house type of environment, since Chicago then entirely lacked any center or focus for Beat bohemian culture.

Alk 'couldn't act, play the guitar or sing, but he managed to do all those things convincingly', Sahlins recalled. Alk 'had a highly developed sense of irony, a voracious appetite for high-level gossip and a well-developed nose for trends and fakery . . . his incisive knowledge of young, avant-garde thinking was invaluable at the start.' He checked the others' tendency 'to be awed by the intellectual and was quick with the witty analysis of life's contradictions. It was he who defined a Freudian slip as "meaning to say one thing and saying a mother."' Alk's ex-wife Jones Cullinan remembers him from this period as a great reciter of pretend-Latin and inventor of satiric comic characters: 'He made a great Superjew!'

Alk stayed with the Second City company only a few months; he quickly tired of acting, was replaced by Alan Arkin and went on to other things. By this time he had already worked as film editor on a short black and white movie, Cry of Jazz, directed by Edward Bland and co-written by Bland and Nelam Hill, released in 1959 and described as a 'Discussion of jazz and the role of African-Americans in the United States'.

By early 1963 Alk was opening and running a music venue, the Bear. That other bear-like figure, ALBERT GROSSMAN, booked Bob Dylan to appear there that April. Grossman and Alk had met in New York a year or two earlier. Dylan did two unpaid performances at the Bear 'for the exposure', and he and Howard Alk promptly developed a friendship that lasted the rest of Alk's life.

Accounts vary greatly as to the importance of the work of Howard and Jones Alk (they had married in Chicago on the last day of 1964) in the making of the Dylan movie Don't Look Back, and how they were brought into it in the first place. In summary, the D.A. PENNEBAKER version is that the Alks were brought in to assist because, being friends of Dylan's, they'd be cheap to employ. 'Howard Alk,' he said later, 'was kind of helping out. I think I had a camera for Howard'; he calls it 'a fallback camera'. But this is to denigrate Alk's contribution, though he wasn't primarily a cameraman but an editor. The Alk version is that they were brought in before Pennebaker and that though it became the latter's film, they were crucial throughout. This seems essentially correct. (For more detail see separate entry on the film.)

At any rate, the following year, when the same team of people filmed Dylan on tour in the UK again for Eat the Document, their rôles were very different. This time Pennebaker wasn't the auteur director but, like Alk, the hired hand working on what was emphatically Dylan's film. Alk now had more clout. Pennebaker wasn't impressed; he thought Dylan was 'very influenced by Howard's film ideas, which didn't interest me much, frankly, at the time, and they still don't.'

This was the core of it: as well as doing more of the filming this time around, Alk duly became the film editor, working alongside (and perhaps advising) Dylan. They started work on the film in June 1966 but were interrupted by Dylan's motorcycle crash that July. They resumed work on what was originally intended as a one-hour television film (it had been commissioned by ABC-TV), worked on it in fits and starts through much of 1967 and worked on it again in 1968.

In the end, Dylan came to feel that the footage was hopeless—how wrong he was can be seen from MARTIN SCORSESE's use of it in No Direction Home—though this was mostly because Dylan had lost whatever small interest he'd ever had in the concert footage (strange but true) and was mainly interested in the tiresome little staged scenes of stoned, amateur acting that took place in hotel rooms and 'on the road' as the tour progressed. Eat the Document was released minimally; it was premiered at an art-house cinema in New York City on February 8, 1971 and has rarely seen the official light of day since (though it has circulated on bootleg videos and DVDs).

As CLINTON HEYLIN notes, however, what came of it was 'an idea for a film to be directed by Dylan, with Alk advising. The product of this resolve was realized years later in the making of Renaldo & Clara. That this epic film was an eventual result of the months of labour on Eat the Document is evident from many parallels of style, structure and symbolism in the two films.'

In the interim, Howard Alk worked on other films. He worked as editor on Murray Lerner's magnificent musical documentary film Festival (starring everyone from JOAN BAEZ to Cousin Emmy and from SON HOUSE to HOWLIN' WOLF), and he was in Woodstock, New York, in 1967, when Dylan and THE BAND were there, editing the avant-garde footage that would become You Are What You Eat, starring Peter Yarrow of PETER, PAUL & MARY, plus The Band's about-to-be producer, John Simon, plus Tiny Tim, PAUL BUTTERFIELD, Barry MacGuire, DAVID CROSBY and JOHN HERALD. This film was shot and directed by Alk's friend Barry Feinstein, who was also a photographer: his is the cover shot on Dylan's Bootleg Series Vol. 7: No Direction Home 2-CD set. You Are What You Eat came out in 1968, and was about as widely seen as Eat the Document.

Alk then made two politically radical films with Mike Gray, a founder of the Chicago-based production company the Film Group and later the story and screenplay writer on the prophetic movie The China Syndrome. Alk had been a political radical all along, but like so many, he became more politicised in the second half of the 1960s as the US raged with the turmoil of ghetto riots, war protests and murderous repression by government forces. (By 1978 writer Gerald Peary was asserting that to speak of Alk in other than political terms was 'to misrepresent him' and that he often expressed his 'total support for the programs of the Black Panther Party'.)

The first of the political films, 1969's American Revolution 2, focused on the infamous 1968 Democratic Party Convention in Alk's hometown, Chicago; the second was The Murder of Fred Hampton, released in 1971. Gray says (correcting the credits given on the www.imdb.com website database) that 'Howard directed both films and I was director of photography and producer.' He gives this account of how it all happened:

'Howard came back to Chicago in late September of 1968 at my request. He had been working in New York with Dylan on Eat the Document. I had shot footage of the Democratic Convention in August and that fall we collaborated on the film. . . . We finished shooting in January 1969 and immediately shifted our focus to Fred Hampton, whom we followed for what turned out to be the last nine months of his life.' Jones says: 'Howard's great idea was to make films with people instead of about people. That's what made these films so good.'

In 1971 the Alks went to India, encouraged by Albert Grossman's wife Sally's enthusiasm after their own trip. Howard made a film there too, having connected with the musicians Grossman had brought over to Woodstock years earlier, the Bauls of Bengal, who can be seen on the front cover of Dylan's album John Wesley Harding. Alk's film was a 50-minute feature, Bauls of Bengal: Luxman Baul's Movie shot on video in Birbhum District, Bengal, in Bengali and English (with English subtitles). The finished film had Sally Grossman as narrator and producer; Alk was its director and editor.

Howard Alk came back from India; Jones Alk stayed out there and then flew to Europe for another prolonged trip. This was the end of their marriage. Howard went out to the West Coast and worked as editor on the Hollywood movie A Safe Place, directed by Henry Jaglom and starring Orson Welles and Tuesday Weld. Alk, brought in by producer Bert Schneider, goes uncredited because of problems over union recognition.

In 1974, Alk released his posthumous film about Janis Joplin, Janis, co-directed by Seaton Findlay, and the following year turned his attention back to Dylan, rejoining him to start shooting the 1975 Rolling Thunder Revue and its circus of performers for what became Renaldo & Clara.

Alk and Dylan, working together again, started editing their substantial concert footage and their 80-plus hours of non-concert footage, at the beginning of 1976. It took months, was interrupted by the second Rolling Thunder Revue, and, within it, the filming of the 'Hard Rain' TV Special at Fort Collins, Colorado, on May 23, again made by Howard Alk (see separate entry). He was almost certainly involved too, in the shelved alternative film from Clearwater, Florida, that April 22. A further concentrated six months of work on Renaldo & Clara took place in 1977.

Released in 1978, it showed clear signs of Alk's input, especially, as Heylin put it, in 'one major, sustained sequence—the brilliantly rendered series of street interviews about HURRICANE CARTER', a sequence that 'shows both his political solidarity with black America (and his commitment to using the camera to let the disenfranchised speak for themselves) and his trademark of cutting from conversation to music and back again to emphasize points and set contexts.'

Heylin suggests too that Alk's interest in the Black Panthers would have been what prompted Dylan to the fruitless meeting that 'supposedly took place between Dylan and Huey Newton and David Hilliard' in 1970. Alk commented years later that 'Bob Dylan is by nature not a political person'. In more recent years too, people have lined up to say that Dylan was apolitical. But this may be misleading, granted how strong his instinct for the underdog and for liberty has always been. The Dylan who stays quiet about his reluctant meeting with the Panthers stays so about many things, mistrusts organisations and orthodoxy ('There is only up wing and down wing') and will have understood his own inevitable irrelevance to the Panther programme. And just as the power of Alk's politics derives not from dogma but from his trust in those 'who have been stepped on and victimised', so there is nothing apolitical in Dylan's consistent and similar solidarity with the pawns in society's game. While Alk made The Murder of Fred Hampton, Dylan had made 'The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll'. The unsatisfactory Panthers meeting didn't put Dylan off visiting Hurricane Carter in jail five years later (however misguidedly); and in the same era in which Alk made his political films, Dylan came out with the record 'George Jackson'.

Alk's influence may have been marked but he surely didn't insert politics into Renaldo & Clara despite Dylan. The 'Hurricane' sequence is clearly a co-production. Whatever the film achieves or doesn't, it offers a survey of North America—and while TV reportage deliberately keeps non-WASP America invisible, the special strength of Renaldo & Clara's survey is the high visibility it insists on giving to this other America. Two things about this are clear: it makes for a politically radical act, and it reflects Bob Dylan's vision as much as Howard Alk's.

Before they saw how badly it was received upon its release in 1978, Alk and Dylan planned to make further films. Alk announced: 'You can believe that Bob is fully committed to filmmaking. That we are discussing the next two films.'

These didn't happen, but Alk's association with Dylan continued. He took the front and back cover photographs of Dylan used on the Street Legal album of 1978 and all the photos in the songbook for the 1981 album Shot of Love, and he filmed at least two of that year's Dylan concerts (Avignon on July 25 and Boston on October 21) and attended most of the rest. The fall tour began with two nights in Milwaukee (a bizarre place to launch a tour, Jones teased Bob), and Howard Alk was using a new camera to film Dylan, CLYDIE KING and others in the hotel after the first concert, that October 16.

Alk was still with the Dylan tour in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, that October 25 when he turned 51 and Dylan sang him 'Happy Birthday' during the encore. That the two men had remained close friends all through the long years of working together is also suggested by it being Howard Alk who was around to take the most informal pictures of Dylan shown in the booklet inside the 1985 Biograph box set, including the delicately intimate pictures of Dylan and Clydie King from 1980–81.

Alk also had time in 1981 to appear in a small acting rôle: as a party guest in the car-racing drama, Noel Nosseck's King of the Mountain. By this time, however, he is alleged to have become a heroin addict; re-married, he had separated from his current wife and on December 31, hanging out at Dylan's old stomping ground, Santa Monica's Rundown Studios, he was desperately low and was trying to phone people to say he was going to kill himself. This depression was the flipside to his tremendously energetic engagement with people. One of those he called was ex-wife Jones, who happened to be home changing between parties. It was New Year's Eve. It was also their wedding anniversary, he reminded her. She said no it wasn't, because they weren't married anymore. She said she'd ring round to try to get someone nearby to come and see him, but everyone was out, including Dylan, and Howard gave her the wrong number to call back. He went ahead and killed himself; he was found dead at the studio on New Year's Day 1982.

'Howard was one of a kind,' says Mike Gray: 'He deserves an entry in every encyclopedia.'

[Bernard Sahlins: Days and Nights at the Second City: A Memoir, Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2002, quoted online 29 Oct 2005 at http://sctvguide.ca/features/sahlins.htm. Clinton Heylin, 'A Profile of Howard Alk' in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, eds. Michael Gray & John Bauldie, London: Futura edn., 1988, pp.146 & 150. Gerald Peary quoted from ditto, p.149; Alk quoted ditto p.152. Mike Gray, e-mail to this writer 30 Oct 2005. Other information from Jones Cullinan, phone interview with this writer, 1 Nov 2005.]

'All Along the Watchtower' [1968] Recorded on November 6, 1967, this spare, dark song came out of the John Wesley Harding sessions that yielded such a stark rebuke to the 'summer of love' and such a contrast to Dylan's previous mid-1960s work.

The nature of the language in this song, as it struck us when it was new, was a sort of impressionism revisited, but no longer reflecting summer tension in the city, as did Blonde on Blonde, and instead reflecting winter time in the psyche (helped by having an allusion within it to T.S. ELIOT's The Wasteland: 'all the women came and went', sings Dylan, echoing Eliot's 'the women come and go').

How does it end, this stark song? There used to be two alternatives. Either it was experienced as circular, drawing an added element of menace from the very endlessness of the nightmare vision offered, with the song going round and round, so that the helpless cry 'There must be some way out of here' recurs after 'The wind began to howl'. Or else, if it were not experienced as circular in that way, then it was felt to end, as Richard Goldstein argued in a Village Voice review, on an emphatic full-stop—indeed, a terrifying full-stop. Just three clean, razor-sharp verses, with an end that signifies the end of everything: 'Outside in the distance / A wild cat did growl / Two riders were approaching / The wind began to howl.' As Goldstein says, the suggestion of menace in these lines is far too ominous and powerful for them to be concluded with a series of dots.

Dylan, though, has other ideas, and in the last few years he has been performing the song in concert in such a way as to give it a third ending. In this version 'There must be some way out of here' does recur after 'The wind began to howl': but not because the song never ends. Rather, because Dylan chooses to finish in a way that at once reduces its apocalyptic import and hugely cranks up its emphasis on the artist's own centrality. Repeating the first stanza as the last means that Dylan now ends with this: 'Businessmen they drink my wine / Plowmen dig my earth / None of them along the line / Know what any of it is worth' (and this is sung with a prolonged, dark linger on that word 'worth'). It's a lesser ending—but an audacious hijacking of his own song.

The first live performance of 'All Along the Watchtower' was on the opening night of the 'comeback tour' of 1974, in Chicago on January 3, and it was, from the outset, the JIMI HENDRIX version of the song that Dylan offered: heavy rock, rather than the album's eerie acoustic minimalism. It became the most performed of all Dylan songs: one might say the most over-performed. It was eventually given a sustained rest in 1997, after being played at 40 out of 40 concerts in 1974, 110 out of 114 concerts in 1978, 10 out of 19 of 1980's semi-secular concerts, 35 out of 54 shows in 1981, all 27 of 1984's concerts, 11 out of 60 in 1986, 8 out of 36 in 1987, 39 out of 71 in 1988, 63 out of 99 in 1989, 81 out of 92 in 1990, 89 out of 101 in 1991 and 86 out of 92 concerts in 1992.

From August 20, 1992 until August 3, 1997 it became the third song in every Bob Dylan concert. For five years! That last night it came fourth, was then dropped for a few days, reintroduced on August 12th and then dropped properly until resuscitated as the opening number at his 43rd concert of 1998. Thus it had been performed a further 76 times in 1993, 109 times in 1994, 118 times in 1995, 86 times in 1996 and 38 times in 1997. By the end of 1998 this had already totaled a numbing 1,033 performances in 25 years, 690 of them in the 1990s alone. By the end of 2003 the total had reached 1,393. Nothing could be more dramatic, effective or welcome than if he were to come on stage with an acoustic guitar and try to sing it as he'd heard and recorded it in the first place, in late 1967, before Jimi Hendrix.

(Re 'Outside in the distance / A wildcat did growl', see also 'Call Letter Blues'.)

['All Along the Watchtower', Nashville, TN, 6 Nov 1967. Live versions have been included on the albums Before the Flood, Bob Dylan at Budokan, Biograph (the Before the Flood version), Dylan and the Dead and Unplugged.]

Allen, Colin [1938 -] Colin Allen was born in Bournemouth, England, on May 9, 1938. Mainly keen on modern jazz, he took up drums at age 18, while working as an apprentice aircraft fitter. He moved to London on the first day of 1964, along with fellow local-jazzer Andy Summers (later of the Police), becoming a professional musician and founder member of Zoot Money's Big Roll Band, which played with many visiting American blues legends including MEMPHIS SLIM, JOHN LEE HOOKER and SONNY BOY WILLIAMSON, and was the opening act for Otis Redding in England and for James Brown in France. Three years later the band split, and Colin Allen became the drummer with JOHN MAYALL's Bluesbreakers in summer 1968, playing in Europe and touring the US.

In 1969 he joined the recently formed British group Stone the Crows (which featured singer Maggie Bell), and played on all their albums. The group also toured the US twice, once as support act to Joe Cocker's 'Mad Dogs & Englishmen'. In 1974 he became a member of that essentially Dutch band Focus, toured the States with them, contributed to their albums Hamburg Concerto and Ship of Memories but soon quit because there were so many tensions within the group. By the early 1980s he had re-located to Los Angeles, and re-joined John Mayall for several more tours. The other band members were MICK TAYLOR and the Fleetwood Mac bass player John McVie.

Allen has also played on over 50 albums, including Rod Stewart's Foolish Behaviour. He is also a lyric writer, and more than 60 of his songs have been recorded by other people, among them Wings, Fleetwood Mac and MICK RONSON.

More to the point for present purposes he was the drummer on Bob Dylan's 1984 tour of Europe—rehearsing in Los Angeles in May, playing the first concert on May 28 in Verona, Italy, and running through to Slane Castle in Ireland on July 8. Allen played a total of 27 concerts, and inevitably appears on the largely uninspiring album Real Live.

In 1985 Colin Allen moved to Stockholm, Sweden, where he still lives and continues to play. In September 2005 he played with the British Blues All Stars (along with the legendary Peter Green and others) at the Orkney Blues Festival in the Outer Hebrides.

Allen, Woody [1935 -] See Annie Hall*, dismissal of Dylan in.

Allison, Mose [1927 -] Mose Allison was born on November 11, 1927 in tiny Tippo, Mississippi, learnt piano as a child, played in the US Army Band, attended first the University of Mississippi and then gained a BA in English and Philosophy at Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, in 1952. He moved to New York City in 1956, where he played with jazz names like Stan Getz, Zoot Sims and Charlie Byrd, and from 1957 quickly moved record labels from Prestige to Columbia to Atlantic but then stayed with this once-indie label for decades. He was quick at making albums, too: he made eight LPs for Prestige in a three-year period.

Allison was not at all your archetypal blues man, though he did wander towards the blues rather than simply play jazz. He was a sophisticat with an unemotional keyboard style combined with a knowing vocal flippancy, but while he certainly trademarked this finger-snap jazz side to his style—such an unfortunate influence on VAN MORRISON—nevertheless the down-home blues was his basic inspiration and he was a popular Greenwich Village performer whom Dylan certainly encountered. One of the things SUZE ROTOLO emphasises in her testimony is that the Village was explored in its every facet—that she and Dylan, like many others, would try out all kinds of events and venues and genres and art forms.

As she says it: 'You were young, you'd be hanging out, there'd be musicians with you, so you'd go from place to place . . . and people did different things. So it wasn't just to hear folk music. I went to jazz clubs all the time . . . and by the end of the night we'd go down to Chinatown to have some food. . . . there was a lot of stuff going on, culturally going on, and a lot of different ideas through this music, and through the poetry, the jazz, the stand-up, the folk, the whatever.'

Mose Allison's version of 'Baby Please Don't Go' was a fixture of Village musical life, as was his uptown jazz re-interpretation of BUKKA WHITE's 'Parchman Farm', in which Allison paired the line 'Way down on Parchman Farm' with 'The place was loaded with rustic charm'. Though Bob Dylan would never have written such a pay-off line, the act of respecting source material and smiling at it at the same time is something we might recognise as Dylanesque.

Allison was introduced to Dylan by Bill Cosby outside the Village Gate, where Allison was working at the time. He tended to work a month at a time there, plus two or three nights a year as opening act for other people at the Village Vanguard. Cosby told Allison as he introduced Dylan: 'He's into WOODY GUTHRIE'. Mose Allison had no interest in Guthrie whatsoever, but somebody gave him Dylan's début album and he liked it. He thought 'it was different, the sound and the tunes. And I liked the humor: I liked "Talkin' New York".'

A few weeks later Dylan and JOHN HAMMOND JR. came to one of his shows at the Village Vanguard, and later still, when he was back working at the Gate, Allison remembers driving Dylan around in his car one time, and an evening 'sitting at a table with Bob, telling him about a record I had just heard and thought was good, "Rise to Fall", by Edgar Winter. Minutes later Edgar Winter walked in the place. That's the last time I ever saw Bob except on TV.'

Mose Allison is still up and running, with a youthful speaking voice belied by his looking strikingly similar to LAWRENCE FERLINGHETTI. In 2001 he was a 'special guest' in the movie The Score, directed by Frank Oz and starring Robert de Niro and Marlon Brando. He still performs, and in 2005 the BBC filmed a documentary about him.

He dropped 'Parchman Farm' from his repertoire many years ago.

[Mose Allison quotes: e-mail to & phone-call with this writer, 10 & 12 Nov 2005.]

Alvin, Dave [1955 -] David Alvin was born in Downey, California, on November 11, 1955, younger brother of Phil, with whom he formed the Blasters in 1979. He had learnt guitar in 1970 from T-Bone Walker, one of the creators of modern blues and an electric guitar pioneer whose own earliest tuition had come from BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON, thus providing Alvin with a link right back to the beginnings of the music he loved. The aptly named Blasters gained a huge international cult following, and BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN singled them out as 'a major influence'; but a cult they remained. They made the albums American Music (1980), Blasters (1981), Over There (1982), Non Fiction (1983) and Hard Line (1985); but Dave Alvin, dissatisfied, quit the group in 1986. He promptly joined X as lead guitarist but left again soon after the sessions for their See How We Are album the same year. Several members of X, including Alvin, had also been in a country-music side band named the Knitters, who made the 1985 album Poor Little Critter on the Road.

Alvin then went solo (though he toured with the Blasters in 1987 too), producing a large number of albums starting with 1987's Romeo's Escape (renamed Every Night About This Time in the UK), after which he switched labels. He toured with Mojo Nixon and Country Dick Montana as the Pleasure Barons and did a large amount of session work. His 2000 album Public Domain: Songs from the Wild Land, traditional folk and blues numbers, won him a Grammy as Best Contemporary Folk Album (the same award Dylan had won with Time Out of Mind in 1997).

Alvin's session work included playing on Dylan's 'Driftin' Too Far from Shore'. The basic track was recorded in New York at early sessions for the Empire Burlesque album but left off it; Alvin was one of those brought in to studios at Topanga Park, California, on April 28, 1986 to overdub guitar; the track was issued on that year's Knocked Out Loaded album. Alvin also played guitar that day on Dylan's first attempt at 'You'll Never Walk Alone'; this has not circulated. A year later, in Hollywood studios, Alvin played guitar on similarly unheard versions of 'Look on Yonder Wall', 'Rollin' and Tumblin'', 'Red Cadillac and a Black Mustache' and two takes of 'Rock with Me Baby'. Fifteen years after that, during a Never-Ending Tour concert, Dave Alvin replaced band member CHARLIE SEXTON on 'To Be Alone with You' and 'Lay Lady Lay', consecutive numbers in the middle of Dylan's set of August 31, 2002 at Grand Junction, Colorado. Dylan was reportedly overheard to ask: 'Dave, when are you and Phil getting back together? Man, that stuff was magic!'

In 2005 Alvin was still working with the Knitters, and recording their second album, The Modern Sounds of the Knitters, 20 years after the first. He is also in the Guilty Men. He has not abandoned his solo career.

'Am I Your Stepchild?' [1978] & blues accusation-laments Dylan introduced this song—one of his own compositions—on the first night of the North American leg of the 1978 tour, on September 15 at Augusta, Maine, and played it at a further 52 out of 64 concerts before the tour's end. There were lyric variations every time Dylan sang it, but the live recording from the Oakland, CA, concert of November 13 was used as a Special Rider music-publishing demo. Dylan's final performance of the song was on the tour's last night, December 16 in Hollywood, Florida. He has never performed it since.

'Am I Your Stepchild?' may be an obscure item in Dylan's canon—it is omitted from the official lyrics books and from the list of his songs at www.bobdylan.com—but its lyric tells us something about his interest in blues lyric poetry. It is what Stanley Booth calls 'a blues in the familiar accusation-lament pattern', as is, for example, BLIND WILLIE McTELL's 'Death Cell Blues', from the early 1930s: 'They got me 'cused for murder, and I haven't harmed a man / They got me charged for burglarin', I haven't even raised my hand . . . / They got me 'cused for forging, and I can' even write my name' (in which the pathos is not reliant upon our knowing that the singer is blind), and LONNIE JOHNSON's fastidiously mordant 'I Have to Do My Time', in which 'The judge say I was guilty and he couldn't explain / Charged me with forgery an' I cain't even sign my name.'

Dylan's 1978 song can't match these; but there is a piece of his writing much earlier and more successful than 'Am I Your Stepchild?' into which he imports an echo of such songs, and that is the poem 'My Life in a Stolen Moment': suggesting that even when any persecution he suffered was largely the fantasy-stuff of the middle-class post-adolescent, his affinity for the blues world (and his familiarity with its poetry) ran deep. His poem includes these lines: 'Got jailed for suspicion of armed robbery / Got held four hours on a murder rap / Got busted for looking like I do / An' I never done none a them things.'

Such alert writing. The blues echo is especially clear in that last line, with its perfectly mimicked appeasing cadence, while Dylan good-humouredly acknowledges his myth-making, his inexperience of such outward oppression, with a series of deft disclaimers. That 'four hours' makes something slighter and more acceptable of what would otherwise be the over-the-top, too easily refutable (and too self-aggrandising) claim 'Got held on a murder rap'. Then there's the double-joke of the last line itself: it's a nifty audacity that he can claim never to have looked like he does; and, in the context of the whole fabricated autobiography the poem offers, it's funny that it ends with the laughing admission that it has all been made up.

[Bob Dylan: 'My Life in a Stolen Moment', first published in the program for the New York Town Hall concert, 12 Apr 1963. Blind Willie McTell: 'Death Cell Blues', NY, 19 Sep 1933, The Atlanta Blues, RBF RF15, NY, 1966; CD-reissued The Definitive Blind Willie McTell, Columbia Legacy Roots N' Blues 53234, NY, 1994. Lonnie Johnson: 'I Have to Do My Time', NY, 5 Aug 1930, unissued until the CD Lonnie Johnson Complete Recorded Works Vol. 6, Document DOCD-5068, Vienna, 1991; CD-reissued Roots N' Blues Retrospective, Columbia Legacy Roots N' Blues 47911, NY, 1992.]

American Civil War in World Gone Wrong, the A main feature of the 1993 solo acoustic album World Gone Wrong is its evocation of the American Civil War: all its psychic divides, its North-South, its then-now and its slave-abolitionist flames that have never been extinguished, defeat being still so real and fundamentally defining in the South that it might have happened in the 1990s rather than the 1860s. The modern plaque at the campus entrance to the University of Georgia in Athens, home to 30,000 students and hometown of R.E.M. and the B52s, refers not to the American Civil War but to 'the War for Southern Independence'. Except for the veterans and their families directly involved, the Vietnam War seems longer ago and harder to remember.

It is with 'Two Soldiers' and 'Jack-a-Roe' that Dylan invokes the Civil War's foment. In many versions of 'Jack-a-Roe', not only does the disguised heroine claim that she could 'see ten thousand fall', she participates in the warfare, so that there is much more common ground—common battleground—shared by the two songs than Dylan's version of the latter suggests.

There is a stirring conjunction between these two adjacently placed songs and the eloquent memorial to the defeated Confederate Army in Columbia, state capital of South Carolina—the state that led the breakaway from the Union—about which V.S. Naipaul writes:

'On one side of the monument was engraved: "To South Carolina's dead of the Confederate Army 1861–1865." On another side it said: "Erected by the Women of South Carolina. Unveiled May 13, 1879." There was rhetoric in that reference to women; monuments of grief and revenge, or grief and piety, are most unsettling when they depict women bowed in grief.' (Again, another sub-text of such monuments can be the message that the Civil War matters far more than any other. In BLIND WILLIE McTELL's place of burial, Thomson, Georgia, the town's memorial statue plinth reads 'In Memory of the Women of the Sixties . . .' Everyone understands that this means the 1860s.)

The Columbia memorial reads: 'This monument perpetuates the memory of those who, true to the instincts of their birth, faithful to the teachings of their fathers, constant in their love for the state, died in the performance of their duty: who have glorified a fallen cause by the simple manhood of their lives, the patient endurance of suffering, and the heroism of death, and who, in the dark hours of imprisonment, in the hopelessness of the hospital, in the short, sharp agony of the field, found support and consolation in the belief that at home they would not be forgotten.'

The first half of this, up to 'the heroism of death', is the predictable clamour of patriotism and (white) male supremacy: but how striking, how enlivening for its candour and compassion, is the passage this official monumentese slides into, as into a confession: you don't expect a war memorial to meditate upon 'the dark hours of imprisonment . . . the hopelessness of the hospital' (that phrase seems especially subversive) and 'the short, sharp agony of the field'. It is this humane and feminine second half of the inscription that converges upon 'Two Soldiers' (and that the 'Two Soldiers' are blue-eyed Boston boys of the Yankee army only serves to make the common humanity of both sides reverberate the more poignantly) and 'Jack-a-Roe'.

In the latter, the disguised woman, having claimed that it wouldn't faze her 'to see ten thousand fall', finds her lover 'among the dead and dying': among those, indeed, 'in the short, sharp agony of the field'. In the version Dylan sings, it is nicely ambiguous as to whether she finds her lover a wounded survivor among the dead and dying, or whether he too is truly 'among the dead and dying', after which the doctor tends his wounds but can do nothing to countermand their mortal effect, so that the marriage with which the song then ends is the death-bed marriage: the kind Barbara Allen is too late with her change of heart to offer Sweet William in the version Dylan sings of that ballad.

In 'Two Soldiers'—'a battle song extraordinaire, some dragoon officer's epaulettes laying liquid in the mud, physical plunge into Limitationville. . . . America when Mother was the queen of Her heart,' as Dylan puts it with sumptuous muscularity in the album's unexpected sleevenotes—the soldiers are indeed preoccupied with seeking 'consolation in the belief that at home they should not be forgotten' by the women who do stay and wait.

In this case they wait in vain, for both soldiers turn out to be 'among the dead', not among 'those whom death and doom had spared'. It is also in this simple phrase 'among the dead' and its extension 'and dying', omitted but implicit here, that the two songs come together. There are not only common concerns but common-stock elements in each song, and that this is one they share is shown by those versions of 'Two Soldiers' brought together under varying titles in G. Malcolm Laws' standard work Native American Balladry. In 'The Drummer Boy of Shiloh', 'On Shiloh's dark and bloody ground / The dead and wounded lay around'; in 'A Soldier from Missouri' (aka 'The Kansas Line'), 'A soldier from Missouri / In early manhood's prime / Lay with the dead an' dyin' / In Mississippi's clime'. Yet 'Two Soldiers' ends not with their deaths per se but with the bleakness of their leaving a silence behind, with 'no-one to write' to the women left stranded at home. They are the women who might have paid to raise such a memorial as the one to be found in South Carolina.

Its inscription's end—envisaging that the dying soldiers would find 'consolation in the belief that at home they would not be forgotten'—is itself the lonely consolation of the women. The sensibility of these songs is such as to offer a sisterhood to these disruptive human whispers from within the carved stone: a fluid, oral guardianship of the past running alongside the fixity of its official text.

In the 19-verse version of 'Jack-a-Roe' called 'Jackie Frazier', collected in A.L. Lloyd's Folk Songs of the Americas, her lover unambiguously recovers, and the far less reverberative moral of the story is 'So parents let your children get married as they please' (or, as someone else put it, 'your sons and your daughters are beyond your command'). But as Roscoe Holcomb refashions the story in his tour de force recording 'Across the Rocky Mountain'—a title surely echoed by Dylan's own most recent Civil War song ''Cross the Green Mountain'—the song ends with the callous boast of the heroine, the subsequent discovery of her lover and the pared-down ambiguity of a frantic dash to the doctor, its outcome left unclear. The words duplicate those of 'Jack-a-Roe': 'My cheeks are not too rosy, my fingers not too small / No they would not change my conscience to see ten thousand fall / . . . She's walking through the battlefield a-searching up and down / It's all among the dead and wounded her darling Jack she found / . . . She picked him up all in her arms, she carried him to the town / She took him to the doctor for to quickly heal the wound.'

That we cannot assume a happy ending from the mere invocation of the doctor is also pressed upon us by recalling that the same line—about the doctor, the healing and the wound—is an ingredient in the 'Unfortunate Rake' series of songs, in which despite the physician's attention, the outcome is death. With the happy ending refused, in both the Holcomb and the Dylan versions of the 'Jackie Frazier' song, we're left to question the consolation the heroine receives for having refused to wait passively at home for news from the war, as wives and mothers and sisters more usually must.

Consolation was small either way. The American Civil War was the biggest in the western world in the hundred years between the end of the Napoleonic Wars and the start of World War I. It cost more American lives than the two world wars, Korea and Vietnam combined. On a single day in the wet spring of 1864, May 12, almost 13,000 men died fighting for a patch of ground abandoned within days afterwards. It also introduced the special horrors of 'modern' warfare: the trenches, the prisoner-of-war camp, the first American conscription, ironclad ships, aerial observation, the Gatling gun and propaganda.

'Two Soldiers' focuses upon the Battle of Fredericksburg (the song is sometimes known as 'The Battle of Fredericksburg' and also as 'The Last Fierce Charge'), which took place on December 13, 1862, demoralised the North and heartened the South yet proved the latter's last significant victory (and was largely by default at that). The North lost over 12,000 men and the Confederate South had 5,000 killed or wounded. It was this battle too that brought home to people on both sides the sense that the war might be a remorseless, continuing conflict with no end ever in sight.

Bob Dylan's richly concentrated, somber and ineffably tender version of 'Two Soldiers' draws out of the song every last sorrowful morsel of its skilful encapsulation of this vast, doomed slaughter into the story of two individual doomed innocents and the repercussions of grief and silence that follow from their deaths. It works affectingly despite its historical inaccuracy—there was, for instance, no cavalry engagement at the Battle of Fredericksburg. And even though it is so very difficult to hear all the words as Dylan sings them, you feel when you listen that he sings them extraordinarily well!

Dylan's liner notes say that JERRY GARCIA showed him 'Two Soldiers' and that 'Jack-a-Roe' is a TOM PALEY ballad. 'Two Soldiers' was published in Sing Out! in July 1964. 'Jackaroe' is also released on the fourth JOAN BAEZ album—the one for which Dylan contributed a sleevenote poem; Dylan's 'Jack-a-Roe', 30 years later, uses the Baez version of the text.

Dylan's live début of 'Jack-a-Roe' was at the New York Supper Club (2nd Show) on November 16, 1993, within three weeks of the release of World Gone Wrong; more surprisingly, he débuted his live version of 'Two Soldiers' (with insignificant small variations in the lyric from the album version) five years before he included it on the album: at Sacramento on June 9, 1988, the second concert of the Never-Ending Tour.

(See also ''Cross the Green Mountain'.)

[V.S. Naipaul, A Turn in the South, New York: Knopf, 1989. G. Malcolm Laws Jr., Native American Balladry, Philadelphia: American Folklore Society, revised edn., 1964. A.L. Lloyd, Folk Songs of the Americas, London:

Novello, 1965. Roscoe Holcomb: 'Across the Rocky Mountain', Daisy, VA, 1959, Mountain Music of Kentucky, Folkways FA 2317, NY, 1960; CD-reissued (as 2-CD set with extra tracks) Smithsonian-Folkways SFCD 40077, Washington, D.C., 1996. Sing Out! vol.14, no.3, New York, July 1964. 'Jack Monroe' quoted from The Greig-Duncan Folk Song Collection, Vol.1, ed. Patrick Shuldham-Shaw & Emily B. Lyle, Aberdeen, UK: Aberdeen University Press, 1981. Joan Baez: 'Jackaroe', Joan Baez in Concert, Part 2, Vanguard VRS-9113, NY, 1964. This account has leant on Douglas Welsh, American Civil War: A Complete Military History, London: Bison, 1981 and William Least Heat-Moon, Blue Highways: A Journey into America, London: Picador, 1984 (US 1st edition 1983). Athens & Thomson, GA, inscriptions seen firsthand.]

American Folk Music* [1952, 1997] HARRY SMITH's groundbreaking, essential 6-LP anthology of pre-war white and black recordings was issued in 1952 on Folkways Records under the title American Folk Music (and is therefore so called here). However, it has long been commonly referred to as the Anthology of American Folk Music, a title eventually made official by the CD-reissue of 1997.

When the set was released originally it was the first collection to put black and white American folk musics together instead of keeping them separate, and it provided crucial source material for the whole revivalist scene that was to thrive in Greenwich Village and Boston by the end of that decade.

DAVE VAN RONK wrote in 1991 that the anthology had been its bible. 'We all knew every word of every song on it, including the ones we hated.'

The six LPs came with Harry Smith's notes, which are terrific, not least for their summarising the story-lines of the songs almost in tabloid headline style. For instance, re 'Ommie Wise': 'GREEDY GIRL GOES TO ADAM SPRINGS WITH LIAR: LIVES JUST LONG ENOUGH TO REGRET IT'.

It was an eerie work of archeology altogether. As Luc Santé writes in the CD box-set reissue booklet: 'In 1952, when its contents were only twenty or twenty-five years old, they must have already seemed ancient.'

This pioneering compilation was certainly crucial to Dylan from very early in his career. Of this set's 84 recordings, at least 30 have a Bob Dylan connection: and he had already taped performances of ten of them, and rewritten another two, by the end of 1961.

The ten were 'The House Carpenter' (the anthology's 3rd track is CLARENCE ASHLEY's 1930 recording); 'The Butcher's Boy (The Railroad Boy)' (the anthology's 6th track, by Buell Kazee from 1928); 'The Wagoner's Lad' (7th track, ditto); 'Ommie Wise' (13th: Grayson & Whitter, 1927); 'John the Revelator' (52nd: BLIND WILLIE JOHNSON, 1930); 'The Coo-Coo Bird' (57th: Clarence Ashley again, 1929); 'East Virginia' (58th: Buell Kazee again, 1927 [though Smith says 1929]); 'James Alley Blues' (61st: RICHARD RABBIT BROWN, 1927); 'K.C. Moan' (81st: MEMPHIS JUG BAND, 1929); and 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean' (76th: BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON, 1928).

Dylan also turned the collection's song 'Down on Penny's Farm' (25th: the Bently Boys, 1929: one of the mere two tracks they ever recorded) into his own song 'Hard Times in New York Town', and had turned 'A Lazy Farmer Boy', known also as 'The Young Man Who Wouldn't Hoe Corn' (11th: Buster Carter & Preston Young, 1931 [though Smith says 1930]), into his own 'Man on the Street'.

Further references to material from this collection, and to Dylan's use of it, will be found throughout this encyclopedia.

Before the flurry of commentary on Smith's anthology that came with, and was prompted by, its CD reissue, a distinctive voice on the subject was Robert Cantwell's, in a sometimes mystical essay 'Smith's Memory Theater', first published in 1991. More conventionally, as GREIL MARCUS writes in 'The Old, Weird America', his essay in the CD-reissue package (adapted from his book Invisible Republic: Bob Dylan's Basement Tapes, itself aka The Old Weird America), we can say in summary that the American Folk Music anthology was 'the founding document of the American folk revival'. But don't hold that against it.

[Harry Smith, compiler & sleevenote writer: American Folk Music (6-LP set), Folkways FP251-253, NY, 1952; CD-reissued as Anthology of American Folk Music (6-CD box set) with copious notes by many hands and a CD-ROM of extras, Smithsonian Folkways SRW 40090, Washington, D.C., 1997.

Clarence Ashley: 'The House Carpenter', Atlanta, 14 Apr 1930 & 'The Coo-Coo Bird', Johnson City, TN, 23 Oct 1929. Buell Kazee: 'The Butcher's Boy (The Railroad Boy)', NY, Jan 16, 1928, 'The Wagoner's Lad (Loving Nancy)', NY, 18 Jan 1928 & 'East Virginia', NY, 20 Apr 1927. Grayson & Whitter: 'Ommie Wise', Atlanta, 18 Oct 1927. Blind Willie Johnson: 'John the Revelator', Atlanta, 20 Apr 1930. Richard Rabbit Brown: 'James Alley Blues', New Orleans, 11 Mar 1927. Memphis Jug Band: 'K.C. Moan', Memphis, 4 Oct 1929. Blind Lemon Jefferson: 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean', Chicago, c.Feb 1928. The Bently Boys: 'Down on Penny's Farm', Johnson City, TN, 23 Oct 1929. Buster Carter & Preston Young: 'A Lazy Farmer Boy', NY, 26 Jun 1931.

Robert Cantwell: 'Smith's Memory Theater', New England Review, Middlebury, VT, spring/summer 1991, republished as Ch.6 in Cantwell: When We Were Good: The Folk Revival, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1996.]

Andersen, Karl Erik [1948 -] Karl Erik Andersen runs one of the most extraordinary, copious Dylan websites of all the hundreds that are out there in cyberspace: http://expectingrain.com, which he updates twice daily in order to post the URL of every web page that mentions Bob Dylan's name (and a number of extra ones that he thinks will interest people keen enough to be regular visitors to the site 'and even maybe the man himself').

Andersen was born in Mosjøen, Sweden, on July 15, 1948. The first Dylan album he bought was Bringing It All Back Home but it was 30 years on before he attended a Dylan concert (Oslo, July 1995). He has never published any work of his own and never encountered any bootlegs or fanzines until he started the website, which was in 1994: 'Year Zero of the World Wide Web'. At first his idea was to assemble the information resources he found posted on the newsgroup http://rec.music.dylan; when webserver software became available he found it fun to allow others to access the same resources. The first items of content he published online were stills from the 'Jokerman' video and the online Bob Dylan Atlas and Dylan Who's Who pages. As media interest in Dylan grew it seemed useful to gather links to relevant stories on the net, and updating these daily began in February 2000. In the summer of 2005 the still-burgeoning amount of material prompted him to update twice daily instead.

Karl Erik Andersen was a teacher for 11 years but since 1992 he has been curator of the broadcasting archive at the branch of the Swedish National Library in his hometown, Mo i Rana. His goal?: 'To see Bob Dylan play in Mo i Rana.'

'Angelina' [1981] Recorded at the Shot of Love sessions in 1981, 'Angelina' remained unissued until the box set the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 a decade later.

'Angelina' is romantically entangled in the visionary fever of the Book of Revelation—and of EZEKIEL, the Old Testament book that the writer of Revelation seems to have had continually in mind. This is familiar territory in Dylan's work, a backdrop to songs from 'Blowin' in the Wind' to 'Dignity'. With 'Angelina' he is here again: and here as if for the first time, since the narrative seems that of someone wandering lost in a perilous landscape. The recording takes us on a long road, as through a trance or a dream, in which, as they are wont to do in dreams, time and place shift and a different logic prevails. If this parallels perfectly the experience of reading the long, strange biblical passages to which it refers, it also makes 'Angelina' a difficult song to comprehend. It is hard because of the disconnectedness, the impossible images, the general air of smudging which clings to it, and the collision of the narrative into different genres as it passes.

As ever, the way into the song is from the performance. It begins thrillingly, holding out infinite promise (which is of course impossible to deliver), shimmering into being like the gorgeous solo version of 'Spanish Is the Loving Tongue', with piano and voice. The first words are these: 'Well it's always been my nature to take chances / My right hand drawing back while my left hand advances.' This is doubly striking. First, the character of the opening line is surely unique in Dylan's work. Many Bob Dylan songs begin with that direct conversational tone but there is no other in which its content appears candidly self-defining. Bob Dylan is not a man who writes 'I'm a man who . . .' It's never been his nature to define his nature.

Second, Dylan then structures his second line to stress the 'drawing back'—and it's the right hand 'drawing back' while the weaker, sinister hand 'advances'. This is a tantalising, provoking line, never quite satisfying but not dismissible either. There's an ellipse in here: a stage in the logic of exposition has been squeezed unspoken into the crack between Dylan's first line and his second. The result is that the two lines themselves enact what they describe: Dylan has set up a tugging back and forth between them. It isn't comfortable but it is poetry.

Nor is there any carelessness in the structure of the song. Each verse is of eight lines, rhyming AAABCCCB, each last line being (with one deliberate exception, considered below) simply the title word 'Angelina'. After each verse comes a single line of refrain, acting as a simple echo ('Oh—— Angelina! Oh—— Angelina!'). There are no half-rhymes: the shape Dylan has chosen, with those clusters of three adjacent rhyming lines, only works if it delivers the pleasure of repetition, and it cannot deliver that if the rhymes are inexact. The 'echo' must be simple here too. Dylan knows not to settle for less.

If the AAA and CCC rhymes in the verses must be straight, there is opportunity galore in the B rhymes, the 'Angelina' rhymes, for the flamboyant and extravagant. And Dylan seizes it. There are no half-rhymes here either, nor any demure, quietening rhymes designed to pass unnoticed: no Anglican words like 'cleaner', no innocuous phrase like 'have you seen her?' Every one Dylan sings chimes its ding-dong, two-tone bell, its Latin and Latin-American bell, as ostentatiously as possible: concertina, hyena, subpoena, Argentina, arena. This engineering precision, the sturdy carriages of the five verses built to one blueprint, the ringing iron certainty of the rails of rhyme—these are sufficient to propel us through all the swirling mists and past all the looming vague shapes of the song's narrative landscape.

The declaration that there is such a journey comes at the start of the second verse, with the deft line 'Blood dryin' in my yellow hair as I go from shore to shore.' This sets the tone; it establishes the vague generality, the grand sweep, of the song's journey—and simultaneously supplies those specific details, the blood drying in the yellow hair: details which, far from clarifying, only serve to clinch how little we are to be left to feel we know. The 'yellow hair' tells us that the narrator's persona isn't Bob Dylan; the 'blood drying', while detailed, is wholly unexplained. The line that follows, 'I know what it is that has drawn me to your door', only serves to tell us that we don't know what it is, after which comes an immediate confession that much is unknown to the singer too: 'But whatever could it be, makes you think you seen me before / Angelina?'

Yet 'Blood dryin' in my yellow hair as I go from shore to shore' yields more than so far allowed. This blood flows from no ordinary wound: blood doesn't go on drying all through the lengthy travail of going from shore to shore. Continual drying suggests continual flow behind it. The aura here is of stigmata, of those favourite phenomena of the Catholic Church, statues that weep and effigies that bleed. 'Yellow' is less curious as a hair-colour on a plaster saint than a real person. There's an atmosphere here that hints of those countries in which there are many Angelinas and where the more lurid mysticisms of Catholic paraphernalia most nearly make sense: the southern Mediterranean and the Americas. In other words, this line suggests itself as the song's first tentative breath of the air of magic realism.

'Argentina' is named, later in the song, inside a question as rhetorical as that just quoted: 'Tell me, tall man, where would you like to be overthrown: / In Jerusalem or Argentina?' Comically audacious rhetoric it is too, of course: no 'tall man' would like to be overthrown anywhere. Singular or plural, dictator or junta, here Dylan adds in the presence of political violence that permeates everyday life (the realism) and is as much a part of the genre as the acceptance of the fantastical (the magic). What unites the two is the feeling that anything can happen. For the ordinary peasant populace, no outrage, no violent act, no bizarre rumour, no lurid superstition, no horror, no miracle, can confidently be ruled beyond the realms of possibility. (When Dylan gave concerts in South America in the early 1990s, he was described by a São Paolo journalist in a phrase entirely characteristic of this sensibility: he called Dylan 'the white monster of three decades.')

In 'Angelina', the ingredient of menace has been located already, at the beginning of the 'tall man' verse, in the deliciously sinister line 'There's a black Mercedes rollin' through the combat zone.' In this part of the world the powerless see the Mercedes as the symbol of northern, capitalist corruption. Dylan's line evokes the hushed purposiveness (that luxury auto's self-confident 'rollin''), the invulnerability that comes from being the power behind the fighting ('rollin' through the combat zone'), the unaccountability of the sheltered occupant inside the cold, black machine. Its windows are surely as black as its body-work (we cannot see through this glass darkly), and its fat black tyres glide over the dust. This is also the USA's territorial back yard: a place 'where the stars and stripes explode' but the CIA determines 'the combat zone'. And in a compelling double-image of soldiers in battle, suggestive both of pawns in the game and of hacked-up horror, we 'see pieces of men marching'. These elements of the song are companion pieces to that part of 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' in which 'They're killing nuns and soldiers / There's fighting on the border.'

There are many other vapours from this magic realist world in 'Angelina'. All these lines and phrases, these touches and details, accord with this Latin-American milieu: 'the monkey dances / To the tune of a concertina'; 'just step into the arena'; those 'spiral staircases'. This is also a land of blood-feud and revenge, a culture in which it might be par for the course to find that 'She was stolen from her mother when she was three days old', and in which the inevitable follow-up report must be that 'Now her vengeance has been satisfied . . .' In the same climate, the overheated idolatry of a lurid Catholicism has people worshipping 'surrounded by God's angels', readily seeing or believing in a 'tree of smoke' and an 'angel with four faces', and 'Begging God for mercy and weeping in unholy places'. Oh Angelina, oh Angelina . . . As the very noises of the recording whisper into the listener's mind, 'Spanish is the loving tongue'.

Dylan is drawn to this southern, Spanish door recurrently in his work, from romancing the breathy gypsy gal of 'Spanish Harlem Incident' to consulting the wise peasant-Christ in 'Señor', and from the horse ride across the Mexican desert with Magdalena in 'Romance in Durango' to the portrait of the peasant father in 'One More Cup of Coffee'. There has even been an earlier Bob Dylan song with an Angelina in the title, 1965's 'Farewell Angelina'. And when Dylan sang about turning the other cheek before, in 'Queen Jane Approximately', the song's heroine was envisaged as turning that other cheek to 'bandits' who would then lay down their 'bandanas'.

Perhaps there is a precedent too for Dylan's being drawn to this world's magic realism. Dylan remarks to Nat Hentoff in the 1966 Playboy interview that '. . . traditional music is too unreal to die', and so yields 'all these songs about roses growing out of people's brains and lovers who are really geese and swans who turn into angels'. There may be compelling parallels between this 'unrealism' in the traditional folksong of neo-medieval rural Britain and Ireland and the 'magic realism' pinned down in the heavily folk-cultured fiction of modern South American writers like Gabriel García Márquez. When, therefore, Bob Dylan experiments, in 'Angelina', with the evocative poetic effects of this magic realism, it's likely that he finds these effects attractive in the same way as he finds attractive 'roses growing out of people's brains' and 'lovers who are really geese'. Dylan's taste in narrative ballads has always been either for those of mystery or else for tales of horses and daughters and hangings, exile and injustice. In 'Angelina' he creates a narrative, though not a ballad, in which most of these elements co-exist.

But 'Angelina' is a song which seems to pass through several different worlds. If the vaporous postmodernism of magic realism is one, Ancient Egypt, as filtered by Bob Dylan's imagination, seems to be another. Idolatry is heavily present in this world too. Egyptian gods appear predominantly with the forms of animals. Horus is depicted as a sparrow-hawk, Khunm as a ram. Anubis has a hyena-like head, and so does Seth. Depicted so superbly on the walls and in the tombs of an architecture that almost defies time, the idols of Ancient Egypt can readily be imagined to include, as Dylan's second verse has it, '. . . a god with the body of a woman well endowed / And the head of a hyena.' Equally, the vivid and tough first line of this verse, describing a man's face rather than a god's, does so in terms distinctively in tune with, even seeming to summarise, the Ancient Egyptian style, linear and clear: 'His eyes were two slits, make any snake proud.'

In this context, several other lines and phrases resonate, including one or two that function quite differently in the song's other worlds. That phrase 'pieces of men marching' is one. Co-existing with its effectiveness in the Latin-American magic realist context it has another life in this one. Here we can make sense of it as describing how those rows of soldiers are rendered, parading everywhere that Ancient Egyptian carving and drawing survives: cartoon-like, each figure half-hidden by the next, each fitting into the next like jigsaw pieces. Those who are conquered enemies—and these are regularly depicted: the triumphalism of the conqueror demands it—become slaves, put to work building the architectural glories of kings who decree themselves gods and build as if to conquer eternity: in some cases building pyramids in the attempt both to pierce the sky and to decipher the stars. This is indeed 'trying to take heaven by force.'

This is a culture of ritual sacrifices and power-struggles, high priests and god-kings, incest and intrigue, in which, by the time of the Ptolemaic dynasties, a young man might indeed have to 'just step into the arena'. Dylan sets this world 'In the valley of the giants where the stars and stripes explode.' The 'Valley of the Giants' acts as his fictional addition to, or perhaps his summarising retitling of, the Valley of the Kings, the Valley of the Queens, the Valley of the Nobles and the Valley of the Workmen. This vast time and place, this trying to take heaven by force, is 'where the stars and stripes explode' in the sense that here one great, crumbled empire mocks the claims of another. As he sings in another song of the early 1980s, the fairly awful 'Neighborhood Bully', 'Every empire . . . is gone / Egypt and Rome, even the great Babylon.'

Two further wisps of Ancient Egyptian air thread their way around 'Angelina'. One, unsurprising, is evoked by the mention of 'milk and honey'; the other, surprisingly, floats up from the phrase 'When you cease to exist . . .' Both bring us to meeting-points with the other world of the song, that of the Bible story. Merely by using the phrase 'milk and honey', Dylan reminds us that the children of Israel escaped from Ancient Egypt, embarking upon their own long journey and crossing the Red Sea from shore to shore to gain the promised land.

The other point of contact lies in what the Ancient Egyptian and Judaeo-Christian belief systems had in common. Here is a song about worshipping gods, a song in which, so far, all the stress has been on idolatry and the worship of many different figures. When we reach the terrain of apocalypse, we can expect a contrasting emphasis on the legitimacy of just one god, the God whose judgement day shall come, and whose son Jesus Christ shall usher in a new heaven and a new earth: a new Jerusalem. Yet in fact the contrast between the multiple gods of the one and the monotheism of the other is not so certain or straightforward. The Ancient Egyptians too believed in monotheism: in one God of Gods, creator of all things, a God who, in the attractive phrase of the guidebook Egypt, edited by Giovanni Magi, 'is one and primordial'. In the holy books of the Ancient Egyptians too one finds the concepts of original sin and of redemption, the promise of a redeeming god and the resurrection of the flesh at the end of time. This God of gods is Osiris, who 'married Isis', to quote another Dylan song, and he, deified, ruled over the supreme court for the judgement of the souls of the dead.

Dylan seems aware of this belief system—seems to allude to it within one of the song's sudden rhetorical questions. As with 'Tell me, tall men, where would you like to be overthrown . . . ?', we suddenly come upon this in mid-song: 'When you cease to exist, who will you blame?'

This might seem a random interjection—yet it makes a specific sense in the context of Ancient Egyptian belief about the after-life or lack of it: about what happens to those who beg God for mercy and are saved and what happens to those who beg God for mercy and are not saved. As Magi summarises this belief, it was as follows:

'If the dead person had done more good than evil they became one of the "true of voice" and thus a part of the mystical body of the god Osiris. If this was not so, the heart was eaten by an animal with the head of a crocodile and the body of a hippopotamus and ceased to exist in the other world' [emphasis added]. So Dylan's rhetoric translates, on this level, as 'When you are judged and not saved, who will you blame?': a meaning that sits happily with the implicit allusion to the devil, just two lines later, in the claim 'Your best friend and my worst enemy is one and the same.' So we are back once again, as so often in Dylan's work, to the question of ultimate salvation, of where we all end up at the end of the world. It's where we end up at the end of the song, guided by the Old Testament book of Ezekiel and the New Testament book of Revelation.

The long night's journey into day happens as follows: after 430 years under the Ancient Egyptians, the children of Israel escape, led by Moses, who brings them to the promised land (though Moses himself dies just before they reach it). They are not good children. Even before they arrive, they give a lot of trouble, not least in their sneaking fondness for the old Egyptian idols. When they run amok at the very moment Moses is up on the mountain receiving the Ten Commandments, God wants to wipe out the lot of them then and there, and is only dissuaded by Moses. Spared, they gain the promised land and build Jerusalem. Life goes on and they relapse, the worship of false idols again a prominent part of their transgression.

God calls on a priest, Ezekiel, who is living in exile in Babylon, and commands him to take on the rôle of prophet, return to Jerusalem and warn the people that, as in Moses' time, next time they see Him coming they'd better run: if they don't change their ways, He's going to kill them all. (In the Good News Bible, God's crossness is unintentionally funny. He comes across like a thwarted small-time hood: 'The Lord spoke to me. "Mortal man," he said, "this is what I, the Sovereign Lord, am saying to the land of Israel: This is the end for the whole land! Israel, the end has come. . . . One disaster after another is coming on you. It's all over. This is the end. You are finished. The end is coming for you people . . ."'.)

Ezekiel is guided by his visions, the first of which Dylan alludes to in 'Angelina's' magnificent and stately final verse, when he sings of journeying that must 'pass the angel with four faces'. Ezekiel Chapter 1, from verse 5 onwards, describes this vision of 'four living creatures' emerging from the midst of a fire: 'And every one had four faces. . . . As for the likeness of their faces, they four had the face of a man, and the face of a lion, on the right side: and they four had the face of an ox on the left side; they four also had the face of an eagle.' Adam Clarke, writing a note about this in his Commentary on the Bible that, for our purposes, links the angel with four faces to the 'god with a body of a woman well-endowed and the face of a hyena', notes that many such 'compound images appear in the Asiatic idols . . . some with the head and feet of a monkey, with the body, arms and legs of a man. Others with the head of the dog; body, arms and legs human. . . . The head of a lion and the head of a cock, the whole body human, and the legs terminating in snakes.'

The irony here, then, is that the inspirational vision of Ezekiel calls up creatures reminiscent of the very idols his God deplores; it's a strength of Bob Dylan's song that, unfettered by editorialising, these resemblances can float through the lyric heeded or unheeded. As noted earlier, this is a song about worshipping gods. You might say that 'Angelina' is a chimera about chimera.

Ezekiel tells God he can't do much because people always complain that he speaks in riddles. As in the past, God relents a little; but He remains so furious at His people's continued worship of false idols that He allows Jerusalem to fall to the Babylonians (in 586 BC). Ezekiel's last vision is an architecturally detailed one of how a new Jerusalem will be when the people restore themselves to righteousness.

This vision of the 12-gated city, and the earlier vision of the four angels with four faces riding around upon fiery wheels within wheels, are invoked more than half a millenium later in the Revelation of St. John the Divine, or the Revelation to John: the revelation by Jesus Christ in heaven to his faithful, persecuted followers below that a day shall finally come when through him, God's enemies, including Satan, shall be defeated and the faithful rewarded with a new heaven and a new earth: a new Jerusalem. Revelation is no straightforward read, but memorably within its turbid prose arise the four horsemen of the apocalypse:

'And I saw, and behold a white horse; and he that sat upon him had a bow; and a crown was given unto him: and he went forth conquering; and to conquer.' This horseman is supposedly Christ, preaching the purity of the gospel and sending the darts of conviction into the hearts of sinners. Next 'there went out another horse that was red: and power was given to him that sat thereon to take peace from the earth . . . and there was given unto him a great sword.' The red horse's rider, then, is War. Next comes the black horse, Famine. '. . . And I looked, and behold, a pale horse; and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him' (from 6:2–8).

In 'Angelina', then, when Dylan alludes to this passage, singing 'I can see the unknown rider, I can see the pale white horse', he fuses, with a quiet and clever touch, the 'pale horse' and the 'white horse'; and because he cannot say which he is seeing, he sees an 'unknown' rider. He is asking: is it Christ or is it Death that faces me? This is a question Bob Dylan often asks, and often urges us to ask ourselves.

As for 'the angel with four faces', this phrase is not only inspired by the biblical text but in detail—in its rhythm, shape, length and tone—it stays faithful to it, echoing very precisely the Revelation phrase 'the sharp sword with two edges' (2:12).

The 'tree of smoke' is another quiet and clever poetic touch: it's a phrase Dylan invents to cover a great deal of spiritual territory. As so often, he seems to take the inherent poetry of the passage he's using, and to set it free in his imagination. Chapters 8 and 9 of Revelation (both very short) go on to describe the destructions to be visited on those not saved—those without seals on their foreheads—and these visions encompass burning trees and several sorts of smoke: 'the smoke of the incense, which came with the prayers of the saints' (8:4) and, in contrast (9:1–4), the smoke from the bottomless pit:

> 'And the fifth angel sounded, and I saw a star fall from heaven unto the earth: and to him was given the key of the bottomless pit. And he opened the bottomless pit; and there arose a smoke out of the pit, as the smoke of a great furnace; and the sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit. And there came out of the smoke locusts upon the earth . . .'

(The locusts appear like horses with 'crowns like gold, faces of men, hair of women, heads and teeth of lions, tails like scorpions', and so on. Here yet again we contemplate images constructed as if by genetic pick'n'mixing.) Then comes a different army of horses, 'and out of their mouths issued fire and smoke and brimstone. By these three was the third part of men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the brimstone, which issued out of their mouths.'

There is lots more smoke later: 'And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever: and they have no rest day or night, who worship the beast . . .' This contrasts with 'And the temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God, and from his power . . .' When Babylon falls, we get yet another smoke—the smoke of her burning: 'And the kings of the earth, who have committed fornication and lived deliciously with her, shall bewail her, and lament for her, when they shall see the smoke of her burning' (the phrase 'the smoke of her burning' is repeated). Then in the next chapter we get 'And her smoke rose up for ever and ever'—which Dylan uses more directly in 'Ain't Gonna Go to Hell for Anybody', in which the melodically lovely bridge begins with 'Smoke it rises for ever / On a one-way ticket to burn' (while, in 'Saved', drawing on Revelation 12, the singer's saviour has 'Freed me from the pit, / Full of emptiness and wrath / And the fire that burns in it / I've been saved / By the blood of the lamb').

So the image Dylan invents in 'Angelina', 'the tree of smoke', seems entirely apt: a scripturally alert emblem, characterising the enormous sweep of turmoil that must unfold before the establishment of the new heaven and the new earth. A 'tree of smoke' seems especially apt since when the new Jerusalem is built, 'Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life . . .' (Revelation 22:14). It's not the least of Dylan's achievements that while 'the tree of smoke' sounds so right as a feature of the magic realist landscape—it could be drifting up from the pages of One Hundred Years of Solitude—it sounds just as accurately honed as a phrase compressing so much of Revelation.

The looser phrase 'surrounded by God's angels' enjoys a similar double-life. Encountered already as evoking a peasant culture's panting religiosity, now it re-imprints itself as part of a genuinely visionary picture: a brushstroke in Dylan's painting of the apocalypse. In this particular too we've shifted from Argentina to Jerusalem. Likewise 'I see pieces of men marching, trying to take heaven by force' acts now as another series of brushstrokes on this swirling canvas of an overcrowded sky thronging and exploding with fires and angels, armies and horsemen, the quick and the dead, the Lord and His heavenly hosts. Milton's Paradise Lost has much on Satan's legions trying to take heaven by force. The phrase echoes too the calmer text of Matthew 11:12: 'And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force.'

A renewal of meaning is given too to that small phrase 'them spiral staircases': it becomes a figurative expression of the circling motion of ascent as the beholder of such visions feels body and soul rise up, up, up (like smoke) into that thrashing heaven. Beat a path of retreat from sin; choose Christ not Death; choose between the part of oneself that draws back and the part that advances; climb '. . . up them spiral staircases, / Pass the tree of smoke, pass the angel with four faces, / Begging God for mercy and weeping in unholy places, / Angelina.'

Cutting across these general themes of worship and salvation, and recurring in amongst these shifts from world to world, there is also present in 'Angelina' the more personal cutting and shifting of a man-woman dialogue. Fragments of this dialogue seem to fall within our hearing, like parts of a loudly whispered, fitful conversation overheard on a moving train. The terrain outside the windows keeps changing; the lovers' quarrel runs through the middle of it all, as a series of one-liners, occasionally calmly resigned ('I've tried my best to love you but I cannot play this game') but mostly seething with reproach and the malice of the hurt.

Yet these lines and phrases rarely turn out to be unconnected with the terrain around them. We've seen how one line which sounds to be part of the lovers' quarrel, the hissing 'When you cease to exist, who will you blame?', touches upon one of the song's big themes, salvation, and has a special resonance of meaning in one of the song's locations, the world of Ancient Egypt. Similarly, the memorable core of this personal dialogue leads a double-life, its other one lived within the world of contemporary political menace. These are the lines: 'Do I need your permission to turn the other cheek? / If you can read my mind why must I speak? / No, I have heard nothing about the man that you seek . . .' This is admirably captured quarrelsome rhetoric, authentic in its conversational tone, in which belligerence is barely concealed beneath the sweetly reasonable, unanswerable questions and hot jealousy hisses around the sides of an insistent disinterest.

Attractively snappy, quotable stuff, this is clearly from the same pen, 15 years on, as lines like 'And you, you just sit around and ask for ashtrays: can't you reach?' (from the quintessential 'She's Your Lover Now', 1966). But you can hear these same lines altogether differently. They speak from the tortured to the torturer in the South American jail cell, calling out at once hapless and defiant from those unholy places where anything can happen: 'Do I need your permission to turn the other cheek? / If you can read my mind why must I speak? / No, I have heard nothing about the man that you seek . . .' And there is a response, half a verse later: the voice of the other side, mouthing the classic mitigating plea of the torturer and sadistic jailer everywhere: 'I was only following instructions . . .' Less in extremis, this is the excuse of the jobsworth the world over, the excuse of the minion who enjoys his little exercise of power on behalf of the authorities. In this instance 'I was only following instructions when the judge sent me down the road / With your subpoena.'

That 'subpoena' is offered with a smile, acknowledging its own disruptive ostentation. Indeed Dylan maximises its impact by the deliberate abruptness of the line that disgorges it. Every other verse has a fourth line of eight to ten syllables (not counting the extra syllables of filigree that Dylan's voice draws out of these '-ina' words). 'With your subpoena' is a brusquely foreshortened five-syllable line, and Dylan emphasises its brevity by his phrasing, so that 'subpoena' not only jumps out at us but jumps out early.

Gavin Selerie has pointed out an extraordinary possible source for this rhyme—indeed for the whole process of rhyming words with the name Angelina: 'Dylan's song echoes the opening chorus of Gilbert & Sullivan's Trial By Jury, which contains the lines: "For to-day in this arena / Summoned by a stern subpoena / Edwin, sued by Angelina, / Shortly will appear." . . . Later in the operetta, Angelina is summoned . . . with the echoing recitative: "Oh, Angelina! Come thou into Court! Angelina! Angelina!"' (As Selerie adds, these names come from Oliver Goldsmith's ballad 'The Hermit, Or Edwin and Angelina'.)

There is one other juncture at which Dylan deliberately abandons the orderly pattern of his lines. Again, the effect is to surprise for a specific purpose. As mentioned, the last line of each verse is the one word 'Angelina', except in the penultimate verse where we live vividly in the moment in the lovers' quarrel by hearing what is, in content, a blurted interjection ('But so are you') delivered as a blurted interjection in form too. Instead of what we expect, we get '. . . and she's wearin' a blindfold / But so are you, Angelina.' It is a clear, small illustration of a general truth often asserted in the arts, that only those who have mastered the rules can break them successfully.

Not that 'Angelina' is wholly a success. Dylan's cut-up narrative, whereby phrase by phrase the flow of logic is defeated, and lines and half-lines fail to connect with those nearest them, but rather call out to others half the song away, while the 'me' and 'you' and 'she' and 'he' refuse identification: in the end, it fails to satisfy. We drink in the riches of ellipse and leaps of imagination, the compressed layering of meaning and powerful air of mystery that such a method achieves . . . and still we thirst for narrative clarity.

Yet what a compelling, grand failure 'Angelina' remains. Not mere smoke but a tree of smoke. This song about angels with many faces and gods made from more than one animal achieves the same multiplicity itself. Its lines and phrases often have several faces—are frequently more than one kind of creature themselves. It may lack narrative clarity, but it has in abundance that other quality we demand of a complex work: it has unity.

This is partly achieved by its series of inner pairings, which extend far beyond the obvious—right hand, left hand; best friend, worst enemy; body of woman, head of hyena; Jerusalem or Argentina; vengeance satisfied, possessions sold; he's this and she's that; to love versus to play a game; rider and horse; tree and angel; the other cheek. As well as all these, which are all pairings placed in proximity, we can discern a further set more distantly placed: that 'right hand drawing back' at the beginning and that 'path of retreat' at the end; 'pieces of men' and body of this, head of that; the ambiguity of 'pieces of men marching' paralleled by that of 'Your servants are half dead'; 'tall men' and 'giants'; 'his eyes were two slits' and 'she's wearin' a blindfold'; the combat zone and the arena. This satisfying inner cohesion, this sense of balance, is augmented by Dylan's reliance upon one Old and one New Testament book—and since both look forward to the second coming of Christ, it is apt that Christ's first coming also has a presence in 'Angelina'.

This presence is evoked by another pairing: in this case a pair of allusions to Christ's words to the apostles from the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5–8 and Luke 6 & 11). For 'Do I need your permission to turn the other cheek?' not only operates as personal dialogue and political drama, as noted. It carries further resonance by alluding to Christ's dictum '. . . resist not evil: but whoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also' (from Matthew 5:39), or 'And unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek offer also the other . . .' (from Luke 6:29).

In turn, to remember that this derives from the Sermon on the Mount is to hear as a back-echo something else in 'Angelina', from the very start of the song, that Dylan draws from the same well: that right hand drawing back while the left hand advances. We come to recognise that this notion of having our hands acting independently of each other is also from a dictum of Christ's (from Matthew 6:3): '. . . let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth.'

Here, then, another of the song's inner matches is made. Not only Ezekiel balanced by Revelation but Revelation balanced by the Gospels. Counterbalancing the boiling incomprehensibility of Christ's visionary 'Revelation' from heaven to his apostle John, here is a glimpse of his calm, strong presence on earth, as he gives clear, kind guidance to all his apostles.

Dylan's performance, which is the other great strength of 'Angelina', enhances this sense of Christ's earthly presence. He sings the line 'If you can read my mind, why must I speak?' with such quiet simplicity that you can hear it anew in this context, hearing not the lover's anger disguised by sweet reasonableness, nor the defiance of the political victim, but the mode of address we associate with Jesus when he's teaching: a mode of piercing but patient questioning.

The exquisite intelligence of Bob Dylan's performance throughout 'Angelina' is easy to disregard, since it works with self-deprecating quietness; but all through the song his voice draws out its multiplicities of meaning and lights up its detail as no other artist could hope to do. And always it rises to the occasion: when the writing is at its best, the singing informs it with genius. Verse two begins with this idiosyncratic, fresh and playful line: 'His eyes were two slits, make any snake proud'—and Dylan sings 'twoooo slits' as two long, equal syllables. Anyone else would, less alertly, give an automatic greater length to 'slits' than to 'two', but Dylan sings them as if he has all the time in the world, and sings them not to achieve a belaboured hissing on 'slits', not to illustrate a sound at all but to illustrate a picture: drawing out the 'two slits' as if actually drawing them, or etching them with a knife.

He passes over the internal rhyme of 'make' and 'snake' without the slightest stress, and passes nonchalantly over the three internal chimes of the next line, in which 'face' is half-echoed by 'painter' and 'paint', knowing that the way 'face' is only half-echoed rescues the repetition of 'painter would paint' from its potential troublesomeness. In case this is still problematic on the ear, the next line is quick to yield its own contrasting internal rhyme, sounding a different vowel: 'Worshipping a god with the *bod*y of a woman well endowed'—and Dylan, fully alert to this, renders it perfectly, lingering on these syllables with measured sagacity. There is no excess of stress: he gives it just enough attention to make it always pleasing to hear. Bound in with this come two instances of that other dangerous kind of chiming, so easy to overdo: alliteration. '*W*orshipping a god with the body of a *w*oman *w*ell endowed / And the *h*ead of a *h*yena.'

Such muscular writing and impeccable execution. The '*w*oman *w*ell' can afford to toll emphatically because it precedes the third consecutive strong line-end rhyme, the third consecutive AAA rhyme, and since these have a cumulative effect upon the ear, the third one must sound so inevitable, necessary, firm and set that you can get away with more or less any degree of insistent alliteration on the way to it. As for 'And the head of a hyena', the small pause before 'hyena' and the sense of wariness achieved in that word's delivery (which would make any hyena proud): these are the brushstrokes of genius.

As JOHN BAULDIE puts it in the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 booklet, Dylan has a 'facility to make his voice reflect the meanings of the words he's singing'. He notes how in 'Someone's Got a Hold of My Heart' Dylan's voice 'seems to wind around the words "wind around", or be as wide as "wide" or as easy as "easy".' In 'Angelina', comparably, Dylan sings 'Do I need your permission to turn the other cheek?' such that on the word 'turn' his voice enacts a turning: the sound pivots around inside his mouth. He gives us the full sense of the moment's drama—of the way that to turn the other cheek is actually to take strong, challenging, even aggressive, action.

This attention to detail, which always avoids reductive predictability in favour of intuitive flash, stays with us throughout the song's long journey. It gives us the dying breath with which Dylan appears to expire on the long-drawn-out end of 'arena———' and then the final climb up the melodic steps which begin with 'up them spiral staircases' (no-one else could sing that phrase at all, let alone with the sumptuous sadness and humane modesty Dylan brings to it) and which keep ascending, words and melody perfectly at one, till the last cathartic incantation of the song title itself.

[Bob Dylan: 'Angelina', Santa Monica, CA, 26 Mar 1981, the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, 1991. Dylan quotes: 'The Playboy Interview: Bob Dylan: A Candid Conversation with the Iconoclastic Idol of the Folk-Rock Set', Playboy, Chicago, Mar 1966; & Dallas Times-Herald, Dallas, TX, 6 Nov 1983. Good News Bible: Today's English Version quote from Ezekiel 7:1–7, London: Bible Societies / Collins / Fontana, 1976. Adam Clarke, Commentary on the Bible, London: Thomas Tegg, 1844 (7 vols.).

'Chimera, or chimaera . . . : 1. Greek myth: a fire-breathing monster with the head of a lion, body of a goat and tail of a serpent. 2. a fabulous beast made up of parts taken from various animals. 3. a wild and unrealistic dream . . .': from Collins English Dictionary, Glasgow: HarperCollins, 1994.

Giovanni Magi, ed., Egypt, Florence: Casa Editrice Bonechi, 1993. Gabriel García Márquez, One Hundred Years of Solitude, 1st UK edn., London: Jonathan Cape, 1970. John Milton, Paradise Lost, 1667 (revised edn. 1674). Gavin Selerie: 'Tricks and Training: Some Dylan Sources and Analogues' Telegraph no.50, UK, winter 1994. Oliver Goldsmith, 'The Hermit, Or Edwin and Angelina', written c.1762, published 1766.]

angels The word 'angel' comes from the Greek 'angelos', meaning messenger. But angels, says the Bible, are sent from God to guide and/or protect us (much like good fairies in fairy-tales). Traditional Catholic belief is that every person has a guardian angel. Pope John Paul II re-asserted the existence of angels in 1986. They are defined attractively in Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews (in a passage that also yields the well-known phrase 'a little lower than the angels'): 'Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs to salvation?' (Hebrews 1:14). Paul is saying that Christ, 'Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they' (1:4), has all the same been sent to earth in the form of a man, 'a little lower than the angels', for our sake: 'But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour; that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man' (Hebrews 2:9). 'For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham' (2:16).

In the Christian hierarchy, nine orders of supernatural beings lie between God and people: seraphim, cherubim and thrones (contemplating God and reflecting His glory); dominations, virtues and powers (regulators of the universe); and principalities, archangels and angels (ministering to humanity). In a passage that transcends these risible delineations, Paul passionately lists some of these orders out of sheer exuberance: 'For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord' (Romans, 8:38–39).

Angels in the Bible are always male: only in modern times have they become feminised and sexualised, by a process of colloquialisation, into women with 'heavenly bodies'. This transformation may have come in stages, via Florence Nightingale (1820–1910), who organised, for the first time, a nursing service, taking a team of nurses to tend the copious wounded of the Crimean War in 1854 (and reducing the war hospital death rate from 42 to 2 per cent): these were readily thought 'ministering angels'.

In 'Precious Angel', then, Dylan is punning on 'angel': i.e. so calling the song's addressee because she has been sent by God to guide him to the Lord, and calling her 'angel' secularly because she has become his beloved sexual partner: she has to be a human creature for this union to be blessed, as the singer believes it is. Hence his line 'What God has given to us no man can take away.' This is taken straight from Matthew 19:5–6: '. . . they twain shall be one flesh. . . . What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder' (repeated verbatim in Mark 10:9) and echoes the equivalent verse in the Marriage Service in the Church of England's Book of Common Prayer: 'Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder.' Dylan reconfirms that his 'precious angel' has this double function in the song's last verse, which begins: 'You're the queen of my flesh, girl. . . . You're the lamp of my soul'.

As he puns on 'angel', so he does on 'sun' (making for a pun-packed opening phrase: 'Precious angel, under the sun . . .'). It's part of Dylan's greatness that in the best of these Christian songs, he can press into service so much scriptural moment, yet keep his lines sounding so casual, so conversational, so expressively relaxed. 'Under the sun', of course, has come into common currency, or at least been continually recirculated there, by its repeated incantation in memorably famous passages of the brief but hugely influential ECCLESIASTES (upon which Dylan draws in many songs, from 'It's Alright Ma [I'm Only Bleeding]' to 'Pressing On' and from 'Jokerman' to 'Tell Me'): '. . . and there is no new thing under the sun' (from Ecclesiastes 1:9); '. . . wise under the sun' (2:19); '. . . vanity under the sun' (4:7) etc.

In this usage, 'under the sun' is conventional; yet Dylan's 'precious angel' is also 'under the sun' in the sense of being 'under the Son', a messenger of the Lord—and this is exactly how the pun is used in one of the very last verses of the Old Testament: 'But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings . . .' (from Malachi 4:2). We're likely to infer a further hint of angels flying around here too, by that 'healing in his wings', and to be reminded, in turn, that Dylan has visited this terrain, and wittily, before: 'You angel you / You got me under your wing', as he sings in 'You Angel You' on Planet Waves.

An angel or angels also occur in the following Dylan songs: 'Three Angels', 'Winterlude', 'Angelina', 'From a Buick 6', 'Tough Mama', 'Dirge', 'Political World', 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues', 'Changing of the Guards', 'Gates of Eden', 'Sara', 'Dignity', 'Jokerman' and 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands'. In only five of these are they clearly secularly meant allusions; in at least seven they appear to be angels in the Christian or spiritual sense.

[Bob Dylan: 'Precious Angel', single taken from Dylan's first 'evangelical' album, 1979's Slow Train Coming, Sheffield, Alabama, 30 Apr–4 May (+ overdubs 11 May) 1979, Columbia FC-36120, NY (CBS 86095, UK), 28 Aug 1979.]

Animals, the The Animals were an early-60s British rock group from Newcastle. They arose after keyboard player ALAN PRICE quit local group the Kansas City Five (which included drummer John Steel) to join the Kontours (which included bassist Chas Chandler, later to be the man who brought JIMI HENDRIX to Britain and stardom) and singer Eric Burdon quit to seek his fortune in London. The Kontours eventually became the Alan Price R& B Combo, with Steel coming in, Burdon returning early in 1963 and guitarist Hilton Valentine augmenting the line-up and prompting the name change to the Animals.

They were Newcastle's best beat group, playing raw and exciting music; their sound was distinguished by Burdon's voice, Price's exceptional keyboard playing and the sometimes lyrical lead guitar-work of Hilton Valentine. Given a record-deal with a major label (the British Columbia label—part of the EMI group and unconnected with the US Columbia label, to which Dylan was signed) as the hunt for new talent spread beyond Merseybeat to the other big cities of the United Kingdom, in February 1964 they recorded a variant on the traditional song 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down' / 'Baby Don't You Tear My Clothes', which they re-worked as the tamer and more pop-normal-sounding 'Baby Let Me Take You Home', which they probably adapted after hearing the version on Dylan's first album—and then they put out a rock version of 'House of the Rising Sun', which was also a cleaned-up re-working of the version of the song on Dylan's album. (It was 'revealed', many years later, that they had picked up both songs not from Dylan but from Josh White—which might have been true but wouldn't have been helpful to say at the time.)

'House of the Rising Sun' captured the virtues of the group's live act on record (something that eluded many of the best of the British beat groups of the day), and was an inspired fusion of traditional folk words and rock. It is the record that disputes the claim that THE BYRDS created folk rock—though it did not kick off the folk rock movement as the Byrds' 'Tambourine Man' and Dylan himself did, mostly because when first released it was too early for that—it was instead heard as part of another movement: in the UK as part of the beat-group boom and in the US as 'the British invasion'. It reached no.1 in the US and the British charts, and on the back of it the Animals toured America and met Bob Dylan (briefly). They had much subsequent chart success, including with a very respectable version, based on Nina Simone's, of 'Don't Let Me Be Misunderstood'.

In another way too their 'House of the Rising Sun' was ahead of its time: long before 'Like a Rolling Stone', it broke the three-minute rule for singles: and by a long way. It ran to 4:30. It was also the first British-made US no.1 since 1962 not written by LENNON & McCARTNEY.

[The Animals: 'House of the Rising Sun', nia, Columbia DB 7301, London (MGM USA 1STP, US), 1964.]

Annie Hall*, dismissal of Dylan in The chorus of 'Just Like a Woman' ends with '. . . she aches just like a woman / But she breaks just like a little girl.' This non-statement doesn't describe an individual characteristic, doesn't say anything fresh about a universal one yet pretends to do both. What parades as reflective wisdom ('. . . woman but . . . girl') is really maudlin platitude. It hasn't even engaged Dylan's skill in minimising the badness. It would be less bad if the 'But' of the pay-off line was an 'And'—for at least we would then be spared so blatantly lame and predictable a 'paradox'.

This is exactly the 'lameness' honed in on in Woody Allen's 1977 film Annie Hall, in which a vacuous hippie character played by the wonderful Shelley Duvall recites the lines just quoted as if they're far-out and profound, and the character played by Allen (the usual character played by Allen), pulls a face that means he fails to see in them anything less empty-headed than their admirer.

In Chronicles Volume One, 2004, Dylan recalls (without comment) that Woody Allen was one of the comedians performing at the Café Wha at the start of the 1960s.

[Annie Hall, dir. Woody Allen, United Artists, USA, 1977. Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, p.11.]

Another Side of Bob Dylan* [1964] The fourth album, and recorded in a day. The title was not of Dylan's choosing; it would be the last time that someone other than the artist decided what to name the work. The Dave Spart section of his constituency declared that this was an unwelcome side of Bob Dylan and the album was a sell-out—just as more people were to feel later when he 'went electric', again when he 'went country' and yet again when he was 'Born Again'. This fourth album was much the same stark, solo performance as on the preceding three (though Dylan added piano and somehow more space and colour in the sound) but with the exception of the long 'Chimes of Freedom' there wasn't a protest song or any overtly political theme anywhere on the record: and even 'Chimes of Freedom' was, for many, uncomfortably close to blurry impressionism rather than activist clarity.

They were love songs—and many people felt betrayed. It must be hard now to understand how this album could have angered so many; but it did. Yet it was clear to plenty of people at the time, and is all the more so looking back, that the love songs Dylan offered on this album were more true and real—and ultimately more radical—than protest songs. 'All I Really Want to Do' and 'It Ain't Me Babe' are historically important songs: they questioned the common assumptions of true love and the male-female relationship; they not only avoided possessiveness and macho strut but explained why as well. This was years before any of us understood that 'love' and politics weren't opposites—that there was such a thing as sexual politics. And among the ways Dylan mounted these challenges to love-song convention was by his irreverent upending of pop cliché in general, and in particular in his playful, tack-sharp response to the ubiquitous presence of THE BEATLES. Everyone else was rolling over and submitting to the Beatles Invasion. Not Dylan. (So his 'no, no, no,' in 'It Ain't Me, Babe' is a discreet riposte to their 'yeah, yeah, yeah' in 'She Loves You'.) This album also contained Dylan's specific recantation of the protest phase. 'My Back Pages' did this, and had the celebrated chorus line 'Ah but I was so much older then / I'm younger than that now.' This permanently beguiling claim was enacted by Dylan's voice, which sounds far younger than on his earlier work. Here he has thrown off his self-imposed obligation to seek gravitas in sounding as old as the hills, and begun to rejoice in his youthfulness. If you could have only about five Bob Dylan albums, it wouldn't be crazy if this were one of them. His writing and control of atmosphere on songs like 'To Ramona' and 'Spanish Harlem Incident' come across as early flashes of the creative explosion that he was to go through in 1965–66. A great minor album, and his last solo album until the 1990s.

[Recorded NY, 9 Jun 1964; released as Columbia CL 2193 (mono) and CS 8993 (stereo), 8 Aug 1964. In UK, CBS BPG 62429 (mono), SBPG 62429 (stereo).]

Anthology of American Folk Music* [1952, 1997] See American Folk Music [1952, 1997] and Smith, Harry.

Armstrong, Gillian [1950 -] Gillian Armstrong was born on December 18, 1950 in Melbourne, Australia. Regarded as part of the self-exporting Australian New Wave (like Mel Gibson) she learnt filmcraft first as an editor on educational films, won scholarship to the Australian Film, Television & Radio School just outside Sydney, directed shorts and documentaries and began her feature-film directorial career with the brilliant My Brilliant Career in 1979, made in Australia. After that came Starstruck, a musical, then a move to Hollywood for the dull Mrs. Soffel, starring Diane Keaton and Mel Gibson in 1984.

When this bombed she returned to Australia, and in early 1986, in Sydney, agreed to film Bob Dylan backed by TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS to make a concert film for distribution straight to HBO and video release. She directed the filming at his Sydney concerts of February 24 & 25, 1986, and came away with beautifully shot footage edited into a ten-song mixed-repertoire concoction, Hard to Handle, that makes everyone involved look and sound better than they deserved.

Armstrong remained in Australia long enough to re-unite with Judy Davis (who had achieved stardom via My Brilliant Career); they made the less successful 1987 film High Tide. Since then Armstrong has continued to veer back and forth between the US and her native land, where she made the fine 1992 film The Last Days of Chez Nous before finally achieving a happy result in Hollywood with her 1994 version of the Louisa May Alcott novel Little Women. Her 1997 film Oscar and Lucinda was a more complex film, handled imaginatively and adroitly.

She had not abandoned the documentary, however; she made a long-term commitment to following the lives of three 14-year-old working-class Australian girls in a series of three films made between 1975 and 1988 (Smoke and Lollies, 1975, Fourteen's Good, Eighteen's Better, 1980 and Bingo, Bridesmaids and Braces, 1988), and in 1996 reshaped the footage into an award-winning feature-length film, Not Fourteen Again.

Granted that, more generally, she has always been keen to explore the lives of women, and with distinctive success ('Gillian Armstrong cuts closer to the core of women's divided yearnings than any other director', in Molly Haskell's comment), it was perhaps an odd partnership, but a welcome one, when she and Bob Dylan got together.

Arnold, Jerome [1936 -] Jerome Arnold, a year younger than his more famous harmonica-playing brother Billy Boy Arnold, was born in Chicago in 1936. He was playing bass guitar in the city in the 1950s and from around 1957 played in HOWLIN' WOLF's band (though he didn't play on Wolf's records till the 1962 session that yielded 'Tail Dragger', to which the lyric of Dylan's 1990 blues 'Cat's in the Well' slyly alludes). He and SAM LAY were poached from Wolf in 1963 by PAUL BUTTERFIELD, who was forming the pioneering Paul Butterfield Blues Band. Arnold and Lay were the bi-racial band's black members, and the authentic Chicago blues rhythm section on which the band's white soloists built. Arnold kept things solid when MIKE BLOOMFIELD introduced Indian music into the band on their second album, East-West, yet while reportedly uneasy with the 'progressive' organ-playing of Mark Naftalin (who joined in 1964), he was more than capable of laying down jazz-rooted bass lines flowing around behind Bloomfield on the eight-minute-long 'Work Song', which emerged on the Bloomfield compilation Don't Say That I Ain't Your Man: Essential Blues 1964–1969. He continued to play on Howlin' Wolf records after joining the Butterfield outfit.

Arnold, described by Butterfield Blues Band enthusiast Charles Sawyer as 'quiet and unassuming; a conservative dresser given to double knits and loafers', was nevertheless one of those who played behind Dylan—with Bloomfield, AL KOOPER, BARRY GOLDBERG and Sam Lay—at Dylan's controversial electric début at the 1965 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL. It was the only time he played behind Dylan; he continued with the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, which Butterfield disbanded in 1972.

By 1978 he had changed his name to Julio Finn and moved to London. Now playing more harmonica than bass, he played with jazz acts, including Archie Shepp (for instance on the album Black Gipsy) and the Art Ensemble of Chicago (Certain Blacks, recorded in Paris in 1970). On the 1970 eponymously titled album by Archie Shepp and Philly Joe Jones, Finn is credited as composer of the 21-minute-long 'Howling in the Silence', on which he contributes vocals as well as harmonica.

In 1981 he was asked to write the sleevenotes for the UK label Charley's album Crying and Pleading, by his brother Billy Boy Arnold. He agreed, mentioned their relationship in his notes but still signed as Julio Finn. Interested in gay rights and in black history, he wrote the 1986 book The Blues Man: The Musical Heritage of Black Men and Women in the Americas, which was published in London by Quartet Books.

Finn/Arnold still keeps open his playing and academic options, and still ranges widely without abandoning the blues. In 1998 he played harmonica on the Linton Kwesi Johnson album Independent Intavenshan; in 2000 he was the respondent at a panel discussion on 'The Blues as Individual and Collective History' at a conference on 'The Blues Tradition' at Penn State University.

[Bob Dylan with Jerome Arnold et al: 'Maggie's Farm', 'Like a Rolling Stone' & 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', Newport, RI, 25 Jul 1965. Charles Sawyer quote from 'Blues With a Feeling: A Biography of the Paul Butterfield Blues Band', 1994, online 2 Jul 2005 at www.people.fas.harvard.edu/~sawyer/bwf.html.]

Aronowitz, Al [1928 - 2005] Al Aronowitz was born in Bordentown, NJ, on May 20, 1928, and grew up in nearby Linden and Roselle. He became a professional journalist in 1950 (editor of the Daily Times in Lakewood, New Jersey) and was a music columnist for the New York Post in the 1960s to early 70s. He wrote a well-regarded long piece on Beatlemania for the Saturday Evening Post in 1964. Latterly a freelance writer (mostly on the internet) living in Elizabeth, NJ, and calling himself 'the Blacklisted Journalist', he died of cancer there on August 1, 2005.

Aronowitz claimed: 'The 60s wouldn't have been the same without me.' This was because he famously brought Dylan and THE BEATLES together for the first time, and introduced the Beatles to marijuana, at the Hotel Delmonico, Park Avenue, NY, on August 28, 1964. He also said that Dylan wrote 'Mr. Tambourine Man' in his kitchen (after listening to Marvin Gaye's 'Can I Get a Witness' all night), and that he drove Dylan over to buy the famous Triumph motorcycle. He was around Dylan a lot in the Woodstock days, and was also in the backstage posse when Dylan and his wife SARA arrived at the Isle of Wight for the 1969 festival appearance. He is 'the friend' in this brief 1967 Woodstock anecdote he tells (against himself):

> 'Do you like that song?' Dylan asked a friend. 'I think it's great,' the friend said. 'I don't like that song,' Dylan said. The friend was crestfallen. Later, Dylan sang another new song. 'I like that one better than the other one,' the friend said. Dylan turned to Jaime [ROBBIE] ROBERTSON. 'See,' Dylan said, 'we shouldn't keep any music critics around here. We just lost another song.'

Aronowitz was also a hanger-on/hanger-out with many people with Dylan associations, including ALLEN GINSBERG, THE BAND and GEORGE HARRISON, as well as with a number of jazz and BEAT people. (He wrote a 12-part series on the Beat Poets in the New York Post in 1960.) A selection of his (mostly retrospective) music columns was self-published as Bob Dylan and the Beatles, Volume One of the Best of the Blacklisted Journalist, 2004.

Artes, Mary Alice [1948 -] It was the black American actor Mary Alice Artes, born on May 19, 1948, who helped bring Dylan to Christianity, allegedly after refusing to continue living with him after converting to Christ herself (or re-converting; it's been suggested that she had strayed from the faith of her upbringing). She is first mentioned by Dylan on the cover of the Street Legal LP, where her namecheck comes immediately below those of the album's producers, and reads 'Queen Bee—Mary Alice Artes'. She is also surely the subject of 'Precious Angel' on Slow Train Coming and 'Covenant Woman' on Saved. And as JOHN BAULDIE wrote: 'Dylan reportedly bought her an engagement ring in early 1980; later that year he wrote relevant versions of "Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar" and "Caribbean Wind".'

The New Testament text, 'But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin' (I John 1:7) is a core text for 'Precious Angel', and drawn upon in those great lines in which Dylan, the Jewish American descendant of Moses, and his 'precious angel', the black American descendant of slaves, are envisaged walking in fellowship: 'We are covered in blood, girl, you know our forefathers were slaves / . . . But there's violence in the eyes, girl, so let us not be enticed / On our way out of Egypt, through Ethiopia, to the judgment hall of Christ.'

Dylan achieves a concentration of three meanings into that 'covered in blood': blood as in one's family and racial history (blood thicker than water); blood as in carrying the stain of people's inherent violence and sin; and blood as in 'the blood of Jesus Christ' that 'covers us' by cleansing us all from sin. He also manages, with these lines, to invoke the whole story of the exodus from Egypt under Moses (Exodus) and by taking that exodus 'through Ethiopia' he not only emphasises that his 'precious angel' is an African-American, but echoes the specific scriptural detail remembered not in Exodus itself but in the fourth book of Moses, Numbers: '. . . for he [Moses] had married an Ethiopian woman' (Numbers 12:1).

Thus Dylan indicates the biographical parallel with his own story, and that of Mary Alice Artes.

Artes, aka Mary Akins, played the character 'Faith' in an episode of the TV series 'The Beverly Hillbillies', 'Three-Day Reprieve', in 1970 and appeared in a spectacularly dreadful low-budget western movie called She Came to the Valley, aka Texas in Flames, filmed in 1977 and released in 1979, the same year as Slow Train Coming, in which she played a very small part, that of Fanny. The film featured RONEE BLAKLEY in the lead female rôle.

[John Bauldie: 'Four and Twenty Windows and a Woman's Face in Every One: Significant Women in Bob Dylan's Life and Art', in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, ed. Michael Gray & John Bauldie, London: Futura paperback edn., 1988, p.270. Mary Alice Artes: 'Three-Day Reprieve', 'The Beverly Hillbillies' episode 8.20, screened 4 Feb 1970; She Came to the Valley, dir. Albert Band, RGV Pictures, US, 1979.]

'Arthur McBride' [song, 1992] See Brady, Paul.

artists v. critics Dylan's antipathy and contempt for critics, however distinguished, has almost been matched by his extravagance of reverence for artists, however undistinguished. But 'artists v. critics' is a false distinction. There's many a major creative writer who has also functioned as a critic. The 19th century American poet and writer EDGAR ALLAN POE also published much acute, lively criticism. T.S. ELIOT's criticism was a significant part of his work in the world, as was that of ROBERT GRAVES, while it was a critical book by D.H. Lawrence, his Studies in Classic American Literature, published in 1923, that rescued WALT WHITMAN's poetry from the neglect and contempt into which it had fallen since the poet's death. So while Dylan's hostility to 'interpreters' is one thing (see Dylan interpreters), his antagonism to critics, as if on principle—as if to be pro-artist must mean to be anti-critic—is misplaced.

Asch, Moses [1905 - 1986] Moses Asch was born in Poland in 1905, the son of Sholem Asch (1880–1957), a Yiddish novelist and dramatist whose trilogy Farn Mabul (1929–31) translates as Before the Flood and may thus have given Dylan the title of one of his albums. As a child Moses Asch moved to Paris and then emigrated to the US, living with his family in Brooklyn. In the 1920s he studied electronics in Germany but was back in the US by 1926 and later, drawn to folk music, left-wing politics and outsiders, had the idea of founding a record label for artists the majors deemed insufficiently commercial. As he explained later:

> 'The depression helped me understand folk music . . . the songs of the people made more sense to me than the popular songs of the 20s with their Wall Street slant. The depression made me go into business for myself. . . . At this time the price of phonograph records was cut so drastically that stores dumped their unsold stocks. This gave me a chance to buy thousands of folk music records for 5 to 10 cents a piece. These formed the basis later for the Anthology of American Folk Song series.'

He started the Asch and Disc labels, both of which failed—though not before he had recorded WOODY GUTHRIE and LEADBELLY. He founded the far more successful Folkways label in 1947 and ran it until his death almost 40 years later, making available more Guthrie and Leadbelly plus the work of PETE SEEGER, the NEW LOST CITY RAMBLERS, PAUL CLAYTON and many others, including an album Dylan says 'knocked me out', the compilation Foc'sle Songs and Shanties. It was also Asch's Folkways label that issued, as mentioned above, HARRY SMITH's invaluable and historic 6-LP set, the anthology American Folk Song. In 1987, the Smithsonian Institute in Washington, D.C., bought out Folkways and undertook to keep all 2,200 Folkways albums in print.

That's the Moses Asch legacy. Its influence, therefore, on the young Bob Dylan might be said to be huge. In Chronicles Volume One Dylan writes of his earliest days in New York City: 'I envisioned myself recording for Folkways Records. That was the label I wanted to be on. That was the label that put out all the great records.' He adds: 'It would have been a dream come true if Moe would have signed me to the label.'

[Moses Asch quoted from 'Folk Music—A Personal Statement', Sing Out!, NY, Feb–Mar 1961, reprinted online 7 Jun 2005 at www.radiohazak.com/Asch.html. Dylan quoted from Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.239, 15 & 72. Paul Clayton & the Foc'scle Singers: Foc'sle Songs and Shanties, Folkways FA 2429, 1959. Harry Smith: American Folk Music, Folkways FP251-253, NY, 1952, CD-reissued as Anthology of American

Folk Music (6-CD box set) with copious notes by many hands and a CD-ROM of extras, Smithsonian Folkways SRW 40090, Washington, D.C., 1997.]

Ashley, Clarence [1895 - 1967] Clarence Earl McCurry, known by adulthood as, variously, Thomas Clarence Ashley, Thomas C. Ashley McCurry, Tom McCurry Ashley and rather later as Clarence Ashley, was born in Bristol, TN, on September 29, 1895. Meeting his bigamous father for the first time at age 39, Tom/Clarence elicited this response from his parent: 'My God, how can a man get that ugly in 39 years?' By this time he had long been an accomplished country banjo player and guitarist with a rich repertoire of old songs (many learnt from more accessible relatives). He had joined a medicine show at 16, playing mostly in Tennessee and Virginia, and stayed with it every summer from 1911 to 1943, by which time his recording début was also long behind him. He had first recorded as Thomas C. Ashley (vocal and guitar) accompanied by banjoist Dwight Bell in 1928; then with Byrd Moore and his Hot Shots; and later as part of the Blue Ridge Mountain Entertainers. On October 23, 1929, at the end of a Columbia session by the former, Ashley recorded four solo numbers—'Dark Holler Blues', 'The Coo-Coo Bird', 'Little Sadie' and 'Naomi Wise'. These were issued on two 78s. He also recorded with the Carolina Tar Heels for Victor, and with Gwen Foster for Vocalion. After 1933, his next recordings were in 1960, after a chance meeting with RALPH RINZLER at a fiddlers' convention in North Carolina led to a reluctant Ashley singing, but not playing, for Folkways Records. After this—and after more than a decade of not playing—he resumed banjo-playing in his mid-60s and began an active new career in the Folk Revival boom years, heading a group that brought DOC WATSON to people's attention and with 'The Coo-Coo Bird' a highlight of their set. Ashley died of cancer on June 2, 1967.

There is every reason to feel that Dylan's 'In Search of Little Sadie' and 'Little Sadie', both on Self Portrait, were prompted by his knowing the song as by Ashley. Sing Out! magazine (Vol.14, no.6, NY, January 1964) published 'Little Sadie' (along with 'Copper Kettle', which is also on Self Portrait, and Dylan's own 'All I Really Want to Do') with this introduction:

> 'Woody Guthrie called it "Bad Lee Brown" and others have titled it "Sadie", "Late One Night", "Chain Gang Blues", "Out Last Night" and "Penitentiary Blues". Clarence Ashley calls it "Little Sadie", and it is his version we print here. According to [the eminent folklorist] D.K. Wilgus, the song seems to be an example of a "blues ballad", which he describes as "a loose, shifting, emotional narrative that celebrates and comments on an event instead of presenting a straightforward, detailed account." "Little Sadie", in all its various titles, has enjoyed wide currency among both Negro and white singers.'

Dylan was well aware of Ashley as a conduit of folksong: Ashley's pre-war recordings of 'The House Carpenter' and 'The Coo-Coo Bird' are on (and his 'Naomi Wise' & 'Dark Holler Blues' cited in) the 1952 HARRY SMITH 6-LP anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC, which Dylan certainly knew by May 1961. Equally, Dylan was well aware of Sing Out! as a source of material. It is no surprise, then, to find that Dylan's 'Little Sadie' is nigh word for word the same as the lyric Sing Out! publishes as Ashley's.

In Chronicles Volume One Dylan also recalls having seen Ashley in person as one of the people 'hanging around' in IZZY YOUNG's Folklore Center, and perhaps also hearing him perform at one or more of ALAN LOMAX's twice-monthly 3rd Street 'soirées'.

Dylan cut 'House Carpenter' in 1961, at his first LP sessions (it was finally issued 30 years later on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3) and performed 'Naomi Wise' at Riverside Church Saturday of Folk Music in New York City that July. Dylan put 'Naomi Wise' on tape again that December in Minneapolis. 'Dark Holler Blues' is related to 'East Virginia Blues', which Dylan recorded in the Self Portrait period, i.e. with EARL SCRUGGS in 1970.

[Clarence Ashley: 'Naomi Wise' c/w 'Little Sadie', and 'Dark Holler Blues' c/w 'The Coo-Coo Bird', Johnson City, TN, 23 Oct 1929. 'Little Sadie', Chicago, Feb 1962, Old-Time Music at Clarence Ashley's, Volume 2, Folkways FA 2359, NY, 1963; 'The House Carpenter', Atlanta, 14 Apr 1930 & 'The Coo-Coo Bird' (1929 version), American Folk Music, Folkways FP251-253, NY, 1952, CD-reissued as Anthology of American Folk Music (6-CD box set), Smithsonian Folkways SRW 40090, Washington, D.C., 1997.

Bob Dylan: 'House Carpenter', NY, 20 Nov 1961; 'Naomi Wise', NY, 29 Jul 1961 (broadcast WRVR-FM, NY, same day) and Minneapolis, 22 Dec 1961; 'East Virginia Blues' (with Earl Scruggs), Carmel, Dec 1970, broadcast NET TV, US, Jan 1971, issued Festival of Music video, New Line Cinema 2015, NY. Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.19 & 70.

Much Ashley biographical data from www.clarenceashley.com, online 5 Aug 2005, but with recording data corrected using Tony Russell's monumental and authoritative Country Music Records: A Discography, 1921–1942.]

Auden, W.H. [1907 - 1973] Wystan Hugh Auden was born in York on February 21, 1907, growing up first in Birmingham and then at Surrey and Norfolk boarding schools. After Oxford he spent a year in Weimar Berlin before returning to Britain, where he wrote his early love poems. He moved to the US in 1939, as World War II was beginning, and became a naturalized citizen in 1946. He was living on West 4th Street in Greenwich Village when Dylan was there in 1962, and though there's no evidence that he was aware of Dylan in particular, he was responsible for directing PHILIP SAVILLE's attention to the nearby bohemian folk clubs, as a result of which Saville saw Dylan perform and brought him over to London in late 1962 to appear in the TV drama The Madhouse on Castle Street. Auden was Poetry Professor at Oxford 1955–61 and died in Vienna September 29, 1973.

As Gavin Selerie points out, there are strong, particular similarities between Auden's poem/ ballad 'Victor', 1937, and Dylan's 'Lily, Rosemary & the Jack of Hearts', 1975. The Auden verses include, for example, 'Anna was sitting at table / Waiting for her husband to come back. / It wasn't the Jack of Diamonds / Nor the Joker she drew at first; / It wasn't the King or the Queen of Hearts / But the Ace of Spades reversed. / Victor stood in the doorway, / He didn't utter a word. / She said: "What's the matter, darling?" / He behaved as if he hadn't heard.'

[Gavin Selerie: 'Tricks and Training: Some Dylan Sources and Analogues', Telegraph no.50, Richmond, UK, winter 1994. W.H. Auden: 'Victor', in The English Auden, ed. E. Mendelson, 1977, p.221.]

audience members performing with Dylan There was a brief period during the Never-Ending Tour when instead of staying put or being violently repulsed by hired psychotics in tight yellow t-shirts bearing the word 'SECURITY', members of the audience at Dylan concerts were allowed to clamber on stage and dance, or even join in a song performance. On May 2, 1992, at Santa Rosa, California, an unidentified girl came up from the audience and sang most of 'Mr. Tambourine Man', the 11th number of an 18-song set. (Dylan stood back to indulge this.) On February 17, 1993 at Eindhoven in the Netherlands, a young woman named Liz Souissi shared the task with Dylan of singing 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', the 14th song of the set. And some years later on May 11, 2000 in Cologne, Germany, a fan with a guitar, one Dagmar Mueller, brought it on stage with him and augmented the band on 'Like a Rolling Stone'.

[As so often in the present work, information here has been gleaned from Glen Dundas' invaluable listings book Tangled, Thunder Bay: SMA Services, 2004.]

Aufray, Hugues [1929 -] Hugues Auffray [sic] was born in an agreeable suburb of Paris on August 18, 1929, but when his family fled the German occupation of the city in 1940 he was sent away to a Dominican monastery school in the Tarn, in south-west France. In 1945 his divorced father moved him to a school in Madrid. He returned to Paris in 1948, hoping to become a painter but busking for money either side of military conscription in 1949 (in the Alps). On his return to Paris he married a dancer, had children and for almost ten years worked only by singing in local bars and cabaret. In 1959, pushed into entering a radio competition, he won a record deal and found immediate popularity. In 1962 he visited New York City, encountered the excitement of the Greenwich Village folk-revival movement and met Bob Dylan. The two formed a personal bond and Aufray was inspired by the young American's songs. On Aufray's return to France he introduced the acoustic folk style to French pop (which, God knows, would have been improved by almost anything), and toured to great acclaim performing a number of Dylan's songs.

In the spring of 1964, just before returning to the States to record Another Side of Bob Dylan, Dylan visited France and stayed with Hugues Aufray in Paris. Aufray began working (with Pierre Delance and Jean-Pierre Sabar) on translating an album of Dylan songs into French. This famous album, Aufray chante Dylan, duly appeared in 1965 to widespread European and French-Canadian acclaim (and was also issued in the UK). The songs, refreshed by their French-language titles, were: 'La fille du nord', 'Ce que je veux surtout' ('All I Really Want to Do'), 'Ce n'était pas moi', 'Oxford Town', 'Corrina Corrina', 'Cauchemar psychomoteur', 'Les temps changent', 'La ballade de Hollis Brown', 'La mort solitaire de Hattie Carroll', 'Dieu est a nos côtés' and 'Le jour où le bâteau viendra'. When CD-reissued in the 1990s it came with the extra tracks 'L'homme orchestre' ('Mr. Tambourine Man') and 'N'y pense plus tout est bien' plus a live 1964 cut of the latter and four live 1966 tracks: 'Les temps changent', 'La fille du nord', 'L' homme orchestre' and 'Cauchemar psychomoteur'.

In another lifetime, 30 years later, Aufray released a 2-CD set, Aufray trans Dylan, the first disc comprising re-recordings of more or less the original album's worth of Dylan songs, and the second new translations (all his own work) of newer material. This was still mostly drawn from the 1960s but did include a 'Mais qu'est-ce que tu voulais?' ('What Was It You Wanted?') and an 'Au coeur de mon pays' ('Heartland', the Bob Dylan-WILLIE NELSON song). A year later, on the live 2-CD set Au Casino de Paris, 17 of its 27 songs were by Dylan and included 'Comme des pierres qui roulent' ('Like a Rolling Stone') and the song Dylan himself had had an English-language hit with in France, 'Man Gave Names to All the Animals', or as Aufray had it, 'L'homme dota d'un nom chaque animal'.

In the summer of 1984, Aufray made surprise appearances on stage with Dylan—at Bob's Paris concert of July 1 and then two nights later in Grenoble—in each case playing guitar and sharing vocals with Dylan on 'Les temps changent'.

Aufray has remained a law unto himself, often disappearing from public view to his farm or his ranch for long periods, sometimes not giving the French public what it thinks it wants, touring Africa and generally espousing rural and ecological causes like a decent human being.

[Hugues Aufray: Aufray chante Dylan, nia, Barclay 80.289S (mono) & BB106 SS (stereo), Paris, 1965; Fontana TL 5329, UK; Barclay CBLP 2076, B-8019 & 45503, Canada; CD-reissue Dial 900 2217, France 1992 & Barclay 519 9 308-2 (with only 2 'bonus tracks'), Paris, 1993 (the 1997 & 2000 reissues have no extra tracks); Aufray trans Dylan, nia, Arcade 3006762 (2-LP version Arcade 3006766), Paris, 1995; Au Casino de Paris, Paris, Feb 1996, 2-CD set Arcade 3032272, Paris, 1997.]

Augustine, St. [354 - 430] St. Augustine of Hippo (now Annaba, Algeria) studied and lectured in Carthage before converting to Christianity in the 380s. His Confessions is a spiritual autobiography. He died in Hippo in 430 as the Vandals were taking the handles. He features (as you might expect) in Dylan's marvellous 'I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine', from John Wesley Harding (a song that, alarmingly, Dylan decided to perform in the midst of his wretched 2005 US concerts). See also Augustine's appearance in Eliot, T.S.

Austrian Bob Dylan Convention, the annual The annual Austrian Bob Dylan Convention was founded by ROBERT KÖHLER in 1992 and, except for two Vienna-based festivals at the end of the 1990s (organised by RAINER VESELY), Köhler has continued to organise and oversee this venerable event. It has usually been held at the amazing Castle Plankenstein, spread over several days each May (or thereabouts) and providing a unique venue and an occasion for people to come together over and over again down the years. While it has attracted foreign speakers including MICHAEL GRAY, STEPHEN SCOBIE and PAUL WILLIAMS, it has been at heart a German-speaking Austro-German and Eastern European rendezvous in and around the courtyard of this medieval castle in the hills, encompassing the playing of rare video, audio and live music, merchandise stalls and the consumption of huge amounts of beer.

B

'Baby Let Me Follow You Down' [1962] Although on his first album Dylan credits 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down' as learnt from (E)RIC VON SCHMIDT, saying with lovely timing and wit on the spoken intro to the track that he'd 'met him one day in the green pastures of Harvard University' (a track laid down on his first day in the studios as an artist in his own right), he was aware that it could be traced back through the REV. GARY DAVIS' 'Baby, Let Me Lay It on You' and back beyond that all the way to MEMPHIS MINNIE and her second husband, Joe McCoy.

They may have been the first to record this song, but their 1930 version is actually a vocal duet, with McCoy doing the asking and her the spurning, so that the whole nature of the song is different. That is, before it becomes the familiar song of implicitly successful seduction, it is an inconsequential chat-up novelty item, a sort of early 'Come Outside'. It is impossible to say whose street-singing or fish-fry live version developed first or from where, but the pattern of the song's early committal to record in its various guises seems to run like this:

Memphis Minnie (with Joe McCoy): 'Can I Do It for You—Part 1' and 'Can I Do It for You—Part 2', Memphis, February 21, 1930; The State Street Boys (i.e. BIG BILL BROONZY and others): 'Don't Tear My Clothes', Chicago, January 10, 1935; Walter Coleman: 'Mama Let Me Lay It on You', Chicago, February 8, 1936 (re-cut in Chicago, June 3, 1936); Sheik Johnson: 'Baby Let Me Lay It on You', Chicago, March 27, 1936; BLIND BOY FULLER: 'Mama Let Me Lay It on You', NY, April 29, 1936; Georgia White: 'Daddy Let Me Lay It on You', Chicago, May 11, 1936; Washboard Sam: 'Don't Tear My Clothes', Chicago, June 26, 1936; Chicago Black Swans (i.e. again, Bill Broonzy and others): 'Don't Tear My Clothes No. 2', Chicago, January 26, 1937; State Street Swingers: 'Don't Tear My Clothes No. 2', also Chicago, January 26, 1937.

In the 1950s it became popular with New Orleans-based artists, including Professor Longhair, who recorded it in 1957, and Snooks Eaglin, who revived it in 1959 in its Big Bill Broonzy form as '(Mama) Don't You Tear My Clothes'—at which point its line 'You can rock me all night long . . . but don't you tear my clothes' is likely to have sounded as if it were pinching ideas from CARL PERKINS' then-recent 'Blue Suede Shoes'. Two years after Snooks Eaglin, Dylan recorded it as 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down'. The version he put on his début album is his earliest-known extant performance of it.

Three days later, however, Dylan was taped performing the song solo at the New York City home of friends Eve and 'Mac' MacKenzie; the same applied a month later in Minneapolis. He performed it live on the Billy Faier radio show on WBAI-FM in October 1962—and then, as if remembering it anew and deciding he'd written it himself, he recorded it as a Witmark music-publishing demo in January 1964. After 'going electric', Dylan then reintroduced the song to his set in concert, though not straight away: the earliest extant concert tape to include it comes from Hartford, Connecticut, on October 30, 1965. By February 1966 it had gained a regular position as the tenth song in the turbulent set Dylan & THE HAWKS took across the States and Australia and Europe; the Manchester, UK, version of this beautifully deranged reinvention of the song, from May 1966, can be heard on the Bootleg Series Vol. 4.

The song took a decade's rest after that, reappearing unexpectedly, though not especially beguilingly, at THE BAND's farewell concert in November 1976 (later issued as part of The Last Waltz album set and film). Again this was followed by a long gap: of over 11 years, before 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down' resurfaced at the second-ever Never-Ending Tour concert, Sacramento on June 9, 1988. There were three revisits in 1989—and the third, at Costa Mesa, California, that September 8, has (as of October 2005) proved to be the last time Dylan played the song in public.

For all this, the versions on Dylan's début album, and the live 1966 versions, are the ones that matter. They could hardly be more different from each other, or more perfect.

[Bob Dylan: 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down', NY, 20 Nov 1961, Bob Dylan.

Professor Longhair, 'Baby Let Me Hold Your Hand', New Orleans, 1957; Mardi Gras in New Orleans 1949–1957, Nighthawk 108, nia. Snooks Eaglin: 'Don't You Tear My Clothes', New Orleans, 1959; Snooks Eaglin's New Orleans Blues, Heritage EP 301, nia; re-recorded with 12-string guitar at same sessions as 'Mama Don't You Tear My Clothes', New Orleans, 1959; That's All Right, Bluesville BVLP 1046, nia.]

Baez, Joan [1941 -] Joan Chandos Baez was born on Staten Island, New York City, on January 9, 1941. She and her prettier, less talented sister MIMI both grew up to be folksingers. They, plus Bob Dylan and Mimi's husband RICHARD FARIÑA are the subjects of the book Positively 4th Street by DAVID HAJDU, published in 2001. He cuts to one core when he writes, brusquely but tellingly, that 'In folk circles . . . [amid] down-home characters groaning in and out of tune, Joan Baez seemed like the spirit of a child-queen, floating in off the moors.' Her pure voice was exactly what Dylan didn't like about her.

In one of those autobiographical poems of his that got into print from time to time on the back of LP covers and in old underground magazines—in this case on the back of her album Joan Baez in Concert Part 2 (an album on which Baez sings the traditional 'Jackaroe' with the same set of lyrics Dylan uses thirty years later for the version on World Gone Wrong)—he uses the railroad remembered from his 'youngest years' as an axis round which to spin ideas of what is real. The 'iron bars an' rattlin' wheels' are real, the nightingale sound of Joan Baez's voice an alien, smooth opposite: 'A girl I met on common ground / Who like me strummed lonesome tunes / With a "lovely voice" so I first heard / "A thing a beauty" people said / "Wondrous sounds" writers wrote / "I hate that kind a sound" said I / "The only beauty's ugly, man / The crackin' shakin' breakin' sounds're / The only beauty I understand" . . .'

He suggests that he changes his mind. Not everybody does. Some of us hear those early duets, as at Newport, and can't but wince at the strident gauchery of her rigid delivery, the irritating way she's lost the moment he improvises, and her martyred suffering of these challenges she's privileged to have him throw at her.

But Baez, awful though she is in many ways (specially when she tries to dance on stage), should not be discounted as a conduit of traditional material to Bob Dylan. Once he accepted her voice and listened to her, she might have drawn his ever-curious attention to more than one or two of the songs with which we can now associate him. He could have heard them all from any number of other sources, and might well have done, but Joan Baez's early recordings happen to assemble quite a few of them conveniently together. In Chronicles Volume One he writes that he was struck straight away by what her first album contained: 'The Vanguard record was no phony baloney. It was almost frightening—an impeccable repertoire of songs, all hard-core traditional.'

Her first album includes 'East Virginia', 'Fare Thee Well', 'House of the Rising Sun' and 'Little Moses', her second 'Wagoner's Lad', 'The Lily of the West', 'Barbara Allen' and 'Railroad Boy', while 'The Trees They Do Grow High' is an alternative title for 'Young But Daily Growing'. On the third Baez album comes 'Copper Kettle', 'House Carpenter' and 'Pretty Boy Floyd', and in among the four Bob Dylan songs on the sixth album, Farewell Angelina, we find 'Will Ye Go, Laddie, Go' and 'Satisfied Mind' (which he gets around to on Saved in 1980).

Many further connections and comparisons arise on the same albums. Baez's first album's 'John Riley', a broadside ballad collected by G. Malcolm Laws Jr., belongs with 'Belle Isle' in telling of a soldier or sailor returning in disguise to test his lover's fidelity, while 'Rake and Rambling Boy' has a final verse that melds together the 'I'm Riding Old Paint' format discussed elsewhere ('when I die, don't bury me at all / Place my bones in alcohol') and the ending of 'Railroad Boy' ('at my feet place a white snow dove / To tell the world I died for love'). This last formulation is found widely—as for instance in the Lincolnshire folk song 'Died for Love (I Wish My Baby It Was Born)', which not only ends the same way ('Dig me my grave long, wide and deep / Put a marble stone at my head and feet / But a turtle white dove put over above / For to let the world know that I died for love') but also offers this recognisable prefiguring of a portion of 'Bob Dylan's Dream': 'I wish, I wish, but it's all in vain / I wish I was a maid again'.

The third album's 'Matty Groves', a CHILD ballad, shares its theme with that other Child ballad 'Blackjack Davey', while 'Geordie', a part-Child and part-broadside ballad, reminds us of both 'Blackjack Davey' and Dylan's own 'Seven Curses': 'Ah my Geordie will be hanged . . . / Go bridle me my milk white steed / Go bridle me my pony / I will ride to London's court / To plead for the life of Geordie . . . / The judge looked over his left shoulder / He said fair maid I'm sorry'.

Quite apart from all that, Baez comes into the Dylan story recurrently, of course. They hung around together, he took up with her, she helped spread his name around when she was a star and he wasn't (her second, third and fourth albums all went gold, she made the covers of upscale New York magazines, her concerts were reviewed by JOHN UPDIKE: she was the acceptable face and voice of folk music), she duetted with Dylan at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL in July 1963—during her own set—and the following month warbled away behind him, as if to validate his presence, at the March on Washington. She gave him a significant slot on her own shows when she was a bigger name than him. In 1965 she accompanied him and his retinue to England (where, that year, she enjoyed a top 10 hit with her single of his song 'Farewell Angelina') for his last set of solo concerts before he 'went electric', expecting him to reciprocate. He didn't. Her pain is there for all to feel embarrassed by in D.A. PENNEBAKER's film of the tour, Don't Look Back.

She continued with her political activism: campaigning, giving benefit concerts, visiting Vietnam and helping to establish Amnesty International in the United States—and she has continued her good works ever since, visiting trouble spots with great persistence, though people have occasionally questioned the quality of her commitment. Terry Castle, reminiscing not altogether fondly about her late mistress Susan Sontag, revealed that Baez was an especial bugbear to the great critic:

> '. . . she regaled me—for the umpteenth time—about the siege of Sarajevo, the falling bombs, and > how the pitiful Joan Baez had been too terrified to come out of her hotel room. Sontag flapped her arms and shook her big mannish hair—inevitably described in the press as a "mane"—contemptuously. That woman is a fake! She tried to fly back to California the next day! I was there for months. Through all of the bombardment, of course, Terry. Then she ruminated. Had I ever met Baez? Was she a secret lesbian? I confessed that I'd once waited in line behind the folk singer at my cash machine (Baez lives near Stanford) and had taken the opportunity to inspect the hairs on the back of her neck. Sontag, who sensed a rival, considered this non-event for a moment, but after further inquiries, was reassured . . .'

Meanwhile, back in the 1960s, Baez was widely assumed to have been the subject of Dylan's song 'She Belongs to Me': the woman with the Egyptian ring (though the song can just as well be 'about' the US, rather than any individual). She also somewhere suggested herself as the 'Johanna' in his Blonde on Blonde song 'Visions of Johanna'. More certain is that earlier, when things between them were at their most productive, it was at her house outside Big Sur that he wrote his magnificent 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune'. If she had done nothing else, we'd be in Joan Baez's debt for helping that song come into being.

Less vitally, she also became a conduit for his songs as a performer: not only scattering many of them around her albums but devoting entire albums to them. Any Day Now—Songs of Bob Dylan came out in 1968, was CD-reissued in 1987 and then reissued again in 2005 with two 'bonus tracks' taken from her 1967 Live in Japan album. There were various extra such projects in Europe—a 2-LP set in Holland in 1975, for instance—and then in 1988 came the retrospective US release of material from 1963–68, Baez Sings Dylan. Of more importance to Dylan collectors, a couple of official Baez releases include performances by the two of them, and offer the only non-bootleg way to acquire these. 'Troubled and I Don't Know Why', sung live at Forest Hills, NY, in August 1963 was released on the Baez 3-CD box set Rare, Live & Classic in 1994; her Live at Newport CD, compiled and released by Vanguard in 1997 offers their previously unreleased duet of 'It Ain't Me Babe' from July 24, 1964, plus their 'With God on Our Side' from two nights later. (A slightly different edit of this 'It Ain't Me Babe', with Baez introducing Dylan as 'George Washington', and with an outtro, was released in 1998 on the various artists CD Vanguard Sessions: Folk Duets.)

A slattern for punishment, Baez returned within the Dylan orb for his Rolling Thunder Revues of 1975–76. Musically, these yielded by far their best collaborations, as can be seen and heard in the movie Renaldo & Clara, filmed during the 1975 Revue, and in the 'Hard Rain' TV Special, filmed the following year. On the JOHNNY ACE song 'Never Let Me Go', and especially on WOODY GUTHRIE's 'Deportees' (its lovely melody was written by a schoolteacher, Martin Hoffman), their duets are so good you don't even want her to not be there. (On the other hand that dancing, on Dylan's splendidly flamencoid reinvention of 'I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine', is excruciating.)

Yet it seems to have been another personal humiliation. What we see, in the end, in Renaldo & Clara, is Baez asking Dylan aloud what he thought would have happened if they had married, parading around in a gypsy wedding dress, trying to square off against SARA DYLAN in a doomed, unsavory way and, within the fictional-storyline portion of the film, being traded for a horse.

On June 6, 1982 they came together on another public platform, for a 'Peace Sunday' concert in Pasadena. Photographs taken at this brief, three-song meeting are rare, but show Dylan and Baez standing at the microphone looking dignified and well-attuned (and looking, for the 1980s, pretty good). They performed 'With God on Our Side' and 'Blowin' in the Wind', but between these came the surprise of a Jimmy Buffett song, 'A Pirate Looks at Forty'.

In 1984, unbelievably, Baez consented to come along on yet another Dylan tour, his tour of European stadiums with SANTANA—only to storm off before the end and write about how horrid Bob was in her second attempt at autobiography, 1988's And a Voice to Sing With. (In her first, Daybreak, 20 years earlier, she had written about him admiringly, and called him 'the Dada King'.)

At least twice she made him the subject of her own songs, too. First there was the ill-advised 'To Bobby', in 1972, remonstrating with him for deserting the right-on political troops and imploring him to return to the head of their raggedly righteous phalanxes. The chorus went: 'Do you hear the voices in the night, Bobby? / They're crying for you / See the children in the morning light, Bobby / They're dying.' (Not quite 'They're dying for you', but close.)

This did not go down well: and not merely on aesthetic grounds; Dylan was still muttering about it over 30 years later in Chronicles Volume One: 'Joan Baez recorded a protest song about me that was getting big play, challenging me to get with it—come out and take charge, lead the masses—be an advocate, lead the crusade. The song called out to me from the radio like a public service announcement.'

Yet three years later, she wrote and recorded a song as good as 'To Bobby' was gruesomely bad. 'Diamonds and Rust' is immeasurably better than anything else Joan Baez has ever written (which might not prove, in itself, ardent recommendation): it was a superb love song, full of ebb and flow, a well-judged mix of vivid detail and warm feeling. It managed to be mature but fresh, quirky and direct. It was also Baez being dignified and open, with absolutely no sulks or martyrdom, about her relationship with and feelings for Bob Dylan. The lyric is so self- confident, too: it can include 'As I remember your eyes / Were bluer than robin's eggs / My poetry was lousy, you said', this deft, witty pay-off line sung without rancour or reproach, enacting that acknowledgement within those lines while the broader sweep of 'Diamonds and Rust' was its own refutation of such a judgment. It also includes these acute lines: lines that pin down part of Dylan, as man and as artist, with fond aplomb but great clear-sightedness: 'Now you're telling me / You're not nostalgic: / Well give me another word for it / You who're so good with words / And at keeping things vague.'

In Chronicles Volume One Dylan rewrites his first reactions to the Baez voice. He forgets that initial clinging to the feeling that 'the only beauty's ugly'; he says of seeing her for the first time on TV, when he was still in Minnesota: 'I couldn't stop looking at her, didn't want to blink. . . . The sight of her made me sigh. All that and then there was the voice. A voice that drove out bad spirits . . . she sang in a voice straight to God. . . . Nothing she did didn't work.' He adds that 'also she was an exceptionally good instrumentalist.' This last, unelaborated observation accords with what he says in the interview in the film No Direction Home, where he stresses that she was 'an excellent guitar player.' She gives an interview for the film too, the bile of the late 1980s gone: but with a sub-text of gentle, not so subtle cutting down to size going on. In contrast, the last things he writes about her in Chronicles Volume One are of unmitigated respect for her artistry.

> 'The singer has to make you believe what you are hearing and Joan did that. . . . Soon I was rolling through the snowy Wisconsin prairie fields, the looming shadows of Baez and ELLIOTT were not far from my heels. The world I was heading into . . . was really the world of Jack Elliott and Joan Baez.'

[Joan Baez: Joan Baez, Vanguard VRS-9078, NY, 1960; Joan Baez, Vol. 2, Vanguard VRS-9094, NY, 1961; Joan Baez in Concert, Vanguard VRS-9112, NY, 1962; Joan Baez in Concert, Part 2, Vanguard VRS-9113, NY, 1964; Farewell Angelina, Vanguard VRS-9200 (stereo VSD-79200), NY, 1965. All these are CD-reissued on, respectively, Vanguard VMD 79078-2, 1995; VMD 79094-2, 1995; VMD 79112-2, 1996; VMD 79113-2, 1996; & VMD 79200-2, 1995. All these songs are published in British Ballads and Folk Songs from the Joan Baez Songbook (with illustrations by ERIC VON SCHMIDT), 1964 & 1967. Joan Baez: Any Day Now—Songs of Bob Dylan, Vanguard VSD-79306/7, US (SVRL 19037/8, UK), 1968; CD-reissued VSD-79306/7, US, 1987; CD-reissue with bonus tracks 79747-2, US, 2005; 'To Bobby', nia, Come from the Shadows, A&M 3103, 1972; 'Diamonds and Rust', LA, 17–29 Jan 1975, A&M SP 3233, LA (AMLH 64527, London), 1975; Baez Sings Dylan, Vanguard 79512-2, US, 1988. Joan Baez & Bob Dylan: 'With God on Our Side', Newport, RI, 28 Jul 1963, Various Artists LP Newport Broadside, Vanguard VRS-9144 (mono) / VSD 79144, NY, 1964, CD-reissued VCD 770003-2, NY, 1997; 'Troubled and I Don't Know Why', Forest Hills, NY, 17 Aug 1963, Rare, Live & Classic, Vanguard VCD 125/27-2, NY, 1994; 'It Ain't Me Babe', Newport, RI, 24 Jul & 'With God on Our Side' 26 Jul 1964, Live at Newport Vanguard 77015-2, NY, 1997; 'It Ain't Me Babe', ditto (different edit), Vanguard Sessions: Folk Duets, Vanguard 79511 2, 1998.

Bob Dylan: 'Joan Baez in Concert, Part 2' (poem; in Lyrics 1962–85 it is copyrighted 1973: almost a decade after its publication on the back of the Baez album); Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.119, 254–57.

'Died for Love (I Wish My Baby It Was Born)' in the pamphlet Twenty-one Lincolnshire Folk Songs, the Percy Grainger collection, ed. Patrick O'Shaughnessy, Lincolnshire & Humberside Arts, UK, 2nd edn., 1983. (Incidentally, Percy Grainger died in New York City in the midst of the folk revival in 1961.) Terry Castle: 'Desperately Seeking Susan', London Review of Books, 17 Mar 2005.]

Baker, Arthur [1955 -] Arthur Baker was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on April 22, 1955. His music-biz career began as a Boston club DJ. He produced for a local label, moved to New York, produced there with no special success, returned to Boston, produced some more, moved back to New York City and there, for Tommy Boy Records, co-produced Afrika Bambaataa's 1982 single 'Jazzy Sensation', an update of Gwen McCrae's 'Funky Sensation', with Shep Pettibone. This was well-regarded (by those who like that sort of thing) and led to his producing the group's 'Planet Rock', a record that was an early hip hop landmark yet had been inspired by Kraftwerk. In 1984 Baker made dance remixes of big-name rock artists' tracks, first revamping Cyndi Lauper's 'Girls Just Wanna Have Fun' and then BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN's 'Dancing in the Dark'. Baker also produced Manchester group New Order's track 'Confusion', which became a crossover hit on the US dance charts. All this set the precedent for rock acts to make dance remixes of their records.

In Chronicles Volume One Dylan credits Arthur Baker with having 'helped' him 'produce the album Empire Burlesque'. Most people would say the opposite: that when Dylan latched onto Baker and this re-mix guru was invited to go through these recordings discoing them up (or down), the vapid, inhuman drumbeat Baker imposed, and the concrete stadium acoustics he threw over everything, were no more capable of injecting real life into these tracks than could Frankenstein into his dead metal monster.

Dylan reportedly told Baker: 'I want to make a record like Madonna or Prince. I want to sell a lot of records.' But dragging Arthur Baker into his arena in order to tart up Empire Burlesque delivered Dylan the worst of both worlds: it convinced neither the market that turns corporate rock into platinum nor those whose ear and mind is on the lookout for an alternative to the mainstream. If you use your position in the evil empire of the music business to send someone out to buy you disco clothes, you'll end up in the clothes of the emperor. And shopping for modishness is still shopping.

Specifically, though, Dylan credits Baker with having persuaded him that he needed an acoustic track to complete the album. How right this was is doubtful, granted the dodginess of the song Dylan went back and wrote that night at the Plaza Hotel, New York ('Dark Eyes'), and granted too how uncomfortably it sits with the mechanistic bedlam of the other tracks as remixed by Arthur Baker.

Baker has continued to work with New Order and still works as both a producer and DJ, though he is modish no more. In the 1990s he moved to London and opened a chain of Elbow Room bars and restaurants in Brixton and Notting Hill.

The failure of the Empire Burleseque album even from Baker's point of view, in commercial and artistic terms, is more than hinted at by the fact that almost every website biography of him omits Bob Dylan's name.

[Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.209–210; quote re cf. Madonna & Prince: Nigel Williamson, The Rough Guide to Bob Dylan, London: Rough Guides, 2004, p.154.]

Baldwin, John [1948–] John Baldwin was born on Christmas Eve 1948 in Bermondsey, London, amid the slums and dereliction left over from World War II. After leaving school he entered the pharmaceutical industry and remained in its employ for 27 years but is now an independent consultant in drug safety evaluation.

He first showed an interest in Dylan's work at age 17. In 1996 he self-published the first of six volumes of The Fiddler Now Upspoke, a series that collates all known interviews with Dylan with adequate indexing and cross-referencing. He also founded and edited the bi-monthly fanzine Dignity, which has run to 31 issues but is now in a rather lengthy temporary abeyance. Though founded to provide serious analytical discussion, in which it never succeeded, it found a niche as a more friendly discussion forum for fans, and for fans to see their work in print 'without unwarranted criticism'.

John Baldwin also runs the Desolation Row Information Service, keeping people up to date with Dylan-related news. It began after JOHN BAULDIE's death in 1996, as a replacement for the latter's telephone hotline service. (More of a 'warmline', really.) This still exists but widespread internet access means that the main form of communication is now by regular e-mailings to 'subscribers, friends and other strangers'. Courtesy of his Desolation Row Promotions, for nearly a decade now John Baldwin has run the 'fan club' ticket allocation for all Dylan's UK concerts.

At the time of writing John and his daughter Mary-Anne are about to self-publish a new book focussing on Dylan's Desire song 'Isis', titled On the Fifth Day of May.

[John Baldwin: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, Welwyn Garden City & Campton, UK; Desolation Row Promotions, www.desolation-row.co.uk. John & Mary-Anne Baldwin, On the Fifth Day of May, Campton: Desolation Row Promotions, 2006.]

Ball, Gordon [1944–] Gordon Victor Ball Jr., born in Paterson, New Jersey, on December 30, 1944, is an underground filmmaker turned Colonel and Professor of Literature at the Virginia Military Institute, and is the man who has nominated Dylan for the Nobel Prize for Literature annually since 1996.

He first took an interest in Dylan's work in 1965, but his first published article about it was a review of Renaldo & Clara. Some early listenings to Dylan are recounted in his book '66 Frames: A Memoir, published in 1999.

In 1968 he was hired as ALLEN GINSBERG's farm manager, later editing the poet's early writings. His book Allen Verbatim: Lectures on Poetry, Politics, Consciousness was nominated for a Pulitzer Prize. He wrote Ginsberg's entry in the Encyclopaedia of American Literature and JACK KEROUAC's entry for the Dictionary of American Biography. At the Caen University Dylan Colloquium of March 2005 he delivered a paper on 'Dylan and the Nobel'.

GREIL MARCUS probably speaks for many when, asked if he thinks Dylan will 'ever get the Nobel Prize for Literature', replies:

> 'I hope not. There are thousands of novelists more deserving than he is. It's a prize for literature; he's a songwriter, he's a singer, he's a performer. Anyway, Bob Dylan's won lots of awards, he doesn't need this one. There are plenty of people who need the money, need the readers.'

[Gordon Ball: Review Notes and a Community Proposal, North Carolina Anvil, vol. 12, no. 567, Durham, NC, 5 May 1978, p.8; '66 Frames: A Memoir, Minneapolis, MN: Coffee House Press, 1999; Allen Verbatim: Lectures on Poetry, Politics, Consciousness, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1974. Greil Marcus: interviewed by Thomas Storch, Isis no.122, Bedworth, UK, Sep–Oct 2005, pp.47–49.]

Band, The The very name The Band was, as Barney Hoskyns wrote, 'born of a beguiling mixture of humility and arrogance. They were not just "the band" but they were THE band.' And they were so called only at the very last minute before the 1968 issue of their début album, the great Music from Big Pink. Their record contract signed them as the Crackers. Then the US promo single of 'The Weight', taken from the finished album, was billed not as by The Band but as by Jaime ROBBIE ROBERTSON, RICK DANKO, RICHARD MANUEL, GARTH HUDSON, LEVON HELM. Even on the label of the British LP itself it doesn't say The Band; it says 'Rick Danko, Levon Helm, Garth Hudson, Richard Manuel, Jaime Robbie Robertson'.

They had begun as the backing band to Arkansas' mediocre rocker and charmer RONNIE HAWKINS, with Levon Helm the first to be recruited and the only American in the group. All the others came from southern Ontario, Canada.

Toronto-based soon after Helm joined, Hawkins & the Hawks were signed to Roulette Records and had two immediate hits, 'Forty Days' and 'Mary Lou', before the other members of what would become The Band were gradually brought into the group: Jaime Robbie Robertson as guitarist, Richard Manuel as pianist, Rick Danko as bass player and Garth Hudson on organ.

After splitting with Hawkins the group went out as Levon & the Hawks, then briefly as the Canadian Squires, and then as the Hawks again. But writer Peter Viney suggests that our notion of these five musos working as a team for eight or nine years before meeting success is mistaken: this was a myth created by the predatory ALBERT GROSSMAN after he stepped in as their manager.

Viney points out that when they were working with Hawkins, the group was a changeable unit, using extra horn players at their longer Ontario residencies but with a smaller core unit when they traveled around; that Hudson, for example, came into the group far later than Helm and Robertson: he doesn't appear on a Hawks recording until 1963; and that even when they left Hawkins, Jerry Penfound was still a member, on horns, while initially the group had also included a vocalist named Bruce Bruno. In other words, as Viney notes, 'They didn't coalesce as a solid unit of five until very late in 1964.'

They met up with Bob Dylan in 1965. Only Helm and Robertson played the early electric gigs that followed the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL electric début, starting at Forest Hills, New York, that August 28. The rest of Dylan's band at this point were AL KOOPER on organ and Harvey Brooks (aka HARVEY GOLDSTEIN) on bass. This unit lasted only a short time, and after a Hollywood Bowl concert on September 3, Dylan got together with Helm, Robertson, Danko, Hudson and Manuel to rehearse in Woodstock, New York, for further live gigs. That same month, according to Robertson's often wilfully inaccurate notes, Helm and the others were still active as Levon & the Hawks, and they recorded Robertson's songs 'He Don't Love You (And He'll Break Your Heart)' and 'The Stones I Throw' plus the traditional 'Go Go Liza Jane' in New York City some time that September and duly released on two Levon & the Hawks singles on the Atlantic Records subsidiary label Atco. But on October 5 they went into the studio with Dylan for the first time, followed by more live concerts and a second studio stint on November 30 (from which comes the single 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?'). This session has also now yielded the version of 'Visions of Johanna' released on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7, 2005.

At this point, Helm quit; he couldn't stand the booing at Dylan's electric performances. By December 4, at Berkeley, the rest of the Hawks were still in there but Levon had been replaced by BOBBY GREGG. Back in the studio again on January 21–22, it was SANDY KONIKOFF on drums along with the Hawks minus Levon.

The whole of the amazing 1966 tour thus took place without Levon Helm. On the early North American dates, from February 5 at White Plains, NY, through to March 26 in Vancouver, Canada, the drummer was Sandy Konikoff; after that, and so for all the tumultuous Australian and European dates, including the historic Manchester Free Trade Hall concert in May, the drummer was MICKEY JONES.

Drummer aside, however, this blazing, transcendent music was by the Hawks, which is to say The-Band-in-waiting. So loud and badly reproduced in the halls, so smudgily filmed yet mercifully so well recorded, this was the most radical, oceanic and storming electric music ever played live. How was it that Dylan, a solo performer who hadn't played live with a group since he was a schoolboy, and the Hawks, whose earlier music was undistinguished bar-room blowing, coalesced so incandescently well, that they could go on stage in Liverpool in May 1966—the city that had so recently been the centre of the musical universe—and hurl at their audience rock music a thousand times more sublime, challenging, multi-layered and exciting than anything Liverpudlians had ever heard before? Impossible to say, but easy to prove. Play that night's 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues'. By this point Dylan's cawing voice and searing harmonica were both perfectly integrated instruments in amongst those of the Hawks, whose hard-won knowledge of each other's playing freed them all to ride each moment in a ceaseless interchange of fiery, creative levitation.

In extraordinary contrast, in the calm of the countryside and after Dylan's long post-motorcycle crash unwinding, their next co-operative project was the informal Basement Tapes sessions. But what about all the time in between the two—between the end of May 1966 and the spring of 1967? The group, supposedly such a hard-working, on-the-road unit, played not a single live date that anyone has been able to discover.

What's more, Levon Helm was out of the picture all that time, and indeed was still missing when the Basement sessions began. Exactly when that was remains in doubt. It's been suggested (by Helm, who wasn't around) that they began as early as March '67, but more certain is that in June 1967 they assembled at Dylan's house in Woodstock, and at that point the group and Dylan were recorded by Garth Hudson on primitive machinery. These June sessions yielded 20 tracks that have circulated, including a wealth of traditional material and old songs like 'Rock Salt and Nails', 'I Don't Hurt Anymore' and 'Be Careful of Stones That You Throw': material that only came to light in the 1980s and 1990s. Over that summer, partly at Dylan's house but mostly at 'Big Pink', the group's house at nearby West Saugerties—in the basement: a room only about 12 foot square—another 67 tracks plus seven further fragments were recorded, including nine Dylan tracks that emerged in 1975 on the official The Basement Tapes double-LP and two ('Santa Fe' and 'I Shall Be Released') that emerged in 1991 on the Bootleg Series Volumes 1–3.

Across all these tracks the four Helm-less band members spread themselves out into the multi-instrumentalism for which they would later become famous and admired. Here we got, in addition to their primary instruments, Robertson playing drums, Manuel on drums (they needed someone on drums, after all) and harmonica, Danko on fiddle and mandolin and Hudson on accordion, tenor sax, piano and clavinette.

Further sessions followed in September–October and in October–November, all at 'Big Pink', with Levon Helm arriving in October, better late than never. These sessions yielded 29 more tracks, among them Dylan's 'Tears of Rage', 'Clothes Line Saga', 'Goin' to Acapulco' and, like the marathon June-to-August sessions, other high-spot Dylan items that saw official release only on The Basement Tapes in 1975 but were circulated as song demos in London very soon after their recording.

The tracks by The Band on this album are highly suspect. 'Bessie Smith' was actually an outtake from the fourth Band album, Cahoots, and the others were almost as dubious. As CLINTON HEYLIN comments:

> 'Intermingling eight songs by The Band supposedly cut in the fall of 1967, Robertson sought to imply that the alliance between Dylan and The Band was far more equal than it was: "Hey, we were writing all these songs, doing our own thing, oh and Bob would sometimes come around and we'd swap a few tunes." In fact, the so-called Band basement tapes have nothing to do with the Dylan/Band sessions . . . [and] Richard Manuel compositions recorded at Big Pink in 1967 . . . were omitted from the set possibly because they highlighted how Manuel, not Robertson, was the first to pen original Band material. Though revealing in their own right, the Band tracks only pollute the official set and reduce its stature. Dylan's songs, fully sprung from his reactivated muse, are the work of an artist at the pinnacle of his powers. The Band's songs are signposts along the way, notes detailing the search for an independent voice so magically realized on Music from Big Pink. No more, no less.'

When Dylan made his first public appearance for 20 months in January 1968 at the WOODY GUTHRIE Memorial Concerts, the Hawks (or the Crackers) played behind him, and Levon Helm was among them for the first time in over two years. But the group was reaching its own maturity, emerging into the light as a unique creative unit. It was becoming The Band.

Their recording deal and their management was now courtesy of Dylan's manager, Albert Grossman. They were signed to Capitol Records as the Crackers in February 1968, but they had already begun recording the first album in New York in January, and then completed it in Los Angeles in February.

Given their shared management and their very distinguished musical relationship, it was unsurprising that Music from Big Pink drew on Dylan's support: one of his paintings comprised its front cover, and the songs inside included three of his that were attracting attention at the time because they were famed products of the legendary yet still-recent Basement Tapes sessions: 'Tears of Rage' co-written by Dylan and Manuel, 'This Wheel's on Fire' by Dylan and Danko, and Dylan's own 'I Shall Be Released'. (On the original LP issues, all three songs were credited to Dylan alone.) No officially released Dylan versions of these great songs existed when Music from Big Pink burst upon the world.

Yet though these songs were powerful and would have grabbed any listener's attention, to suggest that the album's mesmeric quality and success are due to Dylan would be unreasonable. It was The Band, not Dylan, and it was like no other record. Strongly affecting, touching, sad, eerie and shining almost too brightly, it melded beautifully primitive soulful singing, ultra-vivid sound and production, and music that was at once hillbilly, gospel, rock'n'roll and gothic ghostliness. Understatement and subtlety held their own against the exciting phantasmagoric organ excesses of 'Chest Fever'; the slow-motion fruit-machining of who was taking lead vocals, the plaintive echoey quality that offset the neatly crude plainness of instrumentation; the mix of song type and of songwriter. It was an absolute triumph. As William Ruhlmann writes in the online All Music Guide:

> 'At first . . . the group seemed to affect the sound of a loose jam session, alternating emphasis on different instruments, while the lead and harmony vocals passed back and forth as if the singers were making up their blend on the spot. In retrospect . . . [it all] seemed far more considered and crafted to support a group of songs that took family, faith, and rural life as their subjects and proceeded to imbue their values with uncertainty . . . the points were made musically > as much as lyrically. Tenor Richard Manuel's haunting, lonely voice gave the album much of its frightening aspect, while Rick Danko and Levon Helm's rough-hewn styles reinforced the songs' rustic fervor. The dominant instrument was Garth Hudson's often icy and majestic organ, while Robbie Robertson's unusual guitar work further destabilized the sound. The result was an album that reflected the turmoil of the late 60s in a way that emphasized the tragedy inherent in the conflicts. Music from Big Pink came off as a shockingly divergent musical statement only a year after the ornate productions of Sgt. Pepper . . . the album and the group made their own impact, influencing a movement toward roots styles and country elements in rock. Over time, Music from Big Pink came to be regarded as a watershed work in the history of rock, one that introduced new tones and approaches . . .'

The album was released in July 1968.

It was truly a collaborative work. On 'Tears of Rage', 'In a Station', 'Chest Fever', 'Lonesome Suzie' and 'I Shall Be Released' the lead vocalist was Manuel; on 'Caledonia Mission', 'Long Black Veil' and 'This Wheel's on Fire', it was Danko; on 'To Kingdom Come' it was Robertson and Manuel; on 'The Weight' it was Helm and Danko; on 'We Can Talk' it was Manuel, Helm and Danko, appearing to throw the vocals around between them as if by spontaneous instinct (and using stereo placement with ingenious apparent abandon, which in a later era somehow became prohibited). And while Robertson wrote 'To Kingdom Come', 'Caledonia Mission', 'The Weight' and 'Chest Fever', Manuel wrote 'In a Station', 'We Can Talk' and 'Lonesome Suzie'.

There was almost a sixth member of the group, too, in producer John Simon, whom they had met through film-maker HOWARD ALK. Not only was Simon's production fresh and resourceful but he also played tenor sax on 'Tears of Rage', piano on 'Caledonia Mission' and baritone sax on 'Chest Fever'.

The problem of that traditionally difficult second album was brilliantly solved by their simply titled follow-up, The Band, which from its dark brown textured packaging incorporating black and white photos of the group that might have been taken during the American Civil War, to its corresponding, defiantly unmodish stance and its unity of sound, came across like a concept album without any of the preciousness that might imply. The songs—this time eight by Robertson, three by Manuel & Robertson and one by Helm & Robertson—flowed one into another like the movements of one work. If there was less pain there was a more dignified foreboding. This was timeless American music. In an era of hipness in which parents were part of an old, foolish, evil order to be abolished and replaced by new, revolutionary enlightenment, here were these strong dissenting voices from the backwoods, singing their connections, not so much reaching back into the past as seeing it right there among them and allowing its chords to sound. If the Basement Tapes sessions had explored these old strengths in muffled form and mostly through Bob Dylan's eyes, here we had The Band in neighboring territory but standing firm on their own homestead, this second album their masterpiece.

If this was partly because Robertson's lyrics had matured into thoughtfulness, and found a way to specify seeing the past as the present without being didactic—'The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down', with its 'in the winter of sixty-five' hovering naturally over two centuries' '65s—it was in greater part because the group had reached new heights of wholly co-operative work. Again here was each musician's multi-instrumental dexterity: Hudson on organ, clavinette, piano, accordion, soprano sax, tenor sax, baritone sax and trumpet; Manuel on piano, drums, baritone sax and harmonica; Danko on bass, violin and trombone; Helm on drums, mandolin and guitar; Robertson on guitar and engineering. Plus producer John Simon on tuba, electric piano and tenor horn. And again the lead vocals shift across the tracks, from Manuel to Helm to Danko to combinations of the three. And while Robertson had written so much of the material, he sang lead on none of it.

The album was released in 1969 and had real impact on rock consciousness: perhaps more so than Dylan's John Wesley Harding had done, because it was a more accessible work with a far richer sound; both pushed youth culture to recognise its own shallowness, to admit that contemporary experience could range far beyond a modish obsession with underground culture or the grooviness of the spacey and new; that we all have roots. And they brought this message to a different part of Woodstock, the instant new hippie center of the universe that was Woodstock Nation, where on the last night, August 17, 1969, they were headliners.

Exactly two weeks later, The Band accompanied Dylan again at his Isle of Wight Festival appearance (on August 31). In turn, at their 1971 New Year's Eve concert in New York City, Dylan came on in the early hours of January 1, 1972 and as well as singing 'Down in the Flood', 'When I Paint My Masterpiece' and 'Like a Rolling Stone', he also played guitar behind Helm on 'Don't Ya Tell Henry'.

In the interim The Band had released their third and fourth albums, the disappointing Stage Fright (1970) and Cahoots (1971), the best thing on the latter being their version of another obscure new Dylan song, the gorgeous 'When I Paint My Masterpiece'—a version that included, unlike Dylan's own, the high comedy of the bridge couplet 'Sailing round the world in a dirty gondola / Oh to be back in the land of Coca-Cola'. Producer John Simon had not been used on these albums, and Robertson's songwriting was at once growing anaemic and shoving Richard Manuel's out of the way. You could say that there was a simple equation here: teamwork gave way to Robertson's ego and domination; The Band went downhill. Their 'maturity' just sounded like tiredness.

Moondog Matinee, in 1973, was an album of oldies at a time when people like CHUCK BERRY were regarded as long-gone irrelevancies from an era so superficial that it had enjoyed two-minute singles instead of long concept albums; but like JOHN LENNON'S album Rock 'n' Roll two years later, it seemed pointless as well as not good enough.

In 1974 The Band rejoined Dylan for his mega so-called Come-Back Tour of North America, from which came the double-LP billed as by Bob Dylan & The Band, Before the Flood, which followed their working together one more time in the studio, on Dylan's Planet Waves. At the time, the album was underrated and the tour overrated—and live, The Band seemed keener when backing Dylan than when playing their own considerable material.

In 1975 they produced Northern Lights—Southern Cross. It was their first studio album of new material in four years. As a comeback, it didn't make it. Their self-produced sound was thin, every song was by Robertson alone, and you had to work hard to pick up the gems from among self-imitative pearls like 'Ophelia' and 'Forbidden Fruit'. The gems were the exceptionally lovely vocal by Richard Manuel on 'Hobo Jungle', the searing heartbreak Rick Danko brings to his vocal on 'It Makes No Difference' and the standout 'Acadian Driftwood': so good it could have been on The Band. Which says it all.

The end of The Band was in sight, and it came with the concert at the Winterland Palace in San Francisco on November 25, 1976, filmed by MARTIN SCORSESE (using great cinematographers Michael Chapman, Vilmos Zsigmond and Laszlo Kovacs) as the rather glorious The Last Waltz—glorious as a film, but not as an album. Three LPs was too much (and now, as four CDs, it's worse yet still has things missing), and as the Rev. Al Friston points out: 'Dylan's stuff is no less hot-airish than most of Before the Flood.'

One last studio album, the insipid Islands, was issued in 1977, but The Band had left the building.

All the classic Band albums have now been CD-reissued with unnecessary 'bonus' tracks of outtakes and the like. This is a clear case of 'more means less'. It's no service at all to a new listener to be given a version of Music from Big Pink that fails to come to rest at the perfect end of 'I Shall Be Released' but instead putters and bumps along with a series of tracks of dodgy provenance that are nothing whatever to do with the unimprovable original album. The same applies to The Band; the extras here are less irrelevant—but who needs them? The original album is unsurpassable. Outtakes clutter. De trops = to detract. And the latest, most overblown of these rewritings of history is the five CDs plus a DVD package, The Band: A Musical History, Robbie Robertson's newest opportunity to lie about what was recorded then, and to remaster things his way.

The Band reformed in a partial sort of way, with Earl Cate of the Cate Brothers and without Robbie Robertson, in 1983; but Richard Manuel committed suicide in 1986. A dismayingly enfeebled version of The Band tottered onto the stage at Dylan's so-called 30th Anniversary Concert in New York City in 1992 and flailed their way through 'When I Paint My Masterpiece'.

Yet soon afterwards the trio of original members who were left recorded and released a new Band album, Jericho (1993), which included a version of Dylan's song 'Blind Willie McTell': and when Dylan took to performing it in concert later, he followed The Band's way of doing it rather than his own.

Further albums followed, High on the Hog in 1996 and two years later, celebrating their 30th anniversary, came Jubilation. The last line-up of The Band had comprised Randy Ciarlante, Jim Weider, Levon Helm, Garth Hudson, Richard Bell and Rick Danko. The death of Danko at the end of 1999 meant that of the five classic members, 'then there were two'. It sounded a sad death knell for a once truly great group.

How much Dylan owed The Band is an interesting question, and less discussed than how much they had owed him. He surely gained plenty. The long slog of the 1966 tour gave him priceless support, and for long enough to confirm for him that with the right back-up, the choice to go electric and play live with a group was absolutely the right decision in spite of the booing. The long cathartic Big Pink and Woodstock months brought him the benefit of a sustained informality in his working relationship with a bunch of resourceful musicians: and daily, casual exchange is what builds the deepest kind of intimacy in the easiest possible way. Perhaps too, Dylan learned something about singing with someone else. True, he had harmonised with various folkies in earlier years, and most especially with JOAN BAEZ. But folk wasn't rock, and Baez's voice and Dylan's were worlds apart. With Rick Danko, he found a surer kind of vocal partner and in a group setting: and he must surely have felt this, since he brought Danko forward to become his chosen partner. More generally, we can say that The Band gave Dylan every possible kind of solidity through his most perilous period; it's hard to imagine that any other unit could have served him better.

More generally still, The Band influenced everyone. THE GRATEFUL DEAD were pointed towards Workingman's Dead by The Band; ERIC CLAPTON was turning away from Blind Faith for the simple life of Derek & the Dominoes; CROSBY, Stills, Nash & YOUNG's Déjà Vu paid tribute to The Band even by copying its sleeve; and at the sessions for Let It Be, THE BEATLES played 'To Kingdom Come' and 'I Shall Be Released' and HARRISON and Lennon urged George Martin to make them sound like The Band. That, of course, was asking too much. But their legacy was everywhere. They had shown the possibilities of co-operation, of multi-instrumental and vocal flexibility, in a rock scene that had previously stressed the figurehead lead singer and the lone lead-guitar genius; they had brought their own model of 'the invisible republic' into public consciousness; they had helped bring us out of the city of alienation.

[Ronnie Hawkins & the Hawks: see Hawkins, Ronnie. The Canadian Squires: 'Uh-Uh-Uh' c/w 'Leave Me Alone' 1964, Ware 6002, NY, 1964 & Apex 76964, Toronto, 1965. Levon & the Hawks: 'The Stones I Throw' c/w 'He Don't Love You (And He'll Break Your Heart)', NY, 1965, Atco 6383, NY, 1965; 'Go Go, Liza Jane' c/w 'He Don't Love You (And He'll Break Your Heart)', NY, 1965, Atco 6625, 1968. Jaime Robbie Robertson, Rick Danko, Richard Manuel, Garth Hudson, Levon Helm: 'The Weight', NY, 12 Jan 1968, Capitol 2269 (promo single), NY, 1968. The Band: Music from Big Pink, NY Jan & LA Feb 1968, Capitol SKAO-2955, NY (ST 2955, London), 1968; The Band, Hollywood Mar–Apr & NY May–Jun 1969, Capitol STAO-132, NY (E-ST 132, London), 1969; Stage Fright, NY Jun & Woodstock Jun–Jul 1970, Capitol SW-425, NY (GO 2003, London), 1970; Cahoots, Bearsville, NY, Jul–Aug 1971, Capitol ST-651, NY (& London), 1971; Rock of Ages, NY, 28 Dec 1971–1 Jan 1972, Capitol SABB-11045, 1972; Moondog Matinee, Bearsville & LA, 1972–73, Capitol SW-112, 1973; Northern Lights—Southern Cross, Malibu & LA, Jun 1975, Capitol ST-11440, 1975; Islands, Malibu & NY, 1976, Capitol SO-11602, 1977; The Last Waltz, San Francisco, 25 Nov 1976 (up to a point), Warner Bros. 3WB-3146, NY, 1978: remastered 4-CD reissue with bonus tracks (incl. Dylan's 'Hazel'), Rhino/Warner Bros. 78278, US, 2002; Jericho, nia, Pyramid R2 71564, US, 1993; High on the Hog, Rhino/Pyramid 72404 US (Transatlantic TRA CD 228, Europe), 1996; Jubilation, Woodstock, spring 1998, River North Records CD 51416 1420 2, US, 1998; The Band: A Musical History, 5-CD + DVD set, EMI/Capitol CAP 77409, NY, 2005. (This includes a remastered Dylan & the Hawks: 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues' live in Liverpool, 14 May 1966.) The Last Waltz film, dir. Martin Scorsese, US, 1978; DVD remixed remastered issue with extras, MGM, US, 2002.

Barney Hoskyns, Across the Great Divide: The Band & America, London: Viking-Penguin, 1993 & New York: Hyperion, 1993 (the 'revised' update, London: Pimlico, 2003, is updated very little and its discography not at all). Size of basement from John Simon, interviewed by Lee Gabites, posted online on the crucial, all-encompassing and excellent unofficial Band website http://theband.hiof.no, to which the entry above is much indebted. Clinton Heylin, Bob Dylan: The Complete Recording Sessions: 1960–1994, New York: St. Martin's Press, pp.67–68. William Ruhlmann, on www.allmusic.com, quoted from http://theband.hiof.no. The Rev. Al Friston: 'The Night They Put The Band to Rest: The Last Waltz Revisited', Rock's Backpages (www.rocksbackpages.com), 26 Apr 2002. Thanks also to Peter Viney for much feedback to enquiries; quoted from e-mail to the present writer 18 Sep 2005.]

Bangs, Lester, the Black Panthers & Bob The Desire song 'Sara' includes 'Stayin' up for days in the Chelsea Hotel / Writin' "Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands" for you'. The subject was memorably polemicised by rock critic Lester Bangs (1948–82) in a funny, wrong-headed froth of a review of Desire: '. . . if he really did spend days on end sitting up in the Chelsea sweating over lines like "your streetcar visions which you place on the grass", then he is stupider than we ever gave him credit for.'

This was from a piece titled 'Bob Dylan's Dalliance with Mafia Chic', from 1976. Bangs' phrase 'Mafia chic' picks up the coinage of Tom Wolfe from his book Radical Chic and Mau-Mauing the Flak-Catchers, 1970, in which he excoriated New York socialites for their dalliance with Black Power, focussing on the appearance of prominent Black Panthers at a Leonard Bernstein party.

Bangs, likewise, duly excoriates Bob Dylan. An alleged meeting in 1970 between Bob Dylan and Black Panthers Huey Newton and David Hilliard had been mooted by Dylan's first biographer, ANTHONY SCADUTO, in the New York Times in 1971, and discussed in 'A Profile of HOWARD ALK' by Dylan's third biographer, CLINTON HEYLIN (with research assistance by George Webber), in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, 1987.

Leslie Conway Bangs, born in Escondido, California, on December 14, 1948, began writing freelance in 1969, starting with Rolling Stone but later for other music magazines, for the Village Voice, and for Playboy and Penthouse; his main influences were BEAT authors (though he often comes close to sounding like HUNTER S. THOMPSON). In 1973 he was banned from Rolling Stone by JANN WENNER for being 'disrespectful to musicians'. He died of an overdose on April 30, 1982.

[Lester Bangs: 'Bob Dylan's Dalliance with Mafia Chic', Creem no.7, Birmingham, MI, Apr 1976; republished Thomson & Gutman: The Dylan Companion, 1990. Anthony Scaduto: 'Won't You Listen to the Lambs, Bob Dylan?', New York Times, 28 Nov 1971. (Tom Wolfe's later essay on the same period, 'Funky Chic', is collected in Mauve Gloves & Madmen, Clutter & Vine, 1976.)]

Barker, Derek [1954 -] & Tracy [1963 -] Derek Gordon Barker was born in Tarporley, Cheshire, UK, on July 31, 1954. His wife Tracy was born in Coventry on March 29, 1963. Derek first noticed Dylan's work in the late 1960s but only became 'obsessive from 1978 on'. Tracy didn't become interested in Dylan till 1992. Between them, they run the longest-running extant Dylan fanzine, Isis, which began in September 1985 and has now published well over 120 issues, always under Derek Barker's editorship. Tracy started working with Isis in 1993. She handles the subscriptions, helps design, edit and lay out the magazine and she designs and maintains its website.

The first 17 issues were published as free photocopied newsletters, and though the magazine offers a variety of kinds of work its purpose has traditionally been to find and give out information rather than to offer critical assessment. Since the demise of The Telegraph in 1996, Isis has incorporated IAN WOODWARD's The Wicked Messenger, which acts as a near-daily log of Dylan news and rumour as it arrives. Because of the large-format size of the fanzine, and in its more recent incarnations its glossy paper, it is also an excellent outlet for Dylan photographs, though all too often squandering its photo pages on gruesome recent concert shots of dubious quality that capture Dylan looking like an aged Norman Vaughn. Though also notorious for its misspellings and misplaced apostrophes, Isis has in recent years expanded the breadth and depth of its writing, and Derek Barker himself has become a more than competent, articulate commentator.

As the level of interest in Dylan has increased, especially since 1996–97, the range of Isis activity has increased too, offering not only an active website but also starting to participate in CD releases and edit best-of anthologies. The magazine itself is sold through bookstores and record shops as well as direct to subscribers in over 30 countries.

Derek Barker edited ISIS: A Bob Dylan Anthology in 2001, with a revised edition appearing in 2004, the year before Bob Dylan Anthology Volume 2: 20 Years of ISIS. He has also been interviewed on TV and radio, has promoted two Dylan conventions and co-promoted four others, and now advises Christie's auction house in London and New York on the authenticity of Dylan memorabilia items. Derek and Tracy live in Warwickshire, England.

[Derek & Tracy Barker: Isis, Bedworth, UK & www.bobdylanisis.com. Derek Barker: ISIS: A Bob Dylan Anthology, London, Helter Skelter Publishing, 2001 & 2004; Bob Dylan Anthology Volume 2: 20 Years of ISIS, New Malden, UK: Chrome Dreams, 2005.]

Basement Tapes, The* [1975] This 17th album, a double-LP, marked the first official release of a version of the world's most bootlegged bootleg: material cut by Dylan and the Crackers / THE BAND up near Woodstock in 1967 during the long silence between Blonde on Blonde (and Dylan's motorcycle crash) in 1966 and John Wesley Harding in 1968. The core Dylan songs from these sessions actually do form a clear link between these two utterly different albums. They evince the same highly serious, precarious quest for a personal and universal salvation which marked out the John Wesley Harding collection—yet they are soaked in the same blocked confusion and turmoil as Blonde on Blonde.

'Tears of Rage', for example, is a halfway house between, say, 'One of Us Must Know (Sooner or Later)' and 'I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine'. There is also a unique, radical corpus of spacey yet exuberant music here, as on 'Crash on the Levee (Down in the Flood)', 'Please Mrs. Henry' and 'Million Dollar Bash'. Essential stuff, badly compiled.

The interspersed tracks by The Band alone disrupt the unity of Dylan material, much more of which should have been here. Indeed The Band's tracks are thoroughly dodgy, even including one, 'Bessie Smith', which wasn't recorded in this period at all but was an outtake from four years later, from their 1971 album Cahoots.

The authentic 1967 sessions had also included a wealth of traditional material revisited, the existence of which was far less known at the time of this release than became apparent in the 1990s, when it was widely circulated and became the main subject of GREIL MARCUS' book Invisible Republic, 1997.

Key Dylan-composed items missing include 'I Shall Be Released' and 'This Wheel's on Fire'. And having kept all these 1967 recordings unreleased all through the aeons from 1967 to the mid-1970s, this album was then issued curiously swiftly after the release of Blood on the Tracks. There was also something disquieting about the specially posed cover photos (by Reid Miles, in the basement of the YMCA in LA), which seemed to reduce jostling figures of myth and imagination to a callow amdram tableau—a suggestion here that Dylan was at once packaging and repackaging his own myth. As well as Dylan, The Band and people dressed as song 'characters', others on camera include NEIL YOUNG and DAVID BLUE.

The double-album received fine reviews; John Rockwell in the New York Times declared it 'The greatest album in the history of popular American music.' But it wasn't, and for all the riches within it, all of which are presented out of context, it was a shamefully poor representation of an astonishingly creative, important period in this great artist's working life.

[Recorded West Saugerties, NY (& possibly Woodstock, NY), Jun–Aug & Sep–Nov 1967; released as stereo 2-LP set, Columbia C2 33682 (CBS 88147 in UK), 26 Jun or 1 Jul 1975. New York Times review quoted in Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, 1986, Penguin edn., p.383.]

Baudelaire, Charles [1821 - 1867] Charles Baudelaire was born in Paris on April 9, 1821. The first great poet of the modern city, he spent almost his entire adult life in Paris on inherited money, producing the enormously influential poetry collection Les Fleurs du Mal (Flowers of Evil) in 1857, plus other works including the autobiographical novella La Fanfarlo, 1847, and the essays collection Les Paradis Artificiels, 1860.

Along with the verse of EDGAR ALLAN POE, Baudelaire's poetry, especially his sonnet 'Correspondances', was an important precursor of the symbolist movement, initiated by VERLAINE and Mallarmé, which used symbols to explore and evoke cross-currents and 'illogical' affinities, especially between the senses.

Drugs commonly make this sense-mingling prevalent and vivid. As Kenneth Allsop noted, Baudelaire 'cherished a particular trick of hashish, familiar in mechanised form to the audiences of today's electronic acid rock: the infusion of the senses one with another.' He notes that 'Baudelaire started experimenting with opium while a Sorbonne student, emulating Poe's saturation of his work with the fumes and furies of opium—the "épouvantable mariage de l'homme avec lui-même" was a constant theme of Poe's which Baudelaire found enthralling.'

Compare this with Bob Dylan's 1966 interview comments: 'I wouldn't advise anyone to use drugs. . . . But opium and hash and pot—now, those things aren't drugs; they just bend your mind a little. I think everybody's mind should be bent once in a while.' (Oddly, he went on to say this: 'Not by LSD, though. LSD is medicine—a different kind of medicine. It makes you aware of the universe so to speak; you realize how foolish objects are. But LSD is not for groovy people; it's for mad, hateful people who want revenge. . . . They ought to use it at the Geneva Convention.')

Dylan's mention of Baudelaire on the terrific sleevenotes to Planet Waves (see Planet Waves*, the disappearing sleevenotes) implies that he was struck by the poet very early on: 'Duluth—where Baudelaire Lived and Goya cashed in his Chips, where Joshua brought the house down!', though in the interviews for his Biograph box set, he says that 'Suzie Rotolo, a girlfriend of mine in New York, later turned me on to all the French poets . . .'

WISSOLIK & McGRATH's Bob Dylan's Words, 1994, suggests a direct parallel between lines in 'Idiot Wind'—'One day you'll be in the ditch, flies buzzin' around your eyes / Blood on your saddle . . . blowing through the flowers on your tomb'—and a passage from Baudelaire's Les Fleurs du Mal poem 'The Carcass', in which two lovers see the rotting corpse of an animal in the road: 'The flies buzzed and hissed on these filthy guts . . . / And you, in your turn, will be rotten as this . . . / under the weeds / under blossoming grass'. Wissolik & McGrath suggest too a direct correspondence between lines from Dylan's '11 Outlined Epitaphs'—'cats across the roof / mad in love / scream into the drainpipes'—and a passage from Baudelaire's 'Spleen LXXVII': 'My cat . . . wails in the rain-spouts like a swollen ghost.' (These translations may or may not be taken from An Anthology of French Poetry from Nerval to Valery, ed. Angel Flores, 1958, which Wissolik & McGrath suggest as the volume Dylan 'probably used in the early 1960s'.)

In Chronicles Volume One, the only mention of Baudelaire comes in a description of DANIEL LANOIS, the record producer Dylan was working with for the first time in the late 1980s, in New Orleans; here he reports without comment that 'Dan . . . said that he'd hung around in Texas libraries reading RIMBAUD and Baudelaire to get his language down.'

Baudelaire moved from Paris to Brussels in search of a publisher in 1863 and while there suffered a series of strokes. He returned to Paris in 1867 and died there eight weeks later, in his mother's arms, on August 31.

[Kenneth Allsop, 'The Technicolor Wasteland: on Drugs and Literature', Encounter, vol.32, no.3, US, Mar 1969. Bob Dylan: 'The Playboy Interview: Bob Dylan: A Candid Conversation with the Iconoclastic Idol of the Folk-Rock Set', Playboy, Chicago, Mar 1966; Chronicles Volume One, p.182.]

Bauldie, John [1949 - 1996] John Stewart Bauldie was born on August 23, 1949. He is best known as the founder and editor of The Telegraph, the finest Dylan fanzine there's ever been, and one of the earliest and longest running. It was the best because of the vision of what it could be, which Bauldie kept in his head, and constantly extended, and conjured into reality, starting from a stapled booklet of typed print on cheap paper, all black and white, totalling 20 small pages, in November 1981, and becoming a professional-looking, authoritative but quirky, properly bound quarterly in full colour.

Early on, though, The Telegraph became more than a publication: it became an essential part of the Dylan follower's world. This happened before the internet and the mobile phone—indeed in a world that had only recently acquired the fax machine. Dylan's 1978 European tour, his first for 12 years, was a great stimulus to a renewed need for aficionados to build means of contact and camaraderie. And then a first Bob Dylan Convention took place, in Manchester (conveniently close to Bauldie's home) in 1979.

John Bauldie's immense contribution began in the wake of these events, though he had been listening to Dylan since 1964 and had started collecting taped rarities from late 1969, stimulated by an article by GREIL MARCUS in Rolling Stone that opened John's eyes to the existence of such things. He wrote to Marcus, who sent him a tape of Dylan's 1966 Liverpool concert to start him off collecting. He was aided by 'two good friends, Rob Griffith and MICHAEL KROGSGAARD' and encouraged by coming across the first American fanzine, Talkin' Bob Zimmerman Blues, run by BRYAN STYBLE. It folded in 1979, just when that first Dylan convention was happening. As John put it: 'Here were 600 people whose interest had brought them from all over the world: here were writers and critics who didn't have a forum; here were fans who were not kept informed by an increasingly negligent music press.'

Bauldie's founding idea was thus to create a distribution network to circulate news and exchange information, and to sneak a quality Dylan journal into existence on the back of it. This outfit became Wanted Man, The Bob Dylan Information Service, involving a number of fans in north-west England, and it was this outfit that published The Telegraph, offered a telephone hotline and distributed IAN WOODWARD's incessant logging of Dylan news and rumour, The Wicked Messenger. In the early years, CLINTON HEYLIN was its news editor. For a while, too, there was a Dylan mail-order bookselling unit, the Wanted Man Bookshelf, but this was eventually replaced by a similar but separate enterprise, My Back Pages, run by Dave Heath and Dave Dingle. For some time the latter also took over editorial control of an annual summer issue of The Telegraph while John Bauldie holidayed in Greece; these issues always emphasised how crucial Bauldie himself was to its character. His achievement as editor was multi-skilled but at its core was an ability to keep the whole thing sharp and sane—sane in spite of the necessary fanaticism.

He was not, himself, interested solely in Bob Dylan. He was also keen on PHIL OCHS, DAVID BLUE, NEIL YOUNG, BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN, ROGER McGUINN and a number of other singer-songwriters, and was himself an amateur guitarist and songwriter. He was also a football devotee with a life-long loyalty to the romantically named Bolton Wanderers. A well-educated man, he had been a lecturer in English Literature at a higher-education college in the north of England.

John Bauldie's own writing, as well as his editing, was a vital part of his Dylan enterprise and in the magazine's quest for an ever-improving quality of contribution, he led by example, with work that was witty and generous-minded yet rigorous and brightly acute, whether it was essays about Dylan's work, investigations into events like the 1966 motorcycle crash or pieces that fused the two, as for instance with a scrutiny of the Desire album collaboration between Dylan and JACQUES LEVY.

Around the time of the filming of the Hearts of Fire movie, John and the magazine moved to London and he took a job working on the editorial side of Q magazine, becoming its Hi-Fi Editor before leaving, shortly before his death, to move across to another national glossy magazine, House and Garden.

By this point, he was also the author and editor of a number of Dylan books and booklets, the first of which had been booklet no.2 in his own Wanted Man Study Series, an essay on Bob Dylan and Desire. In 1987 he co-edited with MICHAEL GRAY the first best-of selection from the magazine, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, and later came the second volume, edited by Bauldie alone, Wanted Man: In Search of Bob Dylan. In 1991, with veteran British music journalist PATRICK HUMPHRIES, he produced the postmodernly titled Oh No! Not Another Bob Dylan Book, renamed Absolutely Dylan: An Illustrated Biography for the US market. A worthier work, though disappointing in its design and print quality, was the fascinating and important self-published limited-edition hardback The Ghost of Electricity, 1988, about the Dylan of the 1966 tour (republished in smaller-format paperback in 1993). There was also a collection of John's on-the-road pieces into the small-print-run 90-page book Diary of a Bobcat, 1995.

Finally, however, Bauldie became the first Dylan writer honoured with recognition by Dylan's own office when he was asked to produce—under near-impossible conditions—a booklet of liner-notes for the first of the official Bootleg Series of Dylan record releases, the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3: resulting in the work of his that will have been by far the most widely read, and which almost won him a Grammy. It can still be accessed on the Dylan website, www.bobdylan.com.

John Bauldie was killed with four others in a helicopter crash late on the evening of October 22, 1996 while traveling back to London from a football match in which his beloved Bolton Wanderers had just beaten Brighton, whose Vice-Chairman owned the helicopter that killed them. An inquest returned a verdict of accidental death on February 25, 1998—by which time the UK civil aviation authorities had already put in place extra safety rules for helicopter flights, prompted by this crash. John Bauldie was 47. The ownership of his literary estate is still in doubt.

See also Bridge, The.

[John Bauldie: Bob Dylan and Desire, Wanted Man Study Series no.2 (Bury, UK: 1983); The Ghost of Electricity (Romford, UK: self-published, 1988); Wanted Man: In Search of Bob Dylan (London: Black Spring Press, 1990); liner-notes, the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, Columbia Legacy, NY, 1991; Diary of a Bobcat (Romford: Wanted Man, 1995). Co-editor with Michael Gray: All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook (London: W.H. Allen, 1987); and co-author with Patrick Humphries: Oh No! Not Another Bob Dylan Book (UK: Square One Books, 1991), aka Absolutely Dylan: An Illustrated Biography (New York: Viking Studio Books, 1991). Editor of The Telegraph, first from Bury and then Romford, UK, 1981–96. The quotes from John Bauldie above are taken from his article 'Introduction: All Across the What?', intended for inclusion in All Across the Telegraph, ibid, but unused. A contents list of each issue of The Telegraph is still online at www.expecting rain.com/dok/div/telegraph/pasttishes.html, though its hyperlinks no longer work.]

Baxter, Bucky [1955 -] William Baxter was born in Melbourne, Florida, in 1955, went to junior high in Philadelphia (where he played in his first band in 1968); he could already play oboe, clarinet and guitar, but it was hearing JIMI HENDRIX that prompted him to take music seriously as a career, and after hearing NEIL YOUNG's After the Gold Rush he took pedal steel lessons from Ernest Tubb's steel man Buddy Carlton. Eventually, after mixed success and much sticking at it, he joined the Steve Earle Band, first recording with them on Earle's 1986 début album, Guitar Town. He also played on the 1988 R.E.M. album Green, among other things, but remained with Steve Earle—and was still in Earle's band when it was support act to Dylan for part of the summer 1989 leg of the Never-Ending Tour. Baxter was asked on stage towards the end of Dylan's set in Springfield, Illinois, that August 19 and played pedal steel on 'I Shall Be Released' and 'Like a Rolling Stone'. Six nights later he returned for the first of four consecutive Dylan sets in New Orleans, Texas and New Mexico (August 25, 26, 27 and 29), playing on four songs each time.

Dylan eventually lured him into his own band, in which he débuted in Perth, Australia, on March 18, 1992. His last Dylan concert was in Munich, Germany, on May 2, 1999: the last date before a month's break and the start of Dylan's touring with PAUL SIMON. Between 1992 and 1999, Baxter played behind Dylan a formidable 730 times (739, if you count non-NET occasions too, including the MTV Unplugged débacle of 1995). He also played dobro and pedal steel on the album Time Out of Mind.

Asked afterwards by ON THE TRACKS whether he had been 'buddies' with Bob, he answered: 'No, I didn't really try to be. I just worked for him. And we had a good working relationship . . . but I never went to his house for Thanksgiving, or anything. I think that's why I lasted so long—I conducted myself professionally and let him be.' It could be said that he did more than that. He certainly added colour to the band's sound, and though his pedal steel playing was flexible enough to accommodate many kinds of song, he was really the first to tip the Never-Ending Tour Band towards the kind of country emphasis it has retained ever since. Not everyone feels unmitigated enthusiasm for that.

Baxter remains a producer. His studio is out in the woods around Nashville, thanks partly to one of his artists, Welsh ex-Catatonia singer Cerys Matthews. 'When I ended up on his doorstep,' she says, 'all he had was a little portable four-track, which wasn't what I had in mind. Then he started building a pond. I said to him: "What about the studio?" He said, "You just write some songs, and give me a hand with this." I thought I was going to a nice studio in the woods. I didn't realise I would be helping to build it.'

[Baxter quote from interview by Scott Marshall, On the Tracks no.20, nia, seen online 14 Jul 2005 at www.b-dylan.com/pages/samples/buckybaxter.html. Cerys Matthews quote from Will Hodgkinson interview, The Guardian, London, 13 Jun 2003.]

Bayer Sager, Carole [1947 -] Carole Bayer Sager was born on March 8, 1947 (though 1946 is sometimes suggested) in New York City, where she grew up, becoming a hit songwriter (mostly a lyricist) who straddles the divide between musicals and pop. Her first music-publishing deal was gained while she was still a schoolgirl and her first hit was the co-written 'A Groovy Kind of Love', a moronically simple and horribly catchy song by British group the Mindbenders (who couldn't have bent a note, let alone anybody's mind). When she was given a record deal and made her début album in 1977, Carole Bayer Sager, it went platinum, thanks to its inclusion of 'You're Moving Out Today', an international no.1 hit. She also wrote a Leo Sayer transatlantic no.1, 'When I Need You', and co-wrote Melissa Manchester's 'Midnight Blue'. It all seems a long time ago.

After being married to Marvin Hamlisch—with whom she wrote 'Nobody Does It Better', Carly Simon's stentorian but sinuous hit from the 1977 James Bond movie The Spy Who Loved Me—she married Burt Bacharach instead, and with him wrote another mega-seller by various artists, 'That's What Friends Are For', which became a significant fund-raiser for AIDS research when covered in 1985 by the terrifying team of Dionne Warwick, Gladys Knight, ELTON JOHN and STEVIE WONDER. Carole Bager Sayer's songs have also been recorded by everyone from Michael Jackson to FRANK SINATRA and from BETTE MIDLER to the Doobie Brothers. She and Bacharach divorced in 1991, though not before he and Marvin Hamlisch had worked on her album Sometimes Late at Night. She is now married to a former Warner Brothers chairperson with baseball-team connections, and lives in LA.

In 1986 she and Bob Dylan wrote one song together, 'Under Your Spell'—although 'together' is hardly the word. She told biographer HOWARD SOUNES that he strummed the guitar and she wrote in a notepad, but added: 'Although it was really exciting, it was probably one of the least collaborative experiences I had with anybody. It was kind of like going back to grade school when you are given a test and you put your hand over your work so nobody would copy it.' Dylan recorded and released it on that year's Knocked Out Loaded, and Sounes writes that it was only 'when she received an advance copy of the song that Bayer Sager found out which of her ideas Bob had used. Aside from the title . . . virtually none of the lyrics were hers. Yet Bob said he would never have written the song without her.'

It was immaculately sung but shifty pop, and it includes the line that gives the album its title, 'I was knocked out and loaded in the naked night.' It also includes a line that only Dylan could have written. Anyone else would have offered 'You'll never get rid of me as long as I'm alive'; Dylan has the delightfully more arrogant touch of 'You'll never get rid of me as long as you're alive'.

[Carole Bayer Sager: Carole Bayer Sager, Elektra K 52059, US, 1977; 'You're Moving Out Today', Elektra 45422, US, 1977; Sometimes Late at Night, Boardwalk FW 37069, US, 1981. The Mindbenders: 'Groovy Kind of Love', Fontana TF644, UK, 1966. Melissa Manchester: 'Midnight Blue', Arista 0116, US, 1975. Leo Sayer: 'When I Need You', Warner Bros. 8332, US, 1977. Carly Simon: 'Nobody Does It Better', Elektra 45413, 1977. Dionne Warwick, Gladys Knight, Elton John & Stevie Wonder: 'That's What Friends Are For', Arista AS1-9422, US, 1985. Howard Sounes, Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, New York: Grove Press, 2001, Chapter 9, manuscript p.444.]

Beatles, the A pop group. See Harrison, George; Lennon, John; McCartney, Paul; and Starr, Ringo. See also Aronowitz, Al.

Beats, the KENNETH PATCHEN, JACK KEROUAC, LAWRENCE FERLINGHETTI, ALLEN GINSBERG and those like them and around them constructed (drawing heavily on influences like WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS and e.e. cummings) the genre of the Beat Poets—indeed they became known as the Beat Generation. It was more than poetry: it was a way of life. Hence, here, the more general name 'the Beats'. Anyone could join.

It was an artistic storm that Dylan, some years later, seemed so avant-garde in visiting upon a mass market and a new generation. The Dylan of 1965–66 swims in a milieu taken from these men and their contemporaries. In a way all Dylan did with it was to put it up on stage with a guitar. His greatness lies in the way he did that, the cohesive, individual voice with which he re-presented it and the brilliance of his timing in doing so. There was also the intelligence with which he allowed the influence of the Beats to jostle along, contemporaneously, with a torrent of other 20th century artistic influences.

In 1985 he made it clear that he was well aware of how all this played together inside his life and his art. With Biograph's release came a warm memorialising (on the sleevenotes) of all these influences:

> 'Minneapolis . . . I came out of the wilderness and just naturally fell in with the beat scene, the Bohemian, BeBop crowd, it was all pretty much connected . . . people just passed through, really, carrying horns, guitars, suitcases, whatever, just like the stories you hear, free love, wine, poetry, nobody had any money anyway . . . there were a lot of house parties. . . . There were always a lot of poems recited—"Into the room people come and go talking of Michelangelo, measuring their lives in coffee spoons" . . . "What I'd like to know is what do you think of your blue-eyed boy now, Mr. Death". T.S. ELIOT, e.e. cummings. It was sort of like that and it woke me up. . . . Jack Kerouac, Ginsberg, CORSO and Ferlinghetti—'Gasoline', 'Coney Island of the Mind', . . . oh man, it was wild—"I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by madness": that said more to me than any of the stuff I'd been raised on . . . whatever was happening of any real value was . . . sort of hidden from view and it would be years before the media would be able to recognize it and choke-hold it and reduce it to silliness. Anyway, I got in at the tail-end of that and it was magic . . . it had just as big an impact on me as ELVIS PRESLEY. POUND, Camus, T.S. Eliot, e.e. cummings, mostly expatriate Americans who were off in Paris and Tangiers. Burroughs, "Nova Express", John Rechy, Gary Snyder, Ferlinghetti, "Pictures From the Gone World", the newer poets and folk music, jazz, Monk, Coltrane, SONNY and BROWNIE, BIG BILL BROONZY, Charlie Christian . . . it all left the rest of everything in the dust . . .'

In Chronicles Volume One, 2004, Dylan adds footnotes, as it were, noting that folk songs 'automatically went up against the grain' of all the things the Beats regarded as 'the devil . . . bourgeois conventionality, social artificiality and the man in the gray flannel suit.' He also notes of the Beats' musical preferences that they 'tolerated folk music, but they really didn't like it. They listened exclusively to modern jazz, bebop.'

Very interesting to re-encounter what DAVE VAN RONK told ROBERT SHELTON about Dylan: 'Bobby is very much a product of the beat generation. . . . You are not going to see any more like him. Bobby came into beat poetry just at the very tail end. He towers above all of them, except perhaps Ginsberg.'

[Gasoline is by Gregory Corso, 1958. 'I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by madness' is the most frequently quoted line (it is the main part of the opening line) from Ginsberg's Howl; Nova Express is by William Burroughs, 1964; Pictures from the Gone World is Ferlinghetti's first book of poetry, 1955. It is incorporated into his A Coney Island of the Mind, 1958. Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, pp.247–48 & p.48. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, 1986, Penguin edn., p.99.]

Beckett, Barry [1943 -] Barry Beckett was born in Birmingham, Alabama, on February 4, 1943. He started his musical life as a pianist for a dancing school, but moved on to become a keyboards session player and eventually a record producer. He first became involved with Rick Hall's Fame studio, on a session for James & Bobby Purify, and then replaced SPOONER OLDHAM in the Muscle Shoals band. He co-produced Mel & Tim and his later production credits include work with JOAN BAEZ, Joe Cocker, Etta James, JOHN PRINE, Delbert McClinton, Alabama, the STAPLE SINGERS and McGUINN-Hillman.

Beckett was co-producing with JERRY WEXLER when, in 1979, Dylan called on Wexler to produce the Slow Train Coming sessions in the Muscle Shoals studio in Sheffield, Alabama. Beckett not only co-produced the album but played piano and organ throughout. He did not go on the road as a gospel tour musician behind Dylan, but he was back in the studio with him in February 1980 to co-produce, again with Wexler, the album Saved, on which he was replaced on keyboards by Spooner Oldham and TERRY YOUNG after the session of February 12, 1980 and so does not play on 'Saving Grace', 'Pressing On', 'In the Garden', 'Are You Ready?' or 'Covenant Woman', but does play on the album's title track and on 'Solid Rock', 'What Can I Do for You?' and 'Satisfied Mind'. On the album liner notes Beckett is billed as co-producer and as 'special guest artist'.

In 1985 Beckett moved to Nashville, working with Warner Brothers' A&R department before running an independent production company. He is also a partner in BTM Records. He has never worked with Dylan again since the Saved sessions.

Beecher, Bonnie [1941 -] See Romney, Jahanara.

Before the Flood [1974] From Dylan's huge 1974 North American 'come-back tour' with THE BAND, on which it seemed a surprise, at the time, that he revisited a large number of his old songs, this album, Dylan's 15th, was his first 'live' album. (It was also the second and last for David Geffen's Asylum label.) The title is said to be the English translation of the Yiddish phrase 'Farn Mabul', the title of a trilogy of novels by Sholem Asch (1880–1957), published 1929–31 and translated into English as Three Cities, 1933. Asch was the father of MOSES ASCH, founder of Folkways Records.

Before the Flood was a double-LP of confident, brash rock'n'roll Dylan: a record of an artist exhilarated by being back on stage after a long absence, and in the process largely ignoring the differences between one song and another. There is an over-speedy, break-neck quality here that does little justice to the lyrics and has Dylan mainly just throwing back his head and yelling. It has never been a favourite of anyone keen on Bob Dylan, and he has himself bad-mouthed the atmosphere that obtained on the tour itself, which he recognised accorded a questionable primacy to energy. Don't look to this album for any of the subtlety, nuance or understatement which have always been hallmarks of Dylan's genius.

[Recorded at concerts in NY, 30 Jan and Inglewood, CA, 13 & 14 Feb 1974; released as 2-LP set, Asylum AB 201 (Island IDBD 1 in UK), 20 Jun 1974.]

being unable to die 'Can you imagine the darkness that will fall from on high,' asks Dylan, clearly enjoying imagining it himself, especially the torture, 'when men will pray to God to kill them and they won't be able to die?'

This dark scenario, on 'Precious Angel', on the 1979 'Born Again' album Slow Train Coming, is laid out in both the Old Testament and the New. Job 3:20–22 speaks of those '. . . bitter in soul; Which long for death, but it cometh not; and dig for it more than for hid treasures; Which rejoice exceedingly, and are glad, when they can find the grave . . .'; and Revelation 9:6 looks forward (like Dylan) to a time of squirming: 'And in those days shall men seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them.'

This is a prospect Dylan refers to a quarter-century beforehand, though with a healthier detachment on this earlier occasion, in 'Gates of Eden', where he sings of 'Leaving men wholly, totally free / To do anything they wish to do but die / And there are no trials inside the gates of Eden.'

Belafonte, Harry [1927 -] Harold George Belafonte was born on March 1, 1927 in Harlem, New York City, though his father was from Martinique and his mother from Jamaica. At the age of eight he and his brother Dennis were sent to school in Jamaica (reports vary as to whether their mother went with them or sent them away to boarding school). He returned to the US to attend high school but dropped out at 17 and served in the US Navy during World War II.

First returning to civilian life as a maintenance man, he became a highly distinguished and politicised musician and actor. His first RCA album, in 1954, was Mark Twain and Other Folk Favorites; his third, Calypso in 1956, was the first album to sell over a million copies, spent 31 weeks at the top of the Billboard charts, started the calypso craze and made him forever associated with 'Day-O', aka 'The Banana Boat Song'. His first film rôle was in 1953's goody-goody movie Bright Road, but 1959's Odds Against Tomorrow, which he co-produced, was the real thing, and the first American film noir to star a noir American.

He was an early supporter of Martin Luther King Jr. and the civil rights movement, and grew more radical, rather than less, as he aged, despite being festooned with awards and official appointments (like being made a UNICEF goodwill ambassador in 1987). On the syndicated daily radio and TV news program 'Democracy Now!', he once quoted Malcolm X on modern slave equivalents: 'There was two kinds of slaves. There was the house Negro and the field Negro. The house Negroes, they lived in the house with master, they dressed pretty good, they ate good 'cause they ate his food and what he left. . . . In those days he was called a "house nigger". And that's what we call him today, because we've still got some house niggers running around here.' And on a San Diego radio station in October 2002, Belafonte called Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice 'house slaves' serving war-mongering master George W. Bush. Accepting the Human Rights Award for 2004 from the San Francisco-based group Global Exchange, he said in his acceptance speech: 'We have got to bring Corporate America to its knees, not just in defeat but perhaps in prayer. To understand that we can come together, we can make a difference, a world that is filled with people who are nourished, a world that is filled with people who can read and write and debate and have exchange and dialogue.'

In 2005 he compared the Bush administration to the Third Reich. Three years earlier he said of his United Nations work: 'I go to places where enormous upheaval and pain and anguish exist. And a lot of it exists based upon American policy. Whom we support, whom we support as heads of state, what countries we've helped to overthrow, what leaders we've helped to diminish because they did not fit the mold we think they should fit, no matter how ill advised that thought may be.'

Belafonte also heads a group called the Urban Peace Movement, and 20 per cent of his income goes to the Belafonte Foundation of Music and Art, which helps young blacks study for careers in the arts.

Dylan fans used to believe that Bob played harmonica on only one track (the title track, as it happened) of the Belafonte album Midnight Special because all the re-takes drove him to impatient despair; the assumption was that Dylan found Belafonte tedious, ponderous, over-polished, too showbiz: a mainstream drag for whom he had no respect. It's hard to pin down a source for this belief, but it was widespread for many years. In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan blew this rumour out of the water with a surprisingly long and strong tribute to Belafonte, as folk artist, actor and human being. He wrote:

> 'Harry was the best balladeer in the land and everybody knew it. He was a fantastic artist, sang about lovers and slaves—chain gang workers, saints and sinners and children. His repertoire was full of old folk songs . . . all arranged in a way that appealed to a wide audience, much wider than the Kingston Trio. Harry had learned songs directly from LEADBELLY and WOODY GUTHRIE . . . one of his records, Belafonte Sings of the Caribbean, had even sold a million copies. He was a movie star, too . . . an authentic tough guy . . . dramatic and intense on the screen. . . . In the movie Odds Against Tomorrow, you forget he's an actor, you forget he's Harry Belafonte. His presence and magnitude was so wide. . . . As a performer, he broke all attendance records. He could play to a packed house at Carnegie Hall and then the next day he might appear at a garment center union rally. To Harry, it didn't make any difference. People were people. He had ideals and made you feel you're a part of the human race. There never was a performer who crossed so many lines as Harry. He appealed to everybody, whether they were steelworkers or symphony patrons or bobby-soxers, even children—everybody. He had that rare ability. Somewhere he had said that he didn't like to go on television, because he didn't think his music could be represented well on a small screen, and he was probably right. Everything about him was gigantic. The folk purists had a problem with him, but Harry—who could have kicked the shit out of all of them—couldn't be bothered, said that all folksingers were interpreters, said it in a public way as if someone had summoned him to set the record straight. . . . I could identify with Harry in all kinds of ways. Sometime in the past, he had been barred from the door of the world famous nightclub the Copacabana because of his color, and then later he'd be headlining the joint. You've got to wonder how that would make somebody feel emotionally. Astoundingly . . . I'd be making my professional recording début with Harry, playing harmonica on one of his albums. . . . With Belafonte I felt like I'd become anointed in some kind of way. . . . Harry was that rare type of character that radiates greatness, and you hope that some of it rubs off on you. The man commands respect. You know he never took the easy path, though he could have.'

Despite Dylan's comments, Belafonte was not always averse to TV. When he became the first black American to win an Emmy award, it was for his first TV special, 'Tonight with Harry Belafonte'.

Belafonte and Dylan came together again after a gap of over 20 years when both appeared on Live Aid and sang on the fund-raising single 'We Are the World' in 1985.

[Harry Belafonte: 'Day-O', NY, 20 Oct 1955, Calypso, RCA LPM1150, NY, 1956; 'Midnight Special' (w/ Dylan on harmonica; 20 takes; 1 on LP), NY, 2 Feb 1962, Midnight Special, RCA LMP 2449 (mono) & LSP 2449, NY, Mar 1962. Bright Road, dir. Gerald Mayer, MGM, US, 1953; Odds Against Tomorrow, dir. William Wise, co-prod. Harry Belafonte, United Artists, US, 1959. Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, pp.68–69. Sources include the African American Registry; Wikipedia, online 23 Oct 2005 at http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Harry_Belafonte; the Democracy Now! report www.democracynow.org/article.pl?sid=04/06/15/1410245, online ditto, and the 'Harry Belafonte & Friends' discography online ditto at www.akh.se/harbel/index.htm.]

'Belle Isle' 'Belle Isle' is a terrific traditional song, probably Celtic in origin, that is, not untypically, 'a model of non-linear narrative', in Bill Damon's phrase—and it may be the highlight of the Self Portrait album. Its land of origin may be uncertain but as CHRISTER SVENSSON pointed out in a fanzine in 1983, Dylan probably first came across the song in Sing Out! magazine's booklet Reprints from Sing Out! Volume 9, New York, 1966; this also includes 'Copper Kettle', 'It Hurts Me Too' (here titled 'When Things Go Wrong with You') and 'Little Sadie', all also on Self Portrait.

In Dylan's canon it also rubs shoulders with the much earlier, beautiful and self-penned 'Boots of Spanish Leather'. They are both love dialogues, the latter ending with an estrangement and 'Belle Isle' ending as if its sequel, with an imagined spiritual reconciliation: a neatening-up of existential history. Yet 'Belle Isle' is also self-sufficient and self-contained. Like an island, in fact.

The tune flows out lightly and gracefully, like the gown billowing out around the maiden in the story; but the accompanying strings are sombre: more so than any appropriate Celtic mist would demand. Dylan treats the subject and the tradition it springs from with respect and a sympathetic mockery simultaneously; yet there is also a tone in his voice that takes up that foreboding suggestion in the strings: a darker presence around the edges of this Romance.

This disperses for a little while near the end (before the strings impinge to bring it back again) when the full sunshine of Dylan's comic delivery bursts through: 'Young maiden I wish not to banter / 'Tis true I come here in disguise / I came here to fulfil my last promise / And hoped to give you a surprise! / I own you're a maid I love dearly / And you've been in my heart all the while . . .'

Dylan singing these archaisms is the aural equivalent of 'A Sight to Be Seen'. The second line, with its force falling so gleefully on 'disguise', makes it radiantly clear how far into the Celtic story-world Dylan is taking us, while the third line has a well-contrived calming influence—its words float down in a gentle spiral—so that the imminent absurdity of what follows doesn't overbalance and come too soon. The fourth line brings the fall: that ludicrously bad distribution of syllables, the awfulness of the rhyme and the bathos of the hope expressed (itself accentuated by the rush of syllables given over to its expression). It has all been perfectly timed. It is brilliant clowning, like that unbalanced line from 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat', 'You know it balances on your head just like a mattress balances on a bottle of wine'. With the lines that follow, all is restored. That 'I own' enacts the first flourish towards a restoration, as Dylan's voice gently hams up a bewildered search for the right note; the hush through 'you're a maid I' begins to get it back; the slowing-down on 'love' gives the necessary foothold; 'de-e-ear-ly' acts as one last wobble; 'And you've bin in my heart' is oh-so-nearly back in balance; and the eventual resolve of the voice's note with the music, at the end of 'all the while', announces the firm restoration of the balance. So then, as the emphasised beat comes down on 'me' in the line that follows—'For me there is no other damsel' (where the voice and the music are precisely synchronised)—Dylan resets the tone of the song, right there at the end. In the music that follows to close over the song, Dylan draws all its elements together: the sombre quality, the humour and the traditional Romance.

The sum of these parts is, in 'Belle Isle', mystery. And mystery, as Dylan said in 1966, 'is a fact, a traditional fact . . . traditional music is too unreal to die. It doesn't need to be protected. Nobody's going to hurt it. . . . All these songs about roses growing out of people's brains and lovers who are really geese and swans who turn into angels—they're not going to die.'

[Bill Damon, 'Herewith, a Second Look at Self Portrait', Rolling Stone, 3 Sep 1970, San Francisco. For a full discussion of the song's origins, see Michael Gray, 'Back to Belle Isle', Telegraph no. 29, Romford, UK, spring 1988 & follow-up correspondence in subsequent issues, or Michael Gray, 'Grubbing for a Moderate Jewel: In Search of the Blooming Bright Star of Belle Isle', Canadian Folklore canadien (Journal of the Folklore Studies Association of Canada) vol.8, 1–2, officially 1986 but in fact published 1989. Christer Svensson: 'Stealin', Stealin', Pretty Mama Don't You Tell on Me', Endless Road no.4, Hull, UK, 1983. Bob Dylan, 'The Playboy Interview: A Candid Conversation with the Iconoclastic Idol of the Folk Rock Set', Playboy, Chicago, Mar 1966.]

Berry, Chuck [1926 -] Born Charles Edward Anderson Berry in San Jose, CA, on January 15, or October 18 or 26, 1926, but growing up in St. Louis, Chuck Berry was rock'n'roll's first black guitar-hero and first poet.

His first song, the often misspelt 'Maybellene', began life as 'country music', by which Berry meant country blues, but revamped, on the great post-war Chicago label Chess in 1955, it was not only rock'n'roll but the perfect indicator of just what riches its singer-songwriter would bring to this emergent genre. Berry, never wild but always savvy, introduced the welcome flash of electric guitar-work and piquant comic tales, starting with a race between a Cadillac and a Ford, told from the Ford owner's, and therefore the underdog's, viewpoint. This became one of the most famous opening verses in popular music: 'As I was motorvatin' over the hill / I saw Maybellene in a Coup de Ville.' Here, out of nowhere, was the enticing combination of an instantly recognisable, fresh guitar ('just like a-ringin' the bell,' as he would soon put it), an insistent tune and a highly distinctive lyric that celebrated with deft wit and loving detail the glories of 1950s US teen consumerism.

Even so distinctive a lyricist as Chuck Berry has specific forbears from the pre-war blues world: within that rich, under-familiar terrain are records full of comic wit about domestic detail and city life, and even several on which singers ask phone-operators to call their girlfriends, stating the numbers and sometimes the romantic purpose of their calls. Nonetheless Berry was way ahead of his time, offering an urban slang-sophistication slicker than any bluesman before him.

He offered a bold and captivating use of cars, planes, highways, refrigerators and skyscrapers, and also the accompanying details: seat-belts, bus conductors, ginger ale and terminal gates. And he brought all this into his love songs. He put love in an everyday metropolis, fast and cluttered, as no-one had done before him. In Chuck Berry's cities, real people—individuals—struggled and fretted and gave vent to ironic perceptions. Chuck Berry also specialized in place-names, as no one before him or since has done. He releases the power of romance in each one, and thereby flies with relish through a part of the American dream. The blow-by-blow narrative, the brand-name detail, and a slyly innocent joy at being so au fait with such detail, is the hallmark of almost all Berry's best work.

So is the seamless match of words to melodic line. This unrivalled technical panache was itself part of his humour. Take the opening lines of 'Nadine' (1964): 'As I got on a city bus and found a vacant seat / I thought I saw my future bride walkin' up the street / I shouted to the driver, "Hey conductor! you must / Slow down, I think I see her: please, let me off this bus!" / "Nadine! Honey, is that you?! . . ."' The lively, perfect fit of street-talk to music avoids mere automatic chug-a-chug-a-chug, showing off the true poet's touch as the rhythm enacts the plea that 'you must [pause] slow down . . .'

Here, right from rock'n'roll's outset, was an artist who injected it with wit, the very quality supposed to belong only to the music rock'n'roll displaced. And unlike the Cole Porters, Berry never paraded cleverness for its own sake but always in energetic celebration of life. 'Maybellene' was an instant success, and his guitar-driven classics in the prolific years that followed were the anthems every local group played every weekend ever after. They included 'Roll Over Beethoven', 'Too Much Monkey Business', 'Oh Baby Doll', 'Rock & Roll Music', 'Sweet Little Sixteen', 'Johnny B. Goode', 'Carol', 'Little Queenie', 'Back in the USA', 'Bye Bye Johnny', 'Come On', 'No Particular Place to Go' and 'The Promised Land'. THE EVERLY BROTHERS would master teenage-bedroom angst; but Chuck proclaimed the upside of modern adolescence—which was odd, because he was already 19 by the end of World War II, and turned 30 by the time he began to sing of high-school romance.

In doing so, Berry was also curiously colour-neutral. Before him, black singers invoking schoolgirls somehow always made clear that they moved within black terrain. Chuck elected himself poet of the whole of US high school life. His music was, Tom Zito observed, 'Not so much black as American'. Yet stories like 'Maybellene' were certainly in the spirit of Stagger Lee and the other speedy superheroes of black folksong, while 'Brown-Eyed Handsome Man' (1956) avowed that Black Is Beautiful ahead of its time—the title's understatement adroitly set against the extravagant wordplay of the verses: 'de Milo's Venus was a beautiful lass / She had the world in the palm of her hand / But she lost both her arms in a wrestling match / To get a brown-eyed handsome man.'

Berry's songs ranged far beyond adolescence. 'Havana Moon' (1956) is a vivid drama of lovers' lost opportunity, as affecting as Brief Encounter but funky and told in three minutes; 'You Never Can Tell' (1964) smiles at newly-weds, as do 'the old folks' inside the song; 'Memphis, Tennessee' (1959) laments the pain of divorce as the narrator sings of missing six-year-old daughter Marie, last seen 'with hurry home drops on her cheeks that trickled from her eye'. And Berry was pioneering all this at a time when most people were either singing 'Rock, baby, rock', or 'I love you when you do the—'.

In the midst of the hits, Berry was imprisoned. At 18 he'd been jailed for three years for petty robbery, and in 1959 held for trying to date a white woman in Mississippi. In 1960, now married with four children, he was found guilty of taking a 14-year-old girl across a state line. Berry protested that she only went to the police after he fired her from his nightclub, and that anyway he'd thought she was 20—this from the writer of the line 'She's too cute to be a minute over seventeen'. He was jailed till late 1963. He served his time honing his songwriting, and his records of 1964 are at least as good as the earlier hits. Of no other rock'n'roller is this remotely true.

But in 1972 came the artistic shame of 'My Ding-a-Ling', a smutty song wholly lacking Berry's wit (and written, surprisingly, by FATS DOMINO's great bandleader and co-writer Dave Bartholomew), with which Chuck topped the charts at last, at the age of 46. By then his eulogies of Americana ('I'm so glad I'm living in the USA / Where hamburgers sizzle on an open griddle night and day / Anything you want they got it right here in the USA') had long been deeply unfashionable, as the Beatles had noted with their sardonic 'Back in the USSR'.

Yet Berry's huge influence remained tangible throughout the 1960s and beyond, both generally and in particular, as upon the Beach Boys ('Surfing USA'), Merseybeat, the BEATLES ('Get Back'), the STONES ('Come On' was their first single), Bob Dylan—and right on through to rap.

The fine 1987 documentary film Chuck Berry Hail! Hail! Rock'n'Roll! showed a Berry still slim, still obliging with his trademark duck-walk and still coaxing those lazily bent notes from his beautiful scarlet Gibson guitar. He retained an alert grace; and, as with Dylan, indifferent concerts were the price paid for genuinely spontaneous performance that on other nights yielded magical reinvention and creative musicianship.

(KEITH RICHARDS complains in the film that Berry tried to change key on him when Keith was 'helping' him on stage; on the evidence of Bob Dylan at Live Aid, though, Keith's help is best avoided.)

Dylan learnt a lot from Chuck Berry: from his music and his words. It is Berry's distinctive, driving cameos, tight-knit and self-sufficient, that inspire most of the rock side of Dylan's Bringing It All Back Home and much of Highway 61 Revisited and many other cuts, including, in slow-motion, 'Sittin' on a Barbed Wire Fence'. It isn't old ELVIS records that these albums update: it's Chuck Berry's.

The urban slickness, precision and irony are there in many Dylan songs, including 'On the Road Again'—which is, with its wild domestic detail, 'You Never Can Tell' turning sour. Dylan uses the same Berry qualities on 'Bob Dylan's 115th Dream', 'From a Buick 6', 'Highway 61 Revisited', 'Memphis Blues Again', 'Visions of Johanna' and so on. Dylan also takes over Berry's manipulation of objects and the details and ad-man phrases that surround them. Dylan could never have written 'Tombstone Blues' without Chuck Berry; nor, especially, could 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' have come into being without him, either in its musical format or its words. It needed Berry's 'Too Much Monkey Business' first.

The Berry song's technique is to pile up, like a list, the pressures that are on the story's narrator, and to suggest their unreasonableness by their phrased sharpness and multiplicity. The last verse runs: 'Workin' in the fillin' station / Too many tasks / Wipe the windows / Check the tyres / Check the oil / Dollar gas?!' Dylan, taking this up, makes it serve in a far more complex capacity. He widens the context and the predicament of the man under pressure. Chuck Berry might have a nasty job but Dylan has to fight off the whole of society: 'Ah, get born, keep warm, / Short pants, romance, learn to dance, / Get dressed, get blessed, / Try to be a success, / Please her, please him, buy gifts, / Don't steal, don't lift, / Twenty years of schoolin' an' they put you on the day shift. / Look out kid . . .'

Dylan and LEVON HELM performed 'Nadine' during Helm's Lone Star Café gig, New York City, May 29, 1988, and Dylan sang it live in concert in Berry's hometown, St. Louis, June 17, 1988. He played saxophone(!) while LARRY KEGAN sang Berry's 'No Money Down' live in Merrillville, Indiana, on October 19, 1981 and in Boston two days later, and Dylan uses the song's title inside the lyric of his own 'Maybe Someday' on Knocked Out Loaded (1986). He also performed Berry's 'Around and Around' in concert in Leysin, Switzerland, July 10, 1992. Things do indeed come around and around.

[Chuck Berry: 'Maybellene', Chicago, 21 May 1955, Chess 1604, Chicago, 1955; 'Nadine (Is That You?)', Chicago, 15 Nov 1963, Chess 1883 (Pye International 7N 25236, London), 1964; 'Roll Over Beethoven', Chicago, 16 Apr 1956, Chess 1626, 1956 (London-American HLU 8428, London, 1957); 'Too Much Monkey Business' c/w 'Brown-Eyed Handsome Man', Chicago, 16 Apr 1956, Chess 1635, 1956; 'Oh Baby Doll', Chicago, 6 May 1957, Chess 1664, 1957; 'Rock & Roll Music', Chicago, 6 May 1957, Chess 1671 (London-American HLM 8531), 1957; 'Sweet Little Sixteen' (c/w 'Reelin' and Rockin''), Chicago, 29 Dec 1957, Chess 1683 (London-American HLM 8585), 1958. ('Reelin' and Rockin'' was a UK top 20 hit 15 years later, Chess Records 6145 020, 1973); 'Johnny B. Goode', Chicago, 30 Dec 1957 c/w 'Around and Around', Chicago, 28 Feb 1958, Chess 1691, 1958; 'Carol', Chicago, 12 Jun 1958, Chess 1700 (London-American HL-8712), 1958; 'Little Queenie', Chicago, 19 Nov 1958, Chess 1722 (London-American HLM 8853), 1959; 'Memphis (Tennessee)', St. Louis, July 1958, c/w 'Back in the USA', Chicago, 17 Feb 1959, Chess 1729, 1959 (this was a belated UK top 10 hit in 1963, c/w 'Let It Rock', Chicago, 29 Jul 1959, Pye International 7N 25218, 1963); 'Bye Bye Johnny', Chicago, 12 Feb 1960, Chess 1754 (London-American HLM 9159), 1960; 'Come On', Chicago, 29 Jul 1961, Chess 1799, 1961 (Pye International 7N 25209, London, 1963); 'No Particular Place to Go', Chicago, 26 Mar 1964, Chess 1898 (Pye International 7 25242), 1964; 'Promised Land', Chicago, 25 Feb 1964, Chess 1916 (Pye Intnl. 7N 25285), 1964; 'Havana Moon', Chicago, 29 Oct 1956, Chess 1645, 1956 (London-American HLN 8375, 1957); 'You Never Can Tell', Chicago, 15 Nov 1963, Chess 1906 (Pye Intnl 7N 25257), 1964; 'My Ding-a-Ling', Coventry, UK, 3 Feb 1972, Chess CH-2131 (Chess 6145 019), 1972. (Most discographical information from Michael Gray, Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, but for additional detail and corrections Fred Rothwell and his paperback book Long Distance Information—Chuck Berry's Recorded Legacy, York, UK: Music Mentor Books, 2001, have been valuable.) Chuck Berry Hail! Hail! Rock'n'-Roll!, prod. Stephanie Bennett & Keith Richards, dir. Taylor Hackford, US, 1987.]

Best of Bob Dylan, The [version 1: 1997] An unnecessary UK-and-Australia-only compilation album, especially since it came so soon after Greatest Hits Volume 3, contrived by the record company's TV-advertising division with no thought for how it cut across Dylan's catalogue and certainly with no thought of contributing usefully to it. Worse, for all this CD's claims of digital remastering and Super Bit Mapping™, the versions here of early material like 'Blowin' in the Wind' give an alarmingly poor idea of how these originally sounded. This represents a disquieting form of rewriting audio history. It has one previously unreleased track: an unexceptional outtake of 'Shelter from the Storm' from the Blood on the Tracks sessions, as used in the overrated Tom Cruise film Jerry Maguire (and also released on the soundtrack album Jerry Maguire: Music from the Motion Picture, Epic Soundtrax EK 67910, 10 Dec 1996).

Not very cleverly, another album with the same title but different tracks was issued in the US in 2005.

[Released as Columbia SONYTV28CD, UK; Columbia 31-487924-10, Australia, 2 Jun 1997.]

Best of Bob Dylan, The* [version 2: 2005] Burdened with exactly the same title as a different compilation issued in the UK and Australia eight years earlier, this compilation was issued in the US and Japan only, and promoted as the first single CD to span Dylan's whole career. Rather a lot to ask of 16 tracks. They are: 'Blowin' in the Wind', 'The Times They Are a-Changin', 'Mr. Tambourine Man', 'Like a Rolling Stone', 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35', 'All Along the Watchtower', 'Lay Lady Lay', 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door', 'Tangled Up in Blue', 'Hurricane', 'Forever Young' (disrupting the chronology, since this is from the Planet Waves album, pre-dating 'Tangled Up in Blue' on Blood on the Tracks and 'Hurricane' on Desire), 'Gotta Serve Somebody', 'Jokerman', 'Not Dark Yet', 'Things Have Changed' and 'Summer Days'. Since these are absolutely the most obvious tracks you could have thought of, this was clearly an album designed for the Christmas market and for people who only like Bob Dylan a bit.

[Released as SONCD675013, US & Japan, 15 Nov 2005.]

Best of Bob Dylan Vol. 2, The* [2000] A more interesting selection than the earlier volume, partly for beginning not at the chronological beginning but with what was then the most recent studio recording, 'Things Have Changed', a single and a track from the soundtrack of the film Wonder Boys, recorded on July 26, 1999. Then the chronology kicks in and ranges from 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall' from 1963 through to 'Not Dark Yet' from 1997's Time Out of Mind album, and runs along very much in parallel to its predecessor: 'Hard Rain' and 'It Ain't Me Babe' instead of 'Blowin' in the Wind' and 'The Times They Are a-Changin'; 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' from Bringing It All Back Home instead of 'Mr. Tambourine Man'; 'Highway 61 Revisited' instead of 'Like a Rolling Stone'; 'I Want You' instead of 'Just Like a Woman'; 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight' instead of 'All Along the Watchtower'; the 1970 'Quinn the Eskimo' instead of the 1971 'I Shall Be Released'; 'Simple Twist of Fate' instead of 'Tangled Up in Blue'; 'Hurricane' instead of 'Oh Sister'; 'License to Kill' instead of 'Jokerman'. But it's by no means an exact parallel. This time there's nothing from the third album, nothing from Planet Waves and nothing from Slow Train Coming. From Oh Mercy there's an outtake of 'Dignity' rather than an album track; but Street Legal is represented, by 'Changing of the Guards', and, ignoring the claim in the collection's title, so is Down in the Groove, with 'Silvio'. More usefully, we also get that great single 'Positively 4th Street'.

As with the earlier volume's offering of 'Blowin' in the Wind', though, the audio quality on 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall' here is hopeless: a pallid, lo-fi version of what was to be found on the Freewheelin' album. To find this replicated decently on CD you need the CD/SACD (Super Audio CD) reissue of the album from 2003. Meanwhile, it would surely be asking only for competence to expect 'Subterranean' here not to be misspelt 'Subterannean', as happens on the back cover and the insert. But this collection gives us the unadulterated version of 'Dignity': the incomparably best version.

As a 'limited edition bonus' the collection was first released with an extra CD containing two live tracks from a concert in Santa Cruz on March 16, 2000—i.e. a concert that took place less than two months before this release. The two are: a fair 'Highlands', Dylan's voice at times too struttingly boastful (a mannerism he often falls into in recent years) but more often alertly responsive, with moments of great delicacy on the choruses; and an execrable 'Blowin' in the Wind' that is nothing but overblown pose. It is the perfect audio argument for his abandoning altogether a song that seems meaningless to him. Once, his direct, intelligent communication set his version apart from the glossier, flossier cover versions of others. Here, he sounds like one of them.

[Released as Columbia 498361-2 (limited edn. version with bonus disc 498361-9), Europe, 8 May 2000.]

Betts, Dickie [1943 -] Forrest Richard Betts was born in West Palm Beach, Florida, on December 12, 1943.

After fronting the psychedelic Jacksonville, Florida, band the Second Coming, he was a co-founder of the Allman Brothers Band in 1969 and one of its crucial guitarists; he composed their crucial songs 'Rambling Man', 'In Memory of Elizabeth Reed,' 'Blue Sky', 'Southbound' and 'Jessica.' One of the survivors of all the road deaths the band managed to chalk up, he took over Duane Allman's leadership rôle after Duane's death (while they were still working on their great album Eat a Peach).

Because of his alcohol problems, but officially 'due to creative differences with Greg Allman', Betts was fired from the Allman Brothers Band in May 2000—fired by fax after 31 years in the group—and immediately hit the road, first fronting the Dickey Betts Band and later his current outfit, Dickey Betts & Great Southern (re-using the name he'd claimed on his own records during the Allman Brothers' long vacation of 1976 to 1978, in which time he released Dickie Betts and Atlanta's Burning Down). Dickey Betts & Great Southern have released two CDs, Let's Get Together (2001) and The Collectors, Vol. 1 (2003).

His public connections with Dylan are brief. When the Never-Ending Tour came to Sarasota, Florida (where his old acquaintance ERIC VON SCHMIDT had a home), on November 9, 1992, Dylan brought Dickie Betts on stage in mid-set to play guitar behind him and the rest of the band on 'Cat's in the Well'; a few months later, at the New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival on April 23, 1993, Betts again came on in Dylan's set and again played only on 'Cat's in the Well'. He contributed more at their third and (so far) final encounter, when Dylan's 1995 tour reached Tampa, Florida, on the last day of that September. This time Dickie Betts shared vocals with Dylan as well as played guitar on an unexpected performance of Betts' own 'Rambling Man'; and played guitar on five other numbers: 'Seeing the Real You at Last', 'She Belongs to Me', 'Obviously 5 Believers', 'Highway 61 Revisited' and the final encore number, 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'. Thus the audience were treated to both Betts' fluid guitar-work and his curiously strangulated vocals. On the album The Songs of JIMMIE RODGERS—A Tribute, finally issued on Dylan's Egyptian Records label in 1997, Betts offers a decent performance of Rodgers' great song 'Waiting for a Train'.

[Dickie Betts: Dickie Betts, 1977, CD-reissued Razor & Tie 82141, US, 1997; Atlanta's Burning Down, 1978, CD-reissued Razor & Tie 82142, 1997; 'Waiting for a Train', nia, The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers—A Tribute, Various Artists, Egyptian/Columbia Records 485189 2, NY, 1997. Dickie Betts & Great Southern: Let's Get Together, Free Falls Ent., US, 2001. Allman Brothers: Eat a Peach, 1971, Capricorn, US, 1972.]

biblical text, Dylan's capacity for modernising See 'What Can I Do for You?'.

Bikel, Theodore [1924 -] Meir Bikel was born in Vienna, Austria, on May 2, 1924. His family fled the Nazis in the late 1930s, and he lived in Palestine from 1938 to 1945, moving to the UK in 1946 and finally settling in the US in 1954. Bikel claims to have been fluent in Hebrew, Yiddish and German and, modestly, to have had only 'a respectable command of English and French' by this point. He has since learned many other languages. He had joined the Habimah Theatre in 1943 as an apprentice actor and in 1944 became one of the co-founders of the Israeli Chamber Theatre. On arriving in London in 1946, he enrolled at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, graduating two years later while starting to develop 'a serious interest in the guitar and folk music'. Hence he became a decent character actor as well as a rather laboured folk singer specialising in Jewish folksong. Laurence Olivier gave him the rôle of Mitch in his London production of A Streetcar Named Desire.

He had already worked in the US by the time he settled there in 1954; he made his Hollywood acting début in The African Queen in 1951, in which he played a German naval officer. He created the part of Baron von Trapp in the first Broadway cast of The Sound of Music, and later starred in the equally remorseless Fiddler on the Roof. Other films included The Defiant Ones (1958), My Fair Lady (1964) and The Russians Are Coming, The Russians Are Coming in 1965. In FRANK ZAPPA's 200 Motels (1971) he played a game show host and the Devil.

Bikel was signed to Elektra by the indefatigable Jac Holzman in 1958, who proceeded to record him on a vast number of those awful LPs offering ponderous geographical tours of folksongs from around the world, country by country, sometimes partnered by others, including CYNTHIA GOODING. He not only plays guitar but also mandolin, balalaika and harmonica.

'One night in the summer of 1962,' ROBERT SHELTON reports first-hand, 'Bikel . . . threw a party at his Washington Square Village apartment. Dylan . . . more than a bit stoned', gatecrashed it and 'careened around the room in his top hat'; Bikel was 'gently bemused'. The following summer, they almost worked together; certainly they travelled together. On July 6, 1963, Bikel and Dylan flew down to the deep south to meet up with THE FREEDOM SINGERS, LEN CHANDLER and PETE SEEGER, and to take part in a voter registration rally in Greenwood, Mississippi. Bikel paid Dylan's fare, and watched the emergent young star closely—and found Dylan a watcher too. 'I saw Bob observing everything down there. He was also watching the reaction to himself. He was very humble to the farmers . . .' This is where Dylan performed 'Only a Pawn in Their Game' to black workers in a field outside Greenwood.

At the time, Bikel was a regular on the weekly TV show 'Hootenanny', which had an audience of around 11 million. Since then, he has continued to appear, if his vainglorious website is to be believed, in almost every play, film, television drama and opera that was ever a success. His autobiography, Theo, was re-published in 2002. No doubt it elaborates upon his online claims, which include these: that he is 'One of the world's best-known folk singers'; 'a founder in 1961 of the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL'; 'a multi-faceted entertainer' who gives 'some 50 to 60 concerts per year, performing alone or with large symphony orchestras'; he was 'active for many years in the civil rights movement', 'an elected delegate to the 1968 Democratic Convention in Chicago', President of the Actors' Equity Association (1973–82), a Vice President of the International Federation of Actors (1981–91), a Board Member of Amnesty International (USA), and, 'by Presidential appointment' a member of the National Council on the Arts (1977–82).

'An American citizen since 1961, Theodore Bikel divides his time between California and Connecticut, where he resides with his wife Rita.' What's more, 'Theodore Bikel is a Renaissance Man, a concerned human being who works in the arts', who is not a 'specialist but a general practitioner in the world of the arts.' 'This is reflected in his multiplicity of talents: Bikel the actor on stage, screen and television; Bikel the folksinger and guitarist; Bikel the author, lecturer and raconteur; and Bikel the activist and arts advocate.' And just possibly Bikel the bighead.

[Theodore Bikel, Theo, 2nd edn., Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 2002. His website is at www.bikel.com. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London, Penguin edn., 1987, pp.152, 170–79.]

Biograph* [1985] A 5-LP box set retrospective of Dylan's work from 1962–81, packaged with an unprecedented collection of personal and rare photographs and equally unprecedented interview comments by Dylan about the songs themselves, plus other interview material ranging over many topics in which Dylan, sometimes surly but more often open, remains unpredictable and spikey. Though criticised (inevitably) by some collectors, it is a fine if quirky selection of previously issued album tracks plus a significant number of previously unreleased recordings: a different take of 'Mixed-Up Confusion' (1962); 'Baby, I'm in the Mood for You' (1962); the exquisitely performed 'protest' number 'Percy's Song' (1963); the incomparable 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' (1963); by no means the best take of 'I'll Keep It with Mine' (1965); a fragment, previously unknown even to avid collectors, from the Highway 61 Revisited sessions, 'Jet Pilot' (1965); the wonderful 'I Wanna Be Your Lover' (1965); live cuts from the 1966 tour—the electric 'I Don't Believe You' and the acoustic solo 'Visions of Johanna' and 'It's All Over Now Baby Blue'; the belated release of take 2 of the original 1967 Dylan & the Crackers takes of 'Quinn the Eskimo (The Mighty Quinn)'—though take 1 had long circulated unofficially; a publisher's office demo solo of 'Forever Young' (1973); the original studio cut of 'You're a Big Girl Now' and the Blood on the Tracks outtake 'Up to Me'(1974); the lovely Desire outtake 'Abandoned Love' (1975); excellent live recordings of two other Desire songs, 'Isis' and 'Romance in Durango', from the first Rolling Thunder Revue (1975); a major song from the Shot of Love sessions, 'Caribbean Wind' (1981), and a live 'Heart of Mine' (1981). An affirmation of the astonishing variety as well as richness of Dylan's corpus, the collection was well-received by the public and went some way to reviving that fickle thing, Dylan's critical reputation.

[Released as Columbia C5X 38830 (CBS 20-66509 in UK), 28 Oct or 7 Nov 1985.]

Björner, Olof [1942 -] Olof Edvard Björner was born on November 26, 1942, in Stockholm, Sweden. He first took an interest in Dylan's work in 1963. Gaining a computer science degree in 1967, Olof became a computer consultant and later a management consultant working on IT strategies for health care. In 2003 he and his wife Agneta bought a bookshop in the Swedish country town of Filipstad.

His first publication was the now very rare booklet Words Fill My Head, Written, Spoken, Sung by Bob Dylan, self-published in 1989, which compiled some of the material written by Dylan yet excluded from the official book Bob Dylan Lyrics 1962–1985. Around the same time, Björner started to distribute update pages to MICHAEL KROGSGAARD's enormous log of Dylan recording sessions, Master of the Tracks, published in 1988. He was also very active in the early days of the internet discussion group http://rec.music.dylan. He soon started to complement these update pages with yearly chronicles—which duly became far too costly to keep on distributing on paper. In 1999 he decided to make them all available on the internet and at the same time to expand vastly his chronicling of Dylan's work and career activity.

The result is the enormous and invaluable website www.bjorner.com, which (so far) offers a detailed run-down on every Dylan year from 1958 to 2002: offering a catalogue of his recording sessions, his concert performances—listing every song performed in every concert—plus his record releases, books published by and about him, tapes newly coming into circulation, and more besides. The detail is extraordinary, and the level of accuracy phenomenal. There's also a section of Olof's site with transcriptions of Dylan interviews from the 1960s to the 1990s, a vast listing of cover versions of Dylan songs by other artists (accessible by song or by artist) and an online version of Words Fill My Head. And more besides. Truly a gigantic undertaking, maintained to a very high standard indeed.

Some of the annual chronicles are also becoming available in book form, for those with a good deal of money to spend. Olof's Files: A Bob Dylan Performance Guide, in fourteen volumes including an index volume, each priced at almost $50, are being issued by the quaintly named small UK publishing house Hardinge Simpole, from Volume One: 1958–1969 through to Volume Thirteen: 2003–2004.

As you can tell, Olof Björner is some kind of hero.

[Olof Björner: Olof's Files: A Bob Dylan Performance Guide, Aylesbeare, Devon, UK: Hardinge Simpole, 2002; or online free at www.bjorner.com.]

Blackwell, Chuck [1940 -] Charles Edward Blackwell (not to be confused with the black drummer of that name) was born in Oklahoma City on August 19, 1940. He grew up in Tulsa and became an LA-based drummer around 1958, touring behind LITTLE RICHARD, JERRY LEE LEWIS and THE EVERLY BROTHERS, before playing with Delaney Bramlett, Don Preston, JAMES BURTON and Glen D. Hardin in the Shindogs and the Pebbles, and becoming a long-time collaborator with LEON RUSSELL. Hence he was part of Joe Cocker's Mad Dogs and Englishmen tour (as were those other drummers with a Dylan connection, JIM KELTNER and SANDY KONIKOFF). Hence too when Leon Russell produced Dylan's sessions at New York City's Blue Rock Studios on March 16–19, 1971, Blackwell was the drummer. He can be heard, therefore, on the lovely 'When I Paint My Masterpiece' and heard to more advantage on the 1971 single of 'Watching the River Flow'. (But see Keltner, Jim.)

Blackwell continued to play sessions, including for Freddie King and on many a Taj Mahal album. Today, having survived cancer a decade ago, Chuck owns Blackwell's Stained Glass & Doors Inc., a shop in Broken Arrow, Oklahoma, where he and his wife moved around 1980.

Blade, Brian [1970 -] Brian Blade, younger brother of Brady Blade Jr. (see musical accompanists to Dylan, other), was born in Shreveport, Louisiana, in 1970 into a gospel-enthusiast family and started playing drums in church at age 13. He worked in a Shreveport record store before going to college in New Orleans, where he became a professional drummer, mostly of a jazz persuasion, and got to know DANIEL LANOIS, with whom he has recorded, as he has on EMMYLOU HARRIS' album Wrecking Ball. A fan of John Coltrane and Miles Davis in his youth, he was given a copy of JONI MITCHELL's 1976 album Hejira when he was 16, let it seep into his soul and, many years later, was thrilled to find himself in her band. He plays on albums including her Taming the Tiger and was on the short West Coast tour of May 1998 that sandwiched her set between those by VAN MORRISON and Dylan—by which time he had been one of the drummers on Dylan's Lanois-produced album Time Out of Mind. He plays on 'Love Sick', 'Standing in the Doorway', 'Million Miles', ''Til I Fell in Love With You', 'Not Dark Yet' and 'Can't Wait'.

On his PR portrait Blade is poised meditatively at the drumkit, looking like a young Arthur Ashe. In 1998 he formed the Brian Blade Fellowship—a musical rather than religious group, and an unusual jazz combo in featuring a steel guitar. They have made two CDs, The Brian Blade Fellowship (1998) and Perceptual (2000), both produced by Lanois, who also plays on both. Joni Mitchell plays on 'Steadfast' on the latter. Blade has also taken to playing with Wayne Shorter's quartet and with an outfit called Directions in Music, which exists to pay homage to his early heroes, Coltrane and Davis, and in whose ranks lurks another big-name jazz musician, Herbie Hancock.

Not, in other words, Bob Dylan's usual sort of musician at all.

[The Brian Blade Fellowship: The Brian Blade Fellowship, Blue Note 59417, US (8594172, UK), 1998; Perceptual, Blue Note 23571, US, 2000.]

Blake, Norman [1938 -] Norman Blake was born in Chattanooga, Tennessee, on March 10, 1938, grew up in north-west Georgia and became a Nashville session musician. He has now been playing traditional bluegrass and old-time music for almost half a century. A singer and songwriter but primarily a multi-instrumentalist, he plays guitar, mandolin, fiddle, banjo and Dobro, though he is specially noted for flat-picking fiddle tunes on guitar with speed and precision. He has toured and/or recorded with June Carter, JOHNNY CASH, the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, KRIS KRISTOFFERSON, DOC WATSON and numerous others, played on the JOAN BAEZ record of 'The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down' and more recently played prominently on the soundtrack for the film O Brother Where Art Thou.

In February 1969 he became one of the studio musicians for Dylan's Nashville Skyline sessions, playing guitar on all tracks, including all the outtakes and the duets with Johnny Cash. That album was released in April 1969, and later that month Blake returned to the studios with Dylan. He doesn't seem to have been there for the first of these Self Portrait sessions but he was there on the second day, April 26, at which 'Take Me as I Am', 'I Forgot More (Thank You'll Ever Know)' and 'Let It Be Me' were recorded, and on May 3 for 'Take A Message to Mary' and 'Blue Moon'. This means that he was also a contributor to the track 'A Fool Such as I' on the album Dylan.

Today, Norman Blake frequently performs and records with his singer-musician wife Nancy Short. They returned to live in Dade County, Georgia, in the early 1970s, and there Blake launched a successful independent recording career with Back Home in Sulphur Springs in 1972. He has now released over two dozen solo albums, as well as guitar and mandolin instruction sets.

Blake, William [1757 - 1827] Blakeian influence on Dylan can be apparent as a question of 'thought': that is, in a labour of thought that achieves a concentrated economy of language and a tone almost of disinterestedness about what is actually experienced with intense emotion by the writer. In Blake we see this, for instance, in 'The Sick Rose'. In Dylan we see it in the make-up of the John Wesley Harding album (especially in 'I Dreamed I Saw St Augustine') and in individual songs throughout his repertoire, including 'Love Minus Zero/No Limit', a song that shares with 'The Sick Rose' the theme of possessiveness destroying love.

A difficult and central early work of Dylan's, 'Gates of Eden', also begs to be considered in relation to Blake. Its general themes could not be more Blakeian; and nor could their treatment. Dylan is treating balances of opposites—of material wealth and spiritual; of earthly reality and the imaginatively real; of the body and soul; of false gods and true vision; of self-gratification and salvation; of mortal ambitions and the celestial city; of sins and forgiveness; of evil and good. Not only are these Blake's themes, but they receive directly comparable handling. Both artists address themselves, as Max Plowman phrased it, 'not to common sense, but to individual senses.'

But it is in 'Every Grain of Sand', on 1981's album Shot of Love, that Dylan draws on Blake most and best. Blake, rewriting the Bible in his own unique way, hovers all around Dylan's song, in its themes, its language and in the rhythms of that language, though there is little conjunction of philosophy. (Blake's philosophy, as Yeats claimed, brings him '. . . at last to forget good and evil in an absorbing vision of the happy and the unhappy.' The ideas Dylan takes from the Judeao-Christian religion are far more orthodox—though it happens that when Blake reaches his forties he comes to accept, like Dylan, a degree of Christian orthodoxy previously refused: as Peter Ackroyd notes in Blake (1995), it is in 1797's Vala or the Four Zoas, the great epic poem of Blake's middle age, that he first uses the word 'saviour' and the phrase 'the Lamb of God'. Blake's interest in taking biblical text and flying it to mystical heights is evident everywhere in his own work, and Dylan's interest in the work of this mystic predecessor is never more evident than here.

'Auguries of Innocence'—a single, 133-line poem written in or shortly before 1803 and not part of the Songs of Innocence—begins with the well-known first stanza 'To see a World in a Grain of Sand / And a Heaven in a Wild Flower / Hold Infinity in the palm of your hand / And Eternity in an hour': but though a Dylan remark of 1976, 'I can see God in a daisy', directly parallels Blake here, and is clearly re-echoed in Dylan's 'I can see the Master's hand / In every leaf that trembles, in every grain of sand', what Blake suggests by 'To see a World in a Grain of Sand' is something more complex than merely that the fact of the grain of sand reveals God's presence. Blake presses the idea that there is a world to be seen within a grain of sand, if our 'doors of perception' (this phrase too is Blake's) could be 'cleansed'. He insists on this idea many times over, as here in Vala: 'Then Eno, a daughter of Beulah, took a Moment of Time / And drew it out to seven thousand years with much care & affliction / And many tears, & in every year made windows into Eden. / She also took an atom of space & opened its centre / Into Infinitude . . .'

Blake's vision embraces every possible sense in which every grain of sand is bound up with man's destiny and God's all-caring universe; the boundaries of Dylan's vision in his song are smaller and more modest.

But that Dylan intends his embrace of Blake in 'Every Grain of Sand' is indicated by the echoes of Blake in Dylan's 'the ancient footsteps', of Blake's line 'While he keeps onwards in his wondrous journey on the earth' (from Milton, 1804–08) in Dylan's own 'onward in my journey' and in the half-echoes of Blake in Dylan's Bible-derived 'sparrow falling', the numbering of every hair and every grain of sand, and in the striking sun-steps-time combination in Dylan's majestic line 'The sun beat down upon the steps of time to light the way': the same sun-steps-time combination at the heart of 'Ah! Sun-Flower', from Songs of Experience.

More tellingly, Dylan declares that his embrace of Blake is crucial to his own song by his use not just of Blake's language and of some commonality of theme but by his insistent use of Blake's rhythms.

The rhythmic correspondence is concise and unmistakeable. The whole song is built upon the heptameter, or septenarius, the seven-foot or seven-beat line, which is rare in English-language poetry but is one of Blake's principal trademarks, starting with 'Tiriel' (written about 1786), in which we find 'A worm of sixty winters creeping on the dusky ground.' This distinctive metre recurs throughout Blake's work, as here in The Book of Thel: 'Why fade these children of the spring? born but to smile & fall' and 'Thou seest me the meanest thing, and so I am indeed; / My bosom of itself is cold and of itself is dark'. This seven-beat line is the distinctive foundation upon which Dylan builds the whole of 'Every Grain of Sand'.

You cannot read Blake without noticing the particular words and constructions he likes a lot and returns to often—and some of these Blakeian words and word-patterns are taken up and re-sung in hugely varying works by Bob Dylan.

Put crudely, there are two Blake modes of poetic writing: the sublimely simple mode of the Songs of Innocence & Experience, and the hyperactive complexity of the declamatory epic poems; and clearly Dylan's work reflects both kinds of Blake. But in 'Every Grain of Sand' Blake's presence is indicated by Dylan's use of specific Blakeian ingredients, rather than merely because Blake has been a major influence upon Dylan's work.

Many of Dylan's most Blakeian lines are of the long visionary kind that Blake would punctuate with scattered capital letters and might end with an exclamation-mark, as for instance in these disparate examples (respectively from 'Precious Angel', 1979, and 'Visions of Johanna', 1966, appropriately repunctuated): 'On the way out of Egypt, thro' Ethiopia to the Judgment Hall of Christ' and 'The Ghost of Electricity howls in the Bones of her Face!'

In fact 'howl' is one of Blake's very favourite words. He also likes 'Golden Loom' and 'the rolling thunder'—and, to bring us back directly to 'Every Grain of Sand', that distinctive little word 'wintry', which Dylan deploys towards the end of the song.

Blake uses 'wintry' all the time, as in the final verse of an untitled poem from about 1793, found in Blake's notebook, which has become titled after its first line, 'Let The Brothels Of Paris Be Opened': 'O, who would smile on the wintry seas, / & Pity the stormy roar? / Or who will exchange his new born child / For the dog at the wintry door?' 'The Dog at the wintry door' is re-used for Plate 25 of The First Book of Urizen (1794), and again, almost identically, in Vala—'It is an easy thing. . . . To hear the dog howl at the wintry door'—a poem that also offers 'To listen to the hungry raven's cry in wintry season', 'then sleep the wintry days . . . & prepare for a wintry grave', 'rugged wintry rocks' and 'the wintry blast / . . . or the summer pestilence'. We find 'the myriads of Angelic hosts / Fell thro' the wintry skies' in Europe, a Prophecy (1794); 'Thro' the wintry hail & rain' is a line from the 1800–1803 notebook—and in a poem etched on a cancelled plate for America, a Prophecy (1793) we get the exact prefiguring of Dylan's usage, in '. . . & his white garments cast a wintry light.'

The other specifically Blakeian characteristic of 'Every Grain of Sand' is the formally ordered 'poetic' structural motif, insistently repeated throughout the song, that piles up 'the flowers of indulgence', 'the weeds of yesteryear', 'the breath of conscience', 'the broken mirror of innocence' and so on. Dylan can't be said to use this construction as skilfully as Blake, whose best equivalents are far more vivid, fresh and original. These wipe the floor with Dylan's: 'in the dark delusions of repentance', 'shoes of indolence', 'Clouds of Learning' and, famously, 'the horses of instruction' (as, come to that, does the King James Bible version of Psalm 40 verse 3 with its 'thou hast made us drink the wine of astonishment.').

The contrast in vividness between Blake's and Dylan's phrases here is a matter of vigour of language and of meaning. That 'shoes of indolence' works by its soft-footed surrealism, its striking originality and the beguiling surprise of the image, but also because that image actively illuminates the idea it offers: there's a suggestion that indolence may or may not fit, that it can be stepped out of and discarded, that it isn't a part of the naked self—and so on. These hints about the nature of 'indolence' come directly from the imaginative choice of 'shoes'. The 'Clouds of Learning', more simply and obviously, suggests that 'Learning' may not clarify (à la 'your useless and pointless knowledge', perhaps). It is different with the 'dark delusions of repentance'. This offers the oddity of neither quite yielding an image nor being quite matter-of-fact, so that the word-effect itself, the sheer physique of the cadence, predominates. It has a gorgeous hammering muscularity, a rhythm in which you can certainly hear a master's hand, and as it ends on that rat-tat and hiss, it recharges 'repentance', giving it an almost onomatopoeic eloquence. Blake does not make it 'poetic'; he makes it poetry.

In 'Every Grain of Sand' Dylan's equivalents never quite keep the right side of the gap between the two. He manages it brilliantly in all manner of ways in all manner of songs throughout his repertoire, showing again and again the creative imagination and the judgment for equivalents of 'shoes of indolence' and for muscularity of writing that can stand alongside 'the dark delusions of repentance'—but he doesn't manage it via this form of construction in this song.

His image-carrying phrases are intermingled with echoing phrases that don't present images (matter-of-fact ones like 'time of my confession', 'memory of decay' and 'pain of idleness') so that there is variety in this usage throughout; yet he doesn't quite carry it off. By the midway point, you already feel that there have been too many of these phrases. Their vigour and illuminative power is not enough to stop the device itself obtruding: and once it obtrudes, you start to check on whether each of these constructions is really authentic.

That 'broken mirror of innocence', for instance: you might be able to work out how this image is an apt one (or you might not: to begin with, is innocence the mirror or the broken mirror?)—but it certainly doesn't succeed by any direct, free appeal to the imagination, like the 'shoes of indolence'. It's too careful, too self-consciously writerly, too constructed.

Finally, we can say that Dylan and Blake share also the desire to fight off public assumptions about their abnormality. Blake found it astonishing and perplexing that people should have considered him and his work deliberately puzzling and peculiar; in 1966 Dylan told Playboy: 'people actually have the gall to think that I have some kind of fantastic imagination. It gets very lonesome.'

This commonly felt sense of isolation might not be worth claiming as any special linkage between Blake and Dylan except that it seems to have provoked such strikingly similar expressions of defiance in the two artists. Compare Blake's 'Island in the Moon' (written around 1784–85) and Dylan's liner-notes for Highway 61 Revisited (1965):

Blake:

> '. . . in a great hurry, Inflammable Gass the Windfinder enter'd. They seem' d to rise & salute each other. Etruscan Column & Inflammable Gass fix'd their eyes on each other; their tongues went in question and answer, but their thoughts were otherwise employ'd. "I don't like his eyes," said Etruscan Column. "He's a foolish puppy," said Inflammable Gass, smiling on him. The 3 Philosophers—the Cynic smiling, the Epicurean seeming studying the flame of the candle, & the Pythagorean playing with the cat—listen'd with open mouths. . . . Then Quid call' d upon Obtuse Angle for a song, & he, wiping his face & looking on the corner of the ceiling, sang: To be or not to be / Of great capacity / Like Sir Isaac Newton, / Or Locke, or Doctor South . . .'

Dylan:

'Savage Rose & Openly are bravely blowing kisses to the Jade Hexagram—Carnaby Street & To all of the mysterious juveniles & the Cream Judge is writing a book on the true meaning of a pear—last year, he wrote one on famous dogs of the Civil War & now he has false teeth and no children . . . when the Cream met Savage Rose & Openly, he was introduced to them by none other than Lifelessness—Lifelessness is the Great Enemy & always wears a hipguard—he is very hipguard. . . . Lifelessness said when introducing everybody "go save the world" & "involvement! that's the issue" & things like that & Savage Rose winked at Openly & the Cream went off with his arm in a sling singing "so much for yesterday" . . . the clown appears—puts a gag over Autumn's mouth & says "there are two kinds of people—simple people & normal people" this usually gets a big laugh from the sandpit & White Heap sneezes—passes out & wakes up & rips open Autumn's gag & says "What do you mean you're Autumn and without you there'd be no Spring! you fool! without Spring, there'd be no you! what do you think of that???" then Savage Rose & Openly come by & kick him in the brains & colour him pink for being a phony philosopher—then the clown comes by . . . & some college kid who's read all about Nietzsche comes by & says "Nietzsche never wore an umpire's suit" . . .'

See also the entry below, plus Ginsberg, Allen (re Blakeian influence on Dylan that may have come via Ginsberg) and 'Every Grain of Sand', non-Blake elements. Blake's 'If the doors of perception were cleansed every thing would appear to man as it is, infinite. For man has closed himself up, till he sees all things thro' narrow chinks of his cavern': from 'A Memorable Fancy' in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, c.1790–93 is also (inevitably) drawn upon in various entries about creativity and drugs.

[William Blake: 'The Sick Rose', Songs of Experience (1794), published together with Songs of Innocence (1789) as Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience: Shewing the Two Contrary States of the Human Soul in 1794. The Book of Thel, 1789. 'Island in the Moon' was left untitled and unpublished by Blake; first publication was in E. J. Ellis: The Real Blake, 1907. This work was a product of the co-editorship of Blake's work by Ellis and W.B. Yeats—'Blake's first proper editors', as Peter Ackroyd says in Blake. Yeats's editorial work on Blake was done in 1893; his essay 'William Blake' was republished in W.B. Yeats: Essays, 1924. (There is an entry on Dylan's possible use of Yeats' poem 'VACILLATION'.)

Max Plowman: An Introduction to the Study of Blake, 1st edn., 1927, p.26. The greatest contemporary Blake scholar is perhaps poet and critic Kathleen Raine, who published the 2-volume Blake and Tradition, 1968, and the illustrated William Blake, 1970. Quotations from Blake above are taken from Blake: Complete Writings, ed. Geoffrey Keynes, London, 1969, and the Dover Thrift Edition of Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience, 1992. Dylan's remark re God in a daisy is quoted in the booklet of notes for the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 box set, 1991.

Dylan's use of Blake in 'Every Grain of Sand' is examined at length in Michael Gray: Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, 1999, Ch. 12 (drawn on above). There is also an interesting essay by J.R. Stokes on Blake's presence within Dylan's New Morning album, 'Waking Up to a New Morning (And linking arms in the Universal Brotherhood)', Judas! no.14, Huntingdon, UK, July 2005.

Set to music by Mike Westbrook, Adrian Mitchell's arrangement of some Blake text (Mitchell calls it 'Let the Slave, incorporating The Price of Experience'), is performed by VAN MORRISON on A Sense of Wonder (1984). The section Mitchell calls 'The Price of Experience' is lines 397–418 of the Second Night portion of Vala. The poetry called 'Let the Slave' on the Morrison album comprises lines 670–676 and 825–826 of the Ninth Night portion of Vala, one unlocated line ('For Empire is no more and now the Lion and Wolf shall cease') and half of line 366 from the Second Night portion of Vala, which Morrison says four times over. PATTI SMITH performed her musical interpretation of Songs of Innocence 18 Jun 2005 at the Meltdown Festival, London Royal Festival Hall.]

Blake, William, beat/hippie revival of 20th century social poets such as Peter Porter have recoiled from the beat/hippie revival of Blake, either disliking per se exactly those mystical qualities for which he is a New Age hero, or else simply objecting to his appropriation. 'William Blake, William / Blake, William Blake, William Blake, / say it and feel new!', sneers a verse of Porter's poem 'Japanese Jokes'. Poet and critic Fred Grubb's misremembrance of this salvo, offered inside a book review, is pithier: 'Blake! Blake! Blake! Say it and feel good'. Porter's attack may have beat poet ALLEN GINSBERG in mind—a Blake fan who was almost certainly one conduit for Dylan's absorption of Blake.

Porter and his friends are complaining as if there were just one warping of Blake's otherwise correct and static reputation. It's never been like that. Max Plowman, writing his irrepressible Introduction to the Study of Blake in the 1920s, felt that at last 'the day seems to be not far distant when . . . apologies will be unnecessary and the complete Blake will be no longer regarded as a narcotic for numbskulls, but will stare every university undergraduate full in the face.'

[Peter Porter: 'Japanese Jokes', Last of England, 1970. Fred Grubb: 'Mountaineer', London Magazine, Dec 1989–Jan 1990. Max Plowman, Introduction to the Study of Blake, London: Dent, 1927, p.2.]

Blakley, Ronee [1945 -] Ronee Blakley was born on August 24, 1945 in Stanley, Idaho, but grew up in nearby Caldwell, the daughter of a civil engineer. She became an actor as well as a singer-songwriter and pianist. Her film début had been a fleeting appearance in Tom McGowan's Wilbur and the Baby Factory in 1970, but her most prominent rôle was in her second movie, the great Robert Altman's masterpiece Nashville, made in 1975 and released a year later, in which she played Barbara Jean, a country star allegedly modelled on Loretta Lynn. She appeared in many other films, but never bettered this performance, and never became a star.

As a singer she could perform powerfully, and after singing duets with Dylan at the end of a DAVID BLUE gig in the Village on October 22, 1975, as he was putting together the Rolling Thunder Revue, she became one of its featured singers, performing songs at each concert and being filmed giving a dramatic rendition at the piano of her own song 'Need a New Sun Rising' in Renaldo & Clara, released in 1978, in which, inevitably, she takes part in some of the improvised acting scenes. Part of her job in the film was to be one of the several dark-haired beauties of a certain type (Dylan's type, clearly) who all looked a bit like JOAN BAEZ and a bit like SARA DYLAN.

'Need a New Sun Rising' was one of the tracks on her 1975 album Welcome, on which she had played guitar as well as keyboards. She had earlier been a performer on the experimental 1970 album First Moog Quartet, devised by Gershon Kingsley; and had made her own début album, Ronee Blakley, in 1972.

In 1979 she married the European auteur film director Wim Wenders (and directed him in her own film I Played It for You) but they remained married only until 1981. She continued to appear in films, including Nicholas Ray's last picture, Lightning Over Water in 1979, and Nightmare on Elm Street in 1984, but hasn't made a film since Paul Leder's Murder by Numbers in 1990. She and Dylan don't seem to have crossed professional paths since the 1970s.

[Nashville, dir. Robert Altman, ABC / Paramount, US, 1976. Renaldo & Clara, dir. Bob Dylan, Circuit Films, US, 1978. I Played It for You, dir. Ronee Blakley, US, 1985.]

Blind Blake [c.1890 - c.1935] Probably born Arthur Blake in Jacksonville, Florida, around 1890, he became an immensely popular recording artist in the 1920s, less for his voice than his phenomenally good guitar playing, while remaining a deeply undocumented figure. He was almost as big a name as BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON, and almost as influential on other performers, especially the guitarists of Georgia and the Carolinas. His playing was the main influence on the creator of 'Step It Up & Go', BLIND BOY FULLER.

Blind Blake is the man in the main picture on the cover of Paul Oliver's book The Story of the Blues (with a smaller shot of BLIND WILLIE McTELL, whom Blake influenced, stuck on the corner). He had a light, swinging guitar technique and a touchingly rueful way of singing, though this was balanced by a rough-edged quality (Ma Rainey liked him as an accompanist for this reason). His style suited dances and rags, and he was a prominent early transmitter of 19th century rags into the 20th century blues repertoire. Tony Russell describes him as having an 'unequalled command of rag and blues guitar-playing, displayed both in songs and, unusually for the time, in effervescent and technically demanding instrumentals'. Among much else he played guitar for GUS CANNON on 'Poor Boy', recorded 'Hastings Street' (which is in Detroit) with Charlie Spand and recorded with the writers of Bessie Smith's 'Gimme a Pigfoot', Leola B. Wilson and Welsey 'Kid Sox' Wilson. Josh White acted as Blind Blake's 'eyes' at one time. He had moved to Chicago at some point in the 1920s, signed to Paramount Records and cut dozens of sides for them in his own right, starting with 'Early Morning Blues' and 'West Coast Blues' in the summer of 1926.

His best-known and most popular sides included 'That Will Never Happen No More', 'You Gonna Quit Me Blues', 'He's in the Jailhouse Now' and 'Police Dog Blues' (which includes the 'Dylanesque' lines 'Got a police dog craving for a fight / His name is Rambler, and when he gets a chance / He leaves his mark on ev'ybody's pants'). His 'Georgia Bound', recorded the same day, offers an unusual expression of regret at having migrated to the cold northern city: 'I got the Georgia Blues / For the plow and hoe.' The graceful, rueing heart of the old country blues has never been better voiced than in the brilliant ellipse of the opening line of his 'One Time Blues' from 1927: 'Ah the rising sun going down'. His 'Southern Rag' was so well-known and of such lasting appeal that even musical ingenue ALLEN GINSBERG knew of Blind Blake as well as William: Ginsberg's 'Tear Gas Rag', about an anti-Vietnam War demo in Colorado in 1972, is based on what he calls Blake's 'Old Southern Rag'.

Bob Dylan recorded the eight-bar blues 'You Gonna Quit Me' on his first solo acoustic album of the 1990s, Good as I Been to You, and the song's oft-repeated line supplies Dylan with his album title. (The line 'The day you quit me baby: that's the day you die' is used almost verbatim by Blind Blake as the ending to his earlier 'Early Morning Blues', and the same line recurs at the end of Barbecue Bob's 'Easy Rider Don't Deny My Name' from 1927.) Dylan introduced 'You Gonna Quit Me' to his concert repertoire with 28 performances on the summer 1993 leg of the Never-Ending Tour; its début was as the first song performed that August 22 at Vancouver, and it stayed in that slot, with one exception, in every concert through to the last of the leg, on October 9 in Mountain View, California. The song was then dropped until 1999, when it was re-performed a further three times.

Blind Blake is believed to have died back in Florida around 1935.

[Blind Blake: 'You Gonna Quit Me Blues', Chicago, c.Oct 1927; 'Police Dog Blues' & 'Georgia Bound', Richmond, IN, 17 Aug 1929, vinyl-issued respectively on The Georgia Blues, Yazoo L-1012, NY, 1968 and Blind Blake: Blues in Chicago, Riverside RLP8804, Holland, 1960s; 'Early Morning Blues' (2 takes, NY, c.Sep 1926; one issued No Dough Blues: Blind Blake, Vol. 3, Biograph BLP-12031, Canaan, NY, 1971, the other on Rope Stretchin' Blues: Blind Blake, Vol. 4, 1926–31, Biograph BLP-12037, Canaan, NY, 1972); 'Southern Rag', Chicago, c.Oct 1927, Blind Blake: Foremost Fingerpicker, Yazoo L-1068, US, 1984, now CD-reissued.

Barbecue Bob: 'Easy Rider Don't Deny My Name', NY, 16 Jun 1927; The Atlanta Blues, RBF RF-15, NY, 1966. Tony Russell, The Blues from Robert Johnson to Robert Cray, London: Carlton, 1997, p.33. Allen Ginsberg: 'Tear Gas Rag', in First Blues / Rags, Ballads & Harmonium Songs 1971–1974, New York: Full Court Press, 1975.]

'Blind Willie McTell' [song, 1983] The English ballad 'The Unfortunate Rake'; its many variants, including the cowboy ballad 'The Streets of Laredo'; the black standard 'St. James Infirmary'; and BLIND WILLIE McTELL's 'The Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues': all these related songs end up wondrously transmuted into Dylan's 1980s masterpiece 'Blind Willie McTell'.

What all these songs do is allow some articulation of a fundamental human problem: how to face death. The use of two narrators allows an interplay, or balancing, between different strategies. In the early versions, the dying hero or heroine is often preoccupied with a sense of shame or unworthiness, while the person who comes upon them, and tells us their story, is confronting imminent loss, the impermanence of comradeship, the responsibility of bearing witness to death. Later versions mediate between these feelings of tenderness, sorrow and grief for another, and the dying person's own need to banish the fear of death by making light of it.

This duality is especially heightened in McTell's 'Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues', which begins (in the 1956 version) with a long and attentive spoken account of caring for the dying friend, of the daily care over a period of weeks, the ambulance ride, the father on hand, the sorting out of practicalities—followed by the reductive mythologising of those practicalities by the careless victim ('Let a deck of cards be my tombstone. . . . Life been a doggone curse'), and culminates in the first narrator's submission to the second's show of indifference: 'Throw my buddy Jesse in the hoodoo wagon / Come here mama with that can of booze . . . / With the Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues.'

This is a very similar ending to the conventional one for 'St. James' Infirmary': 'Well now you've heard my story / Have another shot of booze / And if anyone should happen to ask you / I got the St. James Infirmary Blues.' What makes 'St. James' Infirmary' different is that it almost has three narrators. That is, the first narrator meets not a dying second narrator but a healthy one, who is in turn contemplating the death of a third character (his lover). Because death has already arrived in this construction, though only just, the lover doesn't get to speak, but the effect is to make the second narrator meditate upon his own mortality much like the dying second narrators of all the other songs.

The question of how many elements of the 'Rake' cycle Dylan imports into (it's tempting to say 'retains in') 'Blind Willie McTell' is only one of its aspects, but it's a starting point: it stresses their shared central purpose. Dylan's rich and complex song, with a melody that winds across the path of the 'St. James' Infirmary' tune, is also about the problem of how to face death, extended onto the grandest of scales. While implicitly it mourns the death of McTell, it struggles with the problem of how to face, to witness, to confront, the world's death rather than an individual one.

Like the 'Rake' songs, there are two narrators, and for the same reason, to summon more than one strategy in the face of death. In the Dylan song we find a first narrator who witnesses and a second who, says the first, could witness better. The opening verse parallels the beginning of the 'Rake' songs at once. Where they see a doomed comrade wrapped in white linen and cold as the clay, Dylan sees the same thing on the grand scale: he has '. . . seen the arrow on the doorpost / Sayin' this land is condemned / All the way from New Orleans to Jerusalem.' In the next lines, he pluralises coming upon 'one of my comrades', remembering that 'many martyrs fell', and expressing a sympathy with other unwilling recruits whose presence is felt in this pageant of suffering and struggle: the tribes conscripted from Africa as slaves, the chain-gangs forced to build the highways, the rebels forced to fight. And between 'All the way from New Orleans to Jerusalem' and 'I travelled through East Texas' he sets up echoes of 'The Streets of Laredo', in which the narrator 'born in South East Texas' says 'I've trailed from Canadee down to old Mexico'. Instead of a crowd round the bedside and people 'to sing a song', here 'I heard that hoot-owl singin' / As they were takin' down the tents / The stars above the barren trees was his only audience.' In parallel with 'the women from Atlanta', 'them flash-girls', or 'pretty maidens', here 'Them charcoal gypsy maidens / Can strut their feathers well.' The flowers are here too. The 'Rake' songs have 'green laurel', 'white roses', 'red roses', 'wild roses', 'green roses' and 'those sweet-smellin' roses'; they also have, in 'The Streets of Laredo', a southern setting in which 'the jimson weed and the lilac does bloom'. In 'Blind Willie McTell' we see a southern setting in which we 'smell that sweet magnolia bloom'. Dylan's 'With some fine young handsome man' matches the 'St. James Hospital' variant's 'with them handsome young ladies' and 'The Unfortunate Rake's' 'some handsome young woman', while Dylan unites the 'Hamilton Hotel' of McTell's narrative with the conventional 'St. James' Infirmary' in his own, perfectly placed 'St. James Hotel'. Dylan also uses 'the window', from the James Baker/DOC WATSON variant. This begins with the window: 'It was early one morning I passed St. James' Hospital / . . . I looked in the window . . .' and Dylan ends with it: 'I am gazin' out the window', which reverses the old Texan version and places Dylan as the dying inmate, quietly appropriate to the theme that we are all facing imminent death.

Dylan can also use the same language as the 'Rake' cycle but undermine its meaning. That 'fine young handsome man' is 'dressed up like a squire, bootleg whiskey in his hand', which throws a shadow across his fine and handsome aspect: 'dressed up like' suggests both the counterfeit, weighted down by that 'bootleg whiskey', and the vain, fluffed up by the resonance of the earlier, matching 'strut'. Even the 'sweet magnolia' sounds quite unlike the 'sweet-smellin' roses' of the earlier songs. Dylan adds nothing more beyond the phrase itself, yet we smell it as overripe and sickly. Where once the flowers were there to cover the smell of corruption, in Dylan's song they give off the smell of corruption themselves.

Falsity, vanity and corruption compound cruelty and pain. Everywhere people are fallen, in chains, under the whip in this maelstrom of history. Though it's been said that 'Blind Willie McTell' rolls backwards through America's past, in truth it offers no such consistent reverse chronology, and its vision is not limited to American terrain, though it returns to it time and again, not least by the device of McTell's omnipresence.

This may disappoint the need for neatness but it is a strength of the song that most of its images evoke more than one era: more than one time and place, while pressing upon us, time and again, a running analogy between Old Testament and New World.

It begins at the beginning. The 'arrow on the doorpost / Sayin' this land is condemned' flickers with a picture of the marking out of Jewish houses in the pogroms of the 1930s, and with the daubing of the doors of plague-victims in medieval Europe, but it harks back, as both these later scenes must, to the first occasion to yield such an image: the time of the Passover, when the first-born in Egypt were slain in the night by God, after the people of Moses were instructed to mark a sign on their doorposts in lamb's blood so that death might pass over and spare their children: '. . . take of the blood, and strike it on the two side posts and on the upper door post of the houses', as God instructs Moses in Exodus 12:7.

What's so striking in Bob Dylan's lyric, what gives us the sense that poetry is at work, is that Dylan can use this as the opening of a song that holds out no hope that anyone shall be spared the destruction coming in our night. There may be a sign on the doorpost but whose first-born—whose future—is to be spared this time, now that the land has been '. . . condemned / All the way from New Orleans to Jerusalem'?

We reach America explicitly enough, of course, when we get to 'East Texas, where many martyrs fell'. Across the border from New Orleans, Louisiana, it sticks in the memory as a stronghold of the Ku Klux Klan: a place where black victims were untold martyrs, and where the same racist attitudes linger still. Yet 'martyrs' has other, primarily religious, connotations. The word is thrown in like a spanner, to wobble us off our course of easy assumption about the focus of the song. The word 'fell' has a distracting quality here too, somehow calling attention to itself by its declamatory vagueness.

'Takin' down the tents' gives us another glimmer of the Israelites, now on their way out of Egypt, but suggests too the medicine shows, the carnival tents that lingered into the 20th century from an older America. McTell and Dylan both claim a bit of tent-cred in their early days—and for someone whose experience of it was mostly in the mind, Dylan wrote of it in thrillingly energetic detail in 'Dusty Old Fairgrounds', where we feel the setting down and pulling up of the tents as a routine, an activity, a part of life, all through the song. He claims a similar intimacy with this life when he discusses his own (now-lost) poem 'Won't You Buy a Postcard?' on CYNTHIA GOODING's radio show in New York in 1962. THE HAWKS had medicine show experience; ELVIS' manager, Colonel Parker, was an old carnie trooper. Even as recent a figure as the contemporary blues singer Robert Cray recalls that in the early days he and his musicians hit the road in an old truck and camped overnight in tents as they travelled (roaming the country like 'charcoal gypsy maidens'). But 'them charcoal gypsy maidens' also conjures up nubile black girls in 1920s cabaret routines, shimmying through the floor-shows of smokey night-clubs in black and white movies: the sort in which the blues singers never get a look in, because 'sophisticated' jazz combos deliver slicker, jollier routines more compatible with Hollywood sensibilities.

There is almost nothing ambiguous about time or place in the next section of the song, in which time is running backwards from Gone with the Wind to Roots: yet the word 'tribes' arrives strikingly here: it has a rigour that cuts across the assemblage of shorthand images of the Antebellum South: it dislocates the expected chain of words as 'martyrs' does earlier.

Aptly, 'them tribes' come pouring in across the very centre of the song: aptly because the analogy clutched in this double image, the analogy between the twelve tribes of Israel and the African tribes brought over on the slavery ships, is the central analogy Dylan draws all through the song. It is, moreover, the classic analogy drawn by the oppressed American blacks themselves, all the way through till at least Blind Willie McTell's generation, as they compensated themselves for the miseries of this life by looking forward to justice in the next, and reading the Bible's accounts of the struggles of the Israelites in order to voice their own aspirations. We shall overcome some day. That's why I'm sending up my timber. And I know no-one can sing them hymns like Blind Willie McTell.

The 'woman by the river' might equally be biblical or Mississippian. She's timeless. The 'squire' suggests the 17th or 18th century, but 'dressed up like a squire' adds in all those 19th century Southern landowners striding their estates in high boots and frilly shirts while the blacks, almost invisible, worked the land. The 'bootleg whiskey in his hand' can equally smell of the stills in the hills (where they ain't paid no whiskey tax since 1792) or of Prohibition Chicago, another milieu the old blues singers lived and worked in. The 'chain-gang on the highway' must keep us in that recent past but the 'rebels', whoever else they may be, insist on yelling to us from the American Civil War.

This multi-layering of the pageant takes its cue from the opening verse: crucially to our whole understanding of the song, 'All the way from New Orleans to Jerusalem' must be capable of pitching us both backwards and forwards—back from the New Orleans of now or of McTell's generation, the New Orleans where you might say black American music found its feet, to the Jerusalem of Bible days; and forward to the new Jerusalem dreamed of but now doomed not to be: dreamed of but 'condemned'.

One of Dylan's inspired touches here, in that nigh-perfect penultimate stanza, is to underscore his tolling of doomsday by alluding to, and then contorting, those well-known lines of optimism and hope, 'God's in His heaven—All's right with the world.' (For detail see Browning, Robert.)

While Dylan sounds the undertaker's bell, the song itself never shrivels: it moves but it certainly doesn't depress. It examines the problem of how to face death but it tingles with life. The black girls, in that lovely, eccentric construction, strut their feathers. The song presses a sense of our senses upon us. Blind Willie McTell, his other senses heightened, is never far away. Yet true to McTell's uncanny visualising spirit, seeing is insisted upon. In one verse alone we see, hear, smell and see again. The first word of the song is 'seen'; the end of the song finds him 'gazing'. All through, spooky as the plangent, coiling music, Dylan's sixth sense emits its vibrant, probing beam.

Out of death, life arises. Out of bodily pain, the triumph of the spirit (pain sure brings out the best in people, doesn't it?). Out of singing the blues, compensation: even joy. Dylan celebrates, in this song—as Blind Willie McTell does in 'The Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues'. The work of art, as ever with Bob Dylan, is the recording, not the words on the page: but the words on the page demand from Dylan, and receive, two of his most focussed performances: paying tribute to McTell's artistry, he rises to the occasion with the excellence of his own.

This is the spookiest important record since 'Heartbreak Hotel', and is built upon the perfect interweaving of guitar, piano, voice and silence—an interweaving that has space for the lovely clarity of single notes: a guitar string stroking the air here, a piano note pushing back the distance there. And if anything, the still-unreleased performance is even better, for its more original melody (less dependent upon the conventional 'St. James' Infirmary' structure) and its incandescent vocal, which soars to possess the heights of reverie and inspiration. No-one can sing the blues like Blind Willie McTell, but no-one can write or sing a blues like 'Blind Willie McTell' like Bob Dylan.

Spookily, too, perhaps, Dylan's recording of 'Blind Willie McTell' manages to commemorate not only the death of McTell but his birthday also. McTell was almost certainly born in 1903, and the only specific birthdate ever mooted has been May 5. Either by eerie coincidence, or because Dylan is a walking blues encyclopedia, when he came to record 'Blind Willie McTell' in 1983, he did so on May 5.

Aptly, in view of their subject matter, there is even a further correspondence between McTell's masterpiece 'The Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues' and Dylan's masterpiece 'Blind Willie McTell'—these two great songs about appropriate leave-taking—in the tiny detailing of how they take their leave of us. A doubled rhyme is one way to signal the end of a song, as CHRISTOPHER RICKS points out à propos of 'Señor (Tales of Yankee Power)', which ends with 'Can you tell me what we're waiting for, Señ*or*?' Ricks calls this 'making a conclusive ending, that your conclusions can be more drastic,' adding that this is 'exactly what Andrew Marvell did in the greatest political poem in the English language: that is, the "Horatian Ode". . .'

Nowhere this side of Marvell will you find more effective use of such extra emphasis of rhyme as a signing-off device at song's end than when McTell ends 'The Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues'. He sings the final phrase as 'It's the dyin' crap-shoo-doo's blues': putting equal and emphatic weight on each of these last sounds. As you might expect, Dylan finds a neatly equivalent little thing for the end of 'Blind Willie McTell'. In fact Ricks makes a generalisation in 1980 about Dylan's work which is prophetically accurate about this 1983 song: '. . . he's obsessed with two things. One is human situations which you can't imagine ever really coming to an end, and the other is the simple technical question of how if you're singing a song you do something intuitive and imaginative to let people know that it really is the end.' In this case, paralleling 'The Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues', Dylan finds a solution to this 'simple technical question' that is an intuitive touch of tribute to McTell. Instead of a rhyme like those that conclude his other verses—'bell/McTell', and so on—his last verse simply doubles that subliminal 'tell', pairing 'I am gazing out the window of the St. James Ho*tel*' with 'And I know no-one can sing the blues like Blind Willie Mc*Tell*.'

The very phrase 'sing the blues' re-expresses in colloquial terms the ancient Hebrew custom of making lamentations, or mourning songs, 'upon the death of great men . . . and upon any occasion of public miseries and calamities,' in Adam Clarke's phrase. In the Old Testament book Lamentations (short for the Lamentations of Jeremiah), Jeremiah composes a lamentation on the death of Josiah the King, but also a lamentation upon the desolations of Jerusalem, which are visited on the Jews by God for their worship of false idols. In 'Blind Willie McTell' Dylan achieves a lamentation that serves to commemorate both public calamity and individual demise: to deal with the envisaged desolations to come, 'all the way from New Orleans to Jerusalem', and the death of Blind Willie McTell.

In concert, Dylan waited until 1997 before singing 'Blind Willie McTell' at all (its début was in Montreal that August 5th and he has performed it a further 94 times since), and even then, he chose to duplicate the inferior, re-shaped version recorded by THE BAND. This decision, combined with a tendency to easy posturing in his delivery, has meant that in concert it has never received its due: never been quite the fitting tribute it should be, to either McTell or to his own masterly song.

[Bob Dylan: 'Blind Willie McTell', NY, 5 May 1983; 1 take issued the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, 1991; 2nd take unreleased but circulated. Dylan to Cynthia Gooding, 'Folksinger's Choice', WBAI Radio, NY, prob. 13 Jan 1962 & prob. broadcast 11 Mar 1962.

For the English ballad cluster, try The Unfortunate Rake: A Study in the Evolution of a Ballad, various versions by various artists, compiled & edited by Kenneth Goldstein, Folkways FS3805, NY, 1960. Doc Watson: 'St. James' Hospital', nia, reissued The Essential Doc Watson Vol. 1, Vanguard 5308, NY, 1973, CD-reissued Vanguard VMCD 7308, NY, 1987.

Blind Willie McTell: 'Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues, Atlanta, Sep 1956; Blind Willie McTell: Last Session, Prestige Bluesville 1040, Bergenfield, NJ, 1961, reissued Prestige PR 7809, Bergenfield, 1966 (& in the UK first then, as Blind Willie McTell: Last Session, Transatlantic PR1040, London, 1966); CD-reissued Prestige Bluesville Original Blues Classics OBCCD-517-2 (BV-1040), Berkeley, CA, 1992.

Christopher Ricks: radio broadcast in Australia, nia, 1980. Andrew Marvell: 'An Horatian Ode Upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland', 1650. Adam Clarke, Clarke's Commentary on the Bible, Old Testament Vol. 4, London: Thomas Tegg, 1844 edn.]

Blonde on Blonde* [1966] The seventh album and Dylan's first double-album. To have followed up one masterpiece with another was Dylan's history-making achievement here. It aims, perhaps, at a more limited canvas than Highway 61 Revisited but evokes a much richer, more multi-layered, synapse-jumping consciousness. Where Highway 61 Revisited has Dylan exposing and confronting like a laser-beam in surgery, descending from outside the sickness, Blonde on Blonde offers a persona awash inside the chaos and speaking to others who are acceptedly in the same boat and on the same ocean. We're tossed from song to song, and they all move into each other. The feel and the music are on a grand scale, truly oceanic, and the language and delivery is a unique mixture of the visionary and the colloquial, the warm and the alert. Dylan dances like his own 'Mr. Tambourine Man' through these songs, even though tossed and blown by disorientating, desperate forces. It seems against the spirit of the double-album's cumulative effect to single out particular songs, but they include 'Visions of Johanna', 'Pledging My Time', 'Memphis Blues Again' and 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands'.

[Recorded NY, 25 Jan; Nashville, TN, 14–17 Feb & 8–10 Mar 1966; released as 2-LP set, Columbia C2S 841 (stereo) & C2L 41 (mono), Jun 1966. (An official US release date of 16 May has been noted but was theoretical at best. Late Jun/early Jul was the earliest it was really available.) In the UK CBS SDDP 66012 & CS 9316-9317 (stereo), & CBS DDP 66012/CL 2516-2517 (mono), Aug 1966.]

Blood on the Tracks* [1975] In stunning, total contrast to the previous album, Before the Flood, this 16th Dylan album triumphantly shows more subtlety and nuance than anything he'd ever done, and as honed a use of understatement as on John Wesley Harding. At the time this was the most unexpected leap of Dylan's career. After years of comparatively second-rate work and a considerable decline in his reputation, here was an album to stand with Highway 61 Revisited and Blonde on Blonde. As EYOLF ØSTREM puts it: 'A unique combination of a new interest in open tunings (inspired by JONI MITCHELL), a new perspective on writing and time (inspired by the mysterious art-teacher NORMAN RAEBEN), and a broken heart (inspired by SARA [DYLAN]), brought about a burst of creative energy comparable only to the making of his mid-sixties trilogy.'

It was an album of genius—of powerful emotional complexity, unerring fresh insight and the kind of maturity that manifests itself not remotely as grown-up tiredness but as pure, strong intelligence. Yet the point is that while it compared with the mid-60s 'trilogy' in quality, it was not a creature of the 1960s at all. With Blood on the Tracks Dylan's progress suddenly showed through in a tremendous, unexpected leap forwards and upwards. One of his very best, it gave us, on a whole new plateau, a successfully attained, fresh language that achieved the new simplicity he'd been striving for ever since John Wesley Harding—and in which, as ever in the best of Dylan's work, simplicity was deceptive, communicating more by being able confidently to say less.

Blood on the Tracks gave us, also, Dylan's scorching urgency at its very best, and utterly free from the chains of the 1960s. This was the best album of the 1970s.

For this reason alone, its historical importance is immense. When it was first released, in 1975, its effect was colossal. An adjustment was needed, critically, to the fact that Dylan had so dramatically broken free of the decade with which he was deeply associated by virtue of having so profoundly affected it. Some adjustment was necessary to Dylan's generation's consciousness, from the fact that with Blood on the Tracks it was Bob Dylan who had produced the most strikingly intelligent, apposite and entirely contemporary album of the 1970s.

Most people had assumed that, in effect, Dylan's decline at the end of the decade he had made his own, the 1960s, had frozen seminal work—Highway 61 Revisited, Blonde on Blonde, the basement tapes, John Wesley Harding—into an historical religious object that one had to choose, by the mid-70s, either to put away in the attic or else to revere perhaps at the expense of more contemporary artists. Instead, Blood on the Tracks legitimised Dylan's claim to a creative prowess—a power capable of being directed at us effectively for perhaps another 30 or 40 years.

The common conception of how rock music moves forward needed to be adjusted too. That conception had always been that artists come and go in relatively short time-spans, with careers peaking early. Blood on the Tracks challenged that idea. Here was a masterpiece fully ten years after Dylan's first major 'peak', Highway 61 Revisited—and one as different and as fresh as it possibly could have been. It addressed the post-1960s world, and our darkness within, with a whole arsenal of weapons.

Its creative genius is still very much an undiminished thing of the present. It has as much sheer freshness as Dylan's, or anyone else's, first album; as much genuine urge to communicate; as much zest. Yet it combines them all with a sharp wit and corrosive intelligence, and an impeccable judgement, so that the sum of these parts is a greater whole than any of Dylan's other achievements.

Like Planet Waves, Blood on the Tracks deals, among much else, with the overlaying of the past upon the present—but gone, utterly, is any element of Dylan's myopic early-70s insistence on eternal love and its wholesome cocoon. In its place is a profoundly felt understanding of our fragile impermanence of control, so that in dealing with the overlay of past upon present, Dylan is dealing also (unlike Planet Waves) with the inexorable disintegration of relationships, and with the dignity of keeping on trying to reintegrate them against all odds.

'Tangled Up in Blue', tackling all this head on, opens the album at a high level of intensity and brilliance. (See separate entry.) 'Simple Twist of Fate' carves out its own indelible impression on the mind, and 'You're a Big Girl Now' presses on still further with the unsparing examination of whether a decaying relationship can withstand the strains of time and other lovers; and then with 'Idiot Wind' we return to these themes again but with a yet greater intensity.

Seen first as a sort of 'Positively 4th Street Revisited', the version Dylan chose to release is not the album's most successful song. The too-personal bone-scraping jars: 'Someone's got it in for me / They're planting stories in the press . . . / I haven't known peace and quiet / For so long I can't remember what it's like . . . / You'll find out when you reach the top / You're on the bottom . . .' It also produces, in Dylan, a need to step back from that extra-personal quality somehow: and he does so in the wrong way, by stylizing his delivery of the anger, so that his voice at those points comes across with a faked-sounding passion. (The original version, which Dylan got cold feet about releasing, needed no exaggerated delivery; its angry eloquence is genuinely personal, and all the more thrilling for being so scrupulously sotto voce.) Yet this is a small element in the song. It deepens into one of infinitely greater emotional range than a 'Positively 4th Street'. The idiot wind that blows is the whole conglomeration of things that assail our integrity and of love that renders us hapless and out of control. The song locks us in a fight to the death, in a contemporary graveyard landscape of skulls and dust and changing seasons. Destruction and survival again.

The preoccupation with this just-possible survival one must fight for is urged most eloquently in this tremendous, evocative stanza: 'There's a lone soldier on the cross / Smoke pourin' out of a box-car door / You didn't know it, you didn't think it could be done: / In the final end he won the war / After losing every battle . . .'

That is matched, later in the song, by the extraordinary tugging wildness of this—a triumph of poetic strength: 'The priest wore black on the seventh day / And sat stone-faced while the building burned / I waited for you on the runnin' boards / 'Neath the cypress tree while the springtime turned / Slowly into autumn: / Idiot wind / Blowin' like a circle around my skull / From the Grand Coulee Dam to the Capitol . . .' (And what a rhyme!)

Then, in total contrast, we have the lightly sketched humane straightforwardness of 'You're Gonna Make Me Lonesome When You Go', another fully fledged success for Dylan's new simplicity of language and a conscious reversing of all those Dylan songs where the singer leaves his lover for the road. This time, she leaves him for the road—though there is a fine 'live' version of the song by Shawn Colvin which strongly evokes a sense that the person going is departing this life altogether. ('I'll see you in the sky above / In the tall grass and the ones I love'.) The strength of the song lies in its tone of lively philosophic acceptance: there is no self-absorption, much less self-pity. His love for her comes through from the way in which he accepts that she must go and so tells her his feelings unreprovingly: 'I've seen love go by my door / Never bin this close before . . .'

Much of the song is thus delivered, so lightly as to suggest that it's in brackets, with the same sparkling, generous humour. Astonishing that a man who, by the time he made this album, had been monstrously famous for over a decade and had been acclaimed as a genius before he was 25, could have the down-to-earth self-knowledge to throw out, in this song, so ordinarily humorous and puckish a phrase as the one that ends this stanza: 'You're gonna make me wonder what I'm doin' / Stayin' far behind without you / You're gonna make me wonder what I'm sayin'— / You're gonna make me give myself a good talkin' to . . .'

Again, as ever on this unsurpassed album, the simplicity of language represents the opposite of a dullness of emotion. Throughout, from the deft movie-script of 'Lily, Rosemary and the Jack of Hearts' to the scrupulously checked-in intensity of 'If You See Her, Say Hello' (a marvellous re-write of 'Girl of the North Country', with the earlier song's line 'See for me if . . .' echoed in the later's 'Say for me that . . .') and from the flawless blues of 'Meet Me in the Morning' to the barbed sanity of 'Buckets of Rain', Blood on the Tracks is the work of an artist who has never been of sharper intelligence nor more genuinely preoccupied with the inner struggles and complexities of human nature. Dylan's sensibility here is 100 per cent intact. He is also an artist who has lost, on Blood on the Tracks, not one iota of his devotion to, nor expertise with, a wide range of American music.

[Recorded NY, 16–17, 19 Sep, and Minneapolis, MN, 27 & 30 Dec 1974; released as Columbia PC 33235 (CBS 69097 in UK), 17 Jan 1975. Eyolf Østrem: 'Tangled Up in "Tangled Up in Blue"', online 7 Jun 2005 at www.dylanchords.com/index.htm. Shawn Colvin: 'You're Gonna Make Me Lonesome When You Go', NY, 5–6 Aug 1993, Cover Girl, Columbia 477240 2, NY, 1994.]

Bloomfield, Mike [1944 - 1981] Michael Bloomfield was born in Chicago on July 28, 1944, hung around the city's blues clubs from a very young age and by the time he hit adulthood was already one of the great white blues guitarists and one of the earliest blues-rock virtuosos: an influence on all the rest and a pioneer of the extended solo. He learnt from, and sat in with, many blues greats, including BIG JOE WILLIAMS, who once tried to stab him. His short memoir, Me and Big Joe, 1980, describes not only Williams himself but also going with him to visit Tampa Red, SONNY BOY WILLIAMSON, Tommy McClennan, Kokomo Arnold and others.

Bloomfield joined the PAUL BUTTERFIELD Blues Band in late 1964 (in time to play much-admired solos on their 1965 début album) and increasingly influenced the adventurousness of the group's subsequent work, flying off in exploratory ways while relying on the Chicago blues-band anchor of Butterfield and his rhythm section. He brought an Indian influence into the group's second album, East-West, after exploring Indian music on a series of acid trips.

His intermittent relationship with Bob Dylan began, as for so many musicians Dylan has locked onto down the years, with a phone call out of the blue. Would he like to fly to New York and play on this song? There was one style guideline laid down by Dylan: 'None of that B.B. King shit': and however you feel about B.B. King, you know what Dylan meant. He wanted the pioneering rock-blues side of Bloomfield, and he got it. Bloomfield took the flight, his guitar on the seat next to him; he didn't own a guitar-case. The sessions began on June 15, 1965. They started with 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', didn't get the take they wanted, moved on to the more obscure 'Sitting on a Barbed Wire Fence' (the third take of which was issued in 1991 on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3), and then, without success, tried 'Like a Rolling Stone'.

Next day they went back to it, and the session's fifth take was it. A few weeks later, with AL KOOPER, BARRY GOLDBERG, JEROME ARNOLD and SAM LAY, Mike Bloomfield was up there with Dylan facing the partially hostile crowd at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL, and back in the studio four days after that, cutting more of Highway 61 Revisited. On July 29, they pinned down 'Tombstone Blues', 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry' and the 'Positively 4th Street' single. July 30 secured 'From a Buick 6' and the version of 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?' that, also labeled 'Positively 4th Street', was issued by mistake. On August 2, the highly productive penultimate day, they cut the album's title track, 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues', 'Queen Jane Approximately' and 'Ballad of a Thin Man'.

Bloomfield bowed out and went back to his other life. He left the Paul Butterfield Blues Band early in 1967 and on the West Coast formed the Electric Flag, with his old friends Nick Gravenites and Barry Goldberg, plus Buddy Miles on drums and a brass section. Their first recordings were for the soundtrack of the cult film The Trip, followed by a first album, A Long Time Comin', in spring 1968. Mike Bloomfield left the group that summer, before Buddy Miles prompted them to make a second album (The Electic Flag). The group disbanded in 1969.

Bloomfield had moved on to join Stephen Stills and Al Kooper for an album on which they're billed as, er, Stills-Kooper-Bloomfield. Supersession includes a very odd treatment of 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', typifying in its strain after effect that period immediately after the heyday of Angst Bards, when, as this album's title implies, rock groups suddenly produced superstars: a new term, then, signifying a new breed of people so stratospheric that they could hardly play their instruments at all any more. Quitting their original successful groups, they tried to join forces, generally for one-off gigs in front of massive rock-festival audiences; but excesses of money, alcohol, drugs and ego made it impossible for these titans even to speak to each other, much less work productively. Kooper and Bloomfield were not in the same league, superstar-wise, as Stephen Stills, and perhaps their lesser status is what keeps their collaboration from falling apart altogether.

Bloomfield managed a series of solo albums, uninhibited by the fact that he didn't know what he wanted to say and was lost outside the framing of a band. In 1973 another not-very-supergroup was attempted, joining Bloomfield with Dr. John and JOHN HAMMOND JR., calling itself Triumvirate and redirecting Bloomfield back towards the blues. It was no success at all. In 1974 Bloomfield contributed to an Electric Flag reunion album produced by JERRY WEXLER, The Band Kept Playing. It didn't.

He also wrote for 'underground' movies other than The Trip, and made appearances in several too. He wrote all the original music for that important 1960s independent film Medium Cool, directed and written by Haskell Wexler in 1969. He appears as himself in Bongo Wolf's Revenge, 1970, directed by WARHOL hanger-on Tom Baker, and wrote its original music, and gets credits as musician and lyricist on 1973's archetypal 1970s movie Steelyard Blues, directed by Alan Myerson and starring Donald Sutherland, Peter Boyle and Jane Fonda. In 1977 he wrote the music for Andy Warhol's Bad, directed by Jed Johnson.

A decent sampler of Bloomfield's real work in the 1960s is the compilation Don't Say That I Ain't Your Man: Essential Blues 1964–1969. His 1970s solo albums include Try It Before You Buy (1973) and Analine (1977). The same year's If You Love These Blues, Play 'Em as You Please attracted more attention but by this time Bloomfield was a long-term heroin user and hostile to the idea of touring (though in summer 1980 he toured Italy with classical guitarist Woody Harris and cellist Maggie Edmondson). By the late 1970s much of his modest income was earned from creating the music scores for porn movies, a gig that had been at its best in the much-praised semi-overground porn of Sodom and Gomorrah, made by the Mitchell Brothers in 1975.

Fifteen years after their historic 1965 collaboration, when Dylan was playing 12 nights at the Fox-Warfield in San Francisco in November 1980, mounting a series of golden concerts that marked his first semi-return to the secular world after the adamantly all-gospel tours of 1979 and spring 1980, he went round one day to Mike Bloomfield's house, not knowing in what condition he'd find the guitarist, and had to climb in through a window to get to see him. They talked, Dylan urging Bloomfield to come to one of the concerts and play with him again. A couple of nights later (on November 15), friends took Bloomfield along, though he was so sceptical of Dylan's really wanting him to play that he wore his slippers. But Dylan called him on stage, giving him time to adjust to the rather scary situation and much reassurance, by offering the audience a long, affectionate and generous speech on who Mike Bloomfield was. Then they did 'Like a Rolling Stone', with Bloomfield delivering a biting, triumphant guitar-part, matched by a second contribution towards the end of the concert, on a glittering, epic ride through 'Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar'.

Three months later to the day, Mike Bloomfield took a drug overdose and was found dead in his car. He was 36.

[Mike Bloomfield, with S. Summerville: Me and Big Joe, San Francisco: Re/Search Productions, 1980. Mike Bloomfield: Analine, Takoma B-1059, US, 1977; If You Love These Blues, Play 'Em as You Please, Guitar Player KT 5006, 1977; 'Tomorrow Night', nia, unreleased till the CD version of his 1973 LP Try It Before You Buy, One Way A21265, NY, c.1990. Paul Butterfield Blues Band: Paul Butterfield Blues Band, Elektra 7294, NY, 1975; East-West, Elektra 7315, NY, 1976. Electric Flag: The Trip soundtrack; Long Time Comin'; The Band Kept Playing, Atlantic 18112, US, 1974.

Bob Dylan (with Bloomfield & others): 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?', NY, 30 Jul 1965, issued mistitled 'Positively 4th Street' & with its catalogue number (Columbia 4-43389), NY, 1965. B.B. King quote from Bloomfield, article in Hit Parader, US, Jun 1968; republished (but last word given as 'stuff') in Mike Bloomfield: 'Impressions of Bob

Dylan', On the Tracks no.10, Grand Junction, CO, 1997.]

Blow, Kurtis [1959 -] Kurtis Walker was born in Harlem, New York City, on August 9, 1959. From mid-1970s breakdancing he moved across to being a DJ (Kool DJ Kurt) and then the pioneer of rap. He was a club sensation in the late 1970s; his début album, Kurtis Blow, 1980, was the first rap album on a major label; and he proved the first commercially successful rapper and a giant figure in the history of hip-hop. His second single, 'The Breaks', was a huge hit and in the early 1980s he also produced and talent-spotted other artists, not least the Fat Boys. His own albums included Deuce (1981), Tough (1982), Ego Trip and Rapper in Town (both 1984). He appeared in the film Krush Groove, performing 'If I Ruled the World', his biggest hit single since 'The Breaks'. The album America was issued in 1985.

By 1986 he was so thoroughly passé that Bob Dylan had picked up on him, and on April 1, 1986 went in the studio and overdubbed vocals on one verse of 'Street Rock', which was duly released on the next Blow album, Kingdom Blow, later that year. In his memoir Chronicles Volume One, Dylan writes that Blow had asked him to be on one of his records, and that 'he familiarized me with that stuff, Ice-T, Public Enemy, N.W.A., Run-D.M.C. . . . They were all poets and knew what was going on. . . . The music that Danny [LANOIS] and I were making was archaic.'

But 'time will tell who has fell and who's been left behind', and Kurtis Blow sounds at least as archaic now. 'The Breaks' sounds like nothing so much as Ian Dury's 'Hit Me With Your Rhythm Stick'; in exactly the same corny comic way as Dury, Kurtis here intones 'If your woman steps out with another man / And she runs off with him to Japan . . . / And Ma Bell sends you a whopping bill / For 18 phone calls to Brazil'. In other words, this pioneering rap sounds just like vaudeville. Blow's fans sound quaintly old-fashioned too. One posted this comment to Amazon.com as a review of Kurtis Blow Presents the History of Rap (a venerable-sounding title in itself): 'I have been a fan of curtis blow far many years. This is a must for the old school.'

[Kurtis Blow (with Bob Dylan): 'Street Rock', NY, 1 Apr 1986, Kingdom Blow, Mercury 8360-215-1, US, Sep 1986. Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.219. Fan comment seen online 4 Sep 2005 at www.amazon.com/exec/obidos/tg/detail/-/B00000343F/002-9914338-5859204?v=glance. Various Artists: Kurtis Blow Presents the History of Rap, Rhino/WEA 72852, US, 1997; this includes Blow's 'The Breaks'.]

'Blowin' in the Wind' GIL TURNER was hosting the Monday-night hootenannies at Gerde's Folk City when Dylan, accompanied by DAVID BLUE, brought Gil a song he'd just written. David Blue tells the story like this:

> 'Bob was nervous and he was doing his Chaplin shuffle as he caught Gil's attention. "I got a song you should hear, man," Bob said, grinning from ear to ear. "Sure thing, Bob," Gil said. He moved closer to hear better. A crowd sort of circled the two of them. Bob sang it out with great passion. When he finished there was silence all around. Gil Turner was stunned. "I've got to do that song myself," he said. "Now!" "Sure, Gil, that's great. You want to do it tonight?" "Yes," said Turner, picking up his guitar, "teach it to me now."
>
> 'Bob showed him the chords and Gil roughly learned the words. He took the copy Bob made for him and went upstairs. We followed, excited by the magic that was beginning to spread. Gil mounted the stage and taped the words on to the mike stand. "Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "I'd like to sing a new song by one of our great songwriters. It's hot off the pencil and here it goes."
>
> 'He sang the song, sometimes straining to read the words off the paper. When he was through, the entire audience stood on its feet and cheered. Bob was leaning against the bar near the back smiling and laughing.'

Naturally, Dylan started performing 'Blowin' in the Wind' in Greenwich Village clubs himself by late that April and it was one of three songs he sang at the 'Broadside Reunion' show in May 1962, but it was July 9th before he recorded it—on one of the many session days for his second album, The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan (though the same month he also recorded it as a Witmark song demo)—and its release would come almost a year later than this.

In the interim, his manager ALBERT GROSSMAN gave an acetate of the song (plus 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time') to Milt Okun, who worked with PETER, PAUL & MARY, the Brothers Four and the Chad Mitchell Trio. Okun allocated 'Blowin' in the Wind' to the Mitchells, who started to perform it and recorded it for a new album. Thus the first record release of 'Blowin' in the Wind' was on The Chad Mitchell Trio in Action (Kapp Records 3313) in March 1963.

Warner Bros. released Peter, Paul & Mary's version June 18, 1963. Billboard heard 'this slick ditty' as 'a sailor's lament, sung softly and tenderly.' It sold 320,000 copies in eight days: the fastest-selling single in Warners' five-year history. Charting June 29, it peaked Aug 17 at no.2. William Ruhlmann notes, 1996, that it 'remains the most successful single recording of a Bob Dylan song on the Hot 100. Though never certified by the Record Industry Association of America, it is reported to have sold two million copies. It would win Peter, Paul & Mary Grammy Awards for Best Performance by a Vocal Group and Best Folk recording'.

Dylan's own version saw release on May 27, 1963: three days after his 22nd birthday, and the night after performing it triumphantly at the 1963 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL. About 80 versions were released within two years, as the song's hit potential and cultural impact was recognised. These included, apart from the predictable folkies' versions, recordings by Marlene Dietrich, Eddy Arnold, Bobby Darin, Stan Getz, Duke Ellington and Johnny Tillotson. By 2002 at least 375 recordings had been made of the song (far more than of any other Dylan composition), including by ELVIS PRESLEY, NEIL YOUNG, Sebastian Cabot, Ace Cannon, SAM COOKE, Mahalia Jackson, the Four Seasons, Trini Lopez, Cliff Richard (on the 1966 LP Kinda Latin) and Johnny Nash.

Dylan himself eschewed the song within eight months of its Newport performance and didn't reintroduce it to his repertoire until, after recording 15 studio takes of it in New York City in June 1970 (all still uncirculated), he performed it at the afternoon and evening Concerts for Bangladesh on August 1, 1971. (Ahead of these performances, it was said that GEORGE HARRISON had asked Dylan if he were going to sing it and that Dylan had replied: 'Why? Are you going to sing "She Loves You"?')

On the 1974 North American 'comeback tour', it was not performed until the 25th concert (Madison Square Garden, NYC); but since then Dylan has performed the song ad nauseam. The gospel versions of the Born Again period were often effective, and once or twice the song has befitted a particular occasion—e.g. the Martin Luther King Birthday concert at Washington, D.C., on January 20, 1986, when Dylan sang it with Peter, Paul & Mary; but overall it has degenerated into a meaningless Greatest Hit, sung with predictable inattentiveness and overblown or cheesy music. Nastiest so far have been the versions performed with horrrendous vocal back-ups by Never-Ending Tour musicians LARRY CAMPBELL and CHARLIE SEXTON in and beyond the last days of the 20th century. (On this tour alone, from its beginning in mid-1988 to the end of 2000, 'Blowin' in the Wind' was performed 407 times. The career-long total number of times Dylan had performed it by the end of 2003 was 935.)

The lyric is an early example of Dylan's quiet incorporation of Biblical rhetoric into his own. A particular rhetorical format deployed time and again in the New Testament and founded upon a text from the Old Testament book of Ezekiel (12:1–2) is: 'The word of the Lord also came unto me, saying, Son of man, thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house, which have eyes to see, and see not; they have ears to hear, and hear not . . .' In 'Blowin' in the Wind' this is redeployed as 'Yes' n' how many ears must one man have . . . ?' and 'Yes' n' how many times must a man turn his head / Pretending he just doesn't see?'

(In the New Testament the Ezekiel passage is cited by Christ in Matthew 13:43 ['. . . Who hath ears to hear, let him hear'] and repeatedly by Christ and others in Mark and Revelation: 'And he said unto them, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear' [Mark 4:9]; 'If any man have ears to hear, let him hear' [Mark 4:23]; 'If any man have ears to hear, let him hear' [Mark 7:16]; 'Having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? . . .' [Mark 8:18]; and 'He that hath an ear, let him hear . . .' [Revelation 2:7, 11 & 29; 3:6, 13 & 22]. Dylan returns to the same rhetoric in the lyric of 'When He Returns', on the Slow Train Coming album of 1979. See also 'Angelina' for more on Revelation's use of Ezekiel and echoes of these in Dylan's lyrics.)

Dylan's own early, perhaps disingenuous, comments about the song suggest that he saw it as an altogether simpler creation. This is what he says in June 1962, when the lyric is published in Sing Out! magazine:

> 'There ain't too much I can say about this song except that the answer is blowing in the wind. It ain't in no book or movie or TV show or discussion group. Man, it's in the wind—and it's blowing in the wind. Too many of these hip people are telling me where the answer is but oh I won't believe that. I still say it's in the wind and just like a restless piece of paper it's got to come down some time. . . . But the only trouble is that no one picks up the answer when it comes down so not too many people get to see and know it . . . and then it flies away again. . . . I still say that some of the biggest criminals are those that turn their heads away when they see wrong and know it's wrong. I'm only 21 years old and I know that there's been too many wars. . . . You people over 21, you're older and smarter.'

[Bob Dylan: 'Blowin' in the Wind', prob. Gerde's Folk City, prob. late Apr 1962; at the 'Broadside Reunion' show, May 1962, broadcast WBAI-FM, NY, Fall 1962; and Witmark demo, NY, Jul 1962. David Blue quoted from Robbie Woliver, Hoot! A 25-Year History of the Greenwich Village Music Scene, New York: 1986, pp. 83–84, seen online 12 Sep 2004 at www.fortunecity.com/tinpan/parton/2/blowin.html. (Blue dates this as Apr 16; Ian Woodward dates it as Apr 9.) Much other factual secular information here is taken from William Ruhlmann's research, published Goldmine, 12 Apr 1996, excerpted on the History pages of www.peterpaulmary.com, including the quote from Billboard, 22 Jun 1963. The list of covers also draws on www.bjorner.com/covers.htm, online 29 Jul 2005. Dylan's June 1962 comments, Sing Out!, New York, Oct–Nov 1962 issue; reprinted in liner notes to Broadside Ballads, Broadside BR 301, NY, Oct 1963.]

Blue, David [1941 - 1982] Stuart David Cohen was born in Pawtucket, Rhode Island, on February 18, 1941. He had a difficult relationship with his parents, joined the Navy, got kicked out, found Greenwich Village and took a job washing dishes at the Gaslight. He wanted to be an actor first, and then said he was a poet, but mostly he was a hanger-on in the Village, a singer-songwriter whose work no-one much appreciated except, it's said, PHIL OCHS, whom he used to cheat out of the dope he was selling him, by supplying it and then filching it back after collecting the money. LEONARD COHEN (no relation) liked him as a person, and JONI MITCHELL spent years trying to help him, not least with recurrent payments of money. Dylan gave him the nickname 'David Blue' and he took it.

Nervous, strenuously determined to be cool, he naturally gravitated towards Dylan over and above other people. Marc Eliot said David 'was a character. He would be offended if someone told him he looked like Dylan, yet he looked like that on purpose.' It's said that Dylan treated him badly, but Blue himself said Dylan had encouraged his songwriting, enthusing about it and urging him to work at it. They were very friendly—'tight', in the Village jargon—at one point, and he became another figure a bit like BOBBY NEUWIRTH, but earlier. He was with Dylan when he wrote 'Blowin' in the Wind' and took it round to play to GIL TURNER in April 1962.

After contributing three tracks under the name David Cohen to a compilation album on Elektra, The Singer/Songwriter Project in 1965, he made a handful of albums as David Blue—David Blue (1966, which was said to be very Bringing It All Back Home), These 23 Days in September (1968), Stories (1971), Nice Baby & the Angel (1973, produced by Graham Nash), Com'n Back for More (1975) and Cupid's Arrow (1976)—on which an extraordinary array of star names gave musical support, including Joni Mitchell. In 1969 he threw in another, Me, under the name S. David Cohen.

They all sold so badly that he's one of the only people in the world whose LPs have mostly not been CD-reissued. One of them, when in 1966–67 he was fronting the band American Patrol, wasn't even released on vinyl in the first place. On Com'n Back for More, his star contributors included Bob Dylan, who dropped into a Los Angeles studio in the summer of 1975 to play harmonica on one track, Blue's composition 'Who Love (If Not You Love)'. Even this didn't achieve real sales. He never got over getting nowhere while those around him prospered and became stars.

That same year, 1975, Blue kept dropping in on the Rolling Thunder Revue. SAM SHEPARD described him: 'Blue gangster suit, bleary eyed, hoarse throat, wrinkled scarf . . .' and he's to be seen in Renaldo & Clara, playing a pinball machine in a rather neurotic, fretful way while delivering a long, self-consciously hip reminiscence about the old days in Greenwich Village. He also appeared in Wim Wenders' The American Friend (1977) and the TV movie The Ordeal of Patty Hearst, directed by Paul Wendkos (1979), and although he is uncredited, allegedly he was somewhere in NEIL YOUNG and Dean Stockwell's 1982 film Human Highway. That year he also sang and danced in a Broadway production, starred in American Days at the Manhattan Theatre Club and made an appearance on a soap opera, 'All My Children'. He also started work on a new album.

On December 2, 1982, David Blue died of a massive heart attack while keeping fit in Washington Square Park, back in the Village.

[David Cohen & others: The Singer/Songwriter Project, Elektra EKS 7299, NY, 1965. S. David Cohen: Me, Reprise RS 6375, US, 1969. David Blue: David Blue, Elektra EKS 74003, NY, 1966; David Blue & American Patrol, Elektra, unreleased; These 23 Days in September, Reprise RS 6296, US, 1968; Stories, Asylum SD 5052, US, 1971; Nice Baby & the Angel, Asylum SD 5066, US, 1973; Com'n Back for More, Asylum 7E 1043, 1975; Cupid's Arrow, Asylum 7E 1077, 1976. There's a detailed website re David Blue at http://folk.uio.no/alfs/blue.html.]

blues, external signals of Dylan's interest in
That the old blues have been seminal all through his career, Dylan has made plain in a series of signals, though we have not always paid attention. The early signals were that he was listening to LEADBELLY and ODETTA by 1959; he was performing blues songs as early as 1960; by June 1961 he was sufficiently confident of his blues harmonica playing to get himself taken on as session player for HARRY BELAFONTE's recording of 'Midnight Special', a traditional blues song that had been a key item in BLIND BOY FULLER's repertoire; he was writing blues songs himself by January 1962; by March of that year he was proficient enough, and keen enough, to play harmonica on sessions with BIG JOE WILLIAMS for VICTORIA SPIVEY.

The original title planned for his second album was Bob Dylan's Blues, reflecting the number of blues songs he recorded at the sessions for the album in April, July and October–December 1962; and there is a telling outtake of 'Ballad of Hollis Brown' from 1962 (which despite its title is a blues-structured song) on which Dylan includes the stanza 'There's bedbugs on your baby's bed, there's chinches on your wife / Gangrene snuck in your side, it's cuttin' you like a knife'. Dylan probably put in the bedbugs and chinches for extra 'realism', and was aware of them because they pop up commonly in the old blues—and he dropped them again probably because he couldn't quite make them an authentic fit: not least because in the blues they are mostly objects of humorous exaggeration and not of solemn complaint such as Dylan is stuck with by the nature of his song.

However, the signals kept on coming after that early period, and have continued ever since. 1965's album Bringing It All Back Home cites SLEEPY JOHN ESTES in its sleevenotes right up there at the beginning—'I'm standing there watching the parade / feeling combiniation of sleepy john estes. jayne mansfield. humphrey bogart . . .'—and contains within its front-cover picture the front cover of the all-important first reissue album of ROBERT JOHNSON recordings, Columbia's King of the Delta

Blues Singers. For the making of the radical three-minute-format-breaking rock anthem 'Like a Rolling Stone' later the same year, Dylan flew in the blues guitarist MIKE BLOOMFIELD.

Indeed the album title Highway 61 Revisited announces that we are in for a long revisit, since it is such a long, blues-travelled highway. Many bluesmen had been there before him, all recording versions of a blues called 'Highway 61'. That world is exactly what the album declares that it revisits. And of course the previous album title also suggests that Dylan was referring us back to older music. We didn't want to know. His originality, his revolutionary newness, was the point then. Yet Dylan could not have chosen a more apt and accurate route, a better set of songs to allude to or a finer emblem for his own musical journey. (See separate entry Highway 61.)

All through Dylan's white-heat hip period in the mid-sixties, when his creative greatness was in symbiosis with the foment of the times, he stayed rooted in the blues. He continued to put the word 'Blues' (like the word 'Ballad') into song titles when no-one else in rock did: indeed most people at the time thought Dylan's was deliberate ironic usage of a passé term. Even his constant use of the word 'mama' in the songs of this period is imported from the blues—in rock, few people used it (though one of Dylan's old favourites, GENE VINCENT, commonly did), and in white folksong it really does mean 'mother': but in the blues, as Michael Taft's invaluable Blues Lyric Poetry: A Concordance tells us, 'mother' as addressed to a lover, or a prospective one, occurs more frequently even than words like 'if' and 'when'. In 1966 Dylan opened the electric-début second half of each of his concerts with a bluesy, deranged rock song called 'Tell Me Momma'; 'Tell Me Mama' is the title of a song ROBERT JOHNSON wrote but didn't record. (It was recorded by Johnny Shines.)

This is not the only blues title Dylan used directly in this period. While his 1965 song-title 'On the Road Again' might be taken as a reference to JACK KEROUAC's novel 'On the Road', it is also a well-known track by his old friends THE MEMPHIS JUG BAND. 'Long-Distance Operator', another Dylan song from 1965, which he sung in concerts that year, takes its title straight from a blues single, now rather scarce, by Little Milton, made in 1959, while his basement tapes rock song 'Odds and Ends' is the title of a prominent 1957 JIMMY REED record (prominent for the splendidly named Remo Biondi 'playing the electric violin'). And while the 1966 on-stage Dylan was using that Robert Johnson title 'Tell Me Momma', off stage he could be found, as the fragmentary film of that tour, Eat the Document, revealed, playing a song that didn't sound like a blues at all from the delicate, faltering way that he explored it—yet 'What Kind of Friend Is This?'—copyrighted as Dylan's by Dwarf Music in 1978!—duplicated a 1964 blues record by Koko Taylor, cut at her début session, called 'What Kind of Man Is This?'

(GLEN DUNDAS' Tangled credits Dylan's version 'Willie Dixon, adapted Bob Dylan', but Dixon's 1989 autobiography, I Am the Blues: The Willie Dixon Story, does not include it in the list of 500-plus songs he claims to have written, and MICHAEL KROGSGAARD's Positively Bob Dylan credits it to Koko Taylor herself. Whoever may claim the song, it is merely adapted from a gospel song, also called 'What Kind of Man Is This?': a title founded in turn upon a phrase in the biblical story of Christ calming the storm when He and the disciples are on the sea: 'What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him!' they ask themselves in Matthew 8:27; in Mark 4:41 they ask, very similarly, 'What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him?"; and in Luke 8:25, 'What manner of man is this! for he commandeth even the winds and water, and they obey him.')

At the end of the 1960s, when Dylan was said to be looking to found his own record label, its proposed name was Ashes and Sand: an ellipse of the blues expression 'ashes to ashes and sand to sand' (a far rarer cousin to the Bible's 'ashes to ashes and dust to dust'), which BLIND WILLIE McTELL sings in his 1931 song 'Southern Can Is Mine', and which Geeshie Wiley and Elvie Thomas had sung in their earlier 'Over to My House' ('I cried ashes to ashes, said sand to sand / Every married woman got a back-door man').

Likewise, when Dylan named his own main music-publishing outfit, he called it Special Rider Music, borrowing another piece of old country-blues idiom: 'Special rider' conventionally means favourite lover, which makes it a telling way for Dylan to choose to refer to his muse. He likes the poetry of the term, the elegance of which comes from an understatement achieved by everyday vocabulary (as with so much of the blues): a term that intimates affection and sex while also suggesting a magic journeying. Dylan finds it more sympathetic than the etiolated, twee ways the Muse is referred to (the word 'muse' itself sounds precious—very luvvies—and the worse for the capital M) in mainstream white western culture, where its personification tends towards Greco-Roman lyre-playing women with wispy hair and long nylon dresses.

'Rider' itself is one of the 250 most frequently occurring words in the Taft concordance: so often used that it ranks ahead of 'feet', 'mother', 'help', 'stand', 'might', 'things', 'thinking', 'pay', 'jail', 'thought' and 'sleep'. But 'Special rider' is more special: it seems to occur in only four pre-war songs and by implication—'Ain't got no special, got no trifling kind'—in a fifth (though it may have occurred in some unrecorded songs, and may occur more frequently in post-war blues). The four are: 'Special Rider Blues' by SKIP JAMES and by

SON HOUSE, 'No Special Rider Blues' by Eurreal Little Brother Montgomery and 'Mean Old Frisco Blues' by ARTHUR CRUDUP; the implicit fifth is Ishman Bracey's 'Left Alone Blues'.

Then when Dylan came to issue his first box set retrospective collection, in 1985, he called it after one of the main blues-reissue labels, Biograph: a label that specialised in the 1960s and 1970s in releasing work by BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON, Ma Rainey, BLIND BLAKE, SKIP JAMES, Leroy Carr, Papa Charlie Jackson and other important figures. Other significant Biographs included MISSISSIPPI JOHN HURT, 1928: His First Recordings (1972), Early Leadbelly, 1935–1940: Narrated by WOODY GUTHRIE (1969) and a volume with Willie McTell's rare 1950 recordings for the independent Regal label on one side and on the other, cuts from the same label's 1949 Chicago session by MEMPHIS MINNIE, Blind Willie McTell—Memphis Minnie, 1949 Love Changin' Blues, issued around 1972.

When Dylan published his selected works Writings and Drawings in 1972, it was dedicated in part 'To the magnificent Woodie [sic] Guthrie and Robert Johnson who sparked it off'. When Playboy asked Dylan in 1977 what music he listened to—by implication challenging him as to whether he was keeping an ear on what was contemporary and popular: Steely Dan, perhaps, or the Jacksons—Dylan replied: 'I listen to Memphis Minnie a lot.'

The year that interview was published, 1978, is one during which Dylan draws especially deeply and recurrently from the waters of the blues. This is evident from that year's world tour—on which within 114 concerts he gave a total of 109 performances of six different blues songs by people from Tampa Red to Willie Dixon, as well as a remarkable Robert Johnsonised re-write of his own 'Going Going Gone'. It was just as evident from that year's album, Street Legal, which is at least as soaked in the blues as any of his work before or since.

Even writing a song named after a disease or an illness, like Dylan's late-1970s song 'Legionnaire's Disease' (copyrighted 1981), is in a blues tradition. It joins a waiting list that takes in Memphis Minnie's 'Meningitis Blues', TB songs by Leadbelly, Victoria Spivey and Sonny Boy Williamson I, Blind Lemon Jefferson's 'Pneumonia Blues', Blind Blake's 'Hookworm Blues' and 'Depression's Gone from Me Blues', Sylvester Weaver's 'Me and My Tapeworm', BUKKA WHITE's 'High Fever Blues', Vol Stevens' 'Baby Got the Rickets', Elder Curry's 'Memphis Flu', Champion Jack Dupree's 'Bad Health Blues', Josh White's 'Silicosis Is Killin' Me' and Buddy Moss' 'T.B.'s Killing Me', through GEORGIA TOM's 'Terrible Operation Blues' right on down to Blind Richard Yates' 'Sore Bunion Blues'. (Some such titles use illness as, yes you guessed it, a sexual metaphor. 'Terrible Operation Blues' is one of these.)

In 1983 Dylan wrote and recorded his own blues masterpiece 'Blind Willie McTell'. In 1986 when he titled his album 'Knocked Out Loaded' he was quoting a phrase from a song on the album, 'Under Your Spell' co-written with the pop artist CAROLE BAYER SAGER—but that Dylan lyric was itself quoting the phrase from 'Junko Partner', a 1940s semi-cajun blues that the deeply obscure New Orleans blues singer James Wayne recorded in Atlanta and which Dr. John, among others, revived in the early 1970s.

Those, then, are just some of the external signals. No wonder the inheritance of blues lyric poetry is everywhere in Dylan's work.

[Bob Dylan: 'What Kind of Friend Is This?', Glasgow hotel room, 18–19 May 1966. Dylan quote re Memphis Minnie, interview by Ron Rosenbaum, Burbank, CA, Nov 1977, Playboy, Chicago, Mar 1978.

Johnny Shines, 'Tell Me Mama', prob. NY, 1972; Sitting on Top of the World, Biograph 12044, Canaan, NY, c.1972. Memphis Jug Band: 'On the Road Again', Memphis, 11 Sep 1928. Little Milton: 'Long Distance Operator', St. Louis, MO, 1959, Bobbin 103, 1960, LP-issued Raise a Little Sand, Red Lightnin' RL0011, UK, 1975. Jimmy Reed: 'Odds and Ends', Chicago, 3 Apr 1957, Vee Jay 298, Chicago, 1957. (An 'Odds and Ends' was also cut by rockabilly artist Warren Smith, Hollywood, 17 Nov 1960, Liberty LRP 3199 / LST 7199 / LB 1181, Hollywood, 1961.)

Koko Taylor: 'What Kind of Man Is This?', Chicago, 30 Jun 1964, Checker 1092, Chicago, 1964. Blind Willie McTell: 'Southern Can Is Mine', Atlanta, 23 Oct 1931, Blind Willie McTell: The Early Years (1927–1933), Yazoo L-1005, NY, 1968 & re-make 'Southern Can Mama', NY, 21 Sep 1933, Blind Willie McTell, 1927–1935, Yazoo L-1037, NY, 1973; both CD-reissued The Definitive Blind Willie McTell, Columbia Legacy Roots N' Blues Series C2K 53234, NY, 1994. Wiley & Thomas: 'Over to My House', Grafton, WI, c.Mar 1930, Going Away Blues", Yazoo L-1018, NY, 1969.

Skip James: 'Special Rider Blues', Grafton, WI, c.Feb 1931, Mississippi Blues 1927–1941, Yazoo L-1001, NY, 1968 & Skip James: King of the Delta Blues Singers 1928–1964, Biograph BLP-12029, Canaan, NY, 1971. Son House: 'Special Rider Blues' (1 fast & 1 slow take), Robinsonville, MI, 17 Jul 1942, Negro Blues and Hollers, AFS L 59, Washington, D.C., 1962, CD-reissued Rounder CD1501, Cambridge, MA, 1997 & Son House: The Complete Library of Congress Sessions 1941–1942, Travelin' Man TM CD 02, Crawley, UK, 1990. Eurreal Little Brother Montgomery: 'No Special Rider Blues', Grafton, WI, c.Sep 1930; may be issued on Piano Blues 1927–1933, Riverside RM8809, NY, 1966. Arthur Crudup: 'Mean Old Frisco Blues', Chicago, 15 Apr 1942, The Rural Blues, RBF RF-202, NY, 1964. Ishman Bracey: 'Left Alone Blues', Memphis, 4 Feb 1928, The Famous 1928 Tommy Johnson—Ishman Bracey Session, Roots RL-330, Vienna, 1970. Mississippi John Hurt, 1928: His First Recordings", Biograph BLP-C4, Canaan, NY, 1972; Early Leadbelly, 1935–1940: Narrated by Woody Guthrie, Biograph BLP-12013, NY, 1969; Blind Willie McTell—Memphis Minnie, 1949 Love Changin' Blues, Biograph BLP-12035, Canaan, NY, c.1972.

Memphis Minnie: 'Meningitis Blues', Memphis, 26 May 1930. Leadbelly: 'TB Woman Blues', NY, 23 Mar

1935. Victoria Spivey: 'TB's Got Me Blues', Chicago, 7 Jul 1936. Sonny Boy Williamson I: 'TB Blues', Chicago, 21 Jul 1939. Blind Lemon Jefferson: 'Pneumonia Blues', Richmond, IN, 24 Sep 1929. Blind Blake: 'Hookworm Blues', Richmond, IN, 20 Jul 1929 & 'Depression's Gone from Me Blues', Grafton, WI, c.Jun 1932. Sylvester Weaver: 'Me and My Tapeworm', NY, 27 Nov 1927 (but, cut for OKeh but left unissued & untitled, the title was assigned it only for its retrospective 1st issue, Songs of Humor and Hilarity, Library of Congress Folk Music of America series LBC 11, Washington, D.C., 1978).

Bukka White: 'High Fever Blues', Chicago, 8 Mar 1940. Vol Stevens: 'Baby Got the Rickets', Atlanta 20 Oct 1927. Elder Curry: 'Memphis Flu', Jackson, MI, 16 Dec 1930. Champion Jack Dupree: 'Bad Health Blues', Chicago, 23 Jan 1941. Pinewood Tom (Joshua White): 'Silicosis Is Killin' Me', NY, 26 Feb 1936. Buddy Moss: 'T.B.'s Killing Me', NY, 18 Jan 1933. Georgia Tom & Hannah May: 'Terrible Operation Blues', NY, 17 Sep 1930; Georgia Tom & Jane Lucas: 'Terrible Operation Blues', Richmond, IN 19 Nov 1930. Blind Richard Yates: 'Sore Bunion Blues', NY, c.9 Apr 1927.

James Wayne: 'Junko Partner', Atlanta, 1951, Ray Charles in R&B Greats (sic), Oriole Realm RM-101, UK 1963. Dr. John: 'Junko Partner', New Orleans 1972, Gumbo, Atlantic (K40384 in UK), reissued on Various Artists, Let It Rock, Atlantic K40455, UK, 1973. The Clash did a fine version, 'Junco Partner', nia, on Sandinista!, Epic CBS FSLN 1, UK, 1980. (A similar song by Champion Jack Dupree, 'Junker Blues', Chicago, 28 Jan 1941, became, cleaned up, FATS DOMINO's 'The Fat Man', New Orleans, 10 Dec 1949, Imperial 5058, LA, 1950, CD-reissued Fats Domino: The Early Imperial Singles 1950–1952, Ace CDCHD 597, London, 1996).

Michael Taft, Blues Lyric Poetry: A Concordance, 3 vols, New York: Garland, 1984 (for more detail, see the entry 'Call Letter Blues').]

blues, inequality of reward in The inequality of reward and credit as between the old black singer-songwriters and the newer white ones is a topic that arises unavoidably from any scrutiny of what Dylan has taken from the blues.

Four years after the beginning of Dylan's recording career, and already a superstar, he is visiting Tennessee, the state in which Memphis is located, to record the deeply blues-soaked album Blonde on Blonde. In Memphis itself, ELVIS PRESLEY is residing in decadent luxury, resting on the laurels of a career launched from the Sun studios on a cover-version of an ARTHUR CRUDUP blues at a time when Arthur Crudup wouldn't even have been allowed to ride alongside Presley on a public bus. (Not that Crudup was in Memphis; he'd migrated to Chicago, where to begin with he'd lived in a wooden crate under the 'L' station.)

While Dylan is recording 'Pledging My Time', and Elvis is playing games at Graceland, 40 miles south of Memphis on Highway 51, Mississippi Fred McDowell, that state's greatest living bluesman and a big influence on Ry Cooder and Bonnie Raitt, is working in a gas-station in Como, Mississippi. As Stanley Booth notes in his appealing book Rythm Oil, 'there is a telephone handy for when he gets calls to appear at places like the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL.'

What can you say? Several things. Elvis had to live his whole adult life with the accusation that he'd somehow stolen this music, and had only succeeded at it because he was white. This is in every detail untrue. First, Elvis' early record producer, Sam Phillips, recorded Elvis singing blues because they both loved it; Phillips launched the careers of black artists (HOWLIN' WOLF included) as well as white, and willingly let each move on to bigger things than Sun could accommodate.

Against the wishes of his manager Colonel Parker, Elvis continued to record black material throughout his life, because his love for it remained undimmed when precious little else did. Rightly he credited its composers on his records and paid them songwriting royalties. That his own music-publishing outfits took hefty proportions was a corrupt practice endemic in the industry then and now, and applied equally to the white songwriters who hit the theoretical jackpot of having Presley record their material. Low royalty rates, and royalties flowing into the wrong pockets, were aspects of the business that applied without regard to race. ROY ORBISON recalled that he'd been signed to Sun Records for quite a while before he heard, from an older songwriter, that you were supposed to get paid when they played your songs on the radio—and when Orbison told CARL PERKINS, it was news to him too.

It's a myth too that Elvis stole 'Hound Dog' from Big Mama Thornton. White Jewish songwriters Leiber & Stoller wrote it, and offered it to Johnny Otis; he offered it to Thornton and stole the composer credit, which, as GREIL MARCUS wrote in his classic book Mystery Train, 'Leiber and Stoller had to fight to get back. Elvis heard the record, changed the song completely, from the tempo to the words, and cut Thornton's version to shreds.'

Elvis made this material his own; he did something special with all of it. He couldn't have ignited a revolution through unfair good luck. That's the essence of it. And Dylan too takes from the blues because he loves it, and then makes of it something his own. It's a creative process, and creativity deserves success.

That success doesn't always come, that life is essentially unfair, is also true, but beyond the capacity of a Presley or a Dylan to affect. Neither is its unfairness racially scrupulous. Consider the case of another old blues singer, FURRY LEWIS, about whom no black writer or singer has ever said a word but of whom white Stanley Booth writes at length. Like Hubert Sumlin, Furry Lewis came from Greenwood, Mississippi, but he moved to Memphis at the age of six, in 1899. At 23, he lost a leg trying to catch a freight train outside Du Quoin, Illinois. A protégé of W.C. Handy, he recorded four sessions in the 1920s but the depression killed off his career and he didn't record again till 1959. After the end of the 1920s he was never again a full-time pro. He isn't mentioned in Louis Cantor's history of Memphis-based WDIA, the first all-black radio station: 230 pages on how this wonderful station gave blacks their own voice and put the blues on the air—but no change for a bluesman of Lewis' generation: he was still excluded. So was FRANK STOKES, another giant of the early Memphis blues scene who was still alive and living in neglect in Memphis when Elvis made his first records there. Stokes died, aged 67, in 1955. 'Frank Stokes: Creator of the Memphis Blues', the reissue label Yazoo was calling him two decades later.

Then there are the salutary cases of the innovative Noah Lewis and of GUS CANNON, another towering Memphis figure. When Bob Dylan chose to open his performance at the 1996 Aarhus Festival, Denmark, with an approximation of THE GRATEFUL DEAD's 'New New Minglewood Blues', he's likely to have chosen it not because it's a Dead song but because it isn't: because, rather, it's based on 'New Minglewood Blues' by Noah Lewis's Jug Band from 1930, itself a re-modelling of 'Minglewood Blues' by Cannon's Jug Stompers (comprising, in this instance, Gus Cannon, Ashley Thompson and Noah Lewis) from 1928. The Dead's recording may well have reminded Dylan of the song, but there's no reason to suppose that he hadn't been familiar with the original Noah Lewis's Jug Band recording, since this had been vinyl-reissued in the early 1960s. The key figure here, then, is the pioneering and splendid harmonica-player Noah Lewis, whose work set new expressive standards in the pre-war period (and who is credited as the composer of 'Minglewood Blues' as well as of 'New Minglewood Blues': the two may share a tune but are otherwise dissimilar songs—different in lyrics, pace and mood). Lewis was long thought to have been murdered in 1937, but Swedish researcher Bent Olsson discovered that in fact he had retired to Ripley, Tennessee, in the 30s, where in his old age he got frostbite, had both legs amputated and in the process got blood-poisoning, from which he died in the winter of early 1961.

Cannon was by far the better-known figure by the time Bob Dylan reached Greenwich Village. He was one of the featured artists on both HARRY SMITH's 1952 anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC and on the next crucial release of the period, SAM CHARTERS' 1959 compilation Country Blues. Cannon's track on the former, indeed, was 'Minglewood Blues' while on the latter was his 1929 cut 'Walk Right In', which was taken up by the Rooftop Singers, who topped the US charts with a single of the song, complete with beefy 12-string guitar sound, in 1963.

Cannon's own career was first 'revived' in 1956 when he was recorded, for the first time since 1930, by Folkways. They let him cut two tracks. Then in 1963, in the wake of the Rooftop Singers' success, Cannon cut an album issued by Stax (!) which featured 'Walk Right In' plus standards like 'Salty Dog', 'Boll-Weevil' and 'Make Me a Pallet on Your Floor'. He also made appearances at the Newport Folk Festival. He survived to the age of 96, living long enough to still be around in Memphis at the time of Elvis Presley's funeral there in 1977.

Despite his eminence and his 'rediscovery', Gus Cannon too suffered neglect, poverty and lack of respect. His situation is described eloquently by Jim Dickinson, the Memphis session-player who features on Dylan's Time Out of Mind album twenty years after Cannon's death:

> 'In the summer of 1960, a friend and I followed the trail that Charters left to Gus Cannon. . . . He was the yardman for an anthropology professor. Gus had told this family that he used to make records and he had been on RCA and they'd say, "Yeah Gus, sure: cut the grass." . . . He lived on the property, back over a garage, and he took us up into his room, and on the wall he had a certificate for sales from 'Walk Right In', for which of course he didn't get any money. And he had a copy of the record that Charters had made for Folkways, but he had no record-player. That was a real good introduction to the blues.'

Likewise, right through to the 1970s Furry Lewis remained a street-sweeper in Memphis. Now and then in the mid-1960s he'd play a set between rock acts at the Bitter Lemon coffee-house in East Memphis. Stanley Booth writes: 'Next morning he's back sweeping the streets. At the crack of dawn, on his way to work, he passes the Club Handy. On the door is a handbill that reads Blues Spectacular, City Auditorium: JIMMY REED, JOHN LEE HOOKER, Howlin' Wolf . . .'

Inequality of reward, like the blues itself, works on many levels.

blues lines smuggled into Dylan's lyrics In the course of his enormous body of work Dylan draws on blues lyric poetry in many ways, and moves through periods of greater and lesser exploratory debt to it. As is the process with that poetry itself, Dylan is sometimes leaning on a common cluster of song and sometimes on an individually created stanza. Likewise he is sometimes taking a common cluster or individual stanza only to turn it inside out or to twist it round, to make of it something new. It exemplifies his remarkable quiet ability to set himself unobtrusive creative goals and reach them—a side of his work inevitably overlooked inside a pop and media culture attuned only to notice and celebrate hugely dramatic artistic acts—that there is a pattern, though not a rigid one, to Dylan's uses of the blues. It is this: time and again when you come across these streams of blues consciousness in his work, the verbatim blues phrases, quoted either from the common stock or from specific writers, are found inside his non-blues songs, while his blues songs offer such phrases innovatively tweaked. These patterns, and the exceptions to them, were first noted in MICHAEL GRAY's Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, in which they are examined in great detail.

[Michael Gray, Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, London: Cassell Academic, 1999 & Continuum, 2000, and New York, Continuum, 2000.]

Blues Project* [album, 1964] See Muldaur, Geoff.

Bob Dylan* [1962] The first album, this features the 20-year-old Dylan, unique among the Greenwich Village folkies in having been signed to the huge Columbia label, which had missed out on rock'n'roll altogether. In staff-producer JOHN HAMMOND they had a man who'd been involved in Bessie Smith's recordings and those of many more great blues acts besides. He signed Dylan, spent less than $500 in the studio and came out with an album few people liked and that didn't sell. The record company was all for dropping him. This album is, in retrospect, terrific. It has such a young Dylan on it that he sounds about 85. Only two of the songs are his own: one dedicated to his early idol WOODY GUTHRIE ('Song to Woody') and the other owing its format and spirit to Guthrie's own work ('Talkin' New York'), though using a format, the talking blues, that goes further back than Guthrie. The other songs are mainly his own impressionistic arrangements of traditional songs and old blues songs by men like JESSE FULLER, BUKKA WHITE and BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON, performed without any gentility and with a voice that, far from suggesting a soul-mate for PETER, PAUL or MARY suggested some black octogenarian singing personal blues at the back of his shack. The blurb that went out on the album could quite plausibly call Dylan the newest voice in country blues.

Dylan comes across as obsessed with the romance of dying, but the speed, energy and attack in his guitar, harmonica and voice show how fresh and excellently 'unprofessional' he was. There are tracks that ring a little false. On Dylan's rendition of 'Gospel Plow', for instance, the death-wish of the young man may be genuine but the evocation is not: wrongly, it relies on a pretence at the experience of age to 'justify' that death-wish. So that what comes through is a clumsiness of understanding as to what the artist requires of himself.

Yet what comes through from the album as a whole is a remarkable skill and more than a hint of a highly distinctive vision. In the context of what was happening at the time—American folk culture all but obliterated and a stagnating 'folk' cult established as if in its place—Dylan's first album can hardly be faulted. It is a brilliant début, a performer's tour de force, and it served as a fine corrective for Greenwich Village: it was the opposite of effete. Dylan's recordings of folk material are very much more extensive than those officially released suggest, but this first official album is a unit, a fine collection that stands up by itself.

[Recorded NY, 20 & 22 Nov 1961; released as Columbia CL 1779 (mono) & CS 8579 (stereo), 19 Mar 1962. In UK CBS BPG 62022 (mono) & SBPG 62022 (stereo), Jun 1962.]

Bob Dylan at Budokan* [1978] Dylan's third 'live' album, all within a five-year period and revisiting many of the same songs. This double-LP was recorded live in concert in Japan, where Dylan began the tour with the band that appeared on the Street Legal studio album (the largest band he's ever used on stage). A good recording that includes re-workings of many Dylan classics, it is a pity it caught Dylan and the band before they reached the magical, incandescent form they hit later that year in Europe and North America.

The tour was remarkable in re-asserting Dylan's power and relevance in an entirely different decade from the one he had shaped so significantly. The album is a pale souvenir of what went down, yet the freshness of focus Dylan brings to these songs is especially dramatic: 'I Want You', 'Ballad of a Thin Man', 'Blowin' in the Wind', 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right' and 'All Along the Watchtower'. The album cover includes a cringemaking quote about leaving his heart in Kyoto (though the album was recorded in Tokyo) and on-stage photos of Dylan dressed up like ELVIS in Las Vegas.

Many bootlegs from the same tour outshine this release, as is always the case with official 'live' Dylan recordings. There is a fine 6-CD set, ranging right across the tour and the year, which among much else shows that the early Japanese concerts were altogether more alive and effervescent than Budokan has had us believe. The band was hot—and what generous expressiveness we get from Dylan. Lovely, heartfelt, instinctive vocal phrasings and filigrees pouring out of him all the way through. Budokan misses much of it.

[Recorded Tokyo, 28 Feb and 1 Mar 1978; released first in Japan as CBS/Sony 40AP 1100/01 (Japan), 21 Aug 1978. Columbia PC2-36067 (USA), CBS 96004 (UK), Apr 1979.]

The Bob Dylan Scrapbook* [2005] Drawing on material made available by his office for the unprecedented Bob Dylan Exhibition ('Bob Dylan: An American Journey 1956–1966') mounted at the Experience Music Project in Seattle in November 2004 and subsequently a touring exhibition, the expensive book The Bob Dylan Scrapbook: An Ameri- can Journey 1956–1966 was published in autumn 2005, compiled by Bob Santelli, curator of the Seattle exhibition 'in association with Bob Dylan'. The hardcover 'scrapbook', a mere 64 pages but beautifully produced, contains replicas of handwritten song lyrics, rare photographs, facsimile pull-outs of concert programmes, tickets, publicity stickers and other memorabilia—not all of which are 100 per cent pukka, Dylan experts suspect—interviews with Dylan and various associates plus an audio CD of interviews: and even a pull-out, cardboard stand-up Bob.

In the UK it was published at the same time as the first paperback edition of Chronicles Volume One; in the US it was published a little later.

[The Bob Dylan Scrapbook: An American Journey 1956–1966, New York & London: Simon & Schuster, 2005.]

Bob Dylan's Greatest Hits [1967] The title was offensive at the time; Dylan was no mere pop artist and his greatness had nothing to do with whether DJs loved his records or whether his singles ran up the charts. In fact never has so influential an artist had so few hit singles. More importantly, each of the previous albums had had its own unity. They'd never been collections of isolated tracks. So a 'greatest hits' collection made no sense at all except in money terms. The album was put out in what was considered the disastrously long silence from Dylan between Blonde on Blonde in 1966 and the next proper album a week before the start of 1968. In those days, everyone made two albums a year and a long gap was supposed to be career death. This was badly selected regurgitation and provided nothing new; nor did it give an accurate picture of Dylan's progress through the earlier recordings. The US and UK track selections differ slightly.

In some countries the album was titled Subterranean Homesick Blues.

[Released as Columbia KCS 9643 (stereo) & KCL 2663 (mono), 27 Mar 1967. In UK CBS 460907(stereo) & BGP 62847 (mono), 27 Mar 1967.]

Bob Dylan's Greatest Hits Vol. II [1971] Like Bob Dylan's Greatest Hits, this is a collection that rides roughshod over both the real chronology of Dylan's career and the whole-album unities of most Dylan work, but at least here there are tracks not obtainable on other albums: the 1971 (hit) single 'Watching the River Flow'; the 1965 masterpiece of put-down 'Positively 4th Street' and five previously unissued tracks. If it sounds odd to have previously unissued material on a 'greatest hits' collection, it wasn't so odd in the light of what songs they were. 'When I Paint My Masterpiece' (recorded 1971) was already well-known from THE BAND's recording on their Cahoots album; 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time' (a nigh-perfect live performance from 1963) was a Dylan song that other people, including, to Dylan's delight, ELVIS PRESLEY, had recorded in the interim; and 'I Shall Be Released', 'Down in the Flood' and, with playfully different lyrics, 'You Ain't Goin' Nowhere' were newly recorded (1971), outrageously loose versions of three songs that had long been popular from bootlegs of the famed 1967 Basement Tapes. All this makes it an interesting album for collectors, although it would have been more valuable if it had rounded up his other previously only-on-singles tracks too. They could have had 'Mixed-Up Confusion' (1962), which had never had a UK release; 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now' (1965) ditto; the live-in-Liverpool cut of 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues' (1966), the best live song performance ever achieved by anyone yet issued only as the B-side of the 'I Want You' single; the gorgeous 1971 B-side 'Spanish Is the Loving Tongue'; the 1965 A-side 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?'; and the 1971 single 'George Jackson', issued two weeks before this album. But record companies never do these things right.

[Released as 2-LP set, Columbia KG 31120, 17 Nov 1971. (The UK title was More Bob Dylan Greatest Hits, CBS S 67239, Dec 1971 and has a slightly different track-list. On CD re-releases, the US tracklist has superseded the UK vinyl list in both countries.)]

Bob Dylan's Greatest Hits Volume 3 [1994] Twenty-four years since the last 'greatest hits' package, and how remarkably seldom in this aeon had he had a hit of any sort. The last real hit Bob Dylan scored in Britain was in 1978, with 'Baby, Stop Crying'—and that's not included here. Plus ça change. Here instead is the previously unreleased track 'Dignity', an unfinished outtake from Oh Mercy put through the *in*dignity of a working-over by another modish-for-15-minutes hit-guru (BRENDAN O'BRIEN). 'Silvio' also seems to have been remixed, removing its posturing edge to re-present it as an amiable, light, poised little thing; it is still not worth including.

This is otherwise a well-planned selection, its non-chronological running order creating some neat meeting points: 'Ring Them Bells' (1989) is followed by 'Gotta Serve Somebody' from a decade earlier, emphasising similarities of theme and production; 'Series of Dreams' gives way to 'Brownsville Girl'. The inclusion of 'Under the Red Sky' is right and, admirably, the collection opens with a run of four long, demanding songs that stress, perhaps with some pride, Dylan's unrivalled weaponry of words: 'Tangled Up in Blue' (though this is the wrong song-choice from Blood on the Tracks: it has already been re-collected and an outtake issued, while the equally fine 'Simple Twist of Fate' has never been re-collected), 'Changing of the Guards' (a fine choice), 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' and 'Hurricane' (which comes out very strongly). The studio albums issued since Greatest Hits II but unrepresented here are Dylan, The Basement Tapes, Saved and Empire Burlesque.

[Released as Columbia CK 66783 (Columbia 477805 2 in UK), 15 Nov 1994.]

Bono See U2.

book endorsements, unfortunate It was a new development in a reductive direction when, in the 1980s, Dylan tiptoed towards being one of those celebrities who endorse other people's work by giving them blurb quotes. This began reasonably enough with a book-jacket endorsement for ALLEN GINSBERG's Collected Poems 1947–1980 (1985) but by the end of 1991 this had been joined by the dubious company of two gruesome and vacuous Dylan book blurbs for far less distinguished work. Here's Dylan on Lazarus and the Hurricane by Sam Chaiton & Terry Swinton: 'The first book [RUBIN HURRICANE CARTER's The Sixteenth Round, 1974] was a heartbreaker. This one is a mind-breaker, abolishing parts of the nervous system.' And on Minneapolis Rabbi Manis Friedman's book Doesn't Anyone Blush Any More? Reclaiming Intimacy, Modesty and Sexuality in a Permissive Age, there is this back-cover testimonial: 'Anyone who's either married or thinking of getting married would do well to read this book.' (Doesn't anyone blush any more?)

Is this an example of how Dylan keeps on doing the same thing but it comes across differently because he's grown older, or because the world has changed around him (as for instance you might argue is the case with Dylan's clothes: you could say that he's always had dodgy clothes but used to be young and beautiful enough to get away with them)? In the case of these endorsements, well, he endorsed Fender bass guitars in 1965, didn't he? And in that same decade, the decade of his greatest immaculacy, he wrote the sleevenotes for JOAN BAEZ in Concert Part 2, and for PETER, PAUL & MARY's album In the Wind.

But the Fender ads were discreet—they showed a photo of the 1965 leather-jacketed Dylan posing with a Fender electric bass guitar: an instrument everyone knew he didn't play—and Fenders were an honourable name in musical instrument-making, an honourable profession. And Dylan used those album sleevenotes as opportunities to publish 'some other kinds of songs', and to reach the large audiences of people who had already performed his work and therefore with whom he had some tangible artistic connection. He also did so in his own uncompromising style: they were sleevenotes unlike any other.

The more recent blurbs are the opposite. They are Dylan playing a conventional showbiz game, no differently from Bob Hope or Bob Roberts. As with pally music-biz tributes and mutually-presented awards to other celebs, which Dylan has also (after a lifetime's honorable opposition) begun to do, this seems merely demeaning—at least to those who admired his long-term contempt for such stuff.

(See also co-option of real music by advertising, the.)

[The Fender ads appeared in spring 1965 in the UK music papers, and Fender sponsored Dylan's 1965 and 1966 tours. Joan Baez: Joan Baez in Concert Part 2, Vanguard VRS-9113, NY , 1964. Peter, Paul & Mary: In the Wind, Warner Bros. WS1507, NY, 1963.]

Booker T [1944 -] Booker T Jones was born in Memphis on November 12, 1944 and grew up there learning a number of instruments in school. In 1960, aged 16, he began playing sax for Stax Records in Memphis; Booker T and the MGs were formed to be the Stax-Volt house band in 1962, with Steve Cropper of the Mar-Keys and Lee Steinberg, who was replaced by Donald 'Duck' Dunn, also an ex-Mar-Key, in 1964. The group claimed fame in its own right in 1962 with the funky instrumental classic 'Green Onions', but continued to play behind many others, creating the 'Memphis sound' behind Sam & Dave, Carla Thomas, Otis Redding and many more. In June 1967 they backed Otis Redding for his triumphant, gloriously unhippie performance at that year's Monterey International Pop Festival. Three years later they quit as Stax house band, and disbanded in 1972.

Jones moved to California to become a staff producer at A&M Records, recording Bill Withers and RITA COOLIDGE, whose sister Priscilla was his wife. With Priscilla he recorded three albums in the early 1970s, plus a solo album, Evergreen.

Dylan played harmonica on the track 'The Crippled Crow', probably recorded in Malibu, California, in February 1973, on Chronicles, one of the albums by Booker T and Priscilla—and in turn both contributed to a Dylan session that same month: the final session for the Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid soundtrack in Burbank. Booker T played bass; Priscilla sang backing vocals. The session yielded five of the album's tracks: 'Main Title Theme', 'Cantina Theme', 'Billy 1', 'River Theme' and 'Turkey Chase'.

Booker T & the MGs had planned a reunion when drummer Al Jackson was shot dead in Memphis in October 1975. After various experiments, Jones rejoined Steve Cropper and Duck Dunn to record (with others) as the RCO All-Stars—including LEVON HELM and the RCO All Stars, made in 1977 after the break-up of THE BAND. While Cropper & Dunn toured and recorded behind the Blues Brothers (and appeared in the 1980 hit movie The Blues Brothers), Jones produced the 1978 WILLIE NELSON album Stardust and played for RAY CHARLES. The 1981 hit 'I Want You' was not the Dylan song, but Booker T & the MGs did record 'Gotta Serve Somebody' and 'Lay Lady Lay'.

In 1992 a renewed Booker T & the MGs, including Anton Fig, became, with JIM KELTNER, the house band at the so-called Bob Dylan 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration at Madison Square Garden, NY, October 16, 1992, backing or augmenting the sound of most of the performers.

This inspired NEIL YOUNG to hire Booker T & the MGs and Keltner to play behind him on European and North American dates in 1993, and wrote of this experience: ‘As I stood where Otis Redding, Wilson Pickett, Sam and Dave and so many great singers stood, and felt that groove surrounding me, I knew that I had found a place. It’s something I can’t forget. Something to return to again and again, like church or your hometown. A musical place where history surrounds you without getting in the way. The music of Booker T & the MGs will live forever.’

Booker T now runs two bands: the largely instrumental Booker T & the MGs, and what he describes as his ‘solo band’, the Booker T Band.

[Booker T (w Bob Dylan): ‘The Crippled Crow’, prob. Malibu, CA, Feb 1973; issued on Booker T: Chronicles, A&M ST-4413, NY, 1973. Bob Dylan, The 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration, 2-CD set, Columbia 474000 2, NY, 1993. Levon Helm and the RCO All Stars, ABC AA-1017, NY, 1977, CD-reissued Edsel EDCD 494, 1996. Booker T Jones quote online 17 Sep 2005 at www.bookert.com/main/booking.html. Neil Young quote online ditto at www.fantasyjazz.com/html/bookert4424.html, from notes to the 3-CD set Booker T. & the MGs: Time Is Tight, Stax 3SCD-4424-2, 1998, by Rob Bowman (author of Soulsville, U.S.A.: The Story of Stax Records, New York: Schirmer Books, 1997). This CD set includes Booker T & the MGs’ ‘Gotta Serve Somebody’ and ‘Lay Lady Lay’.]

Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3* [1991] A 3-CD (or, optionally in Europe, 5-LP) box set ranging over Dylan’s career from 1961 to 1989, composed entirely of never-released material. Most artists couldn’t muster a single outtake to hold alongside any of this; Dylan can provide 58 recordings almost every one of which is of numinous excellence. There are the perfectly controlled solo performances of the infinitely variegated pre-electric period (‘Kingsport Town’, ‘Worried Blues’, ‘Walls of Red Wing’, ‘Moonshiner’ and the unique ‘Last Thoughts on WOODY GUTHRIE’); the electric acid glory of the fast ‘It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry’ and of ‘She’s Your Lover Now’, a gleeful masterpiece more redolent of its era than most things that came out at the time; on through incomparable studio performances of ‘Tangled Up in Blue’ and ‘Idiot Wind’ and other, more fragile, faltering works from the 1970s; riches from the 1980s which it was madness to have left unissued: ‘Need a Woman’, ‘Angelina’, ‘Someone’s Got a Hold of My Heart’, ‘Lord Protect My Child’, ‘Foot of Pride’ and ‘Blind Willie McTell’; and finishing with an outtake from Oh Mercy perhaps as strong as anything on the album, the compelling ‘Series of Dreams’. This well-received collection could, of itself, establish Dylan’s place as the pre-eminent songwriter and performer of the age and as one of the great artists of the 20th century.

[Released as Columbia C3K 47382, 26 Mar 1991. In UK/Europe Columbia COL 468086 1 (5-LPs) or Columbia 468086 2 (3-CDs).

Bootleg Series Vol. 4: Bob Dylan Live 1966—The ‘‘Royal Albert Hall’’ Concert* [1998] (Snappy title!) The most enthralling, truthful, priceless concert performance ever issued by a great artist. Three decates afterwards, and in heart-stopping quality, came the complete concert from 1966 at last. Long thought to have been from the Royal Albert Hall, London (the early, incomplete bootlegs had claimed this), the concert was actually from the Manchester Free Trade Hall: the time-stopping, astonishing, riveting, synapse-crinkling acoustic solo half and, performed with THE HAWKS, the transcendant, revolutionary electric second half. Bob Dylan at the absolute lapidary peak of inspiration, just turned 25 years old and utterly dismissive of the received wisdom of showbiz. This concert also embraces that telling moment when someone in the audience shouts ‘Judas!’.

The 2-CD set is extremely well packaged, with a generous supply of vivid, telling photographs and an exceptionally fine, thoughtful essay, informed by the writer’s personal knowledge, by Dylan’s old Minnesota friend and fellow musician TONY GLOVER, plus decent and straightforward information about the available officially recorded tour tapes and how they had been reprocessed for the release of this concert, 32 years after it happened.

[Recorded Manchester, UK, 17 May 1966; released as Columbia Legacy C2K 65759, 13 Oct 1998.]

Bootleg Series Vol. 5: Bob Dylan Live 1975* [2002] This 2-CD set offers a compilation of live recordings from the first Rolling Thunder Revue (the 1975 tour), taken from five different concerts but assembled so as to represent one complete performance—or rather, the Dylan part of a Rolling Thunder Revue evening. The general pattern of the concerts was that various individual members of the backing band GUAM opened each of these ‘gyspy carnival’ shows, and then Dylan came on, opening with a ‘When I Paint My Masterpiece’ on which he shared vocals with BOBBY NEUWIRTH and then delivering a set of around five songs before being joined by JOAN BAEZ for several duets, after which she would then perform her own set. Dylan would then return to perform a couple of acoustic solos before bringing Guam back on to play behind him on the final songs. On the usual penultimate song, ‘Knockin’ on Heaven’s Door’, ROGER McGUINN would join him, and on the final number, ‘This Land Is Your Land’, everyone, including ALLEN GINSBERG and RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT, would provide a chorus of vocals.

The Bootleg Series Vol. 5 release does not quite stick to this; if you prefer, it re-writes history a little, partly perhaps to idealise—and people will disagree as to track selection in any case, since the set was not identical each night and nor, of course, were Dylan's performances—but there was a technical consideration too. As the sleevenotes say, it was decided to limit the selections 'only to the 24 track recordings made by a professional sound truck in Worcester, Boston, Cambridge [all Massachusetts] and Montréal.' (The sleevenotes include a longish essay by LARRY SLOMAN.)

The set omits the opener, 'When I Paint My Masterpiece' and begins with the re-written 'Tonight I'll Be Staying Here With You': a neat opening statement but in fact not a song he had ever put in the second slot. And in the real show, after 'Isis' the curtain would fall, signalling the end of the first half, after which it would rise again to reveal Dylan and Baez standing there together—a theatrical touch that was heart-stopping for many of those in the crowd who had known the days of yore to which the sight harked back. And after Baez left the stage, then, in Larry Sloman's words, 'before the audience could even catch its collective breath, Dylan [would] amble . . . onstage alone' and solo on 'Mr. Tambourine Man'. On the 2-CD set, however, that solo 'Mr. Tambourine Man' comes straight after 'Isis' and before the Baez duets—which are themselves split up so that the fourth and last of them comes later than the rest, and so is placed on the other disc. Nevertheless, as the sleevenotes say, the aim was to compile best performances 'roughly the way they might have occurred once Bob Dylan stepped onto the stage', and with the slight bonus that we get 22 songs here: a couple more than Dylan offered most nights. (At Worcester and Cambridge it had been 19, at the Boston second show 20, but at Montréal he performed an exceptional 23 in all.)

Before this 2002 release, the only official issues from these shimmering, frequently magical shows—from, as it has turned out, one of the real 'dream periods' of Dylan's live work—had been the footage that could be gleaned from Renaldo & Clara, released in 1978, and the versions of 'Romance in Durango' and 'Isis' issued on the Biograph box set in 1985. Granted this, granted the exuberant fandango band that gives this blazing music such a fusion of shambles and precision, and granted the triumph of the spirit encapsulated in Dylan's electric performances and the committed yet nuanced acoustic ones, it was extraordinary how much carping went on among aficionados when they were finally able to acquire this beautifully packaged set, and in gorgeous sound. And if you bought the set promptly, a 'bonus DVD' was thrown in, comprising the riveting footage from Renaldo & Clara of Dylan and his hat performing 'Tangled Up in Blue' and 'Isis', plus an audio-only cut of another 'Isis'.

With or without this bonus, this release is too rich in gems to be able to select 'highlights'; but it is a special pleasure of this set to be able to hear songs from Blood on the Tracks performed when this was still his latest studio album, and to hear a generous supply of the songs that were to come on Desire, played to these audiences when they were utterly new, before the album had been released.

[Released as Columbia/Legacy 510140 2, US & Europe, 2002.]

Bootleg Series Vol. 6: Bob Dylan Live 1964 [2004] Forty years after it was recorded, here was Dylan's big-venue New York City concert at the Philharmonic Hall on Hallowe'en 1964, released as a 2-CD set, with excellent scene-setting, historical-context-setting notes by SEAN WILENTZ (who attended the concert at the age of 13). This is a brief early excerpt from his essay, which begins by reminding us that Dylan was 23 years old at the time, and in intoxicatedly relaxed mood:

> 'Many of the songs, although less than two years old, were so familiar that the crowd knew every word. Others were brand new and baffling. Dylan played his heart out on these new compositions, as he did on the older ones, but only after an introductory turn as the mischievous tease. "This is called 'A Sacrilegious Lullaby in D minor'," he announced, before beginning the second public performance ever of "Gates of Eden". He was the cynosure of hip, when hipness still wore pressed slacks and light-brown suede boots . . .
>
> 'Yet hipness was transforming right on stage. Dylan had already moved on, well beyond the most knowing New Yorkers in the hall, and he was singing about what he was finding. The show was in part a summation of past work and in part a summons to an explosion for which none of us, not even he, was fully prepared . . .
>
> 'The world seemed increasingly out of joint during the weeks before the concert. The trauma of John F. Kennedy's assassination less than a year earlier had barely abated. Over the summer, the murders in Mississippi of the civil rights workers James Chaney, Andrew Goodman, and Michael Schwerner had created traumas anew. President Lyndon Johnson managed to push a Civil Rights Bill through Congress in July 1964; by early autumn, it seemed as if he would trounce the arch-conservative Barry Goldwater in the coming election. But in August, Johnson received a congressional blank check to escalate American involvement in the Vietnam conflict. On a single day in mid-October, Soviet leader Nikita Krushchev was overthrown and Communist China exploded its first atomic bomb. A hopeful phase of the decade was quickly winding down, and a scarier phase loomed.'

Not only are some of the songs the 'old' ones—Dylan even includes a version of that once-troublesome comic 'protest' song 'Talkin' John Birch Paranoid Blues'—and some new—he sings five songs from his newest album, Another Side of Bob Dylan—but some are so new that they're destined to make it onto an album still in the future, Bringing It All Back Home—'Mr. Tambourine Man' and 'It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)' as well as 'Gates of Eden'—and some, like 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now' and 'Mama You Been on My Mind' destined not to be on studio albums at all yet thrillingly new too in their radical exploration of contemporary sex and what could be said of it in song. Dylan's work was one of the things that made it a commonplace later, but here in the hall in October 1964, when Dylan sings lines like 'It's not that I'm asking for anything you never gave before / It's just that I'll be sleeping soon and it'll be too dark for you to find the door', it's a joyous relief to hear someone articulate such stuff, and from so ultra-modern and cool a stance. And in 'Mama You Been on My Mind', to hear someone sing 'It don't even matter where you're waking up tomorrow'—or, as he has it on the unreleased studio cut, 'I don't even mind who you'll be waking with tomorrow / Mama you're just on my mind': well! That level of unpossessive sangfroid took the breath away; in an era when more than a couple of dates with someone meant either owning or being owned by them, this was delirious libertarianism.

Some Dylan aficionados were surprised to find themselves disappointed by this concert when officially released—surprised to find Dylan's voice unappealingly harsh: not rough but piercing—while others, already content with their reasonable-quality bootleg copies, considered it 'a waste' of a Bootleg Series slot. (Others still tend to wince or reach for the skip button when JOAN BAEZ comes on. She duets with Dylan on 'Mama You Been on My Mind', 'With God on Our Side' and 'It Ain't Me, Babe', and Dylan plays harmonica as she sings 'Silver Dagger' alone.) Yet for most, this is a near-crucial addition to Dylan's officially released canon.

Specifically, the concert captures his only live performance of the splendid 'Spanish Harlem Incident' and the first live performance of 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now' (there were very few later, and none has been issued). More generally, it gives us a Dylan who disappeared almost immediately afterwards: the Dylan who almost abolished the divide between performer and audience, who chatted as if one-to-one with the crowd and with good-humoured, open, youthful exuberance. And there's one marvellous moment, caught here, when this abolition of the divide is made vivid and real. Dylan starts to sing one of the songs from the album issued that June, 'I Don't Believe You (She Acts Like We Never Have Met)' and as he's strumming away on the guitar, he forgets the opening words of the song. Eventually, breaking free of the showbiz rules inspiredly, he simply asks if anyone knows how it goes; a chorus of voices chants 'I can't understand, she let go of my hand!' and without breaking stride Dylan switches from a spoken 'Oh yeah' into singing the prompted words.

In one way, this intimate accord between Dylan and his listeners was illusory, and Dylan knew it. He was ahead of the rest of us in many ways. And this too was the concert at which he made his oft-quoted remark: 'I have my Bob Dylan mask on. I'm masquerading.'

As Sean Wilentz sums it up: 'Live 1964 brings back a Bob Dylan on the cusp. . . . It brings back a time between his scuffling sets at the downtown clubs and his arena-rock tours of the 1970s and after. It brings back a long gone era of intimacy between performer and audience, and the last strains of a self-aware New York bohemia before bohemia became diluted and mass marketed.'

[Bootleg Series Vol. 6: Bob Dylan Live 1964, Sony Legacy 512358 2, NY, 2004.]

Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack* [2005] This 2-CD set's title claims to offer the soundtrack to what is the MARTIN SCORSESE film No Direction Home: Bob Dylan, 2005 (and at Scorsese's insistence the cover was changed to add his name under that title). But of course it doesn't. These CDs draw on some of the same material as the film, but offer complete tracks, in roughly chronological order, beginning with a previously unknown 1959 recording, 'When I Got Troubles', ending with 'Like a Rolling Stone' live from Manchester, 1966 (already released on the Bootleg Series Vol. 4: Bob Dylan Live 1966—The "Royal Albert Hall" Concert, 1998), but including, in between, outtakes from Blonde on Blonde, something never made available before—indeed something most people never thought they'd live to hear.

The rest of the collection is of varying rarity and value. That 1959 track 'When I Got Troubles', were it not by Bob Dylan, would be of no interest whatever: but it is. After that comes 'Rambler, Gambler', a track now said to be from August 1960 (accompanying booklet, p.19) or autumn 1960 (same booklet, p.50) and recorded at the University of Minnesota by one Cleve Petterson (though it sounds like a quality-upgraded version of a track on the so-called Minnesota Party Tape of 'Fall 1960' always said to have been recorded by BONNIE BEECHER).

Next is 'This Land Is Your Land', live from the 1961 Carnegie Chapter Hall concert, previously known about but uncirculating; 'Song to Woody'—unhappily, the first album version, rather than, as would have been more logical, the Carnegie Chapter Hall version; 'Dink's Song' and 'I Was Young

When I Left Home', both informally recorded in Minnesota in December 1961 and already widely circulated, with the latter also included on various 'official rarities'; and 'Sally Gal', an outtake from The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan not previously circulated (five takes are known to exist but only one—probably take 3—has previously been in circulation; the one released here is reported to be take 1).

Then comes a Witmark Music Publishing demo version of 'Don't Think Twice, It's Alright' from 1963, already circulating, and a 'Man of Constant Sorrow' taken from the TV show 'Folk Songs & More Folk Songs', Dylan's first US network TV appearance, made in New York City on March 4, 1963 (already circulating, as is video footage); then 'Blowin' in the Wind' from the important New York Town Hall concert of April 12, 1963, previously uncirculating; 'Masters of War' from the same concert (already circulating); 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall' from the Carnegie Hall concert of October 26, 1963 (previously known but uncirculating); 'When the Ship Comes In' from the same concert (already circulating); the early version of 'Mr. Tambourine Man' recorded with RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT as part of the Another Side of Bob Dylan session of June 9, 1964 (already circulating); the wondrous 'Chimes of Freedom' performed live at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL on July 26, 1964 (already circulating); an outtake version of 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue' from the Bringing It All Back Home sessions of January 1965; ditto for 'She Belongs to Me'; the historic début of 'Maggie's Farm' live at the Newport Folk Festival, 1965 (in circulation from the film soundtrack, but now released from the uncirculated Vanguard Records line recording); previously uncirculated outtake versions of 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', 'Tombstone Blues' and 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues' from the Highway 61 Revisited sessions of June 1965; an outtake 'Desolation Row' from the same sessions but previously circulated; and a previously *un*circulated outtake of the same album's title track. Then we get to the never-circulated Blonde on Blonde outtakes: there's a beautifully slow, more conventionally bluesy 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat' with much variant lyrics; an experimental early version of 'Stuck Inside of Mobile with the Memphis Blues Again' on which he hasn't even decided, at the beginning, that the chorus formula will be 'Oh Mama, can this really be the end?'; and a 'Visions of Johanna' backed by THE BAND.

The set finishes with 'Ballad of a Thin Man' live in Edinburgh on May 20, 1966 (three days after the 'Judas!' moment in Manchester), which has circulated as an audience recording but not, as here, from the official line recording; plus, because it ties in with the No Direction Home film, the magnificent Manchester 'Like a Rolling Stone'.

With the set comes a booklet that includes the odd choice of an unimpressive essay by Andrew Loog Oldham, which strives harder to be eccentric than to justify its presence; a not wholly accurate track-by-track guide by Eddie Gorodetsky, a Dylan friend who appears in Masked & Anonymous and was a writer on DHARMA & GREG, the sitcom, when Dylan appeared on it in 1999; and a long, fine piece from AL KOOPER, full of detail both human and factual about the sessions for Highway 61 Revisited and for Blonde on Blonde.

Trivia: as well as adding 'A Martin Scorsese Picture' under the title, an alteration was made to the registration number of the car in the CD-set cover photograph by Barry Feinstein. Its real number, clearly shown as 540 CYN, has been changed to 1235 RD: a whimsical, quiet allusion to those rainy day women . . . but on the inside, they haven't changed it . . . and they haven't changed it on the cover of the No Direction Home DVD either. The car, a British-made Austin Princess, belonged to the ROLLING STONES. The man leaning on it was Dylan's filmmaker friend HOWARD ALK. They were awaiting the old Aust Ferry to take them across the River Severn from England to Wales, after the Bristol and before the Cardiff concerts. In the background, still under construction, is the Severn Bridge; it opened that September 8, replacing the ferry.

[Bob Dylan: Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack, Columbia / Legacy C2K 93937, US (Columbia / Legacy 520358 2, Europe), 30 Aug 2005.]

'Born Again' period, the Dylan began to hint that he must have undergone some kind of conversion to Christian faith halfway through the North American (last) leg of his 1978 world tour, when Street Legal was his current album. This section of the tour ran from October 28 (Carbondale, Illinois) through to December 16 (Hollywood, Florida). On November 24 (Fort Worth, Texas) he wore a metal cross around his neck, which had been thrown onto the stage for him from the audience in San Diego on the 17th.

On the 26th (in Houston), he began to perform what became a series of re-writes of a passage in 'Tangled Up in Blue': instead of 'She opened up a book of poems and handed it to me / Written by an Italian poet from the thirteenth century', Dylan sang 'She opened up the Bible and started quotin' it to me / Gospel According to Matthew, verse 3, Chapter 33.' This was either a mistake or a tease: there is no Chapter 33; nor does it work the other way round: there is no verse 33 in Chapter 3. But at the next concert, two nights later, Dylan cited a passage that made a most pertinent sense, singing 'She opened up the Bible, started quotin' it to me / Jeremiah Chapter 31, verses 9–33.'

This passage states Jeremiah's prophecy of a new covenant. As Rod Anstee notes: 'As a Jew, Dylan understood this to mean a remaking, a renewal of the old covenant of Moses. But in 1978, when he read or was shown this passage his heart and mind was struck by the Christian interpretation of the passage, which is that it is a prophecy concerning the coming of Christ.' Its core is the verse Dylan would reproduce on the sleeve of his 1980 album Saved: 'Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah' (31:31). This is repeated verbatim in the New Testament, in Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews 8:8.

Dylan's tour continued. On December 2nd, in Nashville, he sang an early version of 'Slow Train' at the pre-concert soundcheck, and then during the final concert, he débuted another song later to appear on the Slow Train Coming album, 'Do Right to Me Baby (Do Unto Others)'.

Dylan's move towards Christian faith was encouraged by at least three musicians in his band (though this was only possible if he were receptive to their persuasion). It may be that this process goes right back to the 1975 Rolling Thunder Revue, on which T-BONE BURNETT and STEVEN SOLES were guitarists and DAVID MANSFIELD played violin, mandolin and steel guitar. All three were Born Again Christians, and Soles and Mansfield were back in the band that toured with Dylan all through 1978. Most of the backing singers were members of conventional black churches, with strong faiths.

On a January Sunday in 1979, at Dylan's request, singer MARY ALICE ARTES (who was not in his 1978 band) asked a pastor attached to the very Californian VINEYARD CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP if someone could come to an apartment in Brentwood, West LA, to speak to her 'boyfriend'. She didn't name him. Dylan was duly drawn into both Bible study and worship. He spent the first months of 1979 attending Bible classes most weekday mornings, at the Reseda, California, office of the St. Paul's United Methodist Church of Tarzana (on the southern edge of the San Fernando Valley), a church that the Vineyard Fellowship used for evening services. He attended further classes at the home of songwriter Al Kasha in Beverly Hills.

Dylan's church attendance was soon curtailed by the influx of people drawn by knowledge of his presence—many of them wanting to get him to listen to their demo tapes—and by media attention; but though Pastor Larry Myers disputes this, Dylan appears to have been baptised, as Mary Alice Artes had been, in the swimming pool of Pastor Bill Dwyer in May 1979. (Swimming-pool baptism is not confined to the rich; in many US churches, black and white, where baptism by submersion is practised, the pool of the local motel is often borrowed by the congregation for this purpose.)

Starting on April 30, Dylan went into the Muscle Shoals studios down in Sheffield, Alabama—studios famed for producing great R&B music, including by the exceptional ARTHUR ALEXANDER—and with JERRY WEXLER as producer, began recording what would become the first 'Born Again' album, Slow Train Coming. The sessions concluded on May 4, and the album was released on August 18.

In the autumn, Dylan made what many found a surprising appearance on 'Saturday Night Live' on NBC-TV on October 20, performing three of the songs from the album, backed by five musicians and three female gospel singers (and looking, despite the fire-and-brimstone lyrics sung, strangely tame: almost domesticated). Then came the first gospel tour, beginning on November 1, launched with 14 concerts in 16 days, all at the Fox Warfield Theater in San Francisco, and then continuing for four nights in Santa Monica, two in Tempe, Arizona, two in San Diego, two in Albuquerque, New Mexico, and finishing on December 5 & 6 with concerts in Tucson, Arizona.

These were extraordinary concerts. They began by asking the audience to listen to six songs by the gospel singers with piano accompaniment, and then when Dylan came on he featured only gospel songs, and therefore no material from any album prior to Slow Train Coming. Many of the songs were not on that album either (and would mostly emerge the following year on the next album, Saved). In most places the audience response was mixed. The exception was Santa Monica, where all performances were benefit concerts for World Vision International, a non-denominational Christian charity. Elsewhere, there was less enthusiasm. Part of the crowd was now young Born Again youths in challenging, scripture-based t-shirts; but the normal Dylan part of the crowd was confused and troubled, with some people quietly dismayed and others hostile. Dylan responded with long sermons that included alarming mini-rants about homosexuals and muslims, but were mostly about the end of the world being nigh.

When he reached San Diego he recalled that this was where, the previous year, he had been given a small silver cross, and said this to the audience:

> 'Last time I was here in San Diego—I think about a year ago, I don't know—I was coming, coming from some place, and I was feeling real sick when I came through here and I was playing the show. . . . Anyway . . . just about towards the end of the show someone out in the, someone out in the crowd—they knew I wasn't feeling too well—I think they could see that, and they threw a silver cross on the stage.
>
> 'Now usually I don't pick things up in front of the stage. Once in a while I do, sometimes I don't but, ahh, I looked down at that cross, I said "I gotta pick that up". So I picked up the cross and I put it in my pocket. A little silver cross, I'd say maybe so high.
>
> 'And I put it—I brought it backstage and I brought it with me to the next town, which was out in Arizona. I think it was, uh, Phoenix. Any> way, I got back there: I was feeling even worse than I'd felt when I was in San Diego. I said "Well I need something tonight". I didn't know what it was. I was used to all kinds of things. I said "I need something tonight that I didn't have before". And I looked in my pocket and I had this cross. So if that person is here tonight, I just wanna thank you for that cross.'

Dylan began 1980 with another similar tour, starting in Portland, Oregon, on January 11th, and running through Washington State, Colorado, Nebraska, Missouri, Tennessee and Alabama, and ending on February 9th in Charleston, West Virginia. The response was again mixed and ticket sales were poor. Two days later he was back in Muscle Shoals studios, recording Saved. These sessions lasted five consecutive days.

Later that month, Dylan was thrown a lifeline of worldly affirmation when he was presented with a Grammy by the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences in Los Angeles for 'Best Male Rock Vocal Performance of 1979' on 'Gotta Serve Somebody', the opening track of Slow Train Coming. The live CBS showing of this event was a feast for the eyes. Dylan, elegant in his tuxedo, took the opportunity of performing at the ceremony to hurl the chastising burn of his winning song at a glitzy audience which, having so clearly chosen to serve mammon, was satisfactorily discomfited by its lyric. Dylan accepted the Grammy with the words 'I didn't expect this and I want to thank the Lord for it. And most likely I want to thank Jerry Wexler, BARRY BECKETT, who believed in it. Thank you.'

The following month, in a Los Angeles studio, he played harmonica on one track by fellow Vineyarder KEITH GREEN, 'Pledge My Head to Heaven', which would appear on an album called So You Wanna Go Back to Egypt later in the year.

In mid-April, Dylan was back on tour, beginning with four consecutive nights in Toronto, the third and fourth nights being recorded, and the latter filmed, at Dylan's expense, to provide the material for a live album of his gospel material, to be called Solid Rock. These concerts were ferocious, mesmeric, shining—you might say inspired. They remain a favourite of many Dylan aficionados who are unconvinced by the religious message but appreciative of a great artist on one of the peaks of his form. The record company, more interested in sales than artistry, declined to issue the album, though one track, 'When He Returns', from the last night, was issued officially on the relatively obscure Highway 61 Interactive CD-Rom in 1995.

The tour—which was to be Dylan's last 100 per cent gospel tour—moved on from Toronto through four nights in Montréal, four in New York State, then Massachusetts, back into New York State, Connecticut, Maine and Rhode Island before heading to Pittsburgh and finally Akron, Columbus and Dayton, Ohio.

The tour's last night was May 21, 1980. A month later, the Saved album was released, to some of the poorest reviews of Dylan's career. It seemed the nearest thing he'd ever done to a follow-up album, and with a far less compelling collection of songs and perhaps too a slackening off in production values (a great production having been one of the unarguable strengths of Slow Train Coming). Few people appreciated songs that appeared to relish others' damnation—songs like the title track, in fact, that seemed to boil down to the message 'I'm saved, you're not, ha ha.'

In all this vengeful foment, it was easy to overlook the achievement of 'Pressing On', a really fine piece of hot-gospel songwriting with Dylan's usual deft deployment of biblical text—and thus a case of Dylan adding one more strand of American music to his work as, in his own later, clever phrase, 'a musical expeditionary': and not merely adding it but adding to it in the process.

Easy to overlook too the quiet strength of 'Saving Grace' and of the album's finest moment, the lovely 'What Can I Do for You?' (the stimulus to one of CHRISTOPHER RICKS' best song scrutinies, his short essay 'What He Can Do for You' in 1985). The harmonica solos alone, on this track, justify the album's place in Dylan's canon.

Dylan wrote other fine songs in this period—songs that didn't make it onto any album. The beguiling 'Trouble in Mind' was recorded the first day of the Slow Train Coming sessions, but issued only as the B-side of the single 'Precious Angel' (and with both tracks shortened); and the explanatory, scripturally careful 'Ain't No Man Righteous, No Not One' was recorded a day later. Best were the smouldering, menacing R&B strut that is 'Cover Down / Break Through' and the freewheelin' wit and melodious eloquence of the thoroughly likeable, anthemic 'Ain't Gonna Go to Hell for Anybody' (which would have made a great record). These last two went unrecorded but were both featured live on the April–May 1980 tour, and the latter featured again in further concerts that fall: concerts at which, supposedly under pressure from promoter Bill Graham, secular material returned to Dylan's repertoire.

This short tour, from November 9 through to December 4, began by defiantly re-occupying the Fox Warfield in San Francisco, where Dylan's gospel shows had proved so unpopular the previous year. This time he played 12 nights there, and for the first seven nights, he opened with 'Gotta Serve Somebody' and 'I Believe in You', immediately followed by 'Like a Rolling Stone'. On November 17, for one night only, he followed 'Gotta Serve Somebody' with 'Simple Twist of Fate' and 'All Along the Watchtower'; then came 'Like a Rolling Stone' followed by the Slow Train Coming song 'Man Gave Names to All the Animals'. The other nights reverted to the previous pattern.

What was common to all these concerts was the commitment and beauty of Dylan's vocal delivery, especially on newly introduced songs like the lovely traditional 'Mary from the Wild Moor', and 'Abraham Martin and John' (on both of which Dylan shared vocals with CLYDIE KING), and on his own great new secular songs 'Let's Keep It Between Us' and 'Caribbean Wind'. On November 13, CARLOS SANTANA was a guest guitarist on four consecutive songs in mid-set, 'Covenant Woman', 'Solid Rock', 'What Can I Do for You?' and the turbulent new half-secular song 'Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar'. The following night, MIKE BLOOMFIELD was brought on to play lead guitar on 'Like a Rolling Stone' and, incandescently, on 'Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar'. The night after, the guest guitarist was JERRY GARCIA, who played on 'To Ramona', 'Ain't Gonna Go to Hell for Anybody', 'Girl of the North Country' and 'Slow Train'. Three nights later, Dylan brought on MARIA MULDAUR (another avowedly Christian singer by this point) to sing 'Nobody's Fault but Mine'. And on the last night in San Francisco, the guest was ROGER McGUINN, who played guitar and shared vocals with Dylan on 'Mr. Tambourine Man' and 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'.

From 17 Dylan song performances on the opening night, these concerts had lengthened to 25 songs before the end of the San Francisco run. From there the tour revisited other places on the first, controversial all-gospel tour of the previous year, stopping at Tucson, Arizona, and then San Diego—this time rewarded with a 26-song performance from Dylan—and then Seattle and finally Salem and Portland, Oregon. On the final night, the distinguished bluegrass mandolin player DAVID GRISMAN guested mid-set on 'To Ramona'.

March to May 1981 found Dylan recording the next album, Shot of Love, which seemed to offer a studio version of the religious-secular mix he had been offering in concert, but with new material. 'Groom Still Waiting at the Altar' and 'Caribbean Wind' were now recorded, though in the end neither ended up on the album as first released. ('Groom' was added when the album was CD-reissued.)

Before the album was released, in August 1981, Dylan had returned once again to the road, with four warm-up dates in the US preceding a large-venue tour of Europe, bringing his gospel-plus-secular repertoire to France, England, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, West Germany, Austria and Switzerland, finishing back in France on July 25. These were the first European dates since the highly-acclaimed, sell-out concerts of 1978; in London he returned to Earl's Court, the same vast hall he had played back then; again he did six nights there; yet there was no mistaking the downturn in the excitement he was generating, and no disguising the many empty seats. And in France this time, there were no Paris concerts at all.

The Shot of Love secular material amounted to 'Lenny Bruce' and 'Heart of Mine'; the rest could fairly be accounted Christian in theme and intent, though with the exception of the rather agitated 'Property of Jesus' the songs lack the evangelising of the Slow Train Coming and Saved material. Indeed, the evangelising Bob Dylan—his declamatory 'Born Again' period—was drawing to a close. Yet the new album's last track, the majestic 'Every Grain of Sand', made clear that while Dylan was in retreat from preaching, he remained steadfast in his faith. And in essence, that might still be said to be his position.

If you seek a confession of further retreat, the nearest thing (outside of forming your own judgments about how he comports himself in the world) is in remarks Dylan made to Newsweek in 1997: "I don't adhere to rabbis, preachers, evangelists, all of that. I've learned more from the songs than I've learned from any of this kind of entity. The songs are my lexicon. I believe in the songs.'

As for the work the 'Born Again' period produced, this has to be said: that at their worst Dylan's evangelical songs offer much dead language and a paucity of creative imagination, in contrast to so much of his earlier work. 'Are You Ready?' may express urgently the need to consider the imminent end of the world, but 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall' is an infinitely better song. At their worst, these songs catch a Dylan who has been satisfied to assert and argue and declaim but who has hardly bothered to fulfil the more important tasks of the artist: he has not created worlds here, he has only argued about them.

At their best, though, Dylan's sharp, deft attention to detail in his use of language, combined with a rich range of subject-matter, yield songs that can hold their own in any selection from his corpus. They often offer a strange bonus too, in their mesmerising special tension between text and recording. No other part of his output seems to work so well 'on the page'—perhaps because so much of the lyric content hinges upon close attention to use of language itself, as process, not least in Dylan's witty interaction with biblical text. Yet this work also contains within it the writer's focussing of an intensely felt array of belief, and this is brought alive most powerfully in some of his performances of these works, both in the studio and at such concerts as in Toronto in April 1980.

Moreover, whatever Dylan aficionados might feel about his Christian songs, the best of them surely comprise a body of work that brings to contemporary religious song something fresh yet well-grounded in traditional strengths, something passionate and full of an authentic saturation in biblical teaching and in the gospel music of the black church. Anyone can hear that it wipes the floor with all that awful Pat Boonery, that horrid, pallid, acoustic-guitar-and-tambourine sing-song modernism and those gruesome Age of Aquarius lasers-and-love productions offered to white worshippers over the last 30 years. Dylan's religious work has gravitas.

[Bob Dylan: 'Gotta Serve Somebody', 'I Believe in You' & 'When You Gonna Wake Up?', 'Saturday Night Live', NBC-TV, NY, 20 Oct 1979; remarks to San Diego crowd, 27 Nov 1979; 'Gotta Serve Somebody', Grammy Awards, LA, 27 Feb 1980; 'Trouble in Mind', Sheffield, AL, 30 Apr 1979, Columbia 1-11072, NY (S CBS 7828, London), 1979. Dylan quote, 'a musical expeditionary', No Direction Home, dir. Martin Scorsese, US, 2005; outstanding concert, Toronto, 20 Apr 1980. Keith Green (+ Bob Dylan): 'Pledge My Head to Heaven', So You Wanna Go Back to Egypt, Pretty Good PG1, US, 1980; quote re songs as his lexicon: Newsweek, NY, 6 Oct 1997. Rod Anstee quote, letter to this writer from Ottawa, 16 Dec 1981.]

'Born Again' period, a slow train coming to the Dylan has always given us songs that burned with a moral sense. This was true in 1962 when he was restating the morality of WOODY GUTHRIE on his own début album's song 'Talkin' New York', and it has remained crucial in Dylan's work ever since. He was happy to declare in 'Masters of War' that 'Even Jesus will never forgive what you do', and biblical quotations and allusions pour readily out of the early 'protest' songs: out of 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall' and 'When the Ship Comes In'.

'Let Me Die in My Footsteps', written to deride the craze for fall-out shelters (not the happiest solution to the threat of nuclear war, a threat often felt to be imminent in the 1950s to early-60s, especially during the 'Cuba Crisis' of 1962), shows that the very young Dylan was already confidently using biblical text without missing a beat. The second verse, which begins 'There's been rumors of war and wars that have been / The meaning of life has been lost in the wind', takes its text, without nudging the listener toward noticing it, from the words of Christ given in Matthew 24:6 and Mark 13:7: 'And ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars: see that ye be not troubled . . .' and 'And when ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars, be ye not troubled . . .'

But it is in the work that burgeoned in the mid-60s that Dylan-the-moralist asserts himself forcefully with a new complexity people commonly mistook for amorality or a denial of moral judgment. The songs that included 'she knows too much to argue or to judge', 'there are no sins inside the gates of Eden', 'to live outside the law you must be honest', 'don't follow leaders' and so on—that favourite side of Bob Dylan was never urging on us the unimportance of moral clarity. He was arguing that to achieve that clarity, the individual must shake off the hand-me-down conventional moral codes, and the judgements we make thoughtlessly from them. He was pressing us to take the solo flight of responsibility for arriving at our own morality.

This is everywhere in Dylan's work from 1961 to 1978. When, in 1979, Dylan declared himself 'Born Again', the turnabout was in his acceptance, after all those years, of an outside, handed-down moral code—the Bible accepted as the authentic voice of God and Jesus embraced as the true son of God. It was a complete volte face from 'Don't follow leaders / Watch the parkin' meters' to 'there's only one authority / And that's the authority on high' (on 'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking', from Slow Train Coming, 1979).

It was not, however, a sudden change from the hip amoralist to the priest: Dylan had seized on a new code, but remained utterly consistent in his preoccupation with struggling for a code.

Along with this unfailing sense of the need for moral clarity, Dylan's work has also been consistently characterized by a yearning for salvation. The quest for salvation might well be the central theme of his entire output. To survive, you must attain that clarity of morality: you won't even get by without going that far; and then you must go beyond—get rescued from the chaos and purgatory and find some spiritual home.

This is the constant theme. It is as strong in the Blonde on Blonde period as in any other: 'And me, I sit so patiently / Waiting to find out what price / You have to pay to get out of / Going through all these things twice.' That is how 'Memphis Blues Again' ends; and the chorus of that song too emphasizes this felt need to pass from one place to another—from one quality of life to another: 'To be stuck inside of Mobile / With the Memphis Blues Again!'

Twelve years later, he is waiting and yearning again: 'This place don't make sense to me no more / Can you tell me what we're waiting for, Señor?' (from 'Señor: Tales of Yankee Power' on Street Legal, 1978)—and in the interim we've had the same quest for salvation echoed again and again, from 1967's 'I Shall Be Released' to 1974's Planet Waves: 'In this age of fiber-glass / I'm searching for a gem' (from 'Dirge'); 'My dreams are made of iron and steel / With a big bouquet / Of roses hanging down / From the heavens to the ground' ('Never Say Goodbye') and 'I was in a whirlwind / Now I'm in some better place' ('Something There Is About You'). The same quest for salvation permeates John Wesley Harding (1968) and Blood on the Tracks (1975) too.

It is the focus that shifts. Dylan's quest, as it is unfolded in the songs, has always been a struggle within him between the ideas of the flesh and the spirit, between love and a kind of religious asceticism—between woman as the saviour of his soul, and woman's love seen as part of what must be discarded in the self-denial process necessary to his salvation.

In the early days, woman's love was not enough; all those gotta-move-on songs resulted. By the beginning of the 1970s, Dylan was focusing in the other direction, following the tenets of the Nashville Skyline album: 'Love is all there is / It makes the world go round' (from 'I Threw It All Away'). By the time of 'Wedding Song' on Planet Waves, Dylan is even more specifically disavowing the asceticism of the John Wesley Harding collection, declaring a woman's love rather than religion as his path to salvation: 'What's lost is lost, we can't regain / What went down in the flood / But happiness to me is you / And I love you more than blood.' (More, that is, than the blood of the lamb on which, later, he is to become so keen.)

From Blood on the Tracks, Dylan shifts away from woman as saviour: and to trace this process is to hear his slow train in the distance—to find his quest for salvation refocussing itself into a quest for Christ.

On Blood on the Tracks and the next album, Desire (1976), Dylan is trying to do a balancing act—trying to fuse God and Woman: 'In a little hilltop village / They gambled for my clothes / I bargained for salvation / And they gimme a lethal dose / I offered up my innocence / Got repaid with scorn / Come in she said I'll give ya / Shelter from the storm . . . / If I could only turn back the clock / To when God and her were born / Come in she said I'll give ya / Shelter from the storm.'

The Desire album follows this through: 'Oh sister . . . / And is our purpose not the same on this earth: / To love and follow His direction? / We grew up together from the cradle to the grave / We died and were reborn and then mysteriously saved.'

The fact that it seems to have been so personal a journey—not simply an objective narrator (the Artist) musing on Woman versus God as Salvation in theoretical, philosophical terms—makes it more complex. The personal intensity adds other strands, which it is part of Dylan's struggle to try to interweave. Not only are we seeing Dylan-the-moralist move from the upholder of individual conscience to the priest passing on God's word; not only are we seeing a consistency in a Dylan whose songs have always been rich in biblical allusion and language; not only are we tracing Dylan's tussle between woman as sensual mystery and God; we are also seeing, as the albums of the 1970s unfold, Dylan's increased preoccupation with the idea of betrayal.

This strand begins to appear on Planet Waves—'I ain't a-haulin' any of my lambs to the marketplace anymore'—and it produces in Dylan's work something that at first comes across as an astonishing leap of arrogance: that is, that Dylan quite clearly starts to identify with Christ. He begins to do this not in the conventionally-taught sense—that of Jesus is my friend, sent by God to be human just like me—but in the sense of confusing himself with Christ.

From Blood on the Tracks onwards, we are given parallel after parallel between Dylan and Christ: both charismatic leaders, both message-bringers to their people, both martyrs because both get betrayed. In retrospect, it is as if Dylan eventually converts to Christianity because of the way he has identified with Christ and understood His struggles through his own. (In the period after his outburst of evangelism is over, in the early 1980s, he looks back at his Christ-Dylan parallels with an admirable rigour: one that avoids simplistic revisionist declarations. In particular he looks at these issues in the great 1984 song 'Jokerman', on Infidels.)

Dylan had had one eye on Jesus ever since the motorcycle crash of 1966 (or ever since, as he confessed in 'Sara', he had 'taken the cure' the same year). The unreleased 'Sign on the Cross' from the 1967 Basement Tapes declared: 'I know in my head / That we're all so misled / And it's that ol' sign on the cross / That worries me . . . / You might think you're weak / But I mean to say you're strong / Yes you are / If that sign on the cross / If it begins to worry you.' But from Blood on the Tracks Dylan's identification with Christ begins in earnest:

'I came in from the wilderness . . . / She walked up to me so gracefully / And took my crown of thorns'; 'In a little hilltop village / They gambled for my clothes . . .'

The placing of a crown of thorns on Jesus's head is cited in three of the four Apostles' accounts: Matthew 27:29; Mark 15:17; and John 19:2—texts Dylan revisits in the evangelical period in 'In the Garden' on Saved. The scriptural passage Dylan uses for 'In a little hilltop village, they gambled for my clothes / I bargained for salvation an' they gimme a lethal dose' occurs in all four: mentioned fleetingly in Mark 15:24 ('And when they had crucified him, they parted his garments, casting lots upon them, what every man should take') and yet more fleetingly in Luke 23:34 ('Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do. And they parted his raiment, and cast lots'), it is explained better in Matthew 27:35 and most fully in John, 19:23–24:

'Then the soldiers, when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments, and made four parts, to every soldier a part; and also his coat: now the coat was without seam, woven from the top throughout. They said therefore among themselves, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be: that the scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, They parted my raiment among them, and for my vesture they did cast lots. These things therefore the soldiers did.' That this happens 'that the scripture might be fulfilled' refers back to one of the Psalms of David, Psalm 22, which prophesies Christ and His suffering on the cross. It begins with a prefiguring of Christ's famous words 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' (later spoken by Christ as reported in Matthew 27:46 and Mark 15:34) and it includes this passage:

'. . . the assembly of the wicked have inclosed me: they pierced my hands and my feet. I may tell all my bones: they look and stare upon me. They part my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture' (Psalm 22, 16–18).

Those lines from 'Shelter from the Storm' are matched, in 'Idiot Wind', by 'There's a lone soldier on the cross / Smoke pourin' out of a box-car door'—and the reference to that 'box-car door' prefigures the image Dylan is to choose later of the slow train coming while also reminding us that the links to his earliest influences are still there: Woody Guthrie's autobiography, Bound for Glory, is so titled to quote from the old song 'This Train' ('This train is bound for glory, this train'), and part of the soundtrack from Dylan's film Renaldo & Clara has him singing a song popularized by those other early idols of his, THE STAPLE SINGERS: 'People get ready / There's a train a-comin'' which uses the same train image to stand for the coming of the Lord.

There is another song, 'Abandoned Love', performed by Dylan first at an impromptu guest appearance during a JACK ELLIOTT set in New York in July 1975, and then recorded for, but not released on, Desire, that brings us back to Dylan's process of struggle for salvation as we begin to see it from Blood on the Tracks onwards. It includes this: 'I thought that you was righteous but it's vain / Somethin's tellin' me I wear a ball and chain . . . / I march in the parade of liberty / But as long as I love ya, I'm not free . . . / Let me feel your love one more time / Before I abandon it.'

This is the pivotal theme of all Dylan's major work of the 1970s: his journey from SARA to Jesus. The most interesting work falls in the middle, when Dylan is in the thick of the dilemma. After Desire, we come to the really central album in the journey from the 'Love is all there is' of Nashville Skyline to the core conclusion of Saved, which is that '. . . to search for love, that ain't no more than vanity: / As I look around this world, all that I'm finding / Is the saving grace that's over me.'

This truly central album is Street Legal (1978). It brings it all together: Dylan the consistent moralist, Dylan the writer who draws heavily on the Bible, Dylan caught in the struggle between the flesh and the spirit, Dylan ending his key relationship, Dylan the betrayed victim both of what he sees as love in vain and of all of us.

Consummately, Dylan pulls all these strands together on this album, both on its minor songs and its three outstanding major works, 'Changing of the Guards', 'No Time to Think' and 'Where Are You Tonight (Journey Through Dark Heat)?'.

'New Pony', the first minor song, is a farewell to the world of sensual pleasures, a fond goodbye to remind us that Dylan is not quitting the world because he can't cope with it but because it isn't enough. As the gospel chant in the background repeats, over and over, his feeling underneath is 'How much longer? / How much longer?'—and that counterpointing of Dylan's sexy, sleazy blues voice by the gospel plea for deliverance is a brilliantly economic, forceful way of evoking the tussle between flesh and spirit.

Then there is 'Señor (Tales of Yankee Power)', in which the singer seeks guidance in the attempt to make the leap from worldly meaninglessness to a new higher ground. 'Let's overturn these tables' is the Christ-gesture, a swift allusion to the routing of the money-lenders in the temple (Matthew 21:12: 'And Jesus went into the temple of God . . . and overthrew the tables of the moneychangers . . .'; John 2:15: '. . . he drove them all out of the temple . . . and poured out the changers' money, and overthrew the tables'), to which Dylan adds that 'This place don't make sense to me no more'.

'Baby Stop Crying' re-presents the themes of betrayal and salvation. 'You been down to the bottom with a bad man, babe' is the dark, accusing opening line. The song goes on to try to reach the woman, despite the felt betrayal, urging her to join him down the new road to salvation, with the singer still loathe to walk that road alone: 'Go down to the river babe / Honey I will meet you there.' This plea that she understand the need for a new baptism and the need to renounce, that she accept his need for spiritual journeying, that she come along too, is developed in the album's major songs in writing as absorbing, complex and vivid as anything Dylan has given us.

It is in these songs too that the writer's comparisons between himself and Christ come thick and fast, as Dylan pulls all these themes and strands together and prepares the way unhesitatingly for the Slow Train Coming and Saved albums.

'Changing of the Guards' opens with Dylan reflecting on his own career: the time and energy spent; and at once we are back on the betrayal theme—but here it is betrayal by the world, not one woman. 'Sixteen years' is the opening line: as economic a statement of Dylan's career-span, and the weariness felt, as it would be possible to make. But the song ends with a gentle attempt to explain—and to urge acceptance of—what is to come from 'the new transition'. The times they are a-changing in a radically different way from before. To the world, to the 'gentlemen' of 'the organization', and to his lover too, he sings that the change must come now: 'Either get ready for elimination / Or else your hearts must have the courage / For the changing of the guards'. It can be all right in the end: 'Peace will come / With tranquility and splendor on the WHEELS OF FIRE' but there will be no worldly gain: no instant material dividend to be had from surrendering the old, false life. It must be done anyway: 'Peace will come . . . / But will offer no reward / When her false idols fall / And cruel death surrenders / With its pale ghost retreating / Between the king and the queen of swords'. The embattled lovers must stop their self-destruction and accept the new regime in which truth of spirit is its own reward.

'No Time to Think' has Dylan still on the merry-go-round: the noisy, mechanical going-nowhere of 'real life'. The hypnotic yet ridiculous waltz-rhythm underlines this, as do the incandescent jingle jangles of internal rhyme. Here we have the singer back on the edge, knowing he must make the leap, resist old love and old earthly niggling, yet with the disputatious voices of love and money, public and pleasure, politics and philosophy, all trying for his attention, leaving him no time to think. The song opens with the clear statement of his conviction that without a re-birth, we are among the walking dead: 'In death you face life with a charm and a wife / Who sleepwalks through your dreams into walls'—and 'walls' suggests both the wraithlike quality involved in walking through them and the restrictiveness of their presence. Voices call him back, with their bamboozling choices, their shallow temptations and abstractions.

Dylan is swift to summarise for himself the plain facts of the predicament he's been examining throughout the album: 'You know you can't keep her and the water gets deeper / It's leading you on to the brink . . . / You've murdered your vanity burdened your sanity / For pleasure you must now resist.' 'The bridge that you travel on goes to the Babylon / Girl with the rose in her hair'.

And in the last verse, there's a deft pun on 'receive' in these lines: 'Stripped of all virtue as you crawl through the dirt, / You can give but you cannot receive'. Both meanings of 'receive' refer us to biblical text. First, Dylan acknowledges Jesus' teaching, reported in Acts 20:35: '. . . remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive.' Yet by twisting the line around, as if the giving were easy and the receiving more problematic—'You can give but you cannot receive'—Dylan uses the allusion to lament his lingering reluctance, at this point, to 'receive' Christ himself. On and on goes the struggle: but in prospect at last there is 'Starlight in the east, you're finally released'.

This final journey is the 'journey through dark heat' and out the other side that constitutes the album's final song, 'Where Are You Tonight?' The singer has asked his lover to make the pilgrimage alongside him; she has declined; he has gone on alone. As the song opens, he is on the slow train: 'There's a long-distance train rolling through the rain / Tears on the letter I write / There's a woman I long to touch and I'm missing her so much / But she's drifting like a satellite'. The second verse is a glancing reflection back to the old New York days. In 1965 we had that scathing song 'Positively 4th Street'; this time Greenwich Village's Elizabeth Street is used to place that finished camaraderie (and so to prefigure those lines on Slow Train Coming, 'My so-called friends have fallen under a spell').

The last verse of the song—and of the album—announces Dylan's final arrival at re-birth. He has made it at last. Yet what is striking here is the humanity, the generosity of feeling. There is no note of glee or superiority. There is only a gladness which Dylan admits to, while admitting also that it is lessened by the final loss of love: 'There's a new day at dawn and I've finally arrived / If I'm there in the morning baby, you'll know I've survived / I can't believe it! I can't believe I'm alive! / But without you it doesn't seem right / Oh! where are you tonight?!'

It is therefore only the tone, one of uncompromising certainty, that should surprise us on coming to the Slow Train Coming album, after all the struggle between his twin selves so brilliantly documented by Street Legal. The initial shock should properly be at the leap having succeeded—and at the tone of voice switching from the 'oh! but . . .' of Street Legal to the severe certainty of 'You either got faith or you got unbelief / And there ain't no neutral ground' on 'Precious Angel'.

The substance of what Dylan has to say on Slow Train Coming and Saved, tone of voice aside, is not so very different from what he's been saying before. The import of that last verse of 'Where Are You Tonight?'—'I've finally arrived . . . / I can't believe it! I can't believe I'm alive!', is restated on Saved in 'Saving Grace', which must stand as a direct, careful and courageous summary of his new position: 'By this time I'd-a thought that I would be sleeping / In a pine box for all eternity: / My faith keeps me alive.'

In 1962, as noted, he was writing about the need to conduct one's life in the light of one's expecting death: 'I will not go down under the ground / 'Cause somebody tells me that death's comin' round . . . / Let me die in my footsteps / Before I go down under the ground'; and even in the white heat of the mid-60s he was saying that you have to decide how you behave in the face of the certainty that you will die. (See 'Vacillation' for specifics on this.)

His conversion to Christianity prompted what is essentially a re-statement of that earlier agnostic seriousness, re-approached as 'Prepare to Meet Thy Maker'. It is one of the basic, major themes of Slow Train Coming and Saved—and it is a message Dylan urges on us regardless of our religious tenets. It is a message about not wasting our time in this world, regardless (effectively) of whether we believe there is another world to come. For himself, in this period, he chooses to concentrate on this theme with a conventional Christian focus, but essentially it is a re-statement of the same conviction as to the dignity of life and the individual's responsibility for controlling its quality and worthiness as he was expressing in the 1960s.

[Bob Dylan: 'Let Me Die in My Footsteps', NY, 25 Apr 1962, was issued on the almost immediately withdrawn first version of The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, 1963; with one verse excised it was finally issued on Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 box set, 1991; Dylan had played it privately to IZZY YOUNG at the Folklife Center 22 Feb 1962, performed it in public in Montréal, 2 Jul 1962, recorded it again as a Witmark song-publishing demo, NY, Dec 1962 and played guitar (as Blind Boy Grunt) behind HAPPY TRAUM on the latter's version, NY, 24 Jan 1963, Broadside Ballads, Broadside BR301, NY, 1963; 'Abandoned Love', the Other End, NY, 3 Jul 1975, & at the Desire sessions, NY, 31 Jul 1975, this version issued Biograph box set, 1985.

Woody Guthrie: Bound for Glory, 1943; the 1st paperback edn., which Dylan owned, was Garden City, NY: Dolphin, 1949. The Staple Singers: 'People Get Ready': see 'People Get Ready'.]

Bowden, Betsy [1948 -] Elizabeth Ann Bowden (the Bow pronounced as in bow and arrow) was born in Grove City, Pennsylvania, on January 30, 1948. Now a Professor of English at Rutgers University in Camden, New Jersey, her first work on Dylan was her PhD dissertation, completed at the University of California at Berkeley in 1978. This work then mutated into her 1982 book Performed Literature: Words and Music by Bob Dylan, Chapter One of which was also published as 'Performed Literature: A Case Study of Bob Dylan's "Hard Rain"' in an academic journal in North Carolina.

The book was a pioneering attempt both to find an apt language for discussing in print the non-print parts of Dylan's art (whether the title phrase itself augurs success at this task will strike readers differently) and, in the process, to look at the importance of performance for song as a whole. She was touching here on concerns central to present-day folklore studies, the drift of which from the 1980s onwards was away from 'text' and towards 'performance'. Performed Literature was originally published by Indiana University Press; an edition modestly updated (with a new introduction, chronology, bibliography and appendix) came out from the University Press of America in April 2001.

Bowden's other work includes articles in learned journals—from 1979's 'The Art of Courtly Copulation', published in Medievalia et Humanistica, to 'A Modest Proposal, Relating Four Millennia of Proverb Collections to Chemistry within the Human Brain' in a 1996 edition of Journal of American Folklore. A specialist in Chaucer, medieval literature and folklore, she has published two books on Chaucer and edited the collection Eighteenth-Century Modernizations from the Canterbury Tales, published in 1991, and is now working on a project entitled Beyond Textuality: The Audiovisual Wife of Bath, 1660–1810, looking at verbal, visual and musical interpretations of this pilgrim between that of Richard Brathwaite in 1665 and WILLIAM BLAKE's in 1809.

Bowden has not entirely abandoned Bob Dylan studies. At the 2nd International Conference of the Lyrica Society for Word-Music Relations on the Mountain Campus of Northern Arizona University in Flagstaff in 1998, she delivered a paper entitled 'My Way or Yours? The Album as Aesthetic Unit in the Works of Bob Dylan and FRANK SINATRA', which looked in particular at Sinatra's 1957 album Come Dance with Me and Dylan's album of 40 years later, Time Out of Mind.

[Betsy Bowden: 'The Art of Courtly Copulation', Medievalia et Humanistica no. 9, 1979, Denton, TX, pp. 67–85; 'Performed Literature: A Case Study of Bob Dylan's "Hard Rain"', Literature in Performance vol.3, no.1, 1982, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill; Performed Literature: Words and Music by Bob Dylan, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982, 2nd ed., Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2001; 'A Modest Proposal, Relating Four Millennia of Proverb Collections to Chemistry within the Human Brain', Journal of American Folklore 109, 1996, Champaign, IL, pp.440–49.]

Brady, Paul [1947 -] Born on May 19, 1947 in Strabane, County Tyrone, Northern Ireland, on the border with the Irish Republic, Brady grew up there, listening first to the swing, jazz and show tunes of his parents' generation, and then to 1950s rock'n'roll, 60s pop, Motown, blues, R&B and country music. He taught himself rock'n'roll piano before taking up the guitar at 11 and then developing as a singer while covering the RAY CHARLES and James Brown repertoires in a band called the Kult at college in Dublin in the mid-1960s, while all around him the city was witnessing a renewal of interest in Irish traditional music. One of the groups on this scene, perhaps the least famous, was the Johnstons. Brady joined and recorded seven albums with them.

The Johnstons, including Brady, moved to London in 1969 and then to New York City in 1972, but he quit and returned to Dublin in 1974 to join the much more famous Planxty, and then from 1976 to 1978 formed a duo with fellow ex-Planxty Andy Irvine, releasing the album Andy Irvine and Paul Brady, which clinched his popularity and reputation as one of the great Irish traditional song interpreters. He made an acclaimed solo folk album 'Welcome Here Kind Stranger' in 1978 and then changed direction, putting folksong on the back burner and boiling up widely praised self-composed rock music instead.

Brady is a singer Dylan much admires, calling him one of his 'secret heroes' in the Biograph box set interview in 1985. In Ireland in July 1984, at Dylan's request, Brady showed him how he played his guitar accompaniment to another old song, 'The Lakes of Ponchartrain', which Brady had included on that much-lauded solo album of 1978. Four years after receiving Brady's in-person tuition, Dylan began to perform 'The Lakes of Pont-chartrain' in the acoustic section of his Never-Ending Tour concerts, introducing it at the very first one, on June 7, 1988 in Concord, California. (For an exposition of the rather complex route whereby 'The Lakes of Pontchartrain' came to Brady, see Gavin Selerie's 1995 article 'Tricks and Training: Some Dylan Sources and Analogues, Part 2', which includes excerpts from a letter from Brady to its author.)

It was also Brady who had tidied the old anti-militarist song 'Arthur McBride' into the order and exact shape Dylan recycles on his first return to a solo acoustic album in almost 30 years, 1992's Good as I Been to You. This great Irish folk number was A.L. Lloyd's favourite song—'that most good-natured, mettlesome and un-pacifistic of anti-militarist songs', he called it—and it passed from him into the repertoire of the 1960s English folk scene. It had been collected in Limerick from a Patrick W. Joyce in 1840, and, says Lloyd, 'around the same time George Petrie received a version from a Donegal correspondent. Sam Fone, the aging Dartmoor mason whom Baring-Gould found to be an inexhaustible fountain of songs, [who] remembered it as his father's favourite in Devon in the 1830s. . . . [The song] made its way to the Scottish north-east during the latter half of the century. . . . More recently, a singer from Walberswick, Suffolk, recorded it for the BBC early in 1939.'

The recruiting sergeant was one of the most hated figures in Irish and British life, especially since poverty gave many men little alternative but to join up, though of course in the case of the Irish, the army they were joining was not even their own. The roving recruiting sergeant encountered by Arthur McBride and his cousin had a function halfway between that of the earlier press gang and the modern recruiting office, which still pulls in those with least education and fewest opportunities.

Like 'Jim Jones', this makes for a song readily understood within Bob Dylan's repertoire—and is as good an anti-militarist song as 'John Brown' is a bad one, being alive, spanning many moods and full of individual detail instead of polemical and built upon lurid stereotypes to the exclusion of all real observation.

Paul Brady sang the song in Planxty and later as a solo performer, and his recording of it was on the duo album Andy Irvine and Paul Brady. Brady himself had been familiar with the song for many years, but he found a particular arrangement of it in a 1973 American book, A Heritage of Songs: The Songs of Carrie Grover (a Maine resident of Irish and Scottish ancestry), when living at the home of the 1960s folksinger Patrick Sky in Rhode Island, and this was the version he adapted for his own recording of it in 1976. There is no doubting that Dylan knew this recording, nor that his own performance of it on Good as I Been to You is close—word for word, and melodically—to Brady's.

How interesting it is then, that a specific part of the melody of 'Arthur McBride' is to be found in Dylan's much earlier 'Ballad in Plain D' (from Another Side of Bob Dylan: his previous solo album, as it happens, though from 1964). The tune of each verse's third line is the same in each song—so that 'Arthur McBride's' 'Now mark what followed and what did betide' can be overlaid, syllable for syllable and note for note, by the 'Ballad in Plain D' line 'Noticing not that I'd already slipped'—while the next line, the fourth line of each four-line verse, would also be the same in both songs except that in 'Arthur McBride' the line in question alternates verse by verse between ending on the resolved tonic, as 'Ballad in Plain D' always does, and ending on a half-resolve, to hang over, awaiting the start of the next. The upshot is that half of every second verse of 'McBride'—and the melody-line of the guitar intro too—has the same tune as 'Ballad in Plain D'. Thus, for example, these 'McBride' lines (comprising the second half of verse two)—'And a little wee drummer intending to camp / For the day being pleasant and charming'—can be replaced, so far as the tune is concerned, by these, the second half of 'Plain D's' verse: 'At the peak of the night, the king and the queen / Tumbled all down into pieces.'

It was Paul Brady who introduced these half-resolves on alternate verses. That Dylan follows him in doing so is one of the things that establishes how closely Dylan's version is modelled upon Brady's. If it were not for this, then the second half of every verse of 'McBride' would parallel those of 'Ballad in Plain D'.

This is hardly the whole story, however. Dylan brings his own knowledge and his own otherness to his 'McBride' recording. As Gavin Selerie puts it in a later article: 'I hear Brady's performance beneath Dylan's but there are other influences there as well . . . one can hear layers of musical experience in Dylan's work . . .' Moreover, Brady's phrasing and intonation may in turn owe something to Dylan: '. . . notably a charged casualness of reference and an elasticity of syllabic emphasis.' Playing in Dublin, London and New York in his formative musical years, Brady can hardly have failed to absorb Dylan influences.

Dylan's 'Arthur McBride', then, may be very close to Brady's but the voice is so strongly his own that he makes it seem an apt vehicle for expressing himself, and does so with a fond admiration for the song and a range of feeling that make this a highlight of the album.

Paul Brady has continued to make solo albums and to be a national hero on both sides of the border in Ireland. He has also, through the long reaches of his career, played on an unexpected list of other people's records, including playing mandolin on Tanita Tikaram's Ancient Heart and tin whistle on MARK KNOPFLER's Golden Heart, Mary Chapin Carpenter's Stones in the Road and Marianne Faithfull's cover of the PATTI SMITH song 'Ghost Dance', and sharing vocals with Bonnie Raitt on the title track (which he wrote) of her album Luck of the Draw, and on 'Our Little Angel' on the Roseanne Cash album Retrospective. Many others have recorded his compositions, including (co-written with Ronan Keating) a no.1 country hit for Brooks & Dunn, 'The Long Goodbye' in 2003. His album Nobody Knows: The Best of Paul Brady, 1999, includes 1990s re-recordings of 'The Lakes of Pontchartrain' and 'Arthur McBride'.

[Paul Brady: 'Arthur McBride', Wales, fall 1976, Andy Irvine—Paul Brady, Mulligan LUN 008, Dublin, 1976, CD-reissued LUNCD008, Dublin, 1990; 'The Lakes of Pontchartrain', Dublin, Mar–Apr 1978, Welcome Here Kind Stranger, Mulligan LUN 024, Dublin 1978. For career background this entry owes much to the online biog seen 2 Dec 2005 at www.paulbrady.com/biog/default.asp.

A.L. Lloyd, Folk Song in England, London: Penguin, 1967. Gavin Selerie: 'Tricks and Training: Some Dylan Sources and Analogues, Part 2', The Telegraph no.51, Romford, UK, spring 1995, and quoted from The Telegraph no.54, spring 1996.]

Brecht, Bertolt [1898 - 1956] Eugen Bertolt Brecht was born in Augsburg, Germany, on February 19, 1898, studied philosophy and medicine at the University of Munich and served as a medical orderly in a military hospital in World War I. He was only 20 at the end of that war. He became a socialist, a communist and a dramatist—forced to flee Nazi Germany in 1933 (living in exile in Denmark, Sweden, the Soviet Union and the US) and was prompted to flee the US after being hauled up before the House UnAmerican Activities Committee in 1947—though he gave a brilliant performance at the hearing, not least in that his interrogators failed to grasp his game-playing obfuscation; this drama was once compared to 'the cross-examination of a zoologist by apes'. He returned to Europe and entered the Soviet Bloc's East Germany, forming the Berliner Ensemble theatre company in 1949.

Brecht was, above all, a revolutionary dramatist, refuting the 'make-believe' of the traditional theatre in favour of 'epic theatre', in which ideas and didactic lessons are what is important, and all 'realism' is to be suppressed as distracting from the 'message' of the play. His earliest works as a playwright were written in post-WWI Germany: Baal, Drums in the Night, Jungle of the Cities and A Man's a Man. In 1927 he worked with composer Kurt Weill on his own adaptation of the 1728 play The Beggar's Opera by John Gay (which had been revived to great acclaim in London in 1920). Brecht's re-write was die Dreigroschenoper, or The Threepenny Opera, and mocked the Victorian bourgeoisie instead of Italian grand opera. This is the work that gave us 'Mack the Knife' and 'Pirate Jenny'; it also helped train a number of actors, including Lotte Lenya and Peter Lorre. The more demanding musical play Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny, again with songs composed by Kurt Weill, was completed in 1931.

Brecht's greatest plays were written in exile, in the late 1930s and early 40s: principally Mother Courage (1939), The Good Man of Szechuan and The Resistible Rise of Arturo Ui (1941) and The Caucasian Chalk Circle (1943). In Hollywood in this period he could get none of his screenplay writing accepted other than some work with the great Fritz Lang and John Wexley on the 1942–43 film Hangmen Also Die, which Lang directed (and in which Walter Brennan was cast improbably as a professor).

Like so many intellectuals, Brecht was unsuited to Hollywood, remarking that 'Svendborg was a world center' of ideas in comparison; yet post-World War II Berlin proved almost as far from ideal, and after forming the Berliner Ensemble he wrote only one new play while in East Germany. But Brecht was a poet as well as a playwright and his song lyrics were always arresting and vivid. Not all were written with Weill: in 1930 he worked with the composer Hanns Eisler (who was his almost exact contemporary and would later write the East German national anthem, 'Auferstanden aus Ruinen'), on The Measure Taken.

The songs, naturally, were part of the reason Dylan was so taken with Brecht when he first encountered his work in a Greenwich Village musical production SUZE ROTOLO was designing for, Brecht on Brecht. You could reasonably call them 'protest songs', and they were sometimes achieved, like early Dylan numbers, by reading of a specific injustice in a newspaper and crafting a song from that individual case. In The Threepenny Opera one of the main figures is a kitchen maid fantasising about liberation from those whom she serves. Another early Brecht song came out of a news story about another domestic servant, named as Marie Farrar. It isn't far from here to Dylan's early masterpiece 'The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll'. (Nor, in the simpler sense of a title and a phrase, is it far from Brecht on Brecht to Blonde on Blonde.)

Brecht would sing his own songs, too, with a guitar, in a 'raw, abrasive' voice. Unlike Dylan, he 'loved complicated chords that were difficult to finger: C-sharp minor or E-flat major chords,' as another playwright, Carl Zuckmayer, observed.

In an open letter to Broadside in August 1963, Dylan wrote: 'Hallelullah to you for puttin' Brecht in your same last issue. He should be as widely known as WOODY an' should be as widely read as Mickey Spillane . . .'; in 11 Outlined Epitaphs he wrote: 'I stumble on lost cigars / of Bertolt Brecht' (indicating, beyond the singling out of the artist, that he knew something of the man too: Brecht smoked cigars copiously—and had done so as part of his performance at his HUAC interrogation). Years later, Dylan told ANTHONY SCADUTO that he 'was influenced by Brecht. Used to be Woody, but not any more'. And years later still, in Chroni- cles Volume One, Dylan sets out in far more detail the basis of the pull of the songs (in which, as he rightly says, Weill's 'melodies were like a combination of opera and jazz'):

'I . . . was aroused straight away by the raw intensity of the songs', Dylan writes, and then lists some (including one with a title he used himself in the 1970s, 'Wedding Song'). 'Songs with tough language.' He describes the staging vividly, the characters singing—'thieves, scavengers or scallywags'—and the maid, her attitude 'so strong and burning' in 'a hideous netherworld'; and he stresses the special impact of 'Pirate Jenny':

> 'This is a wild song. Big medicine in the lyrics. Heavy action spread out. . . . It leaves you breathless. . . . This piece left you flat on your back and it demanded to be taken seriously. It lingered. Woody had never written a song like that. It wasn't a protest song or a topical song and there was no love for people in it.'

All this is a very short extract from Dylan's long and impassioned, very specific scrutiny, which includes a clear and direct description of the attempts at a particular kind of songwriting to which the Brecht song led him, and how he couldn't achieve this straight away. A few pages later he takes his leave of Brecht in the book with this:

> 'In a few years' time I'd write and sing songs like "It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)", "Mr. Tambourine Man", "The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll", "Who Killed Davey Moore", "Only a Pawn in Their Game", "A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall" and some others like that. If I hadn't gone to the Theatre de Lys and heard the ballad "Pirate Jenny", it might not have dawned on me to write them, that songs like that could be written.'

The present entry gives only the merest skim across the surface of Brecht's overall pre-figuring of Dylan. The place to find it delineated properly is in the brilliant and refreshing essay by Esther Quin, 'The Brecht of the Electric Guitar'—one of the finest pieces about any aspect of Bob Dylan's work—published in the British fanzine The Bridge in 2004, and which Ms. Quin wrote before she could have known what Dylan himself would say in Chronicles. Only one of the gems in her essay — which draws from a longer work in progress, her PhD thesis on the influence of Brecht on Dylan, at the Victoria University of Wellington, New Zealand—is the 'discovery' of these lines in Brecht's 'Song of the Moldau', written in the US about Nazi-occupied Czechoslovakia:

> 'Times are a-changing. The mightiest scheming / Won't save the mighty. The bubble will burst. / Like bloody old peacocks they're strutting and screaming, / But, times are a-changing. The last shall be the first. / The last shall be the first.'

Bertolt Brecht died of a coronary thrombosis in East Berlin on August 14, 1956.

[Hangmen Also Die, dir. Fritz Lang, Arnold Pressburger Films, US, 1942. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.272–275 & 287. Esther Quin: 'The Brecht of the Electric Guitar', The Bridge no.18, Gateshead, UK, spring 2004, pp. 49–68.]

Bremser, Ray [1934 - 1998] One of the lesser-known of THE BEATS, Bremser was born February 22, 1934 in Jersey City, NJ. He was a minor poet who served prison terms for armed robbery (often when he was only pretending to have a gun) and for drug offences between 1953 and 1965, when his Poems of Madness was published; in 1967 came the prose-poem Angel, with an introduction by FERLINGHETTI, and in 1968 Drive Suite. (Bremser's wife Bonnie published her Troia: Mexican Memoirs in 1969.) He was an acquaintance of GREGORY CORSO and ALLEN GINSBERG, and moved into Ginsberg's upstate New York farmhouse in 1970.

Barry Miles, in his excellent Ginsberg: A Biography, 1989, reports that when Ginsberg came to ask Dylan for $15,000 payment for his appearances in, and work on, the film Renaldo & Clara, he said he 'wanted a car and a stereo set and to give some money to Ray Bremser. The mention of Bremser, whom Dylan had heard read in New York in 1961, did the trick, and the money came through.'

Bremser's other poetry publications were Black Is Black Blues (1971), Blowing Mouth (1978), The Conquerors (1998) and the posthumous The Dying of Children (1999).

Dylan recalls the 'love songs of Allen Ginsberg / an' jail songs of Ray Bremser' in his poem sequence 11 Outlined Epitaphs, on the sleevenotes of his third album. Bremser died of cancer in hospital in Utica, NY, November 3, 1998.

[A useful website is www.cosmicbaseball.com/bremser9.html, seen online 5 Aug 2005.]

Bridge, The* [fanzine] The Bridge, which began in 1998, was a delayed reaction to the inevitable closure of The Telegraph after the death of its founder and editor JOHN BAULDIE in 1996. Looking exactly like The Telegraph, The Bridge was founded by Mike Wyvill and JOHN WRAITH, who had run a regular column, 'Jotting Down Notes', logging new official releases with a Dylan connection, in the earlier journal and now transferred this to their own replacement publication. The first issue began by saying: 'It is with the strangest feeling that we write this introduction. As you will realise we would certainly rather not be doing it at all and that John was still writing . . . in The Telegraph.'

The Bridge, however, has not proved much of a substitute; it conspicuously lacks personality, vision and definition, and its editors never actually seem to come out and say anything—which is very different from John Bauldie's approach. Its small, glossy pages and its quarterliness are ideally suited to discursive essays and criticism rather than to news (which is bound to be a thousand miles behind) or song-performance lists (which take up far too much space) yet it has insisted on trying to offer all these things—with some issues largely given over to MICHAEL KROGSGAARD's interminable lists of Dylan sessions: invaluable in themselves but utterly unsuited to this magazine's pages, and every issue giving page upon page to listings of what Dylan has sung in dozens of consecutive recent concerts—recent, but not recent enough, since by the time The Bridge has been built and opened to its very small public, everyone interested has long since logged those concert lists from more immediate (mostly online) sources. Nor, when it comes to critical scrutiny, do the editors seem qualified to hold out for rigour or wit.

Nonetheless they are lucky enough to have amongst their contributors both ROY KELLY and TERRY KELLY (unrelated people), and their 20-plus issues have offered many individually interesting and valuable pieces, perhaps especially interviews with important and/or quirky people who have been tangled up in Bob down the years; it is able, too, to publish some tremendous rare photographs of Dylan (continuing John Bauldie's tradition of pairing, subtly and without saying so, photos taken years apart yet capturing the same pose or facial expression).

[The Bridge no.1, Gateshead, UK, summer 1998. Website: www.two-riders.co.uk.]

Bringing It All Back Home* [1965] The fifth album—another breakthrough and another sudden jump to new ground. One side of the record is solo and has four long tracks, each of which has become a classic—'Mr. Tambourine Man'; the visionary 'Gates of Eden'; 'It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)' and the beautiful 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue'. This solo side of the album contained more than enough to justify Dylan's burgeoning popularity as a uniquely contemporary spokesman. But the other side was enough to gain him a new notoriety and to lose him even more devotees than his previous album had done. Unprecedentedly, here was this folk-singer committing the ultimate sacrilege of singing rock'n'roll songs with electric guitars behind him. Students—serious-minded young people unaware of the social upheavals about to happen—were appalled that Dylan should resort to such triviality. Mostly this side sounds pretty thin now, and a dress-rehearsal/prototype for what was to come next. But it was undeniably innovative and gives us yet another collection of stand-out Dylan songs, 'Subterranean Homesick Blues', 'She Belongs to Me', 'Love Minus Zero/No limit' and 'Maggie's Farm' among them.

[Recorded NY, 14–15 Jan 1965; released as Columbia CS 9128 (stereo) & CL 2328 (mono), 22 Mar 1965. In UK, CBS SBPG 62515 (stereo) & BPG 62515 (mono), May 1965.]

Bromberg, David [1945 -] David Bromberg was born in Philadelphia on September 19, 1945 but grew up in Tarrytown, New York. He began playing guitar at 13, after hearing PETE SEEGER. After high school he attended Columbia University and assumed he would become a musicologist, but dropped out to join the university of life in Greenwich Village, where he rapidly became a sought-after session musician because of his exceptional touch and feel as a picker on guitar and dobro. He may well be the only folkie who has played behind Chubby Checker.

He made an unscheduled appearance at the 1970 Isle of Wight Festival (the same year as JIMI HENDRIX's appearance, and the year after Bob Dylan's) and believes that it was this performance that gained him a contract for four solo albums with Columbia, on the first of which, David Bromberg, released in 1972, Dylan played harmonica on the final track, 'Sammy's Song' (recorded in New York on October 5, 1971).

By this time Bromberg had already played on two Dylan albums—Self Portrait and New Morning, both in 1970. On the first of these, Bromberg had played guitar, dobro and bass on the New York session of March 3, 1970, and guitar and dobro on March 4 and 5. Back in the studio three months later, he played guitar and dobro on the June 1 session that yielded the Dylan tracks 'Mr. Bojangles' and 'Mary Ann', and on June 3, which produced two more Dylan tracks, 'Can't Help Falling in Love' and 'Lily of the West' (plus the uncirculated 'Jamaica Farewell') and the New Morning track 'One More Weekend'. On June 4 Bromberg again played guitar and dobro, and thus also appears on the Dylan track 'Big Yellow Taxi' and the New Morning title track and 'Three Angels'. On June 5, still on guitar and dobro, Bromberg contributed to 'If Dogs Run Free', 'Went to See the Gypsy', 'Sign on the Window', 'The Man in Me', 'Father of Night' and 'Winterlude'. On June 30 he played guitar on the 15 attempted takes of 'Blowin' in the Wind' that Dylan recorded but which have never circulated. (Bromberg had played on the 1968 Jerry Jeff Walker album Mr. Bojangles and had recorded it himself on his own second album, Demon in Disguise in 1972—and on his third, Wanted Dead or Alive, he put Dylan's then-recent composition 'Wallflower', along with the BLIND WILLIE McTELL classic 'Statesboro Blues'. And on the live 1979 album You Should See the Rest of the Band, he is supported by GARTH HUDSON on two tracks.)

After New Morning and David Bromberg, Bromberg and Dylan next appeared together on the album DOUG SAHM & Band, recorded in New York

in 1972 (which is where Bromberg picked up Dylan's 'Wallflower', of course); but after this they seem to have stayed out of professional contact for almost 20 years. After moving to California in 1977, Bromberg moved again in 1980, this time to Chicago, and he was still there in 1992 when, after Dylan had recorded his first solo album in three decades, Good as I Been to You, he asked Bromberg to produce what would have been an intriguing follow-up album: a follow-up in being another set of traditional folk songs and old blues, but this time backed by a number of musicians, including Bromberg's regular band and, on more than one track, by the renowned Chicago black gospel choir the Annettes (not a children's choir, as reported). Dylan was encouraged to turn to Bromberg after seeing him play, back in the Village that February. Dylan had been to NEIL YOUNG's concerts at the Beacon Theater (February 13–15, 1992) and one night he and Neil went on to the Bottom Line (not the Bitter End, as often stated) to catch a Bromberg performance there.

Dylan and Bromberg went into the studios in Chicago from June 4 to June 21, and reportedly recorded 12–26 songs in that time. In fact it was 30. The few that have circulated—and they didn't emerge at all for more than a decade after their recording—were the JIMMIE RODGERS song 'Miss the Mississippi and You', the traditional 'Polly Vaughn' (which Shirley Collins sang a good deal), the oddly spelt 'Kaatskill Serenade', which Bromberg had composed and which is on his 1977 double-album How Late'll Ya Play 'Til?, and a blues called 'Sloppy Drunk', which bears no resemblance to the Jimmy Rodgers song and may be the old Walter Davis number but was certainly also on the Bromberg double-album. The last of these Dylan tracks was a bit phlegm-driven 1990s Bob-on-automatic but the others were wonderful, especially 'Polly Vaughn'. Unfortunately, they have circulated only in poor quality.

The rest of the recorded tracks, which all remain unheard, comprise: 'Hey Joe'; 'Mobile Line'; 'Just Because'; 'Field of Stone (Would You Lay with Me)'; 'Annie's Song'; 'Jugband Song'; 'Rock Me Baby'; 'Send Me to the 'Lectric Chair'; 'Gotta Do My Time'; 'Su Su's Got a Mohawk'; 'Northeast Texas Women'; 'Sail On'; 'Can't Lose What You Never Had'; 'World of Fools'; 'Everybody's Crying Mercy'; 'Tennessee Blues'; 'Summer Wages'; 'Casey Jones'; 'Morning Blues'; 'Young Westley'; 'The Lady Came from Baltimore'; 'New Lee Highway Blues'; 'Rise Again'; 'Duncan and Brady'; 'The Main Street Moan'; and 'Nobody's Fault But Mine'.

It may be that 'Hey Joe' doesn't really exist, or if it does it's probably only a fragment, since this was merely a warm-up; when Dylan first arrived at the studio, he sat straight down at the piano and started performing it without a word to anyone. The tape wasn't rolling till some time had passed. But Dylan had performed Hendrix's 'Dolly Dagger' in concert in Australia earlier the same year, and would open his Juan-les-Pins concert with 'Hey Joe' that July.

'Mobile Line' is a song cut by the Holy Modal Rounders, JIM KWESKIN and Jimmie Dale Gilmore, but it's based on our old friend 'Hey Lawdy Mama—the France Blues', that great pre-war record by Papa Harvey Hull and Long Cleve Reed. 'Just Because' is probably the old country song written by the Shelton Brothers, recorded by them in 1942 and revived by ELVIS PRESLEY at Sun in 1954 (though unreleased till on RCA in 1956). 'Field of Stone' is a song by David Allan Coe but covered by, among others, JOHNNY CASH and Tanya Tucker; the only well-known 'Annie's Song' is, oh dear, John Denver's.

'Rock Me Baby' may be the B.B. King song revived by Hendrix at the 1967 Monterey Pop Festival—which is essentially the same thing as the earlier ARTHUR CRUDUP song 'Rock Me Mama', cut by Dylan at the Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid sessions almost 20 years earlier—and 'Gotta Do My Time' may be the 1950s Roy Moss song, or a number by FLATT & SCRUGGS also cut by Johnny Cash, but may equally be the bluegrass favourite 'Doin' My Time', by Jimmie Skinner. 'Can't Lose What You Never Had' is a MUDDY WATERS number. 'Everybody's Crying Mercy' is by Dylan's old Greenwich Village acquaintance MOSE ALLISON: it's on a 1968 album of his, I've Been Doin' Some Thinkin', but had been revived by Bonnie Raitt in 1973 (and a couple of years after these Dylan-Bromberg sessions was revived again by ELVIS COSTELLO).

'Tennessee Blues' was a song Dylan had played harp on at the Doug Sahm sessions of 1972 (which Bromberg had also attended); 'Morning Blues' might prove to be the LIGHTNIN' HOPKINS song of that name, or LEADBELLY's 'Good Morning Blues', or the lovely Uncle Dave Macon number 'Mourning Blues'. 'Young Westley' was written by folksinger Mary McCaslin, and featured on her 1974 début album Way Out West. Tim Hardin wrote 'The Lady Came from Baltimore' (which Dylan went on to perform live in 1994: twice in the US in April and once in France in July).

The Dallas Holm gospel number 'Rise Again', which Dylan had sung 11 times in concert in 1980 and once in 1981, is the track reported to use the choir, but in fact this is more prominent on 'Nobody's Fault But Mine', the old blues gospel number by BLIND WILLIE JOHNSON (and which MARIA MULDAUR had sung at a 1981 Dylan concert). 'Casey Jones' and 'Duncan and Brady' are well-known traditional black ballads, and 'Sail On' is probably the 1934 Bumble Bee Slim hit 'Sail on Little Girl Sail On', covered widely in the 1930s—including by Leadbelly and Roosevelt Sykes—and many times since.

The provenance of 'Su Su's Got a Mohawk' has not been identified, despite its distinctive working title. 'Summer Wages' is a mid-1960s composition by Ian Tyson of IAN & SYLVIA. As for 'New Lee Highway Blues', this is based on 'Goin' Down the Lee Highway', written by G.B. Grayson of Grayson & Whitter, one of the founding success stories of recorded Old Timey music (and whom Dylan had encountered on the HARRY SMITH anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC). Their 1929 recording led to its widespread adoption as a standard under the title 'Lee Highway Blues'; it was duly turned into 'New Lee Highway Blues' by Bromberg himself.

And that is the striking story of these sessions: that an almost absurd proportion of the songs recorded were Bromberg songs, whether written by him or not. As noted, he had written and recorded 'Kaatskill Serenade' and recorded 'Sloppy Drunk'. 'World of Fools' is also his, as is the rambunctious 'Northeast Texas Women' (not 'Woman', as often listed by Dylan discographers), a song from yet another Bromberg album, 1979's Bandit in a Bathing Suit. Additionally 'Jugband Song' is on his 1972 album Demon in Disguise; 'Send Me to the 'Lectric Chair' (originally by Bessie Smith in 1927), 'New Lee Highway Blues' and 'The Main Street Moan' are all on Bromberg's Wanted Dead or Alive; and 'Young Westley' and 'Summer Wages' are further tracks on the double-LP How Late'll Ya Play 'Til?.

This preponderance of old Bromberg material was apparently mostly at Dylan's insistence. At the time, casting around for songs, reportedly he kept saying, 'What about that one of yours . . .' Afterwards, of course, it was a different matter. Perhaps Dylan felt that it had turned into a David Bromberg album; perhaps not. But for whatever reason, having asked Bromberg to mix a few tracks—six or seven, apparently—he heard the mixes, hated them and promptly abandoned the entire album. And he reportedly ordered the tapes destroyed. They weren't, and Dylan is sitting on the masters. Yet to judge by the quality of 'Kaatskills Serenade' and 'Polly Vaughn', this really is the great lost Dylan album.

Five years later, Bromberg was still Chicago-based when Dylan's Never-Ending Tour came through the city on a wintry night—December 14, 1997—and Bromberg came on stage in the middle of Dylan's set and played guitar on the instrumental 'Ragtime Annie' (his own composition) and on 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry'. So far it's been their last connection.

Bromberg had spent his first Chicago years training at the Kenneth Warren School of Violin Making, and these days spends less time performing than making, selling and repairing these instruments (and their bows) from his store in Wilmington, Delaware (the town in which Dylan's first wife SARA grew up). He still plays music live, with Jay Ungar & Molly Mason and others—usually acoustic music, and covering, as he always has, an enormous sweep of different music, from jazz to rock to gospel to bluegrass. In 2005 he played over 40 gigs, including nine festival dates, sometimes with the David Bromberg Big Band, sometimes with the David Bromberg Quartet and sometimes as part of the Angel Band (comprising the Wilmington-based O'Byrne Family plus electric bassist Bob Taylor).

In 2003 he released a 'new' CD by the David Bromberg Quartet, confessing the age of its material by the title Live New York City 1982 and issued on the somewhat defensively named label David's Private Collection.

[David Bromberg: David Bromberg, Columbia 31104, US, 1972; Demon in Disguise, Columbia KC31753, US, 1972; Wanted Dead or Alive, Columbia 32717, US, 1974. The David Bromberg Band: Midnight on the Water, Columbia CK33397, 1975; How Late'll Ya Play 'Til?, San Francisco, 18–19 Jun 1976, Fantasy, US, 1977; Reckless Abandon, Fantasy, US, 1987; Bandit in a Bathing Suit, Fantasy, US, 1979; You Should See the Rest of the Band, 1979, Fantasy F-9590, US, 1980, CD-reissued with My Own House (originally 1980 also) as My Own House/You Should See the Rest of the Band, Fantasy 24752, US, 1999 (on which Garth Hudson is credited as playing organ and accordion). The David Bromberg Quartet: Live New York City 1982, David's Private Collection, US, 2003.

Bob Dylan: 'Dolly Dagger', Perth, 18 Mar 1992; 'Lady Came from Baltimore', Davenport, IA, 6 Apr 1994, Peoria, IL, 13 Apr 1994 & Besançon, France, 4 Jul 1994; 'Rise Again' débuted San Francisco, 18 Nov 1980 & last played Clarkston, MI, 12 Jun 1981.]

Broonzy, Big Bill [prob. 1893 - 1958] William Lee Conley Broonzy was born in Scott, Mississippi, on June 26, 1893 or 1898. (He claimed the former; the latter is the date on his twin sister's birth certificate). He became one of the most famous, influential, versatile and retrospectively dismissed names in the history of the blues: a singer, songwriter, guitarist and teller of wholly unreliable tales, starting his career in the late 1920s and helping to set in motion in the late 1950s the folk revival movement that hit its peak soon after his death.

One of 21 children, he and his family moved to Arkansas to farm early in the 20th century; he served in France in World War I and moved to Chicago in 1920, where he was later recorded more frequently than any other single figure. He knew everyone, played with most and racked up huge sales, not least in partnership with Georgia Tom (later the gospel songwriter and music publisher THOMAS A. DORSEY) on a series of nudge-nudge records as by the Famous Hokum Boys. With the Boys' associate Hannah May (aka Jane Lucas), too, he made records like 1930's 'Pussy Cat, Pussy Cat', which begins with Ms Lucas singing the immortal 'You can play with my pussy but please don't dog it around / If you going to mistreat it, no pussy will be found', to which Big Bill, wittily bringing in nursery rhyme and combining it with the 'Cor-rina Corrina' format, ripostes: 'Pussy cat, pussy cat, where have you been so long?'

In the 1930s alone Broonzy played on more than 600 recorded sides (including accompanying rôles), defying the power of the Depression to shut him down. His feel-good guitar style and strong vocals were a shaping force in that decade and that city, but though he had an uncanny facility for changing styles, when fashion shifted more fundamentally in the late 1940s and MUDDY WATERS electrified Chicago, Broonzy felt the backlash, yet then found belated favour among white audiences interested in 'folk blues' and 'authenticity', and his last decade was spent pleasing concert audiences in Europe as well as in the US. In turn, after his death in 1958, and after the first release on vinyl of pre-war recordings by more uncompromising artists, Broonzy's name became almost a byword for middle-of-the-road Uncle Tom blues (despite his participation in the brave and daring conversation with MEMPHIS SLIM, SONNY BOY WILLIAMSON and Big Bill recorded by ALAN LOMAX in 1947 and released later as Blues in the Mississippi Night, in which they described the iniquities of the racial divide and the violence of life for blacks in the South, and despite his overt 'protest song' dating back at least to the start of the 1950s, 'Black, Brown and White').

Whatever was said of him, his influence was ubiquitous, as Dylan acknowledged. In the interview accompanying the Biograph box set in 1985, Dylan places Broonzy's cultural significance for those who had grown up in the white 1940s and for whom Big Bill was somehow an inevitable presence within the bohemian world: 'the newer poets and folk music, jazz, Monk, Coltrane, SONNY and BROWNIE, Big Bill Broonzy, Charlie Christian . . . it all left the rest of everything in the dust.'

One of Broonzy's stories is that in 1933 he lost a songwriting contest to MEMPHIS MINNIE when his 'Just a Dream (On My Mind)' was defeated by her 'Me and My Chauffeur Blues'. His contest loser is a terrific song in itself, and with strong 'Dylanesque' touches. You can easily hear him in your head singing these lines with relish and aplomb: 'I dreamed that I got married, raised up a family / I dreamed I had ten children and they all looked just like me / . . . I dreamed I had a million dollars, had a mermaid for a wife / I dreamed I won the Brooklyn Bridge on my knees shootin' dice.'

The songs with which Broonzy is associated include 'This Train Is Bound for Glory'; 'Key to the Highway', which he may not have written (pianist Charles Segar recorded it first) but he made it a 'classic' and it was one of the tracks released on SAM CHARTERS' highly influential 1959 LP The Country Blues; and 'When Did You Leave Heaven?'

Dylan's work grazes up against 'This Train Is Bound for Glory' in a number of ways (and it gives WOODY GUTHRIE the title for his autobiography); Dylan performs 'Key to the Highway' during the surprising sets delivered at Toad's Place in New Haven, Connecticut, on January 12, 1990, and again in concerts in Washington, D.C., on January 17, 1993 and in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, on September 23, 1995; and Dylan both performs and records 'When Did You Leave Heaven?' In concert he débuted the song in Stockholm on May 28, 1989 and sang it a further six times that year. This song too is included in the Toad's Place sets, and received two further outings in 1991—in Montevideo, Uruguay, that August 12 and in Rio de Janiero nine days later. Dylan's studio recording of 'When Did You Leave Heaven?', made in Hollywood probably in June 1987, is one of the better tracks on the 1989 album Down in the Groove.

Big Bill Broonzy died in Chicago on August 15, 1958. When news of his death reached Europe, an international collection was taken up for his widow. Embarrassingly, there was found to be no more than one.

[Big Bill: 'Just a Dream (On My Mind)', Chicago, 5 Feb 1939; 'Just a Dream No.2', Chicago, 14 Sep 1939; 'Key to the Highway', Chicago, 2 May 1941, The Country Blues, RBF RF-1, NY, 1959. Jane Lucas & Big Bill: 'Pussy Cat, Pussy Cat' (aka 'Pussy Cat Blues'), NY, 15 Sep 1930, Big Bill Broonzy 1928–1935: Do That Guitar Rag, Yazoo L-1035, NY, 1973. Big Bill Broonzy: 'Black Brown and White', Paris 20 Sep 1951, Paris 7 Feb 1952, Antwerp, 29 Mar 1952 & Copenhagen, 4 May 1956; 'When Did You Leave Heaven?', Paris, 21 Sep 1951; 'This Train', Copenhagen, 4 May 1956; 'This Train Is Bound for Glory' (with Pete Seeger), Big Bill Broonzy and Pete Seeger in Concert, Verve Folkways FV 9008, US, 1963.

Blues in the Mississippi Night, Chicago, Mar 1947, 1st release United Artists, US, 1959; CD-reissued Rounder CDROUN1860 / 6 82161 1860 2 3, US, 2003. Broonzy's story re songs & Memphis Minnie is in his autobiography Big Bill Blues (as told to Yannick Bruynoghe), London: Cassell, 1955, re-told in Linda Dahl, Stormy Weather: The Music and Lives of a Century of Jazz Women, New York: Pantheon, 1984.]

Brown, Richard Rabbit [c.1880 - 1937] BONNIE BEECHER recalls that around 1960 Dylan and HARVEY ABRAMS sat around in the 10 O'Clock Scholar in the Dinkytown area of Minneapolis, mentioning obscure singers' names, and that she and Dylan met because she was able to join in. This was because she would go to Sam Goodys in New York to buy records, choosing 'any old record that looked like it had some kind of funky singer or blues singer . . . records by CAT IRON, Rabbit Brown . . .'

She's misremembering here: there was no such thing as a Richard Rabbit Brown record available at Sam Goodys, either then or since. Yet by May 1961, when he was recorded in Bonnie Beecher's own Minneapolis apartment, Dylan was already performing Rabbit Brown's great 'James Alley Blues'. He knew it, and Ms Beecher knew the name, from the HARRY SMITH anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC, issued in 1952, on which it appears as track 61 of the overall 84.

'James Alley Blues' was the very first track Brown recorded at the only session he ever achieved, which was for Victor in a garage in New Orleans on Friday, March 11, 1927. It was the city he'd been born in, and into great poverty, over 40 years before he got to make his record. Jane's [sic] Alley was a noted rough-house, street-fighting area, the worst place in the patch known as 'the Battlefield', and no-go area to the police. Louis Armstrong came from Jane's Alley too. A street singer, Brown also worked as a singing boatman on Lake Pontchartrain. 'I done seen better days but I'm puttin' up with these . . .' he sang, in his voice of molten chocolate.

That's one of the lines from 'James Alley Blues', and if you mix together the Bob Dylan-SAM SHEPARD line from 'Brownsville Girl', 'I feel pretty good but that ain't sayin' much: I could feel a whole lot better', and the ROBERT HUNTER-Bob Dylan line from 'Silvio', 'Seen better days but who has not?', you're more or less back to Rabbit Brown's.

Brown's song also includes the common-stock couplet 'Sometime I think that you too sweet to die / Then another time I think you oughta be buried alive' (though there's nothing 'common' about it when Brown's voice shudders and resonates along his complex vowel-sounds as he lands on those words 'die' and 'alive'). Variants of this formulation can be traced in earlyish Dylan songs such as 'Black Crow Blues', with its 'Sometimes I'm thinkin' I'm too high to fall / Other times I'm thinkin' I'm so low I don't know if I can come up at all'.

Dylan, however, owes a more striking debt to Brown's 'James Alley Blues' than those above. Most of us used to think, hearing the formulation 'Well it's sugar for sugar and salt for salt', used on his 1967 song 'Down in the Flood', that this was Dylanesque playful weirdness (if not mysterious drug terminology), typical of the Basement Tapes material. Later, we might have assumed instead that it was Dylan quoting one of these formulaic blues phrases: another common-stock motif. In fact, it seems an individually created variant, actually appearing on only one extant record: Rabbit Brown's 'James Alley Blues'. Dylan adapts this but slightly, shifting it from 'I'll give you sugar for sugar, let you get salt for salt / And if you can't get along with me well it's your own fault' to include his own song title within it: 'Well it's sugar for sugar and salt for salt / If you go down in the flood it's gonna be your fault'.

Decades later, returning to the terrain of those floods on the "Love and Theft" album's majestic 'Mississippi', Dylan calls up the memory of Brown again, and of his transcendent voice, when he echoes yet another line of 'James Alley Blues'. Brown delivers the classic complaint 'Cos I was born in the country, she thinks I'm easy to rule / She try to hitch me to a wagon, she try to drive me like a mule.' Dylan sings two separate lines that reprise Brown's key words here. The words on which Brown's voice lands with its incomparable juddering emphasis are 'country' and 'mule'. In each case Dylan returns them to us with equivalent feeling as he too lands on them with heartfelt, dark-toned emphasis, on his own lines 'I was raised in the country, I been workin' in the town' and 'Well, the devil's in the alley, mule's in the stall'. In each case, the word is mid-line, not at its end; yet the expressiveness of that 'country' and that 'mule' as he sings of them takes us straight back to, and is wholly worthy of, Rabbit Brown himself.

Brown's other five recorded numbers, all done that same March day in 1927, were 'Great Northern Blues' (which was never issued), 'Never Let the Same Bee Sting You Twice', 'I'm Not Jealous', 'Mystery of the Dunbar Child' (about a local kidnapping) and 'Sinking of the Titanic', but he was also known to sing 'Gyp the Blood', about a murder, and his signature song on the street was 'Downfall of the Lion', about the far more famous murder of New Orleans police chief David C. Hennessey by a gang of men who ambushed him in the streets in 1890 (when Rabbit Brown was a child). It was a notorious case all across the States at the time. Brown never got to record it, but local blues guitarist Lemon Nash, who long outlived his old friend, recalled that one of the verses was this: 'I'm gonna tell you racketeers, something you can understand: / Don't let your tongues say nothin' that you head can't stand.' Which makes it sound as if it must have been another 'James Alley Blues'. We lost out there.

Richard Rabbit Brown is reported to have died, still in great poverty and still in New Orleans, in 1937. This has never been confirmed.

[Bonnie Beecher, aka Jahanara Romney, quoted in Markus Wittman, 'The Wanted Man Interview: Jahanara Romney', Telegraph no.36, Romford, UK, summer 1990.]

Browning, Robert [1812 - 1889] The dramatic monologue differs from the soliloquy, which it superficially resembles, in starting with an already established perspective, instead of searching for one as it runs its course. It looks outwards, so that self-revelation appears incidental. It takes the form of a one-sided conversation: half of a dialogue in which the imagined other participant gets only an implicit hearing. It is an open-ended excerpt from the mind of the speaker: it has, in Robert Langbaum's words, 'no necessary beginning and end but only arbitrary limits, limits which do not cut the action off from the events that precede and follow, but shade into those events, suggesting as much as possible of the speaker's whole life and experience'. The unity of the form is its singleness of viewpoint. Browning mastered the dramatic monologue as no one before him; Dylan has used it as no one else since.

They share a brand of irony and dramatic similarities of technique. Part of Browning's 'Bishop Blougram's Apology' (published in Men and Women, 1855) runs as follows: 'You Gigadibs, who, thirty years of age / Write statedly for Blackwood's Magazine / Believe you see two points in Hamlet's soul / Unseized by the Germans yet . . .' In 'Ballad of a Thin Man' Dylan sings: 'You've been with the professors and they've all liked your looks / With great lawyers you have discussed lepers and crooks / You've bin through all of F. Scott Fitzgerald's books / You're very well read, it's well known / But something is happening here and you don't know what it is, / Do you, Mr Jones?'

These two mockings, adopting much the same tone of voice, become identical in tone when addressing their silent interlocutors. 'You, Gigadibs.' 'Do you, Mr Jones?'

Not only do the techniques resemble each other—they are put to comparable uses. Both attack the complacency that makes men use their intellects as blindfolds. Bishop Blougram reproves Gigadibs for not being alive to the real world; Dylan derides the artificial safeness of vicarious living. The same song extends his attack (and with mathematical rhymes again, too): 'You have many contacts / Among the lumberjacks / To get you facts / When someone attacks / Your imagination.'

When Browning and Dylan address this theme of life versus nullity of experience, the results are comparable more than once. Here is Browning again: 'Lord so-and-so—his coat bedropped with wax / All Peter's chains about his waist, his back / Brave with the needlework of Noodledom / Believes!'—and here is Dylan: 'And Ezra Pound and T.S. Eliot / Fighting in the captain's tower, / While calypso singers laugh at them / And fishermen hold flowers. . . . And nobody has to think too much / About Desolation Row.' And Browning again: 'you know physics, something of geology, / Mathematics are your pastime; souls shall rise in their degree; / Butterflies may dread extinction,—you'll not die, it cannot be!'

In all this, Dylan's use of the dramatic monologue conforms to Browning's use of it. But Browning usually identifies the narrator and his environment explicitly; Dylan often fills in these details implicitly, frequently using a belated introduction of his persona's position to achieve a particular effect. In 'Desolation Row' this happens only in the final verse, where it is sprung upon the listener that the whole song has been communicating on a person-to-person, and intensely personal, level: 'When you asked me how I was doing / Was that some kind of joke?' In 'Gates of Eden', similarly, the last stanza gives us the narrator's reflection that 'At times I think there are no words / But these to tell what's true / And there are no truths outside the gates of Eden': so that the rest of the song is thrown back upon us, demanding an immediate reassessment.

Another difference is that whereas Browning projects varied fictional characters, Dylan, like other modern writers, often projects himself, so that it becomes difficult to distinguish the created character from the man. There is a consequent further divergence between Browning's conventions and Dylan's. With Browning, the silent interlocutor is not merely silent but actually unnecessary: a mere tip of the hat to Victorian expectations. In contrast, Dylan's 'silent' interlocutor is not merely eloquent in helping to draw out the narrator's mood and predicament, but in many cases has a felt presence the exploration of which is central to the song's purpose—as in 'Most Likely You Go Your Way (And I'll Go Mine)', 'One of Us Must Know (Sooner or Later)', 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat' and '4th Time Around' (where two women are portrayed in this extraordinarily implicatory way), all on Blonde on Blonde.

Perhaps most of all we encounter this in 'Positively 4th Street': 'You see me on the street, / You always act surprised; / You say How Are You?—Good Luck! / But you don't mean it / When you know as well as me / You'd rather see me paralysed: / Why don't you just come out once and scream it?'

The effect, in this passage, hardly depends at all on the 'How are you?' and 'Good Luck!' that the interlocutor is permitted to actually say: the force of his portrayal comes from that masterfully irregular last line. Its length and pent-up cadence half-echo, half-mimic the scream that is withheld. Yet here too Dylan returns this dramatic monologue to somewhere close to Browning's. To hear the song not as Dylan addressing a woman but as Dylan challenging the callow pigeon-holing and 'the dirt of gossip' (as he calls it elsewhere, in a phrase that might be Lawrence's) of those who see him on the street, is to place it in the footsteps of 'Bishop Blougram's Apology', in which the Bishop, falsely assumed to have grown worldly and corrupt, addresses 'an idealist. . . . [T]he Bishop proceeds . . . to expose the young man's affected pose . . . and charges that in any age he would merely echo fashionable ideas.' (The précis is from Roma A. King: The Bow & The Lyre: The Art of Robert Browning, 1957.)

Beyond the dramatic monologue, other corridors run between Dylan's work and Browning's. One reaches back to Browning the archetypal Victorian in experiencing (like Dorothea Brooke in George Eliot's Middlemarch, 1871–72) 'aspiration without an object': experiencing, that is, religious ardour without being able to focus it on traditional Christianity. Unable to worship God, George Eliot consecrated duty. Faced with the same predicament, Browning idealized love. So did Dylan.

As Walter E. Houghton explains it in The Victorian Frame of Mind (p.385): 'In an age of transition in which crucial problems, both practical and theoretical, exercised the thinking mind at the expense of the sensibility, and in which baffled thought so often issued in a feeling of impotence and a mood of despair, the thinker could find in love a resolution of psychological tensions, and a religion . . . to take the place of Christianity.'

The first hint of this process at work in Dylan comes at the end of the John Wesley Harding album, where the agonized search for a more noble America ends in 'Close your eyes, close the door'. The Dylan of Nashville Skyline redirects his search towards fulfilment through love. As with the Victorians, that way lies salvation. 'Love is all there is'.

Then there's their equal relish for the blatantly grotesque. G.K. Chesterton, thinking of Behemoth in 'Job', wrote that '. . . the notion of the hippopotamus as a household pet is curiously in the spirit of the humour of Browning.' It has the appeal of incongruity, and this scatters itself throughout Browning's work, in rhymes, names, ludicrous alliteration (that 'needlework of Noodledom') and in a Puckish garlanding together of temperamental incompatibles, as in 'The Cardinal and the Dog' (1890). In this short poem, the Cardinal lies on his death-bed at Verona and cries out loud to try to stop 'a black Dog of vast bigness, eyes flaming' from jumping all over the sheets.

It is an area of humour Dylan enjoys as fully. His sense of the grotesque continually invades his visions both of carefree living ('Saddle me up a big white goose / Tie me on her and turn her loose') and of Apocalypse. There is the common circus imagery—camels, clowns, freaks, masked faces, organ-grinders, dwarfs—and people with their trousers down, from the President of the United States to Dylan himself ('They asked me for some collateral an' I pulled down my pants').

This Browning-like celebration of the incongruous is everywhere in Dylan's mid-1960s work. In 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat' it isn't only the panache of, say, 'you know it balances on your head just like a mattress balances on a bottle of wine' sung with appropriate top-heaviness (Chaplin on a tightrope) as just one line within a formal, 3-line, 12-bar framework. It's also the obvious pleasure taken in Dylan—prophet, visionary, seer—singing a whole song about a hat. (Not a pleasure appreciated by the antagonists at Dylan's 1966 concerts.) This same mood, Dylan as surreal Puck, figures beguilingly throughout the Basement Tapes, especially in songs like 'Million Dollar Bash'—where a Browning-like alliterative lunacy is much in evidence: 'Well that big dumb blonde / With her wheel gorged / And Turtle, that friend of theirs / With his cheques all forged / And his cheeks in a chunk . . .' The needlework of Noodledom lives indeed.

In different mood, Dylan returns us, in the 1980s, to the work of this predecessor in the marvellous 'Blind Willie McTell' (see entry). One of his inspired touches, in that song's nigh-perfect penultimate stanza, is to underscore his tolling of doomsday by contorting those well-known lines of optimism and hope, 'God's in His heaven—All's right with the world.' The twisting of this fresh-faced couplet into the brutish modernism of 'Well God is in His heaven / And we all want what's His' could hardly be bettered. Dylan uses the mugging energy of the bare greed he describes to give his lines a slashing economy, hitting us with the switch from the lost innocence of the original.

Those lines are by Browning—from the first section, 'Morning', of the dramatic poem 'Pippa Passes'—and Dylan's song takes from the poem more than just this one, expertly-handled, crude allusion. To know the context is to see that Dylan snatches away not just the gentleness, nor even primarily the reassuring stasis or apparent permanence of those often-quoted lines, when he replaces Browning's contentment with the bleakness of 'But power and greed and corruptible seed seem to be all that there is' but more especially Dylan contradicts Browning's vision of the world as fresh and pure because young, because purged by the coming of spring.

This is the context: 'The year's at the spring, / And day's at the morn; / Morning's at seven; / The hill-side's dew-pearled; / The lark's on the wing; / The snail's on the thorn; / God's in His heaven—/ All's right with the world.' Dylan's 'seed' deftly acknowledges this context, while shrivelling it away at once into the biblical rhetoric of 'corruptible seed': a latency that promises only further decay in a world already old and exhausted. Dylan turns morning into mourning, replacing the lark on the wing with the hoot-owl in the barren trees.

And if many an old song lies behind 'Blind Willie McTell' (see entry), Browning's verse too serves as a structural model. To the extent that Dylan's verses can be said to set themselves out in reverse order, to roll backwards through the panorama of North America's southern history, this follows Browning, who sets out his own scene backwards: 'The year's at the spring, / And day's at the morn; / Morning's at seven . . .'

Here's one last parallel. This is Browning, from 'Up at a Villa—Down in the City', also in Men and Women: 'Look, two and two go the priests, then the monks with cowls and sandals / And the penitents dressed in white shirts, a-holding the yellow candles / One, he carries a flag up straight, and another a cross with handles, / And the Duke's guard brings up the rear, for the better prevention of scandals.' And this is Dylan's 'Subterranean Homesick Blues': 'Better jump down a manhole / Light y'self a candle, / Don't wear sandals, / Try to avoid the scandals / Don't wanna be a bum / Y' better chew gum / The pump don't work / 'Cause the vandals / Took the handles.'

There is even more in the comparison than the startling duplication of ostentatious rhyming words. Read out Browning's verse in Dylan's Blonde on Blonde voice (relishing Dylanesque words like 'penitents') and you will find the two immaculately compatible. Sometimes Browning and Dylan sound like soulmates.

[Robert Browning: 'Pippa Passes' (Part 1, 'Morning') formed part of Bells and Pomegranates (a reference to Exodus 28:33–4), published in sections, London, 1841–1846. A useful collection is Robert Browning: Poetical Works 1833–1864, ed. Ian Jack, 1970. Robert Langbaum: The Poetry of Experience: The Dramatic Monologue in Modern Literary Tradition, 1957 (Langbaum has written extensively on Browning's work.) G.K. Chesterton: Robert Browning, 1903. The biblical text from which Dylan takes 'corruptible seed' is I Peter 1:23–24: 'Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever. For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away.']

'Brownsville Girl' [1986] This song, hidden away at the start of side 2 of the original LP of the deeply mediocre Knocked Out Loaded, was composed by Dylan but its lyric written jointly by Dylan and SAM SHEPARD. In the opinion of STEPHEN SCOBIE it is 'a masterpiece, a song that must rank among the five or six best songs Dylan has ever written.' NIGEL HINTON writes that 'When Dylan is working at this level of creativity—a level that puts him head and shoulders above everyone else—there's a magic evocativeness about everything he writes that gives the words enormous possibilities,' even though many of them are quite deliberately the words of Hollywood cliché. The best scrutiny of the song may be that by AIDAN DAY in his book Jokerman: Reading the Lyrics of Bob Dylan. Agreeing in effect with Stephen Scobie's explanation of the song's structural complexity—that it 'never develops a single, coherent narrative: rather it presents the fragments of several possible narratives, sometimes evoked and discarded within a line, whose relationship to each other remains unspecified . . .' but that these fragments are 'thematically congruent'—Day offers two main reasons why the song has been so structured that 'scraps of memory and thought mix with other scraps in an unstable temporal sequence.'

The first purpose of such a structure is that the lyric 'plays with tenses and perspectives as it enacts the lack of chronological structure in the inner life of the mind.' But—and this is Day's main theme—it is 'not only the fluidity of memory or mind which the lyric dips into. It is that throughout "Brownsville Girl" the mind's images and memories have only a questionably "real" status.' For this, he suggests, is a song about how cliché invades the memory and mind. He says that the opening two verses of this 17-verse song describe memories held by the narrator that are composed of 'the stock diction and conventions of a Western': 'He was shot down by a hungry kid tryin' to make a name for himself. / The townspeople wanted to crush that kid down and string him up by the neck. / Well the marshal, now he beat that kid to a bloody pulp. / As the dying gunfighter lay in the sun and gasped for his last breath: / "Turn him loose, let him go, let him say he outdrew me fair and square. / I want him to feel what it's like to every moment face his death."'

These are memories composed of 'the stock diction and conventions of a Western': they're a description of what's remembered from the film The Gunfighter. But as Aidan Day suggests, they are also stock Western ingredients. There's nothing described here that sounds unique to the particular film the song's narrator is describing. The opening moment is 'a man riding 'cross the desert'; the storyline of the renowned gunfighter always being challenged by some 'hungry kid tryin' to make a name for himself' and the dialogue quoted—these are familiar commonplaces of the cowboy film genre: you could say that it's their grinding familiarity on the screen that accounted for the death of the genre at the box-office.

Aidan Day argues that this cheap cliché is being emphasised, exposed, pointed out, by Dylan, and with regret and even disdain. This is the song that has him exclaim 'Oh! if there's an original thought out there I could use it right now!': a line that, says Day, 'reflects upon one of the fundamental preoccupations of the lyric. . . . It is when this crescendo of cliché has been reached in the last line of the second verse . . . that the recollections momentarily break and the speaker expresses his disdain for the formulae purveyed by the film. But disdain is accompanied by a recognition that such formulae are, inescapably, a part of the raw material of memory and mind.' And to illustrate this sense of what's being communicated by the song's narrator, Day quotes its next two lines, which are: 'Well I keep seeing this stuff and it just comes a-rolling in / And you know it blows right through me like a ball and chain.'

These lines suggest rueful acknowledgement that something of no special value, 'this stuff', continually invades the mind unbidden. This is brought acutely to life at the end. From similes of what's in the air, and therefore unavoidable—it comes 'a-rolling in' like the tide, it 'blows right through me' like the wind—Dylan makes an inspired switch and we find that it blows right through him with far greater invasive violence: 'like a ball and chain', like the very fabric of your house being demolished. And the sudden surprise of the switch to this image enacts the effect it describes.

At the same time, 'like a ball and chain' carries its other meaning into the song: the 'ball and chain' that ties the prisoner down, the effect of which is to underline that the narrator cannot escape 'this stuff' rolling in. The brilliant touch on Dylan's part here—the first of so many in this song—is that while 'ball and chain' is itself a cliché, the effect Dylan puts it to is anything but tired.

But is Dylan's emphasis really on the exhausted unoriginality of these Hollywood scenes? Just as people so often parody what they're most fond of, so Dylan's feeling for Hollywood images and filmgoer's memories here is surely 90 per cent affection and only 10 per cent challenge and demurral. Several things inside and outside the song itself suggest this. First, the words are not wholly weighted as Day suggests. The summary Dylan offers of The Gunfighter's key points reveals a noticeably straightforward desire to communicate what's up on the screen in the film's dramatic action. In the earlier, unreleased version of the song, 'New Danville Girl', the equivalent passage is also scrupulous in saying at the outset that he remembers little about the film, yet that which is remembered is given clearly and in some detail. For a narrative so 'unstable', 'fragmented' and 'indeterminate', it starts out with an almost urgently expressed clarity.

Nor are words the sole evidence here. There is also the way Dylan says them. There is no demurral in his voice, no sneer at or apology for the clichéd nature of the scenes he describes in these first two verses, and when he steps back, to say how he keeps seeing 'this stuff', the change in his voice, far from adding distance, expresses ruefully acknowledged fondness. It's the same all through the song. Great affection, enthusiasm and yearning are expressed for the very scenes from 'his own life' that are described as if they too are scenes from movies: 'Ah but you were right: it was perfect as I got in behind the wheel'; 'Well we're drivin' this car and the sun is coming up over the Rockies'; 'It was the best acting I saw anybody do.'

Moreover, the narrative Dylan so carefully gives us at the beginning of 'Brownsville Girl' is the perfect articulation of Dylan's most perturbed feelings about his own dilemma as a celebrity. He identifies readily with the gunfighter who can't go anywhere without being stared at, measured up and challenged, perhaps lethally and by the very people who admire the skills on which that celebrity is based. Even the death that the gunfighter feels 'every moment' might indeed be hovering for Dylan in real life. Every 'star' has felt this since death came up on JOHN LENNON from a 'fan'. (Dylan speaks about this in the interview with CAMERON CROWE for Biograph.) The Gunfighter is a film about fame and how lethal it can be, and this is intensely interesting to Bob Dylan. When he hears 'this stuff' about wanting the hungry kid to feel what it's like for the weary hero, he doesn't hear stock convention and cliché: he identifies with it through and through.

Given all this, it's a central irony that the narrator in Dylan's song is himself a fan, of the Hollywood star Gregory Peck. The film was 'about a man riding 'cross the desert and it starred Gregory Peck,' he says without a pause, suggesting unrestrained keenness, right there in the song's second line; 'All I remember about it was it's Gregory Peck,' he says later; then he's 'standin' in line in the rain to see a movie starring Gregory Peck . . . I'll see him in anything'; later still, thinking of the first movie again, he says, like a shy fan confessing fan behaviour, 'I think I sat through it twice'. Then, rounding things off neatly at the end by returning to the beginning, he says two 'fan-like' things on the two final lines, punning on 'stars' in the second: 'All I remember about it was it starred Gregory Peck . . . / Seems like a long time ago, long before the stars were torn down.'

This irony is energised when we know that Dylan really is a fan of Gregory Peck. In 1971, the Jerusalem Post asked how Dylan had spent his 30th birthday: 'We went to see a Gregory Peck movie—I'm quite a fan of his,' he said.

In any case, the very point about The Gunfighter upon which critics and viewers are agreed is that it stood out from the run of the genre: it avoided the stock conventions and cliché and went to some trouble in the pursuit of authenticity of look and feel. It's an irony, then, that while the film goes all out for outer realism, Dylan's narrative both does the opposite and doesn't. On the one hand the song is more realistic than the film, because the film straightforwardly counterfeits authenticity whereas the song keeps its eye on the difficult matter of what's real and what is not, and on the invisible passageways that slip us between the real and the fictional, all the time. Yet the song refuses the realistic style of the film's narrative, as, in Aidan Day's phrase, it 'plays with tenses and perspectives as it enacts the lack of chronological structure in the inner life of the mind.'

Nonetheless the parallels present themselves insistently. The film's hero is no hero at all, but a man who lives by the gun and dies by it. He is a failure as an integrated human being: isolated, incapable of living with or protecting his family, roaming without purpose and without the nourishment of any sort of intimacy. In the song, the narrative and chronology may be unclear but here too the narrator's memories are of failed relationships, failed connections and the failure to protect either himself or those he loves. Unlike the stock Western hero, the song's narrator abandons women, or is abandoned by them, or both—'Way down in Mexico you went out to find a doctor and you never came back. / I would have gone after you but I didn't feel like letting my head get blown off' (a cowardice re-emphasised later when '. . . shots rang out. / I didn't know whether to duck or to run. So I ran')—or else he needs to be rescued by women instead of the other way round: 'You went out on a limb to testify for me. You said I was with you.' It heightens the contrast between the heroic cowboy archetype and the song's less-than-reliable narrator that the song sets his nebulous exploits in western terrain also. Stephen Scobie notes that 'Brownsville seems intended to unify the geographical references—San Anton[e], the Alamo, Amarillo, Corpus Christi—along the border area between Texas and Mexico that has fascinated Dylan from "Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues". . . . As a border town it stands between the various realms of history, fiction and myth . . .'

Border towns are also where people cross from one kind of place to another, yet where the conjunction of the two makes for an ill-defined, nebulous entity, and uncertain crossings of one sort or another are a recurrent motif in 'Brownsville Girl'. The first thing we see is a man crossing the desert—always a risky business, a place in which to lose your way. When the narrator steps into the action himself, he's 'too over the edge'. Then he crosses 'the panhandle'—the term for a narrow strip of land in one state that projects into another (in this case the Texas Panhandle): another place of nebulous boundaries. But there's also a frisson here of crossing a moral boundary: a stain that seeps in from the word's other meaning. To panhandle is to accost people and beg. When the song's travellers arrive 'where Henry Porter used to live', Ruby tells them they've crossed another invisible borderline: 'She said "Welcome to the land of the living dead."'

Next thing we know, with another switch of scene, the narrator feels vulnerable, violent danger seems to loom, even in the act of the smallest crossing: 'I was crossin' the street,' he says, 'when shots rang out.' Then, matching the earlier phrase 'too over the edge', the woman who saves him with an alibi goes 'out on a limb' in doing so. There is also 'somethin' about you baby' that belongs in another world, while the narrator has left a part of himself behind in another place of uncertain territorial identity and, these days, uncertain authenticity too, 'the French Quarter', way down yonder in New Orleans. The theme is stated most directly and concentratedly in the narrator's protestation that he's 'always been the kind of person that doesn't like to trespass, but sometimes you just find yourself over the line.'

Crossing is not only a recurrent theme in the song; the song itself eschews linear narrative the better to stand by its core: a series of memories and recollections crossing and re-crossing the narrator's mind. This tracking and tracing, in 'Brownsville Girl', of notions of how these realms blend or fuse or confuse with reality, can only communicate, in the end, one aspect of what's absorbing in the song and why it's so pleasurable and rich an item in Bob Dylan's body of work.

There is also the joy of his matchless delivery, timing and phrasing, the humour that runs through the song, and the skill in its language: a skill touched on in noting the unexpected brilliance of that 'ball and chain' in the third stanza.

There are features of the early version, 'New Danville Girl', in the writing and the performance, which it's a pity we have to lose in the transfer to 'Brownsville Girl': but not many, and it's clear why they are discarded. This is an unusually clear example of the recording chosen for release being superior to the unreleased, while a comparative look at the lyrics alone would tell which was the tentative early attempt and which the later, more realised success. We could tell it from Dylan's delivery too: there are detectable falterings all through 'New Danville Girl'; 'Brownsville Girl' has none.

A kind of music is abandoned when we move from the earlier to the later recording. In the earlier, there is an instrumental break after the first chorus, in which the lead instrument is an almost comically plaintive, wonky harmonica from Dylan, making strangely half-indecipherable noises; and after the third chorus comes a caressingly expressive electric guitar solo, at once soaring and dignified, impassioned and restrained, simple and imaginative, grungy and refined. There may be no better electric solo on any studio recording in Bob Dylan's work than this, by IRA INGBER—and it has to go, because the song must single-mindedly occupy the cowboy and western genre, not criss-cross in and out of rock music signifiers. On 'Brownsville Girl' these pauses after the choruses are mostly abolished, and we are propelled right out of the Hollywood-epic whoosh of the overblown, declamatory chorus music straight back into the narrative, with its more urgent, greater articulation of detail and its far longer lines that must be spoken fast to fit the musical frame. Thus we lose too the simpler, more appealing music on those choruses themselves, where you can hear the rock musicians playing and the vocal lines are sung with a sort of matching pop normalcy; instead we get an epic blare that might be from a full orchestra playing a movie score, with trumpet and sax, women singers and echo, and with the trumpet blurting out high above the rest with a distressingly stiff riff, a stentorian, martial oscillation between two uninteresting notes.

We also lose some of the greatest 'oohs' and 'ahs' in Dylan's entire repertoire, and there seems no good reason for this, beyond the fact that they do seem impelled by the need to fill in spaces, whereas in 'Brownsville Girl' it is words and more words that fill them in. The 'awh' that he has Ruby say in 'New Danville Girl', in the line 'awh, you know some babies never learn' is many-splendoured, and after the 'lost' line 'And everything he did in it reminded me of me' comes an 'ah-ah-ah!' of sublime seductive grace. At the end of the last verse—which offers the unquestionably inferior 'But that was a long time ago, and it was made in the shade' (much inferior, that is, to 'Seems like a long time ago, long before the stars were torn down') Dylan releases us by releasing a most exquisite, yearning 'Yeah—' And after the last chorus, Dylan returns to give one more benediction of really lovely long 'ohs' and 'ahs' that linger for us at the song's final end.

However, these consummately enunciated pseudo-words of exclamation, these most articulate of grunts, are dissipated by fill-ins. Too many times we get the sort of 'yes you are' or 'yes you do' that garrulous soul-singers cannot resist. Thus we get 'Yeah I feel pretty good but you know I could feel a whole lot better, ah yes I could'—and its effect in weakening the line is demonstrable. It is the tightened-up 'Brownsville Girl' version that sticks in the mind, even though in fact it's only one word shorter. It's more focussed, and its rhythm propels it more purposively along: 'You know I feel pretty good but that ain't sayin' much—I could feel a whole lot better'. That is a whole lot better.

The 'Brownsville Girl' version solves all such problems. The narrator who is no Gregory Peck loses the earlier song's tendency to petulant cod-philosophising and becomes a keenly realised individual, a wittily self-deprecating hopeless romantic who likes women and has heart. He's generous-minded. The key exchanges between him and 'you' have a radiant charm that exudes the narrator's awareness of how different the two of them are—how hopelessly boyish he is, and how maturely rooted she is. He delights in the way that what they say to each other comes in from such different starting points of personality, as if the two glance off each other in passing. When he exclaims 'You know I can't believe we've lived so long and are still so far apart', the tone is partly of genuine surprise (a tone echoed twice as he exclaims 'Strange how people who suffer together have stronger connections than people who are most content!' and 'You know it's funny how things never turn out the way you had 'em planned')—but also carries in its tone not rebuke or complaint but a relishing of difference. The gulf between their two approaches to life, hers so practical and his risibly romantic, is comically delineated more than once, and without representing her universe reductively, he makes it clear that his own, while riddled with impracticality and shameless bravado, nevertheless has virtues of its own: indomitable energy, cheeriness, spontaneity, inclusivity. He may be a sucker for the grand gestures of romanticism—he admits that both this 'you' and also Ruby with her 'some babies never learn' have a healthy scepticism towards the way that he flops about in the world—but the self-deprecation and warm susceptibility that shine through him have their validity too. And really, what's the point of living in this terrain, this border territory of history, fiction and myth, where every place name is soaked in romantic resonance—the Alamo, Amarillo, the Painted Desert, San Antone—if you're not a romantic?

Nor has Ruby's cynicism got her anywhere. She feels this literally, and is 'thinkin' of bummin' a ride back to from where she started'. So much for her connections with the man whose washing she is hanging on the line. And so much for her stoicism. This is flimsy, in any case: she changes the subject 'every time money comes up', but she initiates the topic of 'how times were tough'. She's thinking of bumming a ride back to where she came from, yet when she asks how far the narrator and his companion(s) are going, she is good-naturedly sceptical that they will really get anywhere. Her sense of feeling stuck may discolour her view of everything, or may be unsullied realism. We can hear her observation that 'even the swap-meets around here are getting pretty corrupt' either way. No-one has any monopoly on what's real or true in this song, any more than they can stake any claim to heroic qualities.

Meanwhile, their exchanges towards the end of the song resemble nothing so much as great fragments of movie dialogue. They could belong to Bogart and Bacall. The whole song offers the extra irony of being in itself like a half-remembered movie with its episodes and flashbacks and cuts, its panning camera eye and its widescreen pageant. A very vivid one it is too. We see Ruby so clearly out there in the dusty yard, hanging out that washing in the dry western air, where your eyes can follow the flat land way off in the distance. We feel the complexity of her character from the very few lines of dialogue we hear her speak. What a creation she is. Can anyone else create so much in so few frames?

Inside this rhetorical question is the particular question, can Sam Shepard? Of the two co-lyricists of this song, Shepard is the one who writes screenplays; but in the end this is a song, not a screenplay, and Bob Dylan is the one who writes songs. To put this question another way: who wrote what?

The comic interplay between the narrator's voice and the Greek-chorus grunts of the female backing singers, who tiptoe in in the song's 11th verse, seems an innovation: something new to Dylan's oeuvre, and therefore quite likely to be a dramatic element imported by Sam Shepard—it's plays that have Greek choruses, after all—but Dylan seems very comfortable with the innovation, embracing its comic potential with flair yet restraint, never allowing it to dominate or grow tiresome.

More fundamentally there is one striking difference between 'New Danville Girl' and 'Brownsville Girl'. The first has a lot of short lines that seem to resemble the terse minimalism of Shepard's dialogue in, say, Paris, Texas, in which the monosyllable rules, and Dylan sounds as if he finds some of this inadequate and awkward to deliver; whereas 'Brownsville Girl' is delivered by someone so wholly in command of his material that perhaps it is rather more his material. On the other hand there are certain orders of detail that Dylan's own songs never show much interest in yet are prominent in some of the co-written ones—those co-written for Desire with JACQUES LEVY, in particular—which argues that they are the co-writer's babies. In the Dylan-Shepard collaboration, the sort of detail that seems unDylanesque includes 'your platform heels', 'her red hair tied back' and possibly 'the swap-meets' and 'the water moccasin'.

All that can be said with any certainty is that while 'Brownsville Girl' is a unique item in Dylan's work, there are many unique items in his work, part of his greatness being his extraordinary range, and there is nothing about 'Brownsville Girl' to make you feel that Bob Dylan couldn't have written it. Its themes and preoccupations are wholly in keeping with those he offers all through his writing; its fictional characters stand in line without any incongruity among the many others he's created; the interest in the silver screen has been evinced throughout his songwriting life, and never more so than in the mid-1980s (see film dialogue in Dylan lyrics); the 'unstable temporal sequence' of its narrative structure, and the shifting between 'you's' and other 'you's' and between 'you's' and 'she's', are all features familiar from earlier Bob Dylan songs; the wit and sense of humour are Dylan's; the very idea that a song can be that long is Dylan's.

Finally, when we come to the released version, 'Brownsville Girl', the masterly delivery by Dylan makes it his, whoever contributed what in the drafting of it. No-one in the world can deliver a talking song or a half-talking song as Dylan can. It's a facet of his genius he has remained in full control of, apparently from the first day he opened his mouth until now. This mastery, and his audible joy in it—a generous, sharing joy—is there right back in 1961 when he records 'Talkin' New York' on his first album, and when he produces the perfect mimickry of the voices on the unreleased 'Black Cross'; it's there in the faultless dumb-hick impersonation he gives us in 'Clothes Line Saga' on the Basement Tapes sessions of 1967; it's there when he preaches during the evangelical concerts of 1979; and it's there undiminished late in the 1990s on the final track on Time Out of Mind, the exalted 'Highlands'. The same genius is in command of every breath and pause, every unseen tilt of the head, every sung and every spoken syllable, every long line and every switch of mood in 'Brownsville Girl'.

One of the marks of its excellence as a performance, and a particularly important one granted the actorish subject matter of the song, is that there is never an adumbration of luvvieness in it. Dylan sounds so fully open to spontaneity of expression and unrehearsed conversational flow that he makes it sound easy for him. Yet to hold the printed-out lyric in your hand while playing the recording through headphones, and to mark which passages are spoken and which sung as it unfolds: this alone is enough to show you what unmitigated genius he brings to it. There are whole passages where he alternates a spoken with a sung line, one-two one-two one-two, without this ever striking you as a rigid pattern, or a technique, or something calculated; others where speech holds for several lines and then soars into singing in mid-line, again without ever sounding like set policy: without style ever seeming to take its leave of content; and others—for example 'dyin' gunfighter lay in the sun and gasped for his last breath'—where breath is so special that it is impossible to say if this is sung or not. There are lines that no-one else would decide to sing rather than speak; yet Dylan sings them as if to do so is the most natural thing in the world. In 'New Danville Girl' for instance he sings 'Way down in Mexico you went out to see a doctor and you never came back'. In 'Brownsville Girl', after the first chorus, there is a passage of ten consecutive spoken lines, and when the line after that breaks into song, the flow from one to the other is at once immersingly beautiful and unobtrusive. The least high-flown lines are sung with an exquisite, yearning caress that animates the desire and sense of loss behind the prosaic. Listen to this detailing in the superb way he sings lingeringly of 'your busted down Ford and your platform heels'. The word 'heels' has never been stroked so expressively in its life. (In 'New Danville Girl' he doesn't sing this line at all.)

Nor does Dylan overdo it when it comes to the more obviously strokeable. When we lose 'New Danville Girl's' 'fell out under the stars' to 'Brownsville Girl's' 'your skin was so tender and soft' the gain is in the sublimity of delivery rather than in the words. Dylan's voice enacts these words. There is nothing pejoratively soft, or easy, about the tenderly careful touch of his voice on the several syllables he carries us through on 'soft'.

Altogether, the delivery is astonishing. Not a false moment, not a foot wrong. Keeping up a curious tension between the very measured, slightly too slow musical accompaniment and the urgency of his voice, he gives a faultless performance, infinitely fluid and expressive, from beginning to end a plausible, intelligent and immensely humane persona and narrator, alert to the turbulent complexities of every moment. It's a long tour de force not a moment too long, and the Dylan who incan-desces through it is the full Bob Dylan of genius and generous intelligence, fully engaged.

[Bob Dylan: 'New Danville Girl', LA, Dec 1984; 'Brownsville Girl', Topanga Park, CA, 30 Apr 1986, Knocked Out Loaded, US, 1986; 'Black Cross', Minneapolis, 22 Dec 1961, unissued; 'Clothes Line Saga', West Saugherties, NY, Sep–Oct 1967, unissued.

The Gunfighter, dir. Henry King, written William Bowers & William Sellers, 20th Century Fox, US, 1950. Stephen Scobie, Alias Bob Dylan, 1991, Red Deer, Alberta, Canada: Red Deer College Press, p.151. Nigel Hinton, 'Into the Future, Knocked Out and Loaded', Telegraph no.25, Bury, UK, autumn/winter 1986, but quoted here as collected in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987. All Aidan Day quotes are from the chapter 'That Enemy Within' in, Jokerman: Reading the Lyrics of Bob Dylan, Oxford: Blackwell, paperback edn., 1989. Catherine Rosenheimer, Jerusalem Post magazine, Jerusalem, 4 Jun 1971.]

Bruce, Jack [1943 -] John Symon Asher Bruce was born near Glasgow, Scotland, on May 14, 1943, received classical music training and gained a working understanding of bass parts from studying Bach; played string bass in the Graham Bond Organisation (as did Ginger Baker, with whom he was in constant dispute and by whom he was effectively fired), then played with JOHN MAYALL and Manfred Mann before rejoining his old enemy Baker and ERIC CLAPTON in 'the first supergroup', Cream. Bruce and wordsmith Pete Brown wrote the band's hits 'Sunshine of Your Love', 'White Room' and 'I Feel Free'. He was the Cream member left out when the others joined the short-lived Blind Faith. In 1969 he made the successful solo album Songs for a Tailor, named for Cream's fatal car-crash victim, a stage-clothes maker (and PHIL OCHS' cousin), on which he not only sang and played bass but also piano, organ, cellos and guitar (and which included a guest appearance by GEORGE HARRISON), joined the once-bedazzling guitar wizard Robin Trower, then formed West, Bruce and Laing with the ex-Mountain (but still mountainous) Leslie West and Corky Laing but also worked with jazz musicians, which was where his musical heart lay. In the 1970s he made a further five solo albums but only two in the 1980s and three in the 1990s.

Jack Bruce and Bob Dylan played together, probably to Bruce's distaste, at the Guitar Legends Festival in Seville, Spain, on October 17, 2001, at which Dylan was possibly the event's least proficient guitarist, technically, and at which Bruce played behind Bob on the latter's opening number of a five-song set, 'All Along the Watchtower' (with RICHARD THOMPSON and Phil Manzanera on guitars, Ray Cooper on percussion and Simon Phillips on drums), and on the ensemble number at evening's end, 'I Can't Turn You Loose', on which Dylan was merely one of many on guitar.

Liver cancer halted Jack Bruce's career at the beginning of the 21st century but a liver transplant in 2003, though initially almost fatal, was a success in the long term and he was able to play a series of London concerts as part of the temporarily re-formed Cream in May 2005.

[Jack Bruce: Songs for a Tailor, Polydor, UK (Atco, US), 1969. Guitar Legends Festival, Seville, 17 Oct 2001, shown live internationally on TV.]

Bruce, Lenny [1925 - 1966] Leonard Alfred Schneider was born in Mineola, New York, on October 13, 1925 and became the first really contemporary comedian, taking satire outside the bounds of light-entertainment rules and the gentle parodying of foibles to coruscate the unpleasant realities of American society and shocking the audiences—and more particularly the self-appointed moral guardians—of the day with long monologues of sometimes embarrassing autobiographical directness, 'foul language' and biting humour. He was also one of those who divided the world into the Jewish and the rest in a way that suggested that this was a matter of spirit and outlook rather than race: 'To me,' he once said, 'if you live in New York, you're Jewish. If you live in Butte, Montana, you're going to be goyish even if you're Jewish.'

He served in the US Navy and after his 1946 discharge studied acting in Hollywood, changing his name to Lenny Bruce in 1947, but was soon working in nightclubs in Brooklyn and Baltimore, coming to national attention in October 1948 on the Arthur Godfrey Talent Scouts Show, on which he launched into an unprecedented satirical probing of sacred-cow subjects, topics that made the average American nervous and with a previously unheard vituperative disrespect for the President and the privileged.

His club act prospered and he pushed the monologues further and further out onto an experimental limb—though the period when his routine still included worked-out short sketches too probably represents him at his funniest: as in his Concert at Carnegie Hall, recorded in 1961—but it was in 1961 that he suffered the first of a series of arrests and harrassments which came to be deliberate FBI policy against the man they described as 'the nightclub and stage performer widely known for his obscenity'. His arrest in Philadelphia on September 29, 1961 was for narcotics possession, though the charge was later dropped; five days later he was arrested at the San Francisco Jazz Workshop for using the word 'cocksucker' in his stage act (a violation of the California Obscenity Code), but later acquitted. In 1962 he was again arrested for narcotics possession (October 6) and for using the word 'motherfucker' on stage at the Hollywood Troubadour (October 24). Again Bruce was acquitted, this time after a landmark trial that helped uphold the citizen's right to free speech but cost

Bruce all his money and left him perceived as too big a risk for most clubs and theatre bookings. In 1963, by now addicted to heroin, Bruce was arrested and this time found guilty of narcotics possession, and in April 1964 he was arrested in New York and again convicted, on obscenity charges arising from his act at the Café au Go Go in Greenwich Village. He was defended by Norman Mailer and various New York intellectuals as a social satirist 'in the tradition of Swift, Rabelais and Twain', but the FBI didn't have them on file.

His autobiography, the sardonically titled How to Talk Dirty and Influence People, was serialised in Playboy from 1963 to 1965, before its publication in book form. And Playboy took the copyright.

Bob Dylan mentioned Lenny Bruce fleetingly several times in the latter's lifetime. In his poem 'Blowin' in the Wind', published in Hootenanny in December 1963, Dylan wrote that 'Junkies an flunkies line the wind along side ban-the-bomb demonstrators / Girls're hustlin for dollars on one side a the street an / Girls're sitting down for their rights on the other side a the street . . . / Lenny Bruce's talkin / an LORD BUCKLEY's memory still movin"; and in the marvellous incantatory memorialising offered by 11 Outlined Epitaphs, published on the sleeve of Another Side of Bob Dylan two months after Bruce's Greenwich Village arrest, Dylan wrote: 'Lenny Bruce says there're no dirty / words . . . just dirty minds an' I say there're / no depressed words just depressed minds'.

Bruce gave his last performance on June 26, 1966 at the Fillmore in San Francisco and was found dead from a morphine overdose at his Hollywood home less than six weeks later, on August 3, 1966.

It was 15 years later that Dylan released his song 'Lenny Bruce', on the first post-gospel album, 1981's Shot of Love. (It was also issued as a single, in the UK only, and pre-release copies in a picture sleeve had to be recalled and replaced, because they managed to misspell its subject's name as 'Lennie'; in the mad world of collectors, of course, this is the rarer and thus more valued version of the record.)

ALLEN GINSBERG singled out the song, saying of it that he liked 'the rawness of the voice, and the directness, and the statement, and the kind of pathos.' But he also noted and admired Dylan's 'unexpected sympathy for Lenny Bruce at a time when he was supposed to be a Born Again moralist Christian . . . he was coming out for the injured and the insulted and the wounded and the supposedly damned.'

In lines of mixed success and skill, Dylan's song stresses, like so much writing about Bruce, his truth-telling and his victimisation. As with most accounts, Dylan mentions in passing that Lenny Bruce 'sure was funny' but this is never emphasised. How funny Bruce could be is what always seems omitted. That said, the Dylan song was a sincere tribute and an acute summary of at least part of what had been at stake in the struggle that was Lenny Bruce's life:

'He was an outlaw, that's for sure, / More of an outlaw than you ever were. / . . . . Never robbed any churches nor cut off any babies' heads, / He just took the folks in high places and he shined a light in their beds.' The song ends disarmingly: 'He fought a war on a battlefield where every victory hurts. / Lenny Bruce was bad, he was the brother that you never had.'

Introducing the song in concert in Nagoya, Japan, Dylan said this: 'Here's a song about recognition, or lack of recognition. Tennessee Williams, it was he who said "I don't ask for your pity, just your understanding—not even that, but just your recognition of me in you, and time, the enemy in us all." Tennessee Williams led a pretty drastic life. He died all by himself in a New York hotel room without a friend in the world. Another man died like that.'

[Lenny Bruce: How to Talk Dirty and Influence People, ed. Paul Krassner, Playboy, Chicago, 1963–65; Carnegie Hall, NY, early hours of 5 Feb 1961, United Artists UAS-9800, US, 1972. Bob Dylan: 'Lenny Bruce', 2 uncirculated takes attempted LA, 29 Apr 1981; album version LA, May 14, 1981; single release as 'Lennie Bruce' & 'Lenny Bruce', CBS A 1640, UK, 1981. Ginsberg quoted from interview by Wes Stace, Cambridge, UK, 27 Apr 1985, collected in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: Futura edn., 1988, p.173. Bruce's FBI file online at www.fadetoblack.com/foi/lennybruce/fbifile.htm.]

Brumley, Albert E. [1905 - 1977] Albert Edward Brumley was born on his parents' cotton farm in Spiro, Oklahoma, on October 29, 1905. He studied sacred music in Hartford, Arkansas, under Virgil O. Stamps and others, sang in the Hartford Quartet and became a peripatetic schools singing teacher. In 1929 he wrote 'I'll Fly Away', based on an older ballad, but only submitted it for publication in 1932. The Hartford Music Co., which accepted it and watched it become one of the most popular songs in America, hired him as an in-house writer. In the end he wrote around 800 songs, including 'Rank Stranger to Me' (his title has it in the singular), and bought out his employers.

Dylan plays harmonica on CAROLYN HESTER's 1961 recording of 'I'll Fly Away' and sings 'Rank Strangers to Me' on his own album Down in the Groove. He has also performed the latter a number of times in concert.

Brumley died on November 15, 1977 in tiny Powell, Missouri (right in the state's southwest corner, bordering Arkansas and Kansas), where he had lived for over 45 years and where his company, Albert E. Brumley & Sons, is still trading. Its subsidiary, the Hartford Music Co., is now based in Powell too.

Bruton, Stephen [1948 -] Turner Stephen Bruton was born in Wilmington, Delaware, on November 7, 1948 but brought up in Fort Worth, Texas, with a jazz-drummer father who ran a record store. A teenage friend of T-BONE BURNETT, he became a guitarist equally keen on bluegrass, blues and soul, as well as a songwriter. In 1970 he joined KRIS KRISTOFFERSON's band and stayed with him for well over ten years, though also touring with Bonnie Raitt and others. He moved to Austin, Texas, in the mid-1980s, producing other artists' records and having his songs covered by WILLIE NELSON, Waylon Jennings, JOHNNY CASH, Little Feat, Jimmy Buffett and others. Starting with Kristofferson's film A Star Is Born, Bruton has also built a Hollywood bit-part career and has appeared in Convoy, Heaven's Gate, Miss Congeniality, Sweet Thing and The Alamo. As a studio session musician he has played on the Kristofferson & RITA COOLIDGE album Full Moon (1973) and on records by Delbert McClinton, ELVIS COSTELLO, Carly Simon, THE WALLFLOWERS and many others.

More importantly, however, Stephen Bruton played guitar on the Mexico City session for Dylan's Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid album (on January 20, 1973), from which came the album track 'Billy 4', while a bit of the instrumental 'Billy Surrenders' was used in the film—and then 27 years later Bruton played guitar with Dylan's band for a few nights in 2000: August 19 in Victoria, British Columbia, Canada; August 20 in Vancouver; August 21 in Portland, Oregon; August 24 in Pueblo, California; August 26 in Des Moines, Iowa; August 27 & 28 in Merrillville, Indiana; and August 29 in St. Paul, Minnesota—and then he returned to play both guitar and mandolin on October 11 in Greenvale, New York, and October 12 in Springfield, Massachusetts.

'Buckets of Rain' [1975] The closing track on the Blood on the Tracks album, this is an immensely likeable, modest song of barbed sanity. A blues-structured work, it also neatly conflates other old song titles within its lyric, as when Dylan sings 'Little red wagon, little red bike / I ain't no monkey but I know what I like'. In a genre so riddled with sexual innuendo and double entendre as the blues, it's sometimes hard to know whether a phrase or a line belongs in the nursery or the porn shop, and this is a good example. One long-term Dylan collector was told years ago that the phrase 'little red bike' was a blues term for anal sex: which certainly puts a different perspective on Dylan's lyric. But it is not a common blues term: there isn't a single 'little red wagon' in Michael Taft's Blues Lyric Poetry: A Concordance. 'Little Red Wagon' is, however, a recording by the pre-war blues artist Georgia White, and by a happy coincidence the very next track she laid down at the same session is called 'Dan the Back Door Man'. On the other hand, 'Won't You Ride in My Little Red Wagon?' by Hank Penny & His Radio Cowboys (featuring a young Boudleaux Bryant) was a western swing recording from 1939, and songs about anal intercourse didn't usually make it onto radio shows. That wasn't the meaning of the term 'western swing'.

The Georgia White song would suggest that the phrase 'that's your (little) red wagon' means 'that's your preoccupation, not mine', or, to use a comparable expression, its metaphor also taken from the nursery, 'your hobbyhorse.' This meaning is confirmed by a 1945 recording by ARTHUR CRUDUP: 'That's Your Red Wagon'.

'Little Red Wagon' is in any case the title of a Woody Guthrie song (in a 1987 interview, Dylan mentions it as one he knew early on) and a well-known traditional phrase in children's song.

Then there's 'Little Red Monkey', which on the face of it might sound like another children's song but definitely isn't. NIGEL HINTON noted in Judas! that 'Little Red Monkey' was a hit for the Harmonicats and for Rosemary Clooney in 1953, and that Bob Dylan, then aged 12, would have heard it. In Britain it was a hit for Frank Chacksfield & His Orchestra, and was in the charts at the same time as Jo Stafford's 'You Belong to Me' (and Frankie Laine's 'I Believe'). In the US the version by Rose Murphy on London Records also got airplay.

Hinton says that it was used as the 'unsettling theme song' of a B-movie spy film, but this 1955 film, The Little Red Monkey (US title The Case of the Red Monkey), reworked a 1953 BBC television serial by Eric Maschwitz, 'The Little Red Monkey' (six half-hour episodes, shown January to February 1953, starring Donald Houston, Arthur Rigby and Honor Blackman), in which the title character is a midget Russian spy. The sheet music for the title song credits Jack Jordan as its composer.

'Buckets of Rain' ends with a particular touch of grace, unafraid to leave the listener with a moral: 'Life is sad, life is a bust / All you can do is do what you must / You do what you must do and you do it well.' Yet here there is a harking back too: Dylan gives us, in these concluding lines, what is effectively a re-write of an old blues couplet by Kid Wesley Wilson and Harry McDaniels (the words are probably Wilson's) from their 1929 record 'Do It Right', on which they sing: 'Whenever you do it, whatever you should / Just do your best to do it good.'

Dylan's only live performance of 'Buckets of Rain' has been in Detroit on November 18, 1990. Fifteen years before that, he had recorded a duet version, with a playfully altered lyric, with BETTE MIDLER.

[Georgia White: 'Little Red Wagon' & 'Dan the Back Door Man', Chicago, 7 Dec 1936. Hank Penny & His Radio Cowboys: 'Won't You Ride in My Little Red Wagon', Memphis, 4 Jul 1939; Tobacco State Swing, Rambler R 103, El Cerrito, CA, 1980. Arthur Crudup:

'That's Your Red Wagon', Chicago, 22 Oct 1945, not issued on LP until Give Me a 32–20, Crown Prince IG-403, Stockholm, 1983. The film Little Red Monkey, aka The Case of the Red Monkey, dir. Ken Hughes, Merton Park Studios, UK, 1955. Kid Wesley Wilson and Harry McDaniels (as Pigmeat Pete & Catjuice Charlie): 'Do It Right', NY, 5 Sep 1929, Rare Blues, 1927–1930, Historical HLP-5, Jersey City, NJ, c.1967.]

Bucklen, John [1941 -] John Charles Bucklen was born in Bemidji, Minnesota, on December 20, 1941, but soon afterwards moved the 100 miles or so east to Hibbing. There he became a good friend of Bob Dylan's, the one with whom he made the 1958 tape recording at Dylan's home featuring fragments of song and of conversation (see earliest extant recordings, Dylan's), and the one Dylan phoned up excitedly when he first heard the 78rpm records of LEADBELLY he'd been given, to shout down the phone: 'This is the real thing! You gotta hear this!'

John Bucklen was younger than Bob by eight months and a high-school year below him, but he was, in his own words, 'a born follower'; Bob also liked the easier atmosphere in the impoverished Bucklen household, with its lesser emphasis on 'achievement' and 'discipline'. John's father was a disabled miner and a musician, his mother a seamstress, his sister Ruth a lively girl with a record player. Trying out the hipster language they learnt together off James Dean movies and the radio, Dylan told Bucklen: 'You are my main man.'

As they grew up, music held them together, and Bucklen, though without his friend's ambition, neverthless learnt guitar—playing it alongside Dylan's piano—and before long Bucklen was playing blues on the 1959 Gibson J-50 he still plays regularly today. (Dylan played an identical guitar in the late 1960s.)

Dylan told ROBERT SHELTON in the 1970s that Bucklen had really been his 'best buddy' back in Hibbing, and regretted having been 'terribly rushed, terribly busy' when they'd last met.

John Bucklen left Hibbing and became a DJ, first in the Twin Cities and then in Fond Du Lac in Wisconsin in the late 1960s. He and his first wife LaVonne had one child, Chris, now a Minnesota-based ambient folk guitarist. John moved on to DJ work in Superior, Wisconsin, in 1971 and then, with second wife Gracie (with whom he has three children), he moved again, though still within Wisconsin, in 1977. He has worked for the same radio station there ever since, claims never to have missed a day of work in 30 years and is, in son Chris' opinion, 'an excellent blues musician'.

[Information from Chris Bucklen, e-mails to this writer 16 & 20 Oct 2005; quotes from Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., 1987, pp.45, 49 & 16.]

Bunyan, John [1628 - 1688] There's a specific sense in which John Bunyan's achievement prefigures Bob Dylan's. Although he was the worst, the least Miltonic, kind of puritan, epitomising narrow sectarianism, Bunyan restored the strengths of popular culture to mainstream literary culture after the two had gone their largely separate ways. He was thus Elizabethan in spirit. Granted the new conditions, it is reasonable to say that what Bunyan did then, Dylan has done again: put the dynamics of folk culture back into sophisticated art, exalting the one to the level of the other's greatness.

The parallel between the two writers may take us further—to say which involves recognising that Pilgrim's Progress is, in the best sense, a classic. Overriding its reductive intention—to lacerate life with the stick of hellfire—it offers an enriching humanitarianism. Its humanity comes across with that biblical dignity of expression which graces the language of all folk culture. Bunyan's work is a reminder of the powerful influence of the various English-language translations of the Bible, from John Wyclif's first vernacular version to the Authorized of 1611—an influence that still operates powerfully on folk idiom both in England and America, as, indeed, Dylan's work testifies. The Authorized version has been the most important: has been, for hundreds of years, the countryman's only book. In imagery and rhythm, it is popular, not classical; it harks back to and reflects the language of medieval England, while influencing seminally the language of 20th century America, especially black America.

Bunyan therefore harks back also to the language of medieval England—and so does Dylan. It is not mere coincidence—it is a question of common roots: shared cultural history. As if to prove the point, Cecil Sharp (English Folk-Songs from the Southern Appalachians, ed. Maud Karpeles, 1932) discovered the popular culture Bunyan represented, not fossilised but vitally alive, in the remoter valleys of the southern Appalachians during the First World War.

Bunyan, then, is very much Dylan's forebear; and there are many noticeable similarities of language in their work. It is from Bunyan, and certainly not from any rock'n'roll vocabulary, that Dylan gets this great, and typical, phrase from Joey on the Desire album: 'God's in heaven, overlooking His preserve'. And isn't this, for example, instantly recognisable as a line from the Dylan of the John Wesley Harding album?: 'Pray who are your kindred there, if a man may be so bold?' But it is not Bob Dylan, it is Christian in Pilgrim's Progress. And doesn't this comply almost exactly in rhythm and vocabularitive tone?: 'Oh what dear daughter beneath the sun could treat a father so: / To wait upon him hand and foot and always answer no?' Thus Dylan's 'Tears of Rage' also illustrates, as do so many Dylan songs, its creator's concern for salvation. In terms of the parallels with Bunyan, this is the nearest to a merely coincidental one: and yet even here, coincidence is perhaps not the right word.

When Bunyan was writing, of course, God existed. To his contemporary pamphleteers, salvation was a narrowly Christian matter (either you got there or you didn't) and it was a wider thing to Bunyan himself in spite of, not because of, his Calvinism. Since then, God has been through many changes, all reducing His omnipotence. Yet the Dylan of the mid-60s to mid-70s showed us our world too plagued and helpless easily to countenance that God really was dead. We identified with the tortured vision of the medieval Hieronymus Bosch. There was a serious anguish behind our trivia: hence the power of a book like Catch-22. With Slow Train Coming and Saved, in 1979 and 1980, Dylan demands that we re-examine all this—and indeed that we re-examine Bunyan's vision and our notion of what our quest for salvation requires of us.

John Bunyan died in London on August 31, 1688. His immense popularity and impact on mainstream literature won him, after his death, few friends among the literary elite. As Raphael Samuel wrote: 'Bunyan's literary reputation was almost non-existent before the Romantics, even among those who recommended The Pilgrim's Progress for religious instruction. . . . Coleridge was one of the first literary voices raised in favour of Bunyan. Southey's 1830 edition of The Pilgrim's Progress . . . marked Bunyan's entry into the literary pantheon after a century and a half of well-bred putdowns.'

See also the entry on the Dylan song 'Dignity'.

[John Bunyan: The Pilgrim's Progress: From This World to That Which Is to Come, Part I published 1678, Part II 1684. The Life and Death of Mr. Badman published 1680. Raphael Samuel, 'The Discovery of Puritanism, 1820–1914', reprinted in his Island Stories: Unravelling Britain—Theatres of Memory Volume II, 1998. This essay is a reminder of our shifting use and understanding of the term 'puritanism', and by extension of the unheeding way we bandy ideas in modish ways that we forget are merely modish, assuming them to have, instead, historical fixity.]

Burke, Gary [1948 -] Gary Burke was born in Troy, New York, on April 9, 1948. He was the percussionist in the backing band informally known as GUAM on the second Rolling Thunder Revue tour, which began with the RUBIN HURRICANE CARTER fund-raising concert in Houston on January 25, 1976 but really rolled as from April 18 in Lakeland, Florida, and ran through a further 22 dates, including the concert filmed but unreleased at Clearwater, Florida, on April 22 and the concert used instead at Fort Collins, Colorado, on May 23, which yielded both the 'Hard Rain' TV Special and the Hard Rain album. The tour's last night was in Salt Lake City on May 25.

Gary Burke replaced LUTHER RIX, who had been in the line-up for the 1975 Rolling Thunder Revue. He therefore appears not only on the Hard Rain album (and very briefly on camera in 'Hard Rain') but also on the track 'Seven Days' on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 (1991), recorded live in Tampa, Florida, on April 21, 1976.

The way that he came to be part of the band is, as he recounts it, 'a two-part story'. Part One:

> 'I was sitting out in front of Trude Heller's (a club in New York City at that time) at about 4am after a gig. I was just killing time before going home when I noticed Sue Evans walking down the street. I had just seen her perform on percussion, especially tympani (!), the week before at the Village Vanguard with the Gil Evans Orchestra. I introduced myself and told her I loved what she was doing with the band. We got talking and I told her what I was doing and she did the same, mentioning that she was just asked to replace Luther Rix on the Rolling Thunder gig. Luther was unavailable. . . . Sue said she didn't want to do the gig because she was afraid there might be a lot of drugs around and she didn't want to be around that. I said, "Well, if you don't want the gig I'll take it!" Sue said, "Alright, I'll recommend you." I thought to myself, "Yeah, right." Well, she did! I got a call from ROB STONER to get together and play, just the two of us, bass and drums. We jammed at my loft and he said, "You got the gig."'

Part Two:

> 'We were all scheduled to leave for Florida to begin rehearsals for the second part of the tour. There was a sort of going-away party at a hotel before we were to leave. Everybody in the band was there but Dylan and BOBBY NEUWIRTH. I noticed everyone was getting handed itineraries and what looked like contracts to sign except for me. I asked the road manager what was going on and how come I wasn't getting a contract as well. He implied that the rehearsal period was a kind of an audition for me. I told him that as far as I was concerned I already auditioned with Stoner and I had cancelled an album project to do this tour. I then proceeded to tell him that I'd better get a contract or I wasn't getting on the plane and they would also owe me $5,000 for the cancelled album recording. This caused quite a fuss and pretty soon the phone rang in the hotel room and it was Neuwirth. He got me on the line and said he was there with Bob and heard what was going on. He said, "I only have one question for you." I said, "What's that?" He said, "Do you like music?" I said, "No." There was a stunned silence. I said, "I love music." I was told to get on the plane.'

After dropping off Dylan's radar at the end of the Rolling Thunder Revue he played on Kinky Friedman's Lasso from El Paso album (1976), SCARLET RIVERA's Scarlet Rivera (1977), Jesse Winchester's Talk Memphis (1981) and others, and was the drummer with the Radio City Music Hall Orchestra for four years, before joining Joe Jackson's band, with which he toured, appearing on at least ten Jackson albums while still doing session work for Graham Parker and others, including Artie Traum (Letters from Joubee, 1993), RICK DANKO, on whose 2000 album Times Like These Burke played drums, and GARTH HUDSON, on whose 2001 album The Sea to the North he also played. (On the Rees Shad album Anderson, Ohio in 1996 he had done almost everything, being producer, editor, assistant engineer, horn arranger, strings arranger and player of percussion, drums, harmonium and keyboards.)

Since 2000 Gary Burke has been a member of the unit Professor Louie & the Crowmatrix, playing on their albums Over the Edge (2000), Jam (2001), Flyin' High (2002), the only half-truthfully titled Live (2003) and Century of the Blues (2005)—'Professor Louie' being latter-day BAND producer Aaron Hurwitz of Woodstock Records, and Gary Burke being a resident of the Woodstock, New York, area.

Some of his playing has earlier roots, however. In the 1970s, when he was playing xylophone with four mallets, he was apparently reviving an approach pioneered in the 1930s by the now-forgotten jazz multi-instrumentalist, band-leader and former child-prodigy Adrian Rollini (a one-man Rollini Thunder Revue).

[Gary Burke date & place of birth details, plus Rolling Thunder recruitment account, e-mails to this writer, 12 Jan 2006.]

Burnett, T-Bone [1948 -] Joseph Henry Burnett was born in St. Louis, Missouri, on January 14, 1948. He grew up in Fort Worth, Texas, an enthusiast for Tex-Mex music and BUDDY HOLLY, and he became a songwriter, guitarist, singer, studio engineer and record producer—and in the 21st century one of the highest-paid and most successful suppliers of soundtrack music to Hollywood.

He launched his career after finishing high school, playing in local blues bands (later calling himself T-Bone Burnett in tribute to blues-guitarist hero T-Bone Walker) and opening his own small Fort Worth studio, before moving to Los Angeles, producing records by Delbert McClinton and others and then, as J. Henry Burnett, releasing a début album of unusual overt moral rectitude, The B-52 Band and the Fabulous Skylarks, in 1972, the cover of which features a photograph of Burnett alone, bean-pole thin and very tall. SAM SHEPARD describes him as 'seven feet tall' in the Rolling Thunder Logbook. The band (unrelated to Athens, Georgia's legendary B52s) was a quirky five-piece unit featuring Burnett on guitar and vocals, Gary Montgomery as main vocalist, Rodney Dillard on dobro, Dean Parks on saxophone and Willie Leonard on trumpet. The Fabulous Skylarks were two female backing singers. The album, needless to say, required extra musicians to provide mundane things like a rhythm section.

Burnett was taken up by the temporarily modish white soul duo Delaney & Bonnie, with whom he toured, became friends with long-term Bob Dylan sidekick BOB NEUWIRTH and so eventually was brought into the group informally known as GUAM, who backed Dylan on the Rolling Thunder Revues of 1975 and 1976. Though Burnett seems to have arrived late on in the proceedings—he never appears over the summer of 1975 when ROB STONER, HOWIE WYETH and SCARLET RIVERA are already in place from their studio sessions for the Desire album and the TV appearance on the 'World of JOHN HAMMOND' tribute show—nonetheless he was there for both tours, appearing in a total of 56 concerts plus the film Renaldo & Clara, the TV special 'Hard Rain' and the albums Hard Rain and the Bootleg Series Vol. 5. On the first tour he played guitar, and relished the constructed but improvised acting scenes that Renaldo & Clara demanded. Sam Shepard remembers him warming up in New York, before they even set out on the road, 'disguised as a professional golfer, complete with golf bag and cap.' And then on tour, he 'often appeared on stage disguised as Merlin the Magician. Often roped ROGER McGUINN around the neck at the conclusion of . . . "Chestnut Mare"'. On the second tour, his on stage profile increased: he played both guitar and piano and he sang 'Silver Mantis' in the early part of every concert.

Burnett's overt Christianity hit Dylan at the right moment. Howie Wyeth told CLINTON HEYLIN specifically that 'T-Bone read Bob that line in the Bible that says if you listen to astrologers and people who are into the black arts . . . your family will be taken from you. And he'd just lost the battle [against SARA DYLAN for custody of his children] in court. . . . T-Bone told me that the thing that really nailed it was when he showed him, in the Bible, that quote.' Yet Jesus doesn't seem to bring much peace to T-Bone Burnett. 'He has a peculiar quality of craziness about him,' writes Sam Shepard. 'He's the only one on the tour I'm not sure has relative control over his violent dark side.' And he tells Shepard that it is Dylan who has given him 'reason to live'.

After the Revues, Burnett and fellow Guam Christians DAVID MANSFIELD and STEVE SOLES took themselves and their Bibles away and formed the Alpha Band, making three indifferent albums for an indifferent public, The Alpha Band (1976), Spark in the Dark (1977) and Statue Makers of Hollywood (1978). They disbanded, and in 1980 came a new solo album with the groan-inducingly bad punning title Truth Decay: exactly the sort of play on words that preachers and proselytising churches love and imagine to be captivating. It was followed by a 1982 EP, Trap Door, a big-name-guest-filled album, Proof Through the Night, in 1983 and another sort-of EP, Behind the Trap Door, in 1984. None of these records sold well, and nor did 1986's T-Bone Burnett. Nor did the single he and ELVIS COSTELLO issued under the name the Coward Brothers (Henry and Howard Coward), 'The People's Limousine', in 1985. But T-Bone had kept on producing other people's work in this period, including Marshall Crenshaw's Downtown album and two by Costello, King of America (1986) and Spike (1988), and had continued playing guitar on other people's albums.

One of these was Knocked Out Loaded, Dylan's 1986 album. T-Bone Burnett was one of those who reported for work at the Topanga Park, California, studio that May 1, and was set to work overdubbing on 'Brownsville Girl', as well as playing on still-uncirculated cuts of 'Without Love' and 'Unchain My Heart'. This work continued on May 2 but after that, according to the listings in GLEN DUNDAS' Tangled, Burnett's services don't seem to have been required. Yet on the album credits, Burnett is not listed as on 'Brownsville Girl' and is listed for 'You Wanna Ramble', the album's opening track, which was recorded on May 5.

More certainly, it was six years later that T-Bone Burnett played with Dylan again, and, so far, for the last time. On May 9, 1992, at a Never-Ending Tour concert at San Jose State University, Burnett came onstage late on in the set and played guitar on 'Cat's in the Well', 'Idiot Wind' and 'Highway 61 Revisited'. ('Idiot Wind' had been revived that year for the first time since the days when Burnett had been playing it all the time on the 1976 Rolling Thunder Revue. Perhaps he thought Dylan always played it.)

Burnett has since married, produced, written for and recorded with singer Sam Phillips (formerly 'Christian pop singer' Leslie Phillips; Burnett's first work with her was on her last pre-secular album, The Turning, 1986–87). His own subsequent solo albums have been The Talking Animals (1988) and The Criminal Under My Own Hat (1992).

More notably, in an involvement with ROY ORBISON that included producing his 1987 album In Dreams and his 1989 Mystery Girl, T-Bone was also musical director and producer of the 1987 Orbison show 'Black and White Night', a Cinemax TV special filmed in Los Angeles on September 30, 1987 and broadcast in 1988, which starred Orbison with support from Jackson Browne, Elvis Costello, kd lang, Bonnie Raitt, BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN, JENNIFER WARNES, Steven Soles and T-Bone himself, while the band Burnett had assembled also included JAMES BURTON and the Buddy Holly and ELVIS PRESLEY pianist Glen D. Hardin. Burnett also produced the album taken from the event, A Black and White Night Live. Against many odds, this is a worthy representation of Orbison live—indeed the only live album issued in his lifetime—and the re-creation of the sounds behind his hits is thrillingly more accurate than is usual with such projects.

Though first broadcast on HBO this became the biggest fund-raising programme in PBS history, which meant that Burnett, despite a lifetime of failing to sell his own records, was suddenly a music industry heavyweight. He had proved himself as an adroit and effective assembler of talent for 'serious' projects, and so began his big Hollywood years. After working as 'musical archivist' on the Coen Brothers' The Big Lebowski in 1998 he swiftly triumphed with his award-winning soundtrack for their mega-hit O Brother Where Art Thou?, a film in which the music was omnipresent and crucial, and which led to a dramatic upswing in the popularity of traditional folk, bluegrass and general pre-1950s quirky music. He was therefore also a key part of the documentary about that film's music, Down from the Mountain (2000), which he co-produced with, among others, Bobby Neuwirth and D.A. PENNEBAKER. He has since been executive music producer for Divine Secrets of the Ya-Ya Sisterhood (2002), to which Dylan contributed the dreary new song 'Waitin' for You', and Cold Mountain (2003).

All this re-uniting with old cronies didn't stop there. In 1996–97 he had written new songs for a revival of a 1970s Sam Shepard play, Tooth of Crime, and in 2003, he was reunited with Shepard yet again in the documentary film This So-Called Disaster: Sam Shepard Directs the Late Henry Moss, directed by Michael Almereyda, in which both play themselves (at work on another Shepard play).

In 2005, coming full circle, Burnett stepped back into the world of southern rock'n'roll he had grown up with in the first place when he produced the soundtrack, wrote the score and trained actors for their singing rôles in the JOHNNY CASH biopic Walk the Line.

[J. Henry Burnett: The B-52 Band and the Fabulous Skylarks, Uni, US, 1972. The Alpha Band: The Alpha Band, Arista A 4102, US, 1976; Spark in the Dark, Arista AD-4145, US, 1977; Statue Makes of Hollywood, Arista AB-4179, US, 1978. T-Bone Burnett: Truth Decay, Takoma TAX7080, US, 1980; Trap Door (EP), Warner Bros. WB 23691, US, 1982; Proof Through the Night, Warner Bros. 23921-1, US, 1983; Behind the Trap Door, Demon VEX3, UK, 1984; T-Bone Burnett, nia, US, 1986. The Talking Animals, Columbia BFC 40792, US, 1988; The Criminal Under My Own Hat, Columbia 45213, US, 1992. The Coward Brothers: 'The People's Limousine', Imp IMP006, UK, 1985.

The Big Lebowski, dir. Joel Coen; PolyGram Filmed Entertainment / Working Title, US/UK, 1998. O Brother Where Art Thou?, dir. Joel Coen; Buena Vista / Mike Zoss / Studio Canal / Touchstone / Universal / Working Title, US, 2000. Down from the Mountain, dir. Nick Doob, Chris Hegedus & D.A. Pennebaker; Mike Zoss / Pennebaker Hegedus, US, 2000. This So-Called Disaster: Sam Shepard Directs the Late Henry Moss, dir. Michael

Almereyda; IFC / Keep Your Head, US, 2003. Walk the Line, dir. James Mangold; Fox 2000 / Tree Line / Konrad / Catfish, US, 2005.

Sam Shepard, Rolling Thunder Logbook, London & New York: Penguin, 1978, pp.17 & 58. Howie Wyeth quote from Clinton Heylin, Behind the Shades, as seen online 26 Sep 2005 at http://web.utk.edu/~wparr/HistChrDyl.html.]

Burnette, Billy [1953 -] William Beau Burnette III was born on May 8, 1953 in Memphis, Tennessee, and grew up to be a rockabilly guitarist with an inexplicable fondness for the work of Fleetwood Mac and the kind of saturnine good looks that in any southern melodrama would signal inbred madness. He is the son and nephew respectively of those rockabilly pioneers the Burnette Brothers, Dorsey and Johnny, and cousin of singer Rocky Burnette. (Dorsey and Johnny were Golden Gloves boxing champions as well as rockabillies; Dorsey wrote many of RICKY NELSON's hits and died of a massive heart attack in California in 1979; Johnny had big international hit singles with 'Dreaming' and 'You're Sixteen' and drowned in a lake in California in 1964.)

Billy—who became great friends with Ricky Nelson, with whom he shared birthdays—first performed at age three, singing a doubtless outrageously cute 'Hound Dog' with the Rock N'Roll Trio, made his first single, 'Hey Daddy (I'm Gonna Tell Santa on You)', at age seven (with Ricky's band), recorded his first album at age 11 and was touring Japan and the Far East with Little Miss Dynamite, Brenda Lee, at age 13. He neglected to learn to play guitar until age 16.

Burnette grew up in Los Angeles but moved back to Memphis in 1969, where Chips Moman taught him studio engineering and encouraged his songwriting, to develop which he moved to Nashville in 1972. There he recorded a début album, Billy Burnette, for a small label and scored his first hit as a writer with 'Do I Ever Cross Your Mind?', a hit for Kin Vassy and later covered by Dolly Parton and RAY CHARLES. Burnette signed to Polydor in 1979 and made another album titled Billy Burnette, followed by Between Friends, which yielded the hit single 'What's a Little Love Between Friends?'

His career continued through the 1980s with New Wave Rockabilly albums for Columbia—the first one was called, yes, Billy Burnette—and MCA and hits written for others but in 1987 he joined old wave Fleetwood Mac, with whom he toured and recorded for nearly a decade. (He and Mick Fleetwood also had a band called Zoo.) Burnette wrote 'Dream You', one of the songs on ROY ORBISON's 1980s album Mystery Girl, and his work has also been recorded by JERRY LEE LEWIS, BOB WEIR, Cher, THE EVERLY BROTHERS and Gregg Allman (a pleasing juxtaposition of names). He returned to the fray of solo albums in 1993, with Coming Home; other albums include All Night Long (1999) and Are You With Me Baby (2000). He has also acted in films: Saturday Night Special (aka Deadly Desire—in which his character, all but inevitably called Travis, 'arrives like a hot wind on a steamy summer night') and Caspar 3 (aka Caspar Meets Wendy).

In 2003 Billy Burnette became a very temporary guitarist and backing vocalist in Bob Dylan's band, replacing CHARLIE SEXTON and being replaced himself by the great FREDDY KOELLA on a tour of Australia and New Zealand. Billy's run of dates began in Canberra that February 6, Dylan's first date of the year, and ended in Christchurch on February 26, the last night of that leg of the Never-Ending Tour. Burnette had played a total of 11 dates.

[Billy Beau: 'Hey Daddy (I'm Gonna Tell Santa on You)' c/w 'Santa's Coffee', Dot 45-16281, US, 1961. Billy Burnette: Billy Burnette, Entrance Z 31228, US, 1972; Billy Burnette, Polydor PD-1-6187, US, 1979; Between Friends, Polydor PD-1-6242, US, 1979; Billy Burnette, Columbia NJC 36792 (CBS 84642, UK), 1980; Coming Home, Capricorn / WEA, US, 1993; All Night Long, Grand Avenue, US, 1999; Are You With Me Baby, Free Falls 7009, US, 2000. Deadly Desire, dir. Dan Golden, Concorde-New Horizons, US, 1994.]

Burton, James [1939 -] James Burton was born in Minden, Louisiana, on August 21, 1939, moved to Shreveport ten years later and became one of the defining stylists of electric rock'n'roll guitar, playing mainly a Fender Telecaster yet owning 200 other guitars. He worked his way through backing Slim Whitman and others on the Louisiana Hayride while still virtually a child, escaping into session work after playing a striking solo while still a young teenager on the 1957 Dale Hawkins hit 'Suzie Q'. It was on RICKY NELSON's records that he became widely noticed and admired, playing a series of discreet yet inventive, tantalisingly brief solos on Nelson's big hits. It's astonishing how short the instrumental breaks were on pop singles.

In 1969 he was asked to back ELVIS PRESLEY on his return to live performance, and stayed in service through all the numbing, demeaning tours until Presley's death, though he was never free to impose either his flair or his restraint on this overblown orchestral unit.

His credentials were better respected on albums by Hoyt Axton, JUDY COLLINS, Ry Cooder and others, and on the Gram Parsons albums GP and Grievous Angel. After Parsons' death he was a member of EMMYLOU HARRIS' Hot Band (between Elvis tours), touring and recording with her. He and the steel player Ralph Mooney made the duets album Corn Pickin' and Slick Slidin' in 1966 (CD-reissued in 2005), and five years later Burton made his only solo album, which suffered under the title The Guitar Sounds of James Burton, the sort of name normally associated with albums by middle-of-the-road hacks, and catches Burton trying haplessly to look early-1970s hip, in one of the world's nastiest shirts. This album was CD-reissued in 2001.

James Burton's connection with Dylan—aside from the mere rumour that Dylan had wanted Burton in his band when he first 'went electric' in 1965—is that when the Never-Ending Tour came through Shreveport on October 30, 1996, the veteran guitarist came on stage and played with Dylan and the band on five numbers: 'Seeing the Real You At Last', 'She Belongs to Me', 'Maggie's Farm', 'Like a Rolling Stone' and the final encore item, 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'.

[James Burton: The Guitar Sounds of James Burton, A&M, US, 1971. James Burton & Ralph Mooney, Corn Pickin' and Slick Slidin', Capitol T 2872, US, 1966.]

Butler, Keith [1945 - 2002] See 'Judas!' [shout].

Butterfield, Paul [1942 - 1987] Paul Butterfield was born in Chicago on December 17, 1942 and grew up in the city. He was exposed to jazz and was taught classical flute as a child. He learnt guitar and harmonica, dropped out of college to visit blues clubs and by 1961 he and Elvin Bishop were good enough players that they could sit in with HOWLIN' WOLF, Little Walter, MUDDY WATERS, Junior Wells and others in clubs where they were commonly the only white faces. In 1963 he formed the Butterfield Blues Band, with Bishop, the splendidly named Little Smokey Smothers, JEROME ARNOLD and SAM LAY. In 1964 out went Smothers, the word 'Paul' was added to the band's name and in came Mark Naftalin and MIKE BLOOMFIELD: a line-up that stayed steady until illness forced drummer Sam Lay's 1966 replacement by Billy Davenport. Butterfield led this extraordinary unit till 1972, when he disbanded it.

He was a remote individual but an adequate yet expressive vocalist and a superb harmonica player, and his achievement was to create and lead the band that 'slit the membrane between the two cultures', with a first album (The Paul Butterfield Blues Band, on Elektra) that was racially mixed, hard-driving, unapologetic blues that showed white enthusiasts how to play it instead of archiving it, and thus brought urban Chicago blues into the white mainstream. The band's appearance under its own name at the 1965 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL was a revelation to those who heard it, taking this music to a whole new level of energy. It was as vividly remembered by the likes of MARIA MULDAUR as the Dylan controversy at the same festival.

For Dylan's appearance, Butterfield lent him his rhythm section and Mike Bloomfield but did not play himself. The only time he came together with Dylan on stage was at THE BAND's Farewell Concert at the Winterland in San Francisco on November 25, 1976, when he and others provided backing vocals on Dylan's performance of 'I Shall Be Released'.

Towards the end, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band nudged closer to rock, and the group he formed afterwards, Paul Butterfield's Better Days, reined in this trend but was never outstanding. In 1976 Butterfield made the solo album Put It in Your Ear (on which LEVON HELM and GARTH HUDSON both played), and five years later North South, but neither sold well. He moved to Los Angeles, did some session work and made one last album, The Legendary Paul Butterfield Rides Again in 1986—a decent album that includes a fine rendition of the Bob Dylan-HELENA SPRINGS song 'The Wandering Kind', on which he proved he could still play the harmonica searingly well.

Butterfield was by then a heroin addict and in poor health after years of heavy drinking and suffering from peritonitis. He died of drug-related heart failure in Hollywood on May 4, 1987. He was 44.

[Paul Butterfield Blues Band: The Paul Butterfield Blues Band, Elektra 7294, NY, 1965. Paul Butterfield: Put It in Your Ear, Bearsville, BR 6960, US, 1976; The Legendary Paul Butterfield Rides Again, Amherst, MA 1986 (CD-AMH 93305, 1990). The 'membrane' quote from Charles Sawyer, 'Blues With a Feeling: A Biography of the Paul Butterfield Blues Band', 1994, online 2 Jul 2005 at www.people.fas.harvard.edu/~sawyer/bwf.html.]

Buttrey, Kenny [1945 - 2004] Kenneth A. Buttrey was born in Nashville on April 1, 1945 and became one of the great drummers of the 1960s. Playing professionally by age 14, he joined CHARLIE McCOY & the Escorts, and played on ARTHUR ALEXANDER's great record 'Anna (Go to Him)'—the one THE BEATLES covered—in 1962. He was often a persuasive on-the-spot arranger whose creative touch made him invaluable in the studio. He played on dozens of big-name artists' albums including work by the Canadians RONNIE HAWKINS, GORDON LIGHTFOOT, IAN & SYLVIA and eventually NEIL YOUNG, whose Stray Gators he belonged to (he played on Young's After the Gold Rush, Harvest and Tonight's the Night), as well as playing on records by country stars like JERRY LEE LEWIS, ROY ORBISON, Waylon Jennings, WILLIE NELSON and Jimmy Buffett, and on albums by rock and folk artists from BOB SEGER and SIMON & Garfunkel to RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT, Eric Andersen and JOAN BAEZ. Crucially, he played on the core Dylan albums Blonde on Blonde and John Wesley Harding, as well as on Nashville Skyline and Self Portrait.

For Blonde on Blonde he was there as soon as the sessions shifted from New York—where BOBBY GREGG played on 'One of Us Must Know (Sooner or Later)'—beginning on February 14, when they cut final takes of '4th Time Around' and 'Visions of Johanna'. Over the days that followed came 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands', 'Stuck Inside of Mobile with the Memphis Blues Again', and in early March 'Absolutely Sweet Marie' and all the rest. Eighteen months later, Bob, Charley McCoy and Kenny Buttrey re-convened for Dylan's first studio session since Blonde on Blonde's completion and the very different working environs of West Saugherties and the making of the Basement Tapes. It was October 17, 1967, and they laid down the three tracks for John Wesley Harding: 'Drifter's Escape', 'I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine' and 'The Ballad of Frankie Lee and Judas Priest'. On November 6, they added 'All Along the Watchtower', 'John Wesley Harding', 'As I Went Out One Morning', 'I Pity the Poor Immigrant' and 'I Am a Lonesome Hobo'. Incredibly, one more session wrapped it up: November 30, yielding 'The Wicked Messenger', 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight', 'Down Along the Cove' and 'Dear Landlord' (with PETE DRAKE on steel guitar for the middle two of the four).

On February 13, 1969—almost three years to the day since his first Blonde on Blonde session—Buttrey was back with Dylan, McCoy and others for the first Nashville Skyline session. He was the drummer on all tracks, and on outtakes that included the many duets between Dylan and JOHNNY CASH, and he played on Dylan's 'Johnny Cash TV Show' appearance that May 1. And by that time he'd played on the first of the Self Portrait sessions too, beginning on April 24 and 26 and then continuing on May 3. When Dylan returned to New York for further sessions in March 1970, Buttrey was less involved. Alvin Rogers played drums on the New York tracks early that month, but these were flown to Nashville for overdubs, on which Buttrey duly played drums on March 11 and 12, and contributed bongos and congas on March 13. At the beginning of May he was replaced as drummer by RUSS KUNKEL—but by then Kenny Buttrey had played on the Dylan album tracks 'Spanish Is the Loving Tongue' and 'A Fool Such as I' as well as on the Self Portrait tracks 'Living the Blues', 'Take Me as I Am', 'I Forgot More', 'Let It Be Me', 'Take a Message to Mary' and 'Blue Moon', and overdubs on others.

The Village Voice critic Robert Christgau once wrote that while 'Dylan has known great rhythm sections (in Muscle Shoals and, especially, THE BAND), his seminal rock records were cut with Nashville cats on drums—Kenny Buttrey when he was lucky, nonentities when he wasn't.' And in the end, the key point is this: Kenny Buttrey plays so beautifully on Blonde on Blonde, makes the drumming a defining part of every track. Think back to the sound of 'Just Like a Woman', 'I Want You', 'Pledging My Time' and so on: Buttrey's contribution, never attention-seeking, always does something. Here is a musician who could always be proud that he played on 'Visions of Johanna' and then on 'All Along the Watchtower' too.

Buttrey went on not only to work with Neil Young but to co-found Area Code 615 with Charley McCoy, WAYNE MOSS and others: a revered outfit in spite of poor sales for its only two LPs—sales that weren't helped by the group only playing once live and once on 'The Johnny Cash Show'. The first album, Area Code 615, included a version of 'Just Like a Woman'; the second, Trip in the Country—an emphatic term at the time, shouting the new hipness of a group with straitlaced Nashville roots —included the harmonica-centred instrumental track 'Stone Fox Chase', which became the theme tune for the long-running BBC-TV rock music series 'The Old Grey Whistle Test'.

Buttrey went on to reunite with McCoy in the less interesting but more prolific Barefoot Jerry, while continuing to hire out his talents to others in the studios, as on the Jimmy Buffett album that produced Buffett's hit 'Margaritaville', and on sessions in May 1971 for ELVIS PRESLEY (for whom he'd first worked in 1965, on the music for the gruesomely bad film Harum Scarum).

Kenny Buttrey died at his home in a Nashville suburb on September 12, 2004, after a long battle with cancer. He was 59.

[Area Code 615: Area Code 615, Polydor 24-4002, US (Polydor 583572, UK), 1969; Trip in the Country, Polydor 24 4025, US, 1970. Robert Christgau quote unattributed, seen online nia, 10 Jan 2006.]

Byatt, A.S. [1936 -] See 'Keats v. Dylan'.

'Bye and Bye' [2001] See Shakespeare in *"Love and Theft" and 'If Dogs Run Free'.

Byrds, the The Byrds were the group with the best claim to have originated folk-rock, though were folk-rock not essentially an American sound, THE ANIMALS might dispute such a claim, having rocked up two traditional songs after hearing them by Dylan: 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down' and 'House of the Rising Sun', both on his first LP, and achieving a US no.1 with the latter.

The Byrds, though, were dubbed the American Beatles and in 1965 seemed to be everywhere. They were the group that 'electrified' Bob Dylan's work the most, beginning with 'Mr. Tambourine Man', a huge hit single and a record that thrilled Dylan himself and deserves the epithet 'a classic', with its joyous, gritty fusion of Dylan's celebratory lyrics and ROGER McGUINN's electric 12-string Rickenbacker guitar and his highly distinctive voice. In fact none of the rest of the band played on this single—though session men Hal Blaine, Larry Knetchel and LEON RUSSELL did.

The group began as a trio featuring McGuinn, Gene Clark and DAVID CROSBY, then added Chris Hillman and Michael Clarke to become the Jet Set in the summer of 1964—heavily influenced by THE BEATLES. Re-named the Beefeaters (do we detect the arrival of 'the British invasion' here?), they issued a Beatleised single that fall, 'Please Let Me Love You' on Elektra. After its failure they became the Byrds and concocted 'Mr. Tambourine Man'. When the post-folkie Bob Dylan came to the West Coast in 1965, it was the groovy world of Hollywood club Ciro's, the milieu of hip rock groups, the home turf of the Byrds, to which he gravitated and allied himself—he even joined them on stage during their set once, not long after his electric début at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL that July. Dylan and the Byrds created a new zenith of hipness when they came together, and did so by leaning a little each upon the other.

The next Byrds single was 'All I Really Want to Do', by which time they found themselves competing with copyists like the Turtles and Sonny & Cher; their next, 'Turn! Turn! Turn!', restored them to the US no.1 slot. In the singles charts, their best days were over, and after 'My Back Pages' in 1967 they never again hit the US top 20. But their importance and influence was as an albums band, and through various personnel changes their albums flowed out in profusion all through the 1960s, and were undeniably part of the soundtrack of the age. After Mr. Tambourine Man (1965) came Turn! Turn! Turn! (1966) and Fifth Dimension (1966)—on which they shifted away from folk-rock and towards a little electronic experimentation (at McGuinn's prompting); this was intensified on Younger Than Yesterday (1967), after which came The Notorious Byrd Brothers (1968), and then their pioneering, marvellous album Sweetheart of the Rodeo, also 1968, which embraced country music before anyone else in rock had brought themselves to think of it as other than hopelessly reactionary and redneck. It did not go down well but it was a tremendous achievement. Having created folk-rock, the Byrds had now created country-rock too—and though Dylan's sign-off tracks on John Wesley Harding, 'Down Along the Cove' and 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight', were recorded in 1967, and his own interest in country music clearly preceded all these releases, nonetheless Sweetheart of the Rodeo nudged hip rock in the direction of country and came before Nashville Skyline.

The later career of the Byrds is not important: all their innovations took place in the 1960s, McGuinn was launching a solo career by the early 1970s, and though a re-formed version of the Byrds finally performed a live 'Mr. Tambourine Man' with Dylan at the so-called 'ROY ORBISON Tribute Show' in LA on February 24, 1990 (McGuinn, David Crosby, Chris Hillman, John Jorgenson and Steve Duncan), this was hardly significant. And if the Byrds had merely made cover versions of Dylan songs, this would not be the place for an account of them—but they did not merely make cover versions: they created at least one genre in which Bob Dylan's own work got a new kind of hearing, and they provided the stimulus to radical change in that work itself.

[The Byrds: 'Mr. Tambourine Man', Columbia 43271, US 1965; 'All I Really Want to Do', Columbia 43332, US 1965; 'Turn! Turn! Turn!', Columbia 43424, US 1965; 'My Back Pages', Columbia 44504, US, 1967; Mr. Tambourine Man, Columbia CL-2372/CS-9172/CK-9172, US, 1965; Turn! Turn! Turn!, Columbia CL-2454/ CS-9254/CK-9254, US, 1965; Fifth Dimension, Columbia CL-2549/CS-9349/CK-9349, US, 1966; Younger Than Yesterday, Columbia CL-2642/CS-9442/CK-9442, 1967; The Notorious Byrd Brothers, Columbia CL-2775/CS-9575/ CK-9575, US, 1968; Sweetheart of the Rodeo, Columbia CS-9670/CK-9670, US, 1968.

Bob Dylan & the Byrds: 'Mr. Tambourine Man', LA, 24 Feb 1990, telecast Showtime Network, US, 30 Oct 1990 & released The Byrds, Columbia Legacy CK46773, US, 1990. The Beefeaters: 'Please Let Me Love You', Elektra 45013, US, 1964.]

Cage, Buddy [1946 -] Buddy Cage was born in Toronto in 1946, where at age 11 he learnt Hawaiian guitar, shifting over to pedal steel after his tutor discovered 'Nashville tuning' in the late 1950s. He won talent shows and conventions galore and was an unrivalled Canadian player at 15. In Toronto he worked in a country band that made cover albums (George Jones covers, for example) and backed visiting Grand Ole Opry stars—which is how the youthful Cage got to play with LEFTY FRIZZELL near the end of that fine artist's life. (Cage was a fan. 'He was drunk, he kept forgetting words. . . . He'd say "I'm sorry, man," and I'd say "It's OK, Lefty."') Cage then played on Anne Murray's first five albums and for RONNIE HAWKINS, who, disappointingly, also required only straight country playing from him.

C

Cage has a black tattoo of Chinese lettering covering one whole side of his neck. 'Loosely translated,' he says, 'it means "insane musician."' He has not only always been the rebel type, in music and in daily life ('I was just a smart-ass punk-ass kid'), but more interestingly he places himself on the political Left, has always been hostile to the redneck culture he found in Nashville and is proud that it was 'stoned hippies' like him who effected much radical change in the late 1960s:

> 'We weren't country Nashville, redneck hillbilly guys, we were, you know, like in '68. . . . you know think of the time—the race riots, the racial injustice, the injustice to women, the war. All of that shit. We voted a crook out of office—the presidential office. We ended up changing the voting age to 18 by three years man, you know. We were involved in our time. What do you mean we were just a bunch of stoned hippies?!'

Cage is best known for his work with New Riders of the Purple Sage, into which he moved via the legendary 1968 band the Great Speckled Bird ('legendary' as in no-one listens to but everyone remembers the name).

He joined the third line-up of New Riders, which existed as from November 1971, and in the end played on ten of their albums and was with them for 11 years. The first album he's on is Powerglide (1972), followed by Gypsy Cowboy and Panama Red (1973), Home on the Road and Brujo (1974).

On Brujo, at producer BOB JOHNSTON's request, they cut a version of Dylan's 'You Angel You', and a Columbia exec and friend of Dylan's, Ellen Bernstein, gave Dylan the album—as a result of which Cage was invited to play on the original New York sessions for Blood on the Tracks in September 1974. Cage's account is colourful:

'Ostensibly he was supposed to listen to "You Angel You", but when he heard the other things that I was playing with the Fuzz Tone, he said "Oh, is he going to be around? I'm going to be doing some more sessions in New York . . ." So. . . . I came over, but it was one of those situations where I was alone out in the studio. The studio was huge, man, and it was this cavernous feeling of "Oh God, man . . .". So, he says Phil Ramone was on the board. For Christ's sake, I mean no production credit at all. Just to do the engineering! It was like holy fuck man! This is big time! I'm sitting here, Dylan is over there, Phil is sitting here and MICK JAGGER is behind me, just being an observer. And I'm thinking "Man, this better be good!"

'Then Dylan says "Uh, Phil, play him the tunes." Here was like 18 of the most incredible masterpieces of Dylan that you could hope to hear. . . . I looked at Dylan, and I looked at Ramone, and I said "What the fuck am I supposed to do with those?! They're masterpieces, they are finished!" Dylan went "Oh, thank you man, but I would like for you to get some stuff on there." I went [sigh] "I honestly don't know where to begin." He said "Phil, play them again: play him the tunes." 18 more fucking tunes! So finally I kind of bookmarked "Meet Me in the Morning" and a couple, three more is all.

'But the funny thing was, the way that I was used to recording was, I will record over everything. You start the tape and I will start and at the end of the tape I will give you two or three, four versions of it. You have extra tracks—till I burn out spiritually and then you could do whatever you want in the final mix. Dylan hated that, man. I did one take, then two takes, then I'm going to offer one more. Then I did like a third take and then there was like this silence. The red light would go off, end of the song, and I was sitting there, and all fucking alone: you had to see this place. . . . You could barely see through the glass: you could just see Ramone . . . with his head in his hands. Finally . . . Dylan . . . walks out and . . . sticks his boot tips under my pedal board and he says "The first six verses are singing! You don't play! The last verse is playing! You play!" Then he turns around and walks out.

'I was stunned. . . . I looked through the glass and I saw Phil and them go like this [waves his hand in the air]. Like, there he goes again, right? Just in that split second the old punk ass came out. Normally it wouldn't, but just in that situation I said, Fuck you, Jack. I deserve to be here you little son of a bitch. . . . I knew what he wanted, and so Phil hit the foldback and he said "Buddy, do you want to practice one out?" I said "No, hit the tape." . . . the little red light comes on and I'm thinking you little motherfucker, you're not getting away with this. . . .

'I just played it just like he wanted it, I took the direction and stuff like that. Then when it came out to the end, I played the end in one take and I had the picks off and the bar down before the red light was off. I was walking out of the room, and I'm walking hard man, and I pushed open the fucking door and Dylan is sitting back in the control room and he leaned back and said "Hah!" . . . Dylan says to Phil "Play it man, it was great!" . . . after the playback . . . I said "Bob, that was the toughest three and half minutes of my life. . . . Not playing it but sitting here listening to it with you." He said "Can you go out and do some more?"'

So Cage overdubbed steel guitar onto 'Call Letter Blues' (released in 1991 on Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3), the backing track which was re-used for the released track 'Meet Me in the Morning'; and onto 'You're a Big Girl Now'. He played too on the session of September 18, when Dylan made a number of attempts at 'Buckets of Rain', none of which have circulated.

Cage resumed life with the New Riders of the Purple Sage, whose next album, Oh What a Mighty Time (1975), the last of their Columbia albums, included 'Farewell Angelina'. After that they switched to MCA and in 1978 Cage quit and co-formed the San Francisco All Stars, rejoined New Riders in 1980 and left again in '82 (though they reunited for a one-off in October 2001). He worked in a trio with RICK DANKO in 1987 and toured Australia with THE BAND in 1988, but he spent most of the 1980s swamped by an alcoholism far more incapacitating than the drugs habits of earlier years. Near the end of the decade he attended an AA meeting, and it saved his life. He's stayed sober ever since. 'One day at a time.'

[Buddy Cage: all quotes from the undated interview by J.B. Arnold, posted on Cage's website www.buddycage.net/psga/interview.htm, seen online 11 Jan 2006. New Riders of the Purple Sage: Powerglide, Columbia US (CBS 64843, UK), 1972; Gypsy Cowboy, Columbia (CBS 65008), 1973; Panama Red, Columbia (CBS 65687), 1973; Home on the Road, Columbia (CBS 80060), 1974; Brujo, Columbia, 1974; Oh What a Mighty Time, Columbia, 1975; New Riders, MCA, US, 1976; Who Are Those Guys?, MCA, 1977; Marin County Line, MCA, 1977; Feelin' Alright, A&M, US, 1980.]

'Call Letter Blues' & 'the shock of recognition' Chapter 9 of MICHAEL GRAY's Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan was called 'Even Post-Structuralists Oughta Have the Pre-War Blues' because its study of Dylan's use of the blues emphasised areas of connection between these relatively new and old topics. A useful way into this subject is the preface of Michael Taft's pioneering book Blues Lyric Poetry: A Concordance, in which he stresses the communality, open-endedness and multi-layered nature of the blues.

First, Taft explains that in constructing a folkloric, rather than a literary, concordance you have an open-ended and more or less infinite corpus of work to deal with, instead of a known, finite one; there are problems, in other words, in defining the text. This brings the Dylan scholar to the core of the divide between a literary and an oral culture and to Dylan's pertinence to these matters, as someone who straddles the oral folkloric cultures of the ballads and the blues and the literary culture, and who moves his own extraordinary fusion of it all forward into the new oral culture—the non-linear, postmodernist culture—of MARSHALL McLUHAN's global village; an artist who, almost at the very moment of 'going electric', proclaimed the death of the eye (book) and the re-emergence of the mouth (oral noise).

As we touch on these concerns of contemporary folklorists and issues raised by a concordance of traditional pre-World War II songs, what should hove into view but the postmodernist concerns (and the very language) of post-structuralism. For what NEIL CORCORAN wrote of 'Tangled Up in Blue' is as true of the whole culture of the old blues: 'it refuses the consolations of the finished in favour of a poetics of process, of constant renewal, of performance rather than publication.'

Taft brings these post-structuralist concerns yet closer, stressing one overriding point about the structure of blues lyrics and the functioning of the blues as an oral cultural form (and in making the point also explains the fundamental reason for having the concordance):

'. . . the essence of the blues is the blues couplet. Indeed, the nature of this type of song is such that one might very well define the genre as one big blues composed of a large but finite number of couplets, lines and formulaic phrases; each individual text is but a sub-text of these couplets . . . the concordance reveals formulaic and linguistic repetitions in the corpus.

'I came to realize that the blues singers employed a type of formulaic structure in the composition of [the lyrics of] their songs . . . somewhat similar to that of epic singers far removed in space and time from these Afro-American artists. . . . I had to re-order or "deconstruct" lines and phrases . . . the purpose of a concordance is to re-order a text so that the analyst might visualize it in a new way . . .'

From here Taft at once shows how the blues concordance and the concerns of current folklore studies yield special insights into the gist of lit-crit post-structuralism; thus the blues bring us right back to Dylan's post-structuralist critics, STEPHEN SCOBIE and AIDAN DAY. Taft writes: '. . . in the case of folklore this jumbling of the text also reveals the way the singer and his audience see the text . . .' [emphasis added] This converges directly with what Day says about how we see altogether: how our minds give us 'this jumbling of the text' of our past. Taft goes on:

> 'Because of the formulaic nature of the blues . . . when a singer sings a phrase or line, both he and his audience recognize that particular part of the song. Perhaps semi-consciously, they compare this specific singing of the phrase with other singings of that phrase and phrases similar to it. In an instant, the singer and his audience compare the way the sung phrase is juxtaposed with others, both in the song being sung and in other songs. . . . Thus, every phrase in the blues has the potential of a literary richness far beyond its specific usage in one song.'

Taft quotes from sleevenotes by Pete Welding, one of the few to have discussed this property of the blues lyric:

> 'The blues is most accurately seen as a music of re-composition. That is, the creative bluesman is the one who imaginatively handles traditional elements and who, by his realignment of commonplace elements, shocks us with the familiar. He makes the old newly meaningful to us . . . providing the listener with what critic Edmund Wilson described as "the shock of recognition", a pretty accurate description . . . of the process of re-shaping and re-focusing of traditional forms in which the blues artist engages.'

This 'process of re-shaping and re-focusing' was often a deliberate one on the part of the individual creative bluesman. In For What Time I Am in This World, Colin Linden describes visiting Tampa Red in a nursing home on Chicago's South Side: 'He said. . . . "When you make records, take some from me and some from everybody else to make it your own way"'. And BLIND WILLIE McTELL said that when writing 'The Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues' he 'had to steal music from every which way to get it—to get it to fit.'

As Taft adds:

> 'If one were to illustrate how the audience undergoes this "shock of recognition", how the mental processes of the listener bring about this shock, one would construct something like a concordance. Each word and each phrase would be lined up against all other words and phrases which are similar to it in all the songs in which the phrase occurred. By looking down a page in the concordance . . . one sees in an instant what must occur for the listener at the moment of "shock". Both the singer and his audience automatically re-order and deconstruct the text as it is being sung; that constitutes their method of appreciation and the basis of their understanding of the blues. . . . The computer concordance is simply a concrete representation of this intuitive process.'

How well all this relates to Dylan and his achievement—including Welding's description of the creative bluesman's way of working, which so aptly applies to Dylan himself: 'the creative bluesman is the one who imaginatively handles traditional elements and who, by his realignment of commonplace elements, shocks us with the familiar. He makes the old newly meaningful to us . . .'

In illustration of this, consider Dylan's 1970s 'Call Letter Blues', recorded at the Blood on the Tracks sessions, left off the album but issued on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991. This is the lyric: 'Well I walked all night long, hearin' them church bells tone / Yes I walked all night long, listenin' to them church bells tone / Either someone needing mercy or maybe be somethin' I done wrong. / When your friends come by for you, I don't know what to say / When your friends come by for you, I don't know what to say / I just can't face up to tell 'em, honey you just went away. / The children cry for mother, I tell 'em mother took a trip / Well the children cry for mother, I tell 'em mother took a trip / Well I walk on pins and needles—I hope my tongue don't slip. / Well I gaze at passing strangers in case I might see you / Yes I gaze at passing strangers in case I might see you / But the sun goes around the heavens, and another day just drives on through. / Way out in the distance, I know you're with some other man / Way out in the distance, I know you're with some other man / But that's alright, baby, you know I always understand. / Call-girls in the doorway all giving me the eye / Call-girls in the doorway all giving me the eye / But my heart's just not in it—I might as well pass right on by. / My ears are ringin', ringin' like empty shells / My ears are ringin', ringin' like empty shells / Well it can't be no guitar player; it must be convent bells.'

This is a blues of the highest order: carefully constructed, with real artistic detachment—to create what may be one of the most rawly autobiographical blues songs ever put on record. All through it, there is a tense and multi-layered struggle between a lashing out and a stepping back. It seethes with the vitriol of bitterness, the rage of betrayal, but in the midst of it, the singer fights for, and achieves, moments of wry equilibrium.

This warring of opposites is present everywhere. The neatly structured song may begin and end with bells, but there's slippage and disparity here, from the certainty of 'hearing them church bells' to the uneasy conjecture of 'it must be convent bells'. The song also begins and ends with an either/or. The opening verse's 'Either . . .' starts with the narrator's compassion for a vaguely envisaged 'someone needing', out there, before suddenly turning, with less compassion, on the self. The closing either/or of the song makes strongly contrasting intuitive leaps between the secular, mobile, sexually active associations of that 'guitar player' and the timeless austerity of those 'convent bells'.

In between, there's the beautiful simplicity of that line in which complete strangers might somehow include the intimately known 'you'. There's the quiet topsy-turvy joke of the narrator's not responding to the call-girls because his 'heart's just not in it'—the heart being, after all, exactly what isn't involved in such exchanges. There are the conflicts between all these people in their different rôles: the woman at the centre who is absent friend, absent mother, absent lover; the man who is the lover walking all night long, ears ringing 'like empty shells', the social diplomat handling the unknowingly intrusive enquiries of those 'friends', and the protective father.

Given this savage pull between the fury of betrayal and the galvanising of inner strength, it is a deft touch, psychologically right, that the song contains one of Dylan's characteristic bumpings-together of two clichés to produce something new: furious duty walks a razor's edge on the surreally painful, black-humorously vivid 'I walk on pins and needles—I hope my tongue don't slip'. In the same verse, there is the equal deftness of that ambiguous 'I tell 'em mother took a trip', which lets us hear the attempted reassurance to the children that their mother is only temporarily absent, yet gives us the very different message that he feels her 'trip' is into a kind of madness, of aberrational abandonment; and Dylan's vocal delivery, unstoppering all the narrator's raw fury the first time he hits that word 'trip', vividly brings to life the bitter ambiguity of this pun. And topping this with a further truth, he uses the opportunity afforded by the song's blues structure to re-sing this same line as if in a different mood, this time not in fury but resignedly, more mindful of the part of him that is the adult guardian than the part which is the spurned child-man.

It has always been a strength arising out of this 'limitation' of the form, in the hands of its best practitioners, to effect a change of feeling across the repeated line. When, here, Dylan traces this particular shift of feeling, he is also enacting precisely what the blues as a form can achieve at all times, since it is not a music for making people angry and miserable but for engendering resilience against anger and misery.

In achieving this complex surging of feeling, Dylan draws on the blues form itself yet more deeply. Its very familiarity, its commonality of language, woven in among those parts of the lyric that are Dylan's alone, allows him to allude to other blues, and other songs of his own, and so to bring other voices into the tumult, other reverberations. The upshot is that 'Call Letter Blues' demonstrates beautifully how 'the shock of recognition', always within reach in the blues, can be activated—in this case many times over—not only as random soundings in the deep pool of the listener's subconscious but consciously too, to specific, pointed effect.

Consider how one or two of these work, starting with a case where the resonance from a familiarity in the lyric can only be *un*conscious. It is impossible, now, to hear that 'I gaze at passing strangers' followed by those 'call-girls in the doorway . . . I might as well pass right on by' without hearing the echo, from underneath, of lines Bob Dylan didn't write until six or seven years later: the lines from 'Every Grain of Sand' in which, he sings, 'I gaze into the doorway of temptation's angry flame / And every time I pass that way I always hear my name'. This echo, unstriven for but par for the course, has the effect of emphasising as you listen to 'Call Letter Blues' that aspect of the narrator's plight common to both songs, which is the bleak gulf between him and the night-world he finds himself wandering, and between the distraction of temptation and the real quest for passion lost or to be worked for.

The most striking echo from other work of Dylan's comes from that 'Way out in the distance', which jangles with the presence of 'Way out in the wilderness a cold coyote calls', from 'The Ballad of Hollis Brown', and 'Outside in the distance a wildcat did growl', from 'All Along the Watchtower'. The effect is that behind the 'Call Letter Blues' line we feel that Hollis Brown bleakness, we feel that wind begin to howl, and the singer's attitude to that 'some other man' is coloured in for us by the parallel conjured out of the earlier songs—the parallel of the predator: 'Way out in the wilderness a cold coyote calls'; 'Outside in the distance a wildcat did growl'; 'Way out in the distance I know you're with some other man.'

We set it down on paper one line after the other, but as the 'shock of recognition' works, it all comes through at once, the echoes of the older lines deepening the meaning and resonance of the line being sung.

Different echoes are sounded at the start of the song. When Dylan sings in the opening line that he is 'hearin' them church bells tone', one of the things we might recognise him as hearing is the church bell tone that BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON imitates on the guitar in his performance of 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean', which the young Bob Dylan had certainly been listening to. And in writing 'Call Letter Blues' in 1974, Bob Dylan may or may not remember that the similar phrase he uses to end the second line, 'listenin' to them church bells tone', is the last line of a song he wrote himself many years earlier, in 1961–62, 'Ballad for a Friend'. But whether he remembers this or not, it was already, back then, a line he knew he was picking up wholesale from the great common-stock storehouse of blues lyric poetry, and its chime, in every one of the old blues songs that shared it, is always the sound of death come around, or death nearby. By their very familiarity as a blues-song image, those toning church bells at the beginning of 'Call Letter Blues' (a title that is itself an echo: of the far more common blues title 'Death Letter Blues') help signal the presence of the fear of loss. So it is that the familiar in the blues can inform and intensify the new.

So it is too that in the process of recognising cross-currents in Dylan's own corpus, we deconstruct and re-order his 'text' in our minds. When Taft says that 'If one were to illustrate how the audience undergoes this "shock of recognition", how the mental processes of the listener bring about this shock, one would construct something like a concordance', with each word and each phrase lined up against all other words and phrases similar to it in all the songs in which the phrase occurred, we can get a sense of the truth of this simply by looking at the Index of Titles, First Lines and Key Lines at the back of Dylan's Lyrics 1962–1985. This acts like the fragments of a Dylan Concordance. Let your eye drift down these few pages and you'll get a sense of the process at work. But with or without a concordance, the deepest disturbance and the deepest pleasure yielded by those 'shocks of recognition' comes when they rise out of the music, as with 'Call Letter Blues'.

[Michael Taft: Blues Lyric Poetry: A Concordance (3 vols.), New York: Garland, 1984. Neil Corcoran: 'Going Barefoot: Thinking About Bob Dylan's Lyrics', Telegraph 27, Romford, UK, summer 1987. Pete Welding quoted in Taft from 'Big Joe and Sonny Boy: The Shock of Recognition', Big Joe Williams and Sonny Boy Williamson, Blues Classics BC-21, Berkeley, 1969. Colin Linden in Bill Usher, ed.: For What Time I Am in This World, London: Peter Martin, 1977. Blind Willie McTell: spoken intro to 'The Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues', Atlanta, Sep 1956, Blind Willie McTell: Last Session, Prestige Bluesville 1040, Bergenfield, NJ, 1961 (Transatlantic PR1040, UK, 1966), CD-reissued Prestige Bluesville Original Blues Classics OBCCD-517-2 (BV-1040), US, 1992. Blind Lemon Jefferson: 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean', Chicago, c.Feb 1928, American Folk Music, Folkways FP251-253, NY, 1952.

Bob Dylan: 'Ballad for a Friend', NY, Jan 1962, unreleased music-publishing demo; 'Call Letter Blues', NY, 16 Sep 1974, the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, 1991.]

Campbell, Larry [1955 -] Larry Campbell is older than he looks. Born in New York City on February 21, 1955, he grew up in the city to become a near-ubiquitous multi-instrumentalist session player: an old friend of HAPPY TRAUM (he first plays on his album Bright Morning Stars in 1980), which gives him a connection to Dylan's folk years; a player on the 75th Anniversary album by the Dixie Hummingbirds, Diamond Jubilation, which connects him to BAND members LEVON HELM and GARTH HUDSON and so to both the Basement Tapes era of Dylan's career and to his gospel years (the album includes Dylan's song 'City of Gold'); he worked for a lengthy period with Kinky Friedman, and his first album as a session player was on ROB STONER's album Patriotic Duty in 1980, giving him two links to the Dylan era of the Rolling Thunder Revue.

But in fact Larry Campbell's own experience of Dylan events stretches back to within months of the Basement Tapes era. As performer Rick Robbins recounts: 'Larry and I were trading stories. I knew I had a good 10 years on him and I was telling him about the time I went to Carnegie Hall in 1968 with ARLO [GUTHRIE] for the Tribute to WOODY GUTHRIE. Bob Dylan had been out of public view for a long time, and that night he made a surprise appearance with The Band. I was going on about what a special show it was and who was there and all that, and Larry said, "Yeah, I know, I was there." I said—"Really!!?", and he said, "Yeah, I was in the audience with my parents. I was 9 years old."' (In fact, he was almost 13, but '9' makes a better story.)

He has also played on Shawn Colvin's excellent Cover Girl and Edie Brickell's début solo album Perfect Picture Morning (both 1994), Joan Osborne's 1995 Relish (which includes a 'Man in the Long Black Coat'), JUDY COLLINS' pointless 1998 album of re-recordings Both Sides Now (which includes 'Blowin' in the Wind' and 'The Times They Are a-Changin''), albums by Steve Forbert and a hundred others besides, right up to Happy Traum's 2005 album I Walk the Road Again. He plays too on WILLIE NELSON's version of Dylan's 'He Was a Friend of Mine', used on the soundtrack of the 2005 film Brokeback Mountain. He also produces albums, has made a solo album of his own (Rooftops, 2005) and generally impressed all who work with him. Musician Kenny Davis says this: 'Larry has always been better at everyone's else's instrument than they were; a fine blues singer, extraordinarily versatile, not only with the number of instruments, but the diversity of styles he plays. I'd say the one thing that set him apart from every other player I know from that time was that Larry was always practicing.'

That certainly sets him apart from Bob Dylan—but centrally, Larry Campbell became a long-serving and stalwart member of Dylan's Never-Ending Tour band, replacing JOHN JACKSON in 1997. Slow 'to settle in', as ANDREW MUIR notes, when he did he stuck it out right through till the last night of the last leg of 2004. He first played with the band on the night of Dylan's début in Newfoundland, at St. John's Memorial University on March 31, 1997, and he last played at Allston, Massachusetts, on November 21, 2004.

He arrived as lead guitarist (electric and acoustic) and then after playing violin early on in his time with the band expanded his range until by the end of 1999 he had also played pedal steel guitar, lap steel guitar, electric and acoustic slide guitar, dobro, bouzouki and mandolin, and by 2000 had added the cittern.

On record, he plays on the JOHNNY CASH song 'Train of Love', video'd and taped at an unknown location in March 1999 for inclusion on the Cash tribute album Kindred Spirits (unreleased on record until 2002 but the footage televised April 18, 1999 as part of TNT's 'All-Star Tribute to Johnny Cash' TV special); on 'Things Have Changed'; on "Love and Theft"; on the re-make of 'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking' made by Dylan and MAVIS STAPLES in 2002, issued on Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan (2003); on Dylan's Secrets of the Ya-Ya Sisterhood track 'Waitin' for You'; on various live recordings like the CD singles of 'Love Sick', the Dylan Las Vegas performance from March 1, 1999 of 'Friend of the Devil', released on the various artists tribute album Stolen Roses: Songs of the Grateful Dead in 2000, and on Dylan's soundtrack item for the film Gods and Generals, ''Cross the Green Mountain', on the video for which Campbell can also be glimpsed plodding through the mud.

He played when Dylan performed with Joan Osborne on the TV show 'The '60s', on Hallowe'en 1998, from which their shared 'Chimes of Freedom' was released on the 1999 various artists album The '60s—TV Soundtrack; in May 2000 on 'Red Cadillac and a Black Moustache', Dylan's charming studio-recorded contribution to the rockabilly retrospective album Good Rockin' Tonight—The Legacy of Sun Records (released 2001); on 'Return to Me', the Dean Martin song Dylan recorded for 'THE SOPRANOS' and 'I Can't Get You Off of My Mind', the HANK WILLIAMS song he recorded for the tribute album Timeless (both issued 2001). He was also in the band for a live satellite-feed performance of 'Things Have Changed' from Australia broadcast at the Academy Awards show on March 26, 2001 and the live televised performance of 'Cry a While' at the Grammy Awards in LA on February 27, 2002. He also plays in the band on the 2003 film Masked & Anonymous, filmed in July 2002 (and on its soundtrack album).

In the end Larry Campbell played 852 concerts in Dylan's band and most people rated his contributions highly. He also lent an air of flowing-locked, bandit-moustachioed, gambling-man glamour to the look of the band while still managing to radiate easy-going good nature. Others found him just a little bit dull.

[Larry Campbell: Rooftops, Treasure, US, 2005. Various Artists: The '60s—TV Soundtrack, Mercury/Polygram 314 538 743-2, US, 1999. Bob Dylan & band: 'Friend of the Devil', Las Vegas, 1 Mar 1999, Stolen Roses: Songs of the Grateful Dead, Grateful Dead SDCD4073, US, 2000.]

Campbell, Mike [1950 -] Michael Campbell was born in Panama City, Florida, on February 1, 1950. He learnt the guitar and in 1970 dropped out of the University of Florida in Jacksonville to aim at a career in music. After forming a short-lived band named Dead or Alive, he joined TOM PETTY and BENMONT TENCH in Mudhutch, which got as far as a record deal with Shelter in LA, but the album they made in 1974 was shelved. Mudhutch mutated into TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS in 1975. Campbell proved an adroit co-writer of songs with Petty, a competent producer (not only co-producing many of the group's albums but Petty's solo albums too) and above all one of 'only a handful of guitarists who can claim to have never wasted a note', as Guitar World magazine put it. He has a side-band called the Dirty Knobs (a name especially unalluring to British ears), and has written songs for JOHNNY CASH, ROGER McGUINN, Don Henley, Fleetwood Mac and others.

Mike Campbell's first working encounter with Dylan came long before the Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers tours of 1986 and '87. On April 27, 1981, he was brought in on studio sessions Dylan was working on in Los Angeles (Campbell's friend Benmont Tench had been at earlier sessions off and on all month), and played guitar on several takes each of new songs 'Need a Woman', 'Dead Man, Dead Man' and 'In the Summertime', and one of 'Watered-Down Love'. None made it onto the album that eventually emerged, Shot of Love, and no unissued material has circulated; but the fourth take of 'Need a Woman' was officially released ten years later on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3.

On December 6, 1984, in a studio in Hollywood, Campbell, Tench and Heartbreaker HOWIE EPSTEIN backed Dylan's attempts at 'New Danville Girl', 'Queen of Rock'n'Roll' (almost certainly a revival of an obscure slice of borderline rockabilly issued as a single by one Lewis Weber from 1959) and a song that might be called 'Look Yonder'. Their recording of 'New Danville Girl' may or may not be the one later overdubbed and turned into 'Brownsville Girl'. (Another version of 'New Danville Girl' was recorded with different musicians earlier the same day.) Eight days later Campbell, Tench and Epstein were back in the studio recording 'Something's Burning, Baby' and, somewhat surprisingly, 'The Girl I Left Behind' (a folk song Dylan had sung exquisitely on radio in October 1961). These were sessions for the album Empire Burlesque, and with later overdubs 'Something's Burning, Baby' was issued on that album. Campbell and Epstein (without Tench) cut another track, 'Seeing the Real You at Last' on January 28, 1985 and on February 5 added 'Trust Yourself' and 'I'll Remember You'. (They had another run at 'Queen of Rock'n'Roll' while they were at it, but this too remains unissued and uncirculated.) On February 14 they recorded various songs that didn't make it onto the album, including 'Straight A's in Love' and the marvellously sinister 'Waiting to Get Beat', plus another track that did make it, the awful 'Emotionally Yours'.

That fall they were reunited with Dylan as part of the backing group Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers provided for him at Farm Aid. Then came the group's tours with Dylan in 1986 and 1987, and 15 years later a couple of shared concerts in New Jersey in 2003.

Mike Campbell is still playing, writing and producing, working with and without Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers. The Dirty Knobs are still going too.

[Unspecified Guitar World quote from Wikipedia online; Lewis Weber: 'Queen of Rock'n'Roll', nia, Vim K8OW-4759/60 & Scottie 1304, US, 1959. Bob Dylan: 'The Girl I Left Behind', NY, 29 Oct 1961, live on WNYC Radio.]

'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?' [1965] Perhaps the first to truly mark the arrival of Dylan's fully realised new complex type of song was 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?', which he recorded twice in 1965, once at Highway 61 Revisited sessions and once at Blonde on Blonde sessions, using different musicians each time. It literally was a pivotal song (but much ignored).

In a classic record-company cock-up, both versions were issued as a single (though with little commercial success). In July he recorded it with AL KOOPER on organ, MIKE BLOOMFIELD on guitar, HARVEY GOLDSTEIN (aka Harvey Brooks) or RUSS SAVAKUS on bass, PAUL GRIFFIN or an unknown on piano, and BOBBY GREGG on drums. This version was released, mistitled 'Positively 4th Street', and then withdrawn. In November, with either Al Kooper or GARTH HUDSON on organ but with ROBBIE ROBERTSON on guitar, RICHARD MANUEL on piano, RICK DANKO on bass and Bobby Gregg again on drums, Dylan recorded it again. This version was duly released properly.

In this song, the language flashes and sculpts, takes a hundred different photographs, captures a human possibility that comes across as always having been there, recurring and recurring, but never detected or seen in focus before. It needn't be a relationship we have been through for it to impress us as true—as accurately stated and real; and only the insensitive listener would feel a need to ask what the song 'means'. It almost stands up just as words on the page; and while the recordings are fine things, the language of the song is at least as interesting as its music.

Consider the phrase 'fist full of tacks'. Dylan uses that in at least three main ways. First, it gives us a visual image of sorts. It directs our awareness towards the man's hands: and these are kept before us implicitly when we come, later in the same verse, to his 'inventions' and again later when we come to 'hand him his chalk'. Second, 'fist full of tacks' gives us a vivid metaphor at the same time as yielding a neat juxtaposition—for in the first half of the relevant line we get the man and the sweep of the room and then we zoom down to the tiny contents of his closed hand. (The same happens in the comparable example of 'You walk into the room / With a pencil in your hand', from 'Ballad of a Thin Man': that too yields a visual incongruity by its juxtapositioning, and uses the 'pencil' as a symbol, so that the two lines give us not only the man's entrance as others see it but also his own attitude, because to come in 'with a pencil in your hand' is plainly to be unreceptive to real life—to wish to be an observer and not a participant.) These metaphors are characteristic of Dylan, and take us all the way back to 'Talkin' New York', on his very first album, where he says 'A lot of people don't have much food on their table / But they got a lot of forks 'n' knives / And they gotta cut somethin'.' Those lines are explaining why his initial New York audiences were hostile: it is a figurative explanation. 'Fist full of tacks' operates similarly. It could be swapped, in a prose précis, with the word 'aggressively', and yet it does a lot more than 'aggressively' could do.

The third way it works is in establishing a tone of verbal precision—it is an incisive, sharp phrase—which is important throughout the song. It influences the sound, later on in the song, of words like 'test' and 'inventions', 'righteous' and 'box', and links up, in effect, with that phrase 'little tin women' in the final verse. 'Little tin women' is of exactly corresponding brittleness and precision. This impression is enforced in the music, too, by the guitar-work and the insistent cymbal strikes in particular and by various xylophonic percussive effects in general.

(In Lyrics 1962–1985, the phrase is given as 'little ten women', but this is surely a mishearing by the transcriber. An alternative mishearing, 'lilting women', is listed in 'Pardon, Monsieur, Am I Hearing You Right?' in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, 1987. Neither so well suits—indeed the second contradicts—the chinking sharpness Dylan is chipping in with in the verses of the song. 'Little tin women' is surely right: Dylan had already used the phrase 'little tin men' in his poem 'jack o'diamonds', 1964, one of the poems forming Some Other Kinds of Songs, published as sleevenotes to Another Side of Bob Dylan, 1964: 'jack o'diamonds / wrecked my hand / left me here t'stand / little tin men play / their drums now'.)

Dylan provides a contrast to all this 'tin-tack' atmosphere: it is beautifully contradicted by that gangling (and warm) chorus line 'Use your arms and legs, it won't ruin you', where the words enact the motion, so that the listener is actually a part of the flailing limbs swimming out of the window—where, in other words, the sounds and impressions are rounded instead of thin, and soft rather than sharp. The whole chorus takes part in this exercise of contrast: the qualities of 'crawl', 'use', 'ruin', 'haunt', and Dylan's long-drawn-out

'want' are all antithetical to the qualities of that initial 'fist full of tacks'.

Consider too the tremendous line 'With his businesslike anger and his bloodhounds that kneel'. Until we isolate that line, it doesn't occur to our visual response to have our murky, semi-existent bloodhounds actually kneeling. Dogs cannot easily kneel at all; yet in the sense that they are humble/faithful/servile etc., they are kneeling, figuratively, while they stand. We meet the Dylan phrase accordingly: we visualise the atmosphere that corresponds to silent, standing bloodhounds ranged around the man: ranged, in fact, around his knee. By one of those Dylan tricks of transference, it is the man's knees that comes into our picture, and not the dogs' knees at all.

Dylan has never performed this quintessential mid-1960s song in concert.

(See also Hornby, Nick.)

[Bob Dylan: 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?': NY, 30 Jul 1965, one take issued in error as 'Positively 4th Street', Columbia 4-43389, 1965; and NY, 30 Nov 1965, issued as Columbia 4-43477, 1966.]

'Canadee-i-o' [1993] See American Civil War in World Gone Wrong, the.

Cannon, Gus [1883 - 1979] See blues, inequality of reward in.

Carl XVI Gustav of Sweden [1946 -] Carl XVI Gustav Folke Hubertus, King of Sweden, was born in Stockholm on April 30, 1946, the fifth child but the first son of the then–heir to the throne Gustaf Adolf and Princess Sibylla of Sachsen-Coburg-Gotha. Prince Gustaf Adolf died in an air crash in Copenhagen in 1947; a Gustaf VI Adolf acceded to the throne in 1950 following the death of Gustaf V, and our Carl Gustaf became Crown Prince. (Do pay attention.) Then when Gustaf VI Adolf died on September 15, 1973, Crown Prince Carl Gustaf became King Carl XVI Gustav at the age of 27.

(Because he is Carl XVI and his next name is Gustaf, that means he isn't called Carl Gustav XVI but Carl XVI Gustav. So there. Why isn't he just called Carl XVI? This would surely be an FAQ, if there were such a section, on the website www.royalcourt.se, but there isn't.)

Serendipitously, the new king took as his motto 'For Sweden—With the times'; on May 15, 2000, in Stockholm, he found himself presenting Bob Dylan with a Berwaldhallen Polar Music Prize, bestowed by the Royal Swedish Academy of Music. The rather nice citation read:

> 'Bob Dylan's influence, as a singer-songwriter, on the development of 20th Century popular music is indisputable. His achievements encompass almost four decades of constantly changing modes of creativity, always innovative, but always based on American musical traditions and roots. Starting with folk music and reaching the heights of critical and public fame, he set aside the rules of the day, appearing no longer alone with his acoustic guitar but in the company of a rock and roll band. It was a development that required both integrity and determination, a move that cemented his rôle as one of the greatest rock artists of our time.
>
> 'Bob Dylan's ability to combine poetry, harmony and melody in a meaningful, often provocative context, has captivated millions in all age groups, and in most cultures and societies. Through his modest, persuasive musical approach, he has demonstrated an impressive ability to question the most determined political forces, to fight all forms of prejudice and to offer unflinching support for the less fortunate. Even those who might not have shared his views would find it impossible to argue against Bob Dylan's musical and poetic brilliance.'

Dylan accepted the award from the king without saying a word.

Carmichael, Hoagy [1899 - 1981] Hoagy Carmichael was born Hoagland Howard Carmichael on November 22, 1899 and raised in Bloomington, Indiana. He grew up to be a singer and actor but primarily a popular songwriter. His very first composition was called 'Freewheeling', and he also wrote a song titled 'Things Have Changed'. More famously he wrote or co-wrote, among many, many others, 'Stardust' and 'Georgia on My Mind'.

Carmichael is one of the many improbable people whose work and persona Dylan admires, possibly just to be perverse. Hoagy's photo is pinned up on the wall of the shack behind him on the photo by DANIEL KRAMER planned for the US hardback of Dylan's Tarantula but rejected (it's reproduced in Kramer's book Bob Dylan) and in the Empire Burlesque song 'Tight Connection to My Heart' Dylan names a Hoagy Carmichael composition. Dylan sings: 'Well, they're not showing any lights tonight / And there's no moon. / There's just a hot-blooded singer / Singing "Memphis in June"'.

'Memphis in June' was composed by Carmichael with lyrics by Johnny Mercer (who also wrote the lyric to 'Moon River', which Dylan sang one night on the Never-Ending Tour in tribute to the late STEVIE RAY VAUGHAN). Dylan's 'hot-blooded singer' is a neat small joke about Hoagy, whose many assets include a calculatedly lizard-like presence. It was a joke Dylan had retained from an earlier version of the song, then called 'Someone's Got a Hold of My Heart', which he'd recorded at the sessions for Infidels, the album before Empire Burlesque. Several performances of this have floated around, but the one eventually released officially, on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991, offered these alternative lines: 'I hear the hot-blooded singer / On the bandstand croon / "September Song", "Memphis in June"'. Clearly Dylan was determined to retain Hoagy, whatever other changes he made. ('September Song' was written by Maxwell Anderson and composed by Kurt Weill for the 1938 Broadway play Knickerbocker Holiday.)

'Memphis' was written for the 1945 George Raft film Johnny Angel, in which Carmichael played a philosophical singing cab driver. ('After that I was mentioned for every picture in which a world-weary character in bad repair sat around and sang or leaned on a piano'). Subsequent film rôles included being the pianist who sings 'Hong Kong Blues' in the Bogart-Bacall film To Have and Have Not, one of Dylan's favourite hunting-grounds for lyrics in the Empire Burlesque period.

The least hot-blooded cover version of 'Memphis in June' may be by Matt Monro, from 1962; the best (and 'on a bandstand croonin'') may be by Lucy Ann Polk, cut in July 1957 in Hollywood. Hoagy himself recorded the song in 1947 with Billy May & His Orchestra and again in 1956 with a jazz ensemble that included Art Pepper. Carmichael and Mercer also wrote that great song 'Lazy Bones'—in twenty minutes, in 1933—which was revisited magnificently in the 1960s by soul singer James Ray (who made the original US hits of 'If You Gotta Make a Fool of Somebody' and 'Itty Bitty Pieces'; in the UK he was unlucky enough to find these savaged in unusually distressing ways, even by the standards of British cover versions of the time, by Freddie & the Dreamers and Brian Poole in the first case and by the Rockin' Berries and Chris Farlowe in the second).

Carmichael played ranch-hand Jonesey in the 1959–60 season of the TV series 'Laramie'. In 1972 he was given an Honorary Doctorate by Indiana University back in Bloomington (which is where BETSY BOWDEN got her doctorate for a study of Bob Dylan's performance art that became her book Performed Literature).

Hoagy Carmichael died two days after Christmas, 1981. When a retrospective 4-LP box set of his work, The Classic Hoagy Carmichael, was issued in 1988, with copious notes by John Edward Hasse, Curator of American Music at the Smithsonian Institution, it was released and published jointly by the Smithsonian and the Indiana Historical Society. (American hobbyists are so lucky: there are always plenty of places to go for funding. Imagine trying to get funds to research, compile and write an accompanying book about Billy Fury from the British Museum and the Birkenhead Historical Society.) The Carmichael box set notes say this, among much else, and might just remind you of someone else (not Billy Fury):

> 'At first listeners may be distracted by the flatness in much of Carmichael's singing, and turned off especially by his uncertain intonation. The singer himself said, "my native woodnote and often off-key voice is what I call 'Flatsy through the nose'". But . . . one becomes accustomed to these traits and grows to appreciate and admire other qualities of his vocal performances, specifically his phrasing . . . intimacy, inventiveness and sometimes even sheer audacity. Also, many . . . evidence spontaneous and extemporaneous qualities, two important ingredients in jazz.'

[Hoagy Carmichael: The Classic Hoagy Carmichael, 4-LP set compiled & annotated by John Edward Hasse; issued as 4 LPs or 3 CDs, BBC BBC 4000 and BBC CD3007, UK, 1988; Johnny Angel, dir. Edwin L. Marin, written Steve Fisher, RKO, US, 1945. Daniel Kramer: Bob Dylan, New York: Citadel Press edn., 1991, p.127. Betsy Bowden: Performed Literature, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982.]

Carradine, William [c.1896 - c.1958] William Carradine, born in Garden City, Louisiana, around 1896, became a splendidly obscure street singer known as CAT-IRON. BONNIE BEECHER recalls that around 1960 Dylan and HARVEY ABRAMS sat around in the 10 O'Clock Scholar in the Dinkytown area of Minneapolis mentioning obscure singers' names, and that she and Dylan met because she was able to join in. This was because she would go to Sam Goodys in New York to buy records, choosing 'any old record that looked like it had some kind of funky singer or blues singer . . . records by Cat-Iron, Rabbit Brown . . .'

The Cat-Iron record mentioned can only have been a newish copy of his LP Cat-Iron Sings Blues & Hymns, recorded by Fred Ramsey in Natchez, Mississippi (probably in 1957), and released on Folkways in 1958. It was his only record, the fruit of his only recording session. The tracks were traditional and gospel songs, including 'Poor Boy a Long, Long Way from Home', 'Don't Your House Look Lonesome' and 'When I Lay My Burden Down'. In May 1957, Cat-Iron had been recorded on film in Natchez for an item in that year's new TV documentary series 'Seven Lively Arts'.

Cat-Iron / William Carradine is understood to have died in Natchez in 1958. His track 'Jimmy Bell' was included on the 2003 CD Classic Blues from Smithsonian Folkways, and he was still achieving airplay, at least on the Poughkeepsie, New York, radio station WVKR, in November 2005, 109 years after he was born.

[Cat-Iron: Natchez MS, c.1957; Cat-Iron Sings Blues & Hymns, Folkways LP2389, NY, 1958. Filmed in Natchez, 28 May 1957; footage shown 'Seven Lively Arts', CBS-TV, nia, 1957. Various Artists: Classic Blues from Smithsonian Folkways, CD Smithsonian Folkways 40134, Washington, D.C., 2003. Bonnie Beecher, aka Jahanara Romney, quoted in Markus Wittman, 'The Wanted Man Interview: Jahanara Romney', Telegraph no.36, Romford, UK, summer 1990.]

Carroll, Lewis [1832–1898], echoes of Dylan's work occasionally recalls that of Lewis Carroll, born Charles Lutwidge Dodgson in Daresbury, Cheshire, UK, on January 27, 1832. The relevant Carroll works are Alice's Adventures in Wonderland (1865; originally titled Alice's Adventures Under Ground) and Through the Looking-Glass (1871; full title Through the Looking-Glass and What Alice Found There).

If a substantial portion of Dylan's 'The Drifter's Escape' seems to remind us vaguely of the pack-of-cards trial scene in Wonderland, this is principally because it echoes the knowingly preposterous tone (and the metre) of many of the Lewis Carroll verses. The Dylan lines begin with this: 'Well the judge he cast his robe aside / A tear came to his eye / "You fail to understand," he said / "Why must you even try?"' and Wonderland's 'The Lobster-Quadrille' includes this: '"What matters it how far we go?" his scaly friend replied. / "There is another shore, you know, upon the other side . . ."'—which fits the Dylan tune as if purpose-built: as indeed it does the verses read as 'evidence' in the card-pack trial; and it's easy to imagine Dylan singing this one: 'He sent them word I had not gone / (We know it to be true): / If she should push the matter on / What would become of you?'

Resemblance extends also, in Looking-Glass, through much of the poem 'The Walrus and the Carpenter', and while that book's song about Tweedledum and Tweedledee ends with 'Just then flew down a monstrous crow / As black as a tar-barrel / Which frightened both the heroes so / They quite forgot their quarrel', Dylan's 'Drifter's Escape' ends like this: 'Just then a bolt of lightning / Struck the courthouse out of shape / And while everybody knelt to pray / The drifter did escape.' Over 33 years later, Dylan namechecked Tweedledee and Tweedledum on the opening track of the album "Love and Theft", in a song that gives a vivid, dark portrait of two feuding men whose lives are locked so tight together that they may, or may as well, be twins.

Last, but perhaps not least direct as an echo, in Wonderland's 'The Mock Turtle's Story' there is a line from the Duchess—she is herself quoting from a popular song of the period—that Dylan reproduces all but verbatim in 'I Threw It All Away', released the year after 'The Drifter's Escape': '"'Tis so," said the Duchess: "and the moral of that is—'Oh, 'tis love, 'tis love, that makes the world go round!'"'

Lewis Carroll died in Guildford, Surrey, on January 14, 1898.

[Antonio Iriarte notes (letter to this writer, 9 Oct 2000) that the popular song quoted by the Duchess, unidentified in Martin Gardner's The Annotated Alice (New York: Clarkson N. Potter, 1960), is also mentioned in Charles Dickens' Our Mutual Friend (serialised 1864–65), Part IV, Chap. 5, in fine. Iriarte suggests that 'it could well be "'Tis Love that Makes the World Go Round", by R.S. Ambrose, an English composer active in the mid-19th Century.' In fact though born in England, Robert Steele Ambrose lived and died in Canada (born Chelmsford, Essex, 7 Mar 1824; died Hamilton, Ontario, 30 Mar 1908).]

Carter Family, the Ralph Peer discovered both JIMMIE RODGERS and the Carter Family, encountering them in Bristol, Virginia in April 1927, and first recording them there on August 1st that year. Their début tracks were the cheerily titled 'Bury Me Under the Weeping Willow', 'Little Log Cabin by the Sea', 'The Poor Orphan Child' and 'The Storms Are on the Ocean'.

The Carter Family consisted then of Alvin Pleasant Delaney Carter (known as A.P., born at Maces Springs, Virginia, on April 15, 1891), mostly on harmony vocals, his wife Sara (born Sara Dougherty in Flat Woods, Virginia, on July 21, 1898) on autoharp and guitar, and Sara's cousin Maybelle (born Maybelle Addington in Nickelsville, Virginia, on May 10, 1909) on vocals and guitar. Their phenomenal popular success, along with that of Rodgers, kept the Victor record company afloat through the Depression.

The advertisements for their shows (using an approach that would not, today, encourage such success) proclaimed: 'THIS PROGRAM IS MORALLY GOOD'. Their repertoire was a mix of old-time ballads and A.P.'s own songs, and their importance in the history of old-timey and country music is vast. HARRY SMITH would write of them in 1952, on his compilation LP set AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC, that 'Their 1927 records . . . are among the very first electrical recordings. Using autoharp chords, played by Sara (who usually leads the singing) and a guitar melodic line (Maybelle), their instantly recognizable rhythm has influenced every folk musician for the past 25 years.'

Dylan probably first heard them in Minneapolis when he was played the Smith compilation, on which they feature four times—giving them an unrivalled prominence on this 84-track set. Track 17 is their 'John Hardy Was a Desperate Little Man' (summarised by Smith as 'JOHN HARDY HELD WITHOUT BAIL AFTER GUNPLAY, GIRLS IN RED AND BLUE VISIT JAIL, WIFE AT SCAFFOLD'). The song is credited to A.P. Carter and the lead vocal is by Sara. Track 23 is another song Pop Carter claimed, 'Engine One-Forty-Three' ('GEORGIE RUNS INTO ROCK AFTER MOTHER'S WARNING. DIES WITH THE ENGINE HE LOVES'), though Smith quotes John Harrington Cox (in his Folk Songs of the South, 1925) as noting of this real-life narrative that it was 'probably composed by a worker in the round house at Hinton, West Virginia.' Track 67 is 'Single Girl, Married Girl', another A.P. Carter number (though, as Smith says, it is 'of a type frequently represented by such songs as "When I Was Single", "Lord, I Wish I Was a Single Girl Again", "The Sporting Bachelor" etc.'). And more pertinently, Track 53 is one more Pop Carter composition (allegedly), the lovely 'Little Moses', which Dylan took to singing live, and with much benign and seemly gravity, in the early 1990s. He débuted the song in Adelaide, Australia, at the start of his tour there on March 21, 1992 and played it a further 95 times between then and Wantagh, New York, on September 11, 1993.

A decade later the scripted chat on the Dylan and MAVIS STAPLES re-write of ‘Gonna Change My Way of Thinking’, recorded in 2002 and released on the Various Artists album Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan in 2003, is a knowing and in-jokey echo of that on the 1931 novelty record ‘The Carter Family and Jimmie Rodgers in Texas’. Chris Rollason has detected several further Carter touches in the same Dylan record: ‘The “welcome table” in stanza 2 was already laid out in “River of Jordan” . . . while stanza 6 (“There are storms on the ocean / Storms out on the mountain too . . . / Oh Lord / You know I have no friend without you”) combines elements from “The Storms Are on the Ocean” . . . and “Can’t Feel at Home”.’ Rollason adds that there are other ‘Dylan links, too, scattered across’ the Carters’ recorded work, one of which is this: ‘. . . the song “Meet Me by the Moonlight, Alone” . . . is an obvious precedent for the title and refrain of Dylan’s [“Love and Theft” track] “Moonlight” . . .’ He might have added that one of the tracks known to have been recorded at Dylan’s May 1993 sessions for World Gone Wrong but left off the album was a version of the Carter Family’s lovely 1930s song ‘Hello Stranger’.

More generally, though, the Carter Family was a prime influence on the work of WOODY GUTHRIE—indeed he builds many of his old dustbowl jalopies on the chassis of the Carter songbook. Their ‘Can’t Feel at Home’ becomes Guthrie’s ‘I Ain’t Got No Home’, which Dylan performed very early on in his career and again with THE BAND in 1968. Then again, much of the Carter repertoire was taken from traditional song, including a number of adaptations of CHILD ballads, as with ‘Who’s Gonna Shoe Your Pretty Little Feet?’, which passed from the Carters to Guthrie and on to Dylan, who was performing it as early as 1960.

The Carter Family was open to black influence also. They often travelled around on song-collecting trips, frequently taking along the black singer-guitarist Leslie Riddles (Riddles learnt the tunes; A.P. wrote down the words). It was from Riddles that Maybelle Carter ‘picked up many of her instrumental ideas,’ notes Tony Russell, who adds that Riddles also ‘had a friend in BROWNIE McGHEE . . . and he too used to be visited by A.P. in search of songs.’

Sometimes this traffic moved the other way. The only black artist to record ‘John Hardy’, LEADBELLY, said that he learnt the song from Guthrie, who learnt it, of course, from the Carters. Neither, though, gave him one ingredient on his recording: what blues critic Chris Smith calls ‘Leadbelly’s mournfully funky accordion arrangement’.

The Carter Family also recorded ‘My Clinch Mountain Home’ (from which RALPH STANLEY doesn’t take his group name, since he’s from Clinch Mountain himself), ‘Motherless Children’, ‘Wabash Cannonball’, ‘See That My Grave Is Kept Green’ [sic], ‘The Old Rugged Cross’, ‘The East Virginia Blues’, ‘The Girl on the Greenbriar Shore’ (which Dylan performed in Gothenberg, Sweden, and Dunkirk, France, on June 28 & 30, 1992) and many others with degrees of Dylan reverberation. Further songs in their repertoire include ‘Are You Lonesome Tonight?’, memorably revived by ELVIS PRESLEY in 1960 and ‘Diamonds in the Rough’, memorably revived by JOHN PRINE aeons later, in the early 1970s. (The Carters’ ‘Are You Lonesome Tonight?’, with lead vocal by A.P., sounds nothing like Presley’s, which probably came to him from Al Jolson via the Ink Spots; A.P. makes it sound like a Carter Family song—singing it more or less to the tune Woody Guthrie used later for his own ‘Reuben James’.)

The Carter family begat June Carter, who married JOHNNY CASH. More precisely, Maybelle Carter, wife of Eck Carter, gave birth to Valerie June Carter on June 23, 1929 at home in Maces Springs, Virginia. After the Carters disbanded, Mother Maybelle & the Carter Sisters replaced them: Maybelle performing with her daughters Helen, Anita and June as from 1943. They duly teamed up with Chet Atkins, joined the Grand Ole Opry, encountered HANK WILLIAMS and Elvis and thus moved into a more modern musical world, but one they had helped to form in the first place. Johnny Cash became June’s third husband and she his second wife. June and first husband Carl Smith begat Carlene Carter; Johnny and first wife Vivian Liberto begat Roseanne Cash.

June and Johnny performed ‘It Ain’t Me Babe’, and Roseanne Cash joined Shawn Colvin and Mary Chapin Carpenter to harmonise on ‘You Ain’t Goin’ Nowhere’, at the so-called Bob Dylan 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration at Madison Square Garden on October 16, 1992. This programme was morally not so good.

[Carter Family: ‘John Hardy Was a Desperate Little Man’, Camden, NJ, 10 May 1928; ‘My Clinch Mountain Home’ & ‘Little Moses’, Camden, 14 Feb 1929; ‘Engine One-Forty-Three’ & ‘Diamonds in the Rough’, Camden, 15 Feb 1929; ‘Motherless Children’, Atlanta, GA, 22 Nov 1929; ‘Wabash Cannonball’, Atlanta, 24 Nov 1929; ‘Can’t Feel at Home’, Charlotte, NC, 26 May 1931; ‘The Carter Family and Jimmie Rodgers in Texas’, Louisville, KY, 12 Jun 1931; ‘See That My Grave Is Kept Green’ & ‘The Old Rugged Cross’, Camden, 17 Jun 1933; ‘The East Virginia Blues’, Camden, 8 May 1934; ‘Single Girl, Married Girl’, NY, 8 May 1935; ‘Hello Stranger’, NY, 17 Jun 1937; ‘Are You Lonesome Tonight?’, NY, 8 Jun 1936; ‘The Girl on the Greenbriar Shore’, NY, 14 Oct 1941.

Compilations include Original & Essential Carter Family Vol. 1, Country Music History CMH112, US, 1973; The Original and Great Carter Family, RCA Camden 586, UK, nia, which includes ‘Little Moses’ and 'Diamonds in the Rough'); and the 5-CD set The Carter Family 1927–1934, JSP JSPCD7701, UK, 2001, which contains 127 tracks (surely far more than anyone sane would wish to listen to). Leadbelly: 'John Hardy', NY, late 1943.

Christopher Rollason quoted from his online posting seen 11 Jan 2006 at the Bob Dylan Who's Who website at www.expectingrain.com/dok/who/c/carter family.html. Other sources include Tony Russell, Blacks Whites and Blues, London: Studio Vista, 1970, pp.15 & 41, and his Country Music Records: A Discography, 1921–1942, New York: Oxford University Press, 2004, pp.187–95. Chris Smith, e-mail to the pre-war blues discussion group at pre-war-blues@yahoogroups.com, 12 Jan 2006.]

Carter, Rubin 'Hurricane' [1937 -] Rubin Carter was born in Paterson, New Jersey, on May 6, 1937. At age nine he was placed on probation and at 11 sent to the Jamesburg State Home for Boys. He ran away in 1954 and though only 5′8″ he signed up for the US Army and joined the Paratroopers. He was discharged in 1956. From then until 1961 he spent much of his time in jail for various different crimes. The zenith of his boxing career came soon after this; he went from unranked in 1962 to no.3 in 1963 and 1964.

He never rose higher. There is no truth to Dylan's claim in the song 'Hurricane', on the Desire album, that if Carter hadn't been arrested for murder 'he could-a been / The champion of the world'. His career was already on the slide. In 1965 his ranking fell to no.5 and in 1966 he was unranked. The Ring magazine for April 1966, six months before he was arrested, made this assessment: 'Since his defeat at the hands of Dick Tiger in New York last May, Rubin has won three and lost four. His only victories during that period were over two little-known fighters . . . and the erratic McClure. His most recent defeats have dropped Carter from his once high rating and killed his hopes of a crack at Dick Tiger's middleweight crown.'

The song, and Carter's life, turned upon the murder of two men and a woman at the Lafayette Bar and Grill in Paterson on the night of June 17, 1966, and the story of how these murders were followed up. Carter and his friend John Artis were questioned by police that night but released. Resuming his boxing, he lost to Rocky Rivero on August 6. On October 14 local small-time criminal Alfred P. Bello said in a signed a statement that he had seen Carter and Artis at the murder scene. They were arrested and indicted. On May 27, 1967 an all-white jury convicted them; the prosecution sought the death penalty but the jury recommended mercy; they were sentenced to life terms and taken to Rahway State Prison (now the East Jersey State Prison) in Woodbridge, New Jersey. In 1971 riots broke out there and several inmates were killed.

On April 30, 1974 Carter was transferred to the brutal Vroom Readjustment Unit at Trenton State Psychiatric Hospital. That July Carter's federal suit against the state for inflicting 'cruel and unusual punishment' succeeded and he was released from the unit. In September his book The Sixteenth Round was published, and Alfred P. Bello and a second witness, Arthur P. Bradley, claimed that they had been bribed and pressured into making false statements and denied that they had in fact seen Carter and Artis at the murder scene. Carter sent Dylan a copy of his book.

Dylan eventually read The Sixteenth Round and in May 1975 visited Carter in prison. (The photograph of the two men standing talking with the prison bars between them was staged later, however.) 'I realized,' said Dylan, 'that the man's philosophy and my philosophy were running down the same road, and you don't meet too many people like that.' In July 1975 Dylan and JACQUES LEVY wrote the first version of 'Hurricane', and recorded three takes of it on July 28, at the second session for the Desire album. On July 30, two further takes were attempted. On September 10, Dylan performed the song in public for the first time, along with 'Oh Sister' and 'Simple Twist of Fate', at the telerecording of the tribute TV program 'The World of JOHN HAMMOND' in Chicago, shown that December 13 on PBS (and simulcast on FM radio).

CBS lawyers insisted on lyric changes, and the album version was re-recorded on October 24. Six days later Dylan & Co. launched into the first Rolling Thunder Revue, giving 31 concerts and finishing at Madison Square Garden on December 8. This final concert was a benefit for Carter, titled 'The Night of the Hurricane', which included an appearance from MUHAMMAD ALI, then heavyweight world champion (having beaten Joe Frazier in the Philippines less than six weeks earlier).

The previous night, a revue concert had taken place at the so-called Correctional Institution for Women at Clinton, New Jersey. You'd be wrong to assume that this held only women prisoners; it didn't, and its inmates now included Carter. It was a 'country club prison', worlds away from the Vroom Readjustment Unit, and there were no bars on inmates' rooms. A grate of bars used to close off a hallway served as a fake cell barrier for the photo opportunity staged by Carter and Dylan; the picture of their 'meeting' was duly published in People magazine. At the concert itself, prisoners mingled freely on the floor of the hall where the musicians played on a small raised stage. At the end, Carter was allowed to hold a press conference.

Dylan had sung 'Hurricane' at every Rolling Thunder concert, and had released it as a single that November. In January 1976 Desire was released, with 'Hurricane' the opening track, and in Houston, Texas, on the 25th a further benefit concert was held. Less than two months later, on March 17, the New Jersey Supreme Court overturned the convictions of Carter and Artis, ruling that the prosecution had withheld evidence that would have favoured the defence; but they ordered a retrial and released both men on bail.

On December 22, 1976, this retrial ended. The defence had argued that the first trial had been racially biased; but this time it was not an all-white jury, the prosecutor was Burrell Ives Humphreys, a black NAACP member and ex-civil rights activist; yet both men were found guilty again, sentenced again to life imprisonment and sent back to prison.

Exactly five years after the second trial ended, John Artis was released on parole; he had served a total of 15 years. Carter remained in prison. In July 1985 the New Jersey Federal District Court in Newark overturned the second trial's convictions, ruling them 'unsafe' because based on 'racism rather than reason and concealment rather than disclosure'. The prosecutors requested Carter's continued detention pending the result of the state's appeal but Judge H. Lee Sarokin ordered him set free, saying that 'human decency mandates his immediate release'. The US Court of Appeal upheld Sarokin's decision in August 1987, and on January 11, 1988 the US Supreme Court denied the state's appeal against it. The local Prosecutor's Office in Passaic County, New Jersey, decided against seeking a third trial.

This is not the same as establishing that Carter was innocent. Judge Sarokin only ruled that 'To permit convictions to stand which have as their foundation appeals to racial prejudice and the withholding of evidence critical to the defense is to commit a violation of the Constitution as heinous as the crimes for which these petitioners were tried and convicted.' Carter was not, and has never been, found 'not guilty'. Nor has he ever sued for false imprisonment. His history of violence includes beating up a black woman who had been prominent in campaigning for his release. Many of his claims, small and large, have been discredited. No instance of his claimed activism in the civil rights struggle has ever been specified.

Almost every line of Dylan's song is inaccurate, from its description of events and who was where when through to its depiction of Carter. Before his arrest he had not been sitting on horses but in bars, including the Nite Spot, where he spent so much time he's said to have had his own table. This was where he was on the night of the shooting; it was not 'far away on the other side of town', as Dylan sang, based on the claim in Carter's book; it was five blocks down the street from the Lafayette Grill, close enough that if you stand outside the one, you can see the other.

None of this makes any difference to 'Hurricane' as a creative achievement, any more than the facts of Pretty Boy Floyd's life can have any power over the life of the WOODY GUTHRIE song about him. Dylan's record has a blazing vivacity, a life-affirming generosity of sweep; it's a scintillating rendition of a skilful, affecting narrative crafted with great skill, not as a 'message' but as lines of song shaped as a series of cascades and sung with much verve, alertly expressive in its detailing, its ability to change mood and pace, and to dart in, paint a quick and vivid picture and move on. It's cinematic and celebratory.

The facts don't get in the way of a good song or a bad film. The Norman Jewison movie Hurricane, 1999, was based partly on The Sixteenth Round and partly on the later book by Sam Chaiton and Terry Swinton, Lazarus and the Hurricane. It managed the worst of both worlds: it took Carter's own account as gospel, muddied things further, played up the racism of individuals without scrutinising anything uncomfortable about the state's use of it, and threw in the usual quota of white liberal McGuffins.

Carter became a Canadian resident in the early 1990s. He has campaigned for, and is an executive director of, the Association in Defence of the Wrongly Convicted.

On November 17, 2005, boxing promoter Chris Sanigar presented 'An Evening with Former world title contender Rubin "Hurricane" Carter' in the Dolman Exhibition Hall at Ashton Gate Stadium, Bristol, south-west England; the 'support act' was four boxing bouts by local fighters.

When Dylan played a Toronto concert on October 29, 1998 (the 1,040th concert of the Never-Ending Tour) he said from the stage 'My friend Rubin Carter is here tonight'. But he didn't perform the song. He hasn't sung 'Hurricane' live since that second benefit concert on January 25, 1976.

[Rubin Carter: The Sixteenth Round: From Number 1 Contender to #45472, New York: Viking Press, 1974. Bob Dylan: 'Hurricane', NY, Oct 24, 1975. Boxing stats from www.graphicwitness.com/carter/mov-boxing_a.html, seen online Oct 2005; The Ring, April 1966, US, p.26; more generally see the fascinating, and mostly persuasive website www.graphicwitness.com/carter/index.html (though it wrongly dates the Carter Press Conference as 5 Dec and the concert preceding it as 6 Dec; both took place 7 Dec 1975). People magazine, US, 22 Dec 1975. Sam Chaiton & Terry Swinton, Lazarus and the Hurricane, London: Penguin, 1991. Hurricane, dir. Norman Jewison, Azoff / Beacon / Universal, US, 1999.]

Cartwright, Bert [1924 - 1996] Colbert Scott Cartwright was born in Coffeyville, Kansas, on August 7, 1924. From 1928 to 1940 his family lived in Chattanooga, Tennessee (on the Georgia border), and then moved to St Louis, Missouri, where Bert received his BA in 1946 before gaining Bachelor of Divinity and Master of Sacred Theology degrees from Yale in 1948 and 1950. He became an ordained minister of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), serving first in the ominously named Lynchburg, Virginia (1950–1953).

He is the writer of one of JOHN BAULDIE's Wanted Man Study Series of booklets, The Bible in the Lyrics of Bob Dylan, published in 1985, in which he divides Dylan's use of the Bible into five phases, the first three of which cover the 1960s and 1970s before the conversion to Christ.

First is a pre-motorcycle crash phase, drawing on the Bible as 'part of the poor white and black cultures of America with which he sought to identify', yet revealing that Dylan was already familiar with the Bible in some detail; second is a Woodstock and John Wesley Harding phase, in which 'at times a biblical perspective is clearly assumed though not personally claimed'; and third is the period from Planet Waves through till the late autumn of 1978, when the Bible is used 'as material for a sophisticated artist'. (Cartwright includes particularly interesting commentary on the Christ persona in songs such as 'I Pity the Poor Immigrant' and 'Oh Sister' from these second and third phases.)

Then comes the conversion. Cartwright quotes Dylan as telling Robert Hilburn: 'I had always read the Bible, but I only looked at it as literature. I was never really instructed in it in a way that was meaningful to me.'

By Cartwright's analysis, when we reach the beginning of the 1980s, we are in the midst of the fourth phase of Dylan's use of the Bible, the phase that 'reveals his unabashed acceptance of Jesus Christ as Lord and his desire to express in life and song what his fresh study of the Bible as a believer was telling him'. Cartwright designates the fifth phase, 'in which biblical faith [has] been internalized sufficiently for it to serve subtly as Dylan's worldview', as being signalled by the 1983 release of the Infidels album.

It can be argued, however, that a major change occurs between Cartwright's fourth and fifth phases: that what we begin to see after the Saved album of 1980 is Dylan's retreat from evangelism—not a recanting, but a move forward, away from the concern to preach to others and towards a more reflective interest in writing songs that examine the interplay in Dylan's own heart and mind between his Christian faith and other aspects of his life. This is a specially interesting period: it finds Dylan moving beyond insistence on the tenets of faith toward the pain of recognising that faith gets tested, that 'sometimes . . . there's someone there, other times it's only me' and that it's altogether a more complex business than is suggested by 'You either got faith or you got unbelief'.

The original booklet said of Cartwright that he 'first picked up on Bob Dylan in 1965 when a friend referred to young Dylan as a theologian. Curious, he went out and bought Dylan's albums. "Ever since, I have not only been fascinated by his artistic struggle to express through his lyrics and music what life means to him, but by his ability to create his own character out of his fertile imagination."'

Beyond that, his 1985 publication says only that Bert Cartwright was living in Fort Worth, Texas; was 'a Protestant minister' with 'two theological degrees from Yale University and an honorary theological doctorate from Texas Christian University' [in Fort Worth] and 'the author of several books on biblical themes'.

This showed a great deal of modesty on Cartwright's part—because in fact his career had included playing a striking and honourable rôle in the civil rights struggle in the 1950s. From 1953 to 1963 he was the minister at the Pulaski Heights Christian Church in Little Rock, Arkansas, throughout which time he went out on a limb to fight against segregation. After the US Supreme Court ruling of May 17, 1954 in the Brown v. Board of Education case, Cartwright immediately preached a sermon urging obedience to its desegregation ruling, published his sermon in the Arkansas Gazette and so went on record at once in support of the integration of schools. In 1955 he was a co-founder of the Arkansas Council on Human Relations and served on its board, chaired the committee to unite black and white ministries in Little Rock, and gave campaigning public speeches all over the state and more widely, at great personal risk to himself and to his career. In late 1957, 31 members of his church left it in protest at his stance; the church board responded by giving Cartwright a unanimous vote of confidence; new stained glass windows came from an anonymous donor in recognition of the minister's 'courage and conviction'.

Cartwright wrote articles on racial issues in many publications, including The Christian Century, The Reporter, New South and Christianity and Crisis (among them, in this last, 'Church, Race and the Arts of Government', in 1959), persuaded many other Little Rock ministers to come out in support of desegregation and to oppose obstructive state legislation, and throughout this period liaised between the white and black communities, endeavouring to keep the struggle moving forward nonviolently. In 1990 he allowed the University of Arkansas Libraries Special Collections to microfilm the 14 volumes of scrapbooks he had made between 1954 and 1963, documenting that tumultuous period in Little Rock's history.

None of this was known within the Dylan world. Nor was it known that as Colbert S. Cartwright he had moved on from Little Rock to churches in Youngstown, Ohio (1964–1970), and then Fort Worth, Texas (1971–1979). It was in 1976 that Texas Christian University awarded him the honorary doctorate. TCU is owned by the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), Cartwright's semi-Baptist sect, which was founded as a breakaway from the Presbyterians in the early 19th century and in 1990 had 1,043,943 members, 4,105 congregations and 6,845 ministers; its headquarters is in Indianapolis.

Cartwright then served as his sect's area manager for the Southwest, from 1979 until he retired in 1989. The 'books on biblical themes' referred to in The Bible in the Lyrics of Bob Dylan and published under his fuller name Colbert S. Cartwright, were He Taught Them Saying (co-authored by Robert M. Platt, 1960), People of the Chalice: Disciples of Christ in Faith and Practice (1987) and Candles of Grace: Disciples Worship in Perspective (1992). He also self-published a number of other works, including Disciples Worship: Heritage and Promise (1988) and an autobiography, Walking My Lonesome Valley (as by Colbert Scott Cartwright, 1993). In 1992 he was the subject of a profile by one Roy Reed, 'Colbert S. Cartwright: God's Stranger' in Sources of Inspiration, an essays collection published in Kansas City.

As Bert Cartwright he continued to connect with The Telegraph, writing an investigative profile of 'Dylan's Mysterious Man Called NORMAN RAEBEN' in the spring 1987 issue and the updating article 'The Bible in the Lyrics of Bob Dylan 1985–1990' in the spring 1991 issue.

Cartwright also self-published, in 1989, Annotated Dylan: A Critical Analysis of the Lyrics of Bob Dylan, and in 1990 the 112-page large-format book, Bob Dylan in Print. In 1992 he self-published a revised, enlarged edition of The Bible in the Lyrics of Bob Dylan (both as by Colbert S. Cartwright). Then, at some point around early 1999, the US fanzine On the Tracks posted online, undated, an advertisement for a new book by Bert Cartwright and 'Jonathon Lauer' (elsewhere they spell it correctly as Jonathan), The Dylan Song Companion: A Commentary with Annotations, Volume One, with the following explanatory blurb: 'This in-depth song-by-song examination of Dylan songs up through Blood on the Tracks is one huge piece of work. Before well-known Dylan scholar Bert Cartwright passed on, one of his final wishes was that this book, which he'd been working on for a number of years, be completed by "a writer of similar mind." We contacted Jonathan Lauer—our first choice—and he agreed to finish the book.'

The Rolling Tomes organisation, which published On the Tracks, seems to have become defunct (despite maintaining its website) and at the time of the present volume's going to press no further information had emerged. Jonathan D. Lauer, Library Director of Messiah College in Grantham, Pennsylvania—a Christian but liberal arts college, absolutely nothing to do with the neo-con far right—confirms that he was indeed asked by Rolling Tomes to complete this new book by Bert Cartwright, after he'd published an article himself in On the Tracks in 1997 (the interesting 'Last Songs on Dylan Albums, 1974–1993').

Lauer was asked 'to edit Cartwright's manuscript and finish his song-by-song analysis of the last four or five songs on Blood on the Tracks, the last album Cartwright had considered at the time of his death. My son and I worked . . . on the manuscript. . . . Most of the work I did was to rationalise his system of notes and reference, to bring them into conformity with standard practise. There was a lot of bibliographic clean up and consistency to bring to a manuscript numbering about 320 pages. I probably added only about 15 pages. The general character of the book was a bit like TODD HARVEY's [The Formative Dylan: Transmissions and Stylistic Influences, 1961–1963] but without the musical expertise: dealing only with lyrics. It covered the first 12 studio albums, as it said, song by song.'

Lauer returned the finished manuscript to Rolling Tomes in late 1998. 'Over the next couple of years, it appeared in several of their catalogues, complete with a pre-publication order number. . . . I waited patiently. . . . Finally, in January of 2002 I was sent what I took to be galley proofs and asked to proof and correct them. About three days later I sent them back . . . with a number of corrections and a suggestion for updated acknowledgements. That is the last I heard of the project.'

Lauer never met Cartwright, but was given to understand that Bert had sent the manuscript to Rolling Tomes less than a month before he died, 'asking them to find someone to finish a near-completed project he knew he would not live to finish.' Lauer understood too that Cartwright's widow (whose name he was never told and whom he never met) had 'invested in getting this, his final project published.'

Bert Cartwright died in Fort Worth on April 13, 1996. The following year his widow Anne received on his behalf the Christian Board of Publication's Chalice Lifetime Achievement Award for 'significant contributions to the vital worship life' of the church.

It's a small irony that the writer of the article 'Dylan's Mysterious Man Called Norman Raeben' should have remained, within the Dylan world, a modest mystery man himself.

[Colbert S. Cartwright, 'Church, Race and the Arts of Government', Christianity and Crisis vol.19, no.2, US, 1959, pp.12–14; People of the Chalice: Disciples of Christ in Faith and Practice, St. Louis, MO: CBP Press, 1987; Disciples Worship: Heritage and Promise, Fort Worth, TX: Cartwright, 1988; Candles of Grace: Disciples Worship in Perspective, St. Louis, MO, CBP Press, 1992; The Bible in the Lyrics of Bob Dylan, revised & enlarged 2nd edn., nia, 1992. Colbert Scott Cartwright, Walking my Lonesome Valley, Fort Worth, TX: Cartwright, 1993. Bert Cartwright, The Bible in the Lyrics of Bob Dylan, The Wanted Man Study Series no. 4, Bury, UK, 1985; 'Dylan's Mysterious Man Called Norman Raeben', Telegraph no. 26, UK, spring 1987; Bob Dylan in Print, nia; 'The Bible in the Lyrics of Bob Dylan 1985–1990', Telegraph no. 38, UK, spring 1991. Colbert S. Cartwright &

Robert M. Platt, He Taught Them Saying, St. Louis, MO: Bethany Press, 1960). Bert Cartwright & Jonathan D. Lauer, The Dylan Song Companion: A Commentary With Annotations, Volume One, unpublished. Robert Hilburn quoted by Cartwright from Los Angeles Times Calendar, Jun 1980. Roy Reed: 'Colbert S. Cartwright: God's Stranger', Sources of Inspiration, Kansas City, MO: Sheed & Ward, 1992. Jonathan D. Lauer, 'Last Songs on Dylan Albums, 1974–1993', On the Tracks vol.5, no.1, 15 Jun 1997, Grand Junction, CO, pp.14–23. Quotes from Lauer, e-mails to & phone calls from this writer, 12 & 13 Jan 2006.

Main source for background information on Cartwright's life from Leon C. Miller's 1990 notes to Manuscript Collection MC 1026, Special Collections, University of Arkansas Libraries, seen online 12 Jan 2006 at http://libinfo.uark.edu/specialcollections/findingaids/cartwrightaid.html; main source for publication details of Cartwright's work from WorldCat and Epnet databases c/o Jonathan Lauer's Messiah College library. Sect statistics from J. Gordon Melton, Encyclopedia of American Religions, 6th edn., Detroit: Gale, 1999 (Section 11, 'Baptist Family,' entry no.900), p.499.]

Cash, Johnny [1932 - 2003] J.R. Cash (his given name) was born at Kingsland, Arkansas, on February 26, 1932, into a penurious cotton-farming family headed by an abusive, drunken preacher father. They were moved across the state to a farm at Dyess as part of a New Deal social program when J.R. was three, and he was picking cotton soon afterwards. His only formal education was at Dyess' local school. Disturbed for life by the mill accident that befell his brother Jack in 1944 (he was sliced almost in half and took many days to die), Cash grew up listening to gospel music, learning guitar and writing songs.

He served as a radio operator in the US Air Force till 1954, when he moved to Memphis and broke into the music business via Sun Records, on which he had minor rockabilly hits before hitting the country top five with 'Folsom Prison Blues' and crossover hit 'I Walk the Line'. (He appears, more briefly than the others, as one of the legendary 'Million Dollar Quartet' when he drops in at the Sun studio in December 1956 and finds JERRY LEE LEWIS and CARL PERKINS jamming with ELVIS, who had by then left the label but still lived in Memphis.)

Cash left Sun for Columbia, had more hits, fought the Nashville establishment, maintained his blue-collar following but opposed the Vietnam War, and grew to be a legend in his own lifetime, a dignified man battling his own demons and an artist ever more widely respected as he crossed over the lines of more and more genres.

He signally affected Dylan's career, first by using his own clout as a successful artist to defend him from Columbia executives who wanted Dylan dropped after the commercial failure of his first album, and secondly by endorsing Dylan when the latter 'went country' with Nashville Skyline in 1969—appearing on the album with him and writing its liner notes, and introducing Dylan as a guest on the network TV show Cash had from 1969 to 1971. In between, Cash had made the less necessary but telling gesture of defending Dylan in print to the folk-revival community when Dylan was under attack for 'abandoning' protest songs, writing the short piece 'Shut up and let him sing!' in the March 1964 issue of Broadside.

The two had listened to each other's work from early on. As Cash told it: 'I was deeply into folk music in the early 1960s, both the authentic songs from various periods and areas of American life and the new "folk revival" songs of the time, so I took note of Bob Dylan as soon as the Bob Dylan album came out in early '62 and listened almost constantly to The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan in '63. . . . I'd put on Freewheelin' backstage, then go out and do my show, then listen again as soon as I came off. After a while at that, I wrote Bob a letter telling him how much of a fan I was.'

He elaborated: 'I congratulated him on a fine country record. I could hear JIMMIE RODGERS in his record, and Vernon Dalhart from back in the twenties, the whole talking blues genre. I said, "You're about the best country singer I've heard in years". . . . He wrote back and seemed kind of flabbergasted. . . .' And: 'He wrote back almost immediately, saying he'd been following my music since "I Walk the Line", and so we began a correspondence. Mostly it was about music: what we ourselves were doing, what other people were doing, what I knew about so-and-so and he didn't and vice versa. He asked me about country people; I asked him about the circles he moved in.'

They first met backstage at the Gaslight in 1963 when Cash came to hear PETE LaFARGE (Cash would soon afterwards record LaFarge's 'The Ballad of Ira Hayes' and make a top three country hit of it; Dylan would record it himself in 1970). They next met when both were appearing at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL in 1964. In Cash's hotel room, according to TONY GLOVER, 'Dylan and Cash sat on the floor trading songs. JOAN [BAEZ] set up a little portable machine, and that's where Bob gave Johnny "It Ain't Me, Babe" and "Mama, You Been on My Mind". Johnny was there with June Carter, so shy and sweet and gentle, in a room full of freaks. Afterward, Johnny took Bob aside and gave him his guitar—an old country gesture of admiration.' This was not long after Dylan's 11 Outlined Epitaphs had appeared on the back cover of his Times They Are a-Changin' album. In one of these poems Dylan rhapsodises about specific people who had affected him in his youthful New York City days; the penultimate line speaks of 'the beat visions of Johnny Cash'. When Cash's album Orange Blossom Special came out in 1965, it duly contained covers of 'It Ain't Me, Babe', 'Mama, You Been on My Mind' and 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right'.

They met a number of times in the mid-60s, not least when Cash visited Dylan backstage at the Capitol Theatre, Cardiff, on May 11, 1966, when Dylan was touring the UK. In Eat the Document there is an all-too-brief moment with Bob playing piano and trying to get Cash to join him in singing Cash's own 'I Still Miss Someone'; and in No Direction Home we find them, positions unchanged, tiptoeing towards a duet on HANK WILLIAMS' 'I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry'.

Then come the 1969 Nashville Skyline sessions, at which Cash appears on the third day, February 17, and the two sing a series of duets, on 'One Too Many Mornings', 'I Still Miss Someone' and a mix of the melodically very similar 'Don't Think Twice It's All Right' and Cash's 'Understand Your Man'. The next day they returned to the studio and laid down further duet cuts on 'One Too Many Mornings' (again), 'Mountain Dew', 'I Still Miss Someone' (again), 'Careless Love', 'Matchbox' (Carl Perkins was Cash's guitarist in this period), 'That's All Right', 'Mystery Train', 'Big River', 'Girl of the North Country', 'I Walk the Line', 'Five Feet High and Rising', 'You Are My Sunshine', 'Ring of Fire', 'Wanted Man', 'Guess Things Happen That Way', 'Amen' (?), 'Just a Closer Walk With Thee', 'Blue Yodel No.1' and 'Blue Yodel No.5'. Their hope for a joint album was disappointed, and these are largely indifferent performances (though they sound a lot less so in retrospect than at the time, when more was expected). Nonetheless, an album's worth of these have circulated, and a couple officially released: a sumptuously lovely take of 'Girl of the North Country' appears on Nashville Skyline and a take of 'One Too Many Mornings' was shown in the film Johnny Cash, The Man and His Music (1969, aka Johnny Cash! The Man, His World, His Music) and was also released 15 years later on the video The Other Side of Nashville (1984).

Dylan's album Nashville Skyline was released on April 9, 1969, and on May 1 he recorded his appearance on the ABC 'Johnny Cash TV Show', singing 'I Threw It All Away' and 'Living the Blues' and then sitting with Cash to sing and play guitars together on 'Girl of the North Country'. This was shown coast-to-coast that June 7.

Two days after the TV recording, Dylan was back in the studios for more of the sessions that eventually resulted in the albums Self Portrait and, less intentionally, Dylan. These sessions had begun on April 24 and 26; this May 3 session was the third. It yielded the Self Portrait cuts of 'Take a Message to Mary' and 'Blue Moon' but then moved on to never-issued Dylan renditions of two Cash classics, 'Ring of Fire' and 'Folsom Prison Blues'. Over 25 years later, in late February 1996, Dylan re-recorded 'Ring of Fire' for the soundtrack album of the film Feeling Minnesota—a version described by Amazon.com's official reviewer as 'pitiful' but which, by its sheer muted, struggling character, is an affecting treatment of a song easily made into a feeling-free singalong.

In 1985, for one of the better songs Dylan recorded and rejected for the Empire Burlesque album, he took the title (though not the rest) of a 1958 Johnny Cash record, cut soon after the latter had left Sun: 'Straight A's in Love'. Unlike the Cash song, Dylan's splendidly un-PC take on the dumb blonde (or brunette) includes in its detailing of the ignorance of the 'you' in the song the triumphantly funny one-liner 'You could confuse Geronimo with Johnny Appleseed.'

Early on the Never-Ending Tour, Dylan jumped on Cash warhorses again, débuting his maudlin 'Give My Love to Rose' in Canandaigua, New York, on June 28, 1988 and playing it again in Columbia, South Carolina, that September 16. (In 1989 this was the only Cash song played; it was performed at Christinehofs Slott, Skåne, Sweden, that May 27). 'Big River' was débuted in Santa Barbara on August 7, 1988.

Eleven years later, because of his own touring, Dylan was unable to join a cavalcade of stars paying live tribute to the ailing Cash in New York (an all-star cast that included Cash himself, to some surprise), but had arranged for JEFF ROSEN to film a contribution for showing at the performance; backed by his Never-Ending Tour Band of the day, he sang and played, for the first time in public, Cash's 'Train of Love'—a song Dylan had slyly name-dropped in the sleevenotes to his World Gone Wrong album of 1993. This was duly shown on the night of the tribute (April 18, 1999) and later included on the various artists audio CD Kindred Spirits: A Tribute to the Songs of Johnny Cash.

After fighting addiction in the early 1960s, getting religion, becoming a huge star, plunging in popularity in the mid-1970s, selling over a million copies of his (first) autobiography, Man in Black, getting more religion and making a Jesus film with Billy Graham, losing his major-label deals, winning acclaim as an actor, plunging back into addiction after relying on painkillers in the aftermath of being almost disembowelled by an ostrich (really), recovering from both, having heart surgery, diabetes, autonomic neuropathy and pneumonia, recording the modishly simple acoustic comeback album American Recordings in 1994, appearing at the Glastonbury Festival, recording anew with everyone from U2 to TOM PETTY and winning Grammies galore, Johnny Cash died in hospital in Nashville on September 12, 2003.

The standard, respectful story, therefore, is as above, augmented by this sort of assessment: that Cash was a rock'n'roll pioneer who recorded seminal, original music early on (not mere standard rockabilly), crossed many boundaries and remained creative from the folk blues of Blood Sweat and Tears on through the raw power of the prison albums and arrived, at the last, at the stripped down, uncannily personal American Recordings, an album comparable to Dylan's World Gone Wrong and offering a visionary and personal message through a collection of seemingly unconnected tunes.

Some, however, demur, noting the blatant way he marketed himself as the Man in Black and finding the image risible: it would have to be black, wouldn't it? And they suggest that you'd be hard pressed to think of a more cringe-inducing record than Johnny Cash's 'A Boy Named Sue'.

They note too that when Dylan and Cash are glimpsed together in those delicious moments caught on film in 1966, with Dylan at the piano being aptly inventive with the melody lines of both Cash's own 'I Still Miss Someone' and Hank Williams' 'I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry', Cash is visibly confounded: he can't cope with being asked to diverge from his own rigid way of doing them—even though Dylan is leading him gently along alternative melodic paths that make sense, instantly, to the ears of most listeners.

Similarly, in the film footage of their Nashville 1969 duet on 'One Too Many Mornings', when the camera cuts from their recording it to their hearing it back, it's a delight to see Dylan grinning behind his arm when they reach that moment when Cash had been settling in for a predictable ending on three swapped 'And a thousand' lines leading into a final shared extended 'miles—— be—— hind——': and Dylan hasn't let him get there: he's kept throwing in extra 'And a thousand's', forcing Cash to duplicate them still further. It is done playfully: there's no spite or competitive animus behind it at all, but again, Cash can only stand there in bovine perplexedness till Dylan rescues him. In any case, it might be said that through the main body of this performance, which is mostly not really a duet but an alternating of vocalists, verse by verse, Dylan sings in the most beautiful, spontaneous, inventive way, throwing himself fully on the mercy of the gods yet delivering a vocal that is judicious and discreet as well as fresh and free. Cash just plods through it being obvious and 'manly'. Some might add that to hear Cash's hit recording of 'It Ain't Me, Babe' is to encounter him at his most wooden: he declaims the 'No, no, no' in the recurrent 'No, no, no, it ain't me babe' with desperate, pompous rigidity: a manly man in black who can't understand what everyone else finds funny.

There's also something inherently suspect about the kind of tribute Cash gets paid by other stars. This isn't Cash's fault, or particular to him, but it would still be healthier to discount it. Dylan himself can say 'It's important to stay away from the celebrity trap', and this truth is partly to do with the innate unwholesomeness of schmoozing. What Dylan says about Cash once they're good ole buddies, fellow artistes and liggers at other celebrities' parties is probably less interesting than what he said about Cash when Bob was still in Hibbing, with impassioned and unfettered feelings about music, and Cash was already out there in the public sphere. And as it happens, we have on the tape made with his schoolfriend John Bucklen in 1958 exactly what Bob thought about Johnny then:

> Bucklen: You think singing is just jumping around and screaming?
> Dylan: You gotta have some kind of expression.
> Bucklen: Johnny Cash has got expression.
> Dylan: There's no expression! [sings imitation in slow monotone]: 'I met her at a dance St. Paul Minnesota . . . I walk the line, because you're mine, because you're mine . . .'
> Bucklen: You're doing it wrong, you're just—What's the best kind ofmusic?
> Dylan: Rhythm & blues.
> Bucklen: State your reason in no less than twenty-five minutes!
> Dylan: Ah, rhythm & blues you see is something that you really can't quite explain see. When you hear a song rhythm & blues—when you hear it's a good rhythm & blues song, chills go up your spine . . .
> Bucklen: Whoa-o-o!
> Dylan: . . . when you hear a song like that. But when you hear a song like Johnny Cash, whaddaya wanna do? You wanna leave . . .'

It may be adolescent, and Dylan is entitled to have changed his mind (by 2004, in Chronicles, Dylan was saying that 'I Walk the Line' was 'a song I'd always considered to be up there at the top, one of the most mysterious and revolutionary of all time'), but his Hibbing comments reflect what many still find highly resistable about the style of Johnny Cash.

After his death, Dylan said this: 'Johnny was and is the North Star. You could guide your ship by him—the greatest of the greats then and now.' BONO, doubtless intending to praise him, in fact highlighted the intrinsic downside to the Cash mystique when his homage came out as this: 'Every man knows he's a sissy compared to Johnny Cash.' That's a recommendation?

[Johnny Cash: 'It Ain't Me, Babe', 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right' & 'Mama, You Been on My Mind', nia, Orange Blossom Special, Columbia CL-2309, 1965; 'Straight A's In Love', Memphis, c.1956, Sun 334, Memphis (London-American HCSD 9070, UK), 1960; 'A Boy Named Sue', San Quentin, 24 Feb 1969. Johnny Cash, The Man and His Music, later re-titled Johnny Cash! The Man, His World, His Music, dir. Robert Elfstrom, Verité Production / WJRZ Radio, US, May 16, 1969; The Other Side of Nashville, dir. Etienne Mirlesse, MGM/UA Home Video UMV 10351, US, Aug 1984.

Bob Dylan: 'Straight A's In Love', Hollywood, 14 Feb 1985, unissued (2 takes circulated); 'Train of Love', nia, Mar 1999, on Various Artists: Kindred Spirits: A Tribute to the Songs of Johnny Cash, Lucky Dog CK86310, Sep 2002. 1st & 3rd Cash quotes from Johnny Cash (with Patrick Carr), Cash: The Autobiogra- phy, San Francisco: Harper, 1996/7, pp.197–198; 2nd quote in Frye Gaillard, Watermelon Wine—The Spirit of Country Music, New York: 1978, p.61. Tony Glover, 'adden'dum', in Paul Nelson & Tony Glover, The Festival Songbook, New York: Amsco Music Publishing, 1973, p.35. The 'augmenting assessment' summarises posting by Mitch Rath, 29 Aug 1999, seen online 24 May 2005 at www.expectingrain.com/dok/who/who.html. Dylan-Bucklen transcript corrected from that online at www.bjorner.com/DSN00003%201960.htm#DSN00003. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.216.]

Castner, Flo [1939 -] & Lynn [1934 -] Florence Therese Castner (born Minneapolis, April 23, 1939) and Lynn Sumner Castner (Minneapolis, April 11, 1934) were the sister and brother from the Twin Cities of Minneapolis-St. Paul who between them introduced Dylan to WOODY GUTHRIE's records. When Dylan met them, Flo was an aspiring actress and her brother a graduate student at the university law school with a Dinkytown apartment and an interesting record collection. Dylan describes them both in Chronicles Volume One (misspelling Lynn as Lyn throughout), writing that Flo 'was an actress in the drama academy . . . odd looking but beautiful in a wacky way, had long red hair . . . dressed in black from head to foot. She had an uptown but folksy manner, was a mystic and a transcendentalist . . . [and] serious about reincarnation'; Lynn had 'thin, wispy hair, wore a bow tie and little James Joyce glasses. . . . he never said much and I never spoke to him.'

Flo took Dylan round to hear records, and it was then and there that Dylan first heard, on Lynn Castner's recommendation, the collection of 78s that made up the JOHN HAMMOND Spirituals to Swing Concert at Carnegie Hall releases from the late 1930s, and then a series of Woody Guthrie 78s that 'stunned' him, made his head spin and made him 'want to gasp'.

Yet as Dylan was to discover, Castner wasn't merely a man with a record collection: he'd been involved in Guthriesque Left Wing folkie music events for some years before Dylan came to Dinkytown: indeed for most of the 1950s. At 18, after his first undergraduate year in college in Minneapolis he went to the Bay Area of California, where he met folksinger Rolf Kahn and his wife Barbara Dane, and co-produced concerts with Kahn in and around San Francisco—co-producing the first ODETTA concert.

Castner returned to Minneapolis for a second college year, then went back to San Francisco, and so on. By the time Dylan met him he was a graduate law student and not yet the attorney Dylan describes him as being (and which he became only in 1963)—and while it may be true that Castner and Dylan had never spoken before the day of the record playing visit, they certainly spoke after that. Rolf Kahn came to Minneapolis and gave a concert, produced by Castner, at the Minneapolis Unitarian Society, which Dylan probably attended, and certainly Castner introduced Dylan to Kahn, they spent some time together and played at coffee-houses during the several days Kahn was in town—and when Dylan lit out for the East Coast, he had with him some contact details from Castner and Kahn for people in New York City.

Along with his early active engagement in the folk scene Lynn Castner developed a parallel interest in civil liberties issues—in people like Guthrie, of course, the two came together—and he became active in, and by 1965 the first full-time director of, the Minnesota Civil Liberties Union. In 1968 he was the attorney fighting on behalf of the Union against Minnesota's Attorney General, to assert the right of the Minnesota Communist Party's candidates to have their names on the ballot paper for the November 1968 presidential election. Castner's clients won their case and duly stood—they won only 415 Minnesotan votes but an important right, and ramifications took the case on up to the US Supreme Court in 1970.

Today Lynn's name heads that of the Minneapolis law firm Lynn S. Castner & Associates, specialising less loftily in Drunk Under the Influence cases, but he no longer runs the firm; he lives at Hilton Head Island, South Carolina, semi-retired at 72 years of age; he owns a small real-estate business, he uses his knowledge of the law in doing volunteer work and he still sits on the national council of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Flo was a theatre major at the university and was working with the internationally reputable Minnesota Dance Theater & School. She went on to become a founding member of the Minneapolis Children's Theater Company and a drama teacher. Around 1967 she left Minnesota when invited onto the faculty of the American branch of RADA (the London-based Royal Academy of Dramatic Arts), which had been established at Oakland University in Rochester, Michigan. At the end of the 1960s she was invited on a State Department sponsored tour of the Soviet Union with the mime artist Marcel Marceau, but because she refused to sign a passport application loyalty oath, she couldn't go. She returned to Minneapolis and set about a long and varied career acting, designing and directing, and at one point was pursuing two-pronged studies, into Shakespeare and post-graduate level constitutional law.

Dylan's depiction of her as a 'transcendentalist' was accurate on one level—she was 'exploring' the subject, studying informally with a visiting Indian practitioner of advanced yoga who was demonstrating mind-over-matter powers at the university at the time—yet she was also, obviously, a political activist, and has remained so. Like her brother before her, she was at one point an executive director of the Minnesota Civil Liberties Union and she remains, in her brother's phrase, 'a woman with many, many interests'. Today, disabled and living in community housing herself, she campaigns on affordable housing issues, including the problems low-income people have in accessing help with health and education as well as housing. Her answer-machine message says: 'Hi, you've reached go-with-the-Flo and the Hope Project.'

In 2002 she gave an interview to Minneapolis' Rake magazine that was used as part of a detailed profile of 'Dylan in Dinkytown 1959' reconstructed by writer Hans Eisenbeis. She made a point no other Dylan contemporary of the period seems to have made: that the University of Minneapolis into which Dylan arrived as a young freshman in 1959 was still in the grip of the McCarthyism of the mid-1950s (as was the wider world, and would remain so for many more years, to judge by the case her brother had to fight in 1968 and her own struggles with the State Department later still). Flo Castner told Eisenbeis:

> 'You've got to remember what McCarthyism did to individual freedom and independent academic research. All university research fell under the Defense Department, and everything was supposed to fit into our grand military and political schemes. Real research was dead. There were loyalty oaths. That was the climate."

She also recalled that Dylan 'hadn't found himself yet, hadn't developed that poetic vision. He was much more into pop and rock.' Even after she introduced him to her brother's Guthrie collection, she said that the poetic vision Dylan had 'was just a seed at that point, and hadn't rooted and flowered. . . . He was still bewildered and confused, stunned by what he was discovering.'

It had to happen somewhere, sometime, but in the event it fell to the Castners to have this small but crucial rôle in furthering Bob Dylan's musical education and, through Guthrie's stimulus, the first major phase of his creative development.

[Lynn S. Castner, phone call with this writer 16 Jan 2006; Flo Castner, phone call ditto 17 Jan 2006. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, pp.242, 243 & 244; Hans Eisenbeis, 'Dylan in Dinkytown 1959', Rake, Minneapolis, Apr 2002, seen online 15 Aug 2005 at www.rakemag.com / stories / printable.aspx?itemID=2210&catID=146&SelectCat . . .]

Cat-Iron See Carradine, William.

Chabad telethons Chabad 'To Life' telethons began in 1980 as a fund-raising and publicity device in support of the worldwide Chabad-Lubavitch movement, which claims to be 'the largest Jewish organization in the world today' and is certainly one of the largest groups within Hasidic Judaism.

'Chabad' is a Hebrew acronym for 'wisdom, understanding and knowledge' and Lubavitch, meaning 'brotherly love' in Russian, is the name of the Russian town where the movement was long based. Chabad was founded in 1772, and galvanised in its modern form from 1950 onwards by the leadership of Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson. Its Californian branches were founded in the 1960s. The organisation claims to espouse 'a philosophy of study, meditation, and social outreach that bridges rigorous academics 'with proactive community involvement', to offer a 'network of educational and nonsectarian social services' and to have benefitted 'people of all faiths'. Inevitably, perhaps, Chabad Lubavitch has been involved in much controversy, sometimes disquieting both more traditionalist and more liberal wings of Judaism and in recent years much criticised for its alleged 'messianic tendency'.

The annual telethons from California have raised many millions of dollars for the organisation, and on its website its list of the stars and celebrities who have appeared starts with Bob Dylan's name. (Others include Martin Sheen, Whoopi Goldberg, Anthony Hopkins, James Caan, Dick Van Dyke, Elliott Gould, NEIL DIAMOND and Jon Voight.)

Dylan has made three appearances, always amusing and usually bizarre, beginning in 1986, when he performed the song 'Thank God', written and composed by Fred Rose and once recorded by HANK WILLIAMS. Dylan's version, backed by TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS, was filmed in San Francisco that August and shown on September 14. He also consented to deliver an 'anti-drug message' for the show (surely a bizarre decision in itself—on both sides), which was probably made in Wales while Dylan was filming Hearts of Fire. He found a circumspect, honourable route through, by saying this:

> 'This is Bob Dylan and I'm in England [sic] right now, working, so I can't be there tonight; but I'd like to say that Chabad is a worthy organisation helping people in need, helping to set them free from the misconceptions and devastation which is destroying their lives from within. Of course, this is a fierce battle, for those responsible for poisoning the minds and bodies of America's youth are reaping great profits. If you can help Chabad to help others who have fallen victim to the lies and deceits of those who are much more powerful, do it.'

Dylan's second appearance on a Chabad telethon was three years later, in the studios of KCOP-13 in LA, at which he gave one of his weirdest-ever performances, taking part in three songs with HARRY DEAN STANTON and Dylan's son-in-law PETER HIMMELMAN. (See the latter's entry for details.)

Two years on from this comes the further high comedy of his third (and so far final) telethon appearance, broadcast live on September 15, 1991, starting with the show's host, a Rabbi, urging Dylan to help them obtain the return of ancient holy books from Russia. Dylan asks, 'What do you want me to say?!' The Rabbi: 'Tell them to give back the books.' Dylan: 'Oh, yeah. Give back the books. And give plenty of money to Chabad. It's my favourite organisation in the whole world, really. They do nothing but good things with all the money, and the more you can give, the more it's going to help everybody.'

The Rabbi interjects: 'I want to say something, Bob, if I might. I think the people out there . . . that heard us talk about the cry of these books—these are books that have suffered for 70 years behind those bars of the Lenin Library. Mr. Gorbachev said he's going to give it back, Mr. Yeltsin says he's going to give it back, everybody says he's going to give it back. Bob, tell them to give it back!' Bob: 'Yeah, give it back. Give the books back.' Rabbi: 'If Bob Dylan says they'll give it back, they'll give it back.'

After this Dylan is seen scuttling out of sight as the young man standing alongside him starts to confess to a sinfully drug-taking past. When this ends, Dylan re-appears, and the Rabbi says: 'Please go to your phones and call and call and call. Bob, tell them what to do.' Dylan, in a refreshing acknowledgement that people who do phone in have a long and miserable time of it, concludes by saying this: 'Call and call and call some more until you get somebody to answer—and give what you can. And thanks for inviting me down here.' At another point in the show he plays guitar behind Kinky Friedman as Friedman performs 'Sold American'.

[Chabad Lubavitch quotes from its official US west coast website, seen online 12 Jan 2006 at www.chabad.com/show_art.php?articleID=2. All transcription of Dylan and others' telethon dialogue reprocessed from Glen Dundas, Tangled, Thunder Bay, Canada: SMA, 2004.]

Chandler, Len [1935 -] Leonard Hunt Chandler Jr. was born on May 27, 1935 in Akron, Ohio, and became one of the best-known black guitarists and folk singer-songwriters active in the early 1960s folk scene. He was trained in classical piano and oboe, joined the Akron Symphony Orchestra but was introduced to pre-war blues records by a professor and began performing converted folk songs with the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra before moving to New York City at the age of 15. Playing regularly at the Café Wha at the beginning of the 1960s, he told the then New York Times folk critic ROBERT SHELTON that 'he had thrown over his classical background to rediscover his people's music.' His best-known song is 'Keep Your Eyes on the Prize (Hold On)', a civil rights anthem which he performed, with Bob Dylan and JOAN BAEZ as back-up participants, at the momentous March on Washington performance at the Lincoln Memorial in D.C. on August 28, 1963, film of which can be seen in the MARTIN SCORSESE film No Direction Home (2005).

This marked the high point of Chandler's career, though Robert Shelton says he was still regarded as 'a rising figure' at the time of the 1964 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL. On the evidence of the March on Washington footage he seems to have resembled an earnest schoolteacher (which is what he had wanted to be), far from charismatic as a performer. Yet Dylan says the opposite—'His personality overrode his repertoire'—and found him a compelling, audacious companion of some personal power, as he attests in Chronicles Volume One, where he writes of him warmly and recalls him as one of those who 'would play poker continuously through the night', stresses that he was 'one of the few' who wrote his own songs ('topical songs' that were 'pretty much accepted . . . because they used old melodies with new words'), who 'Besides being a songwriter . . . was also a daredevil', and who became a friend of Dylan's after sharing bills at the Gaslight:

> 'Len was educated and serious about life, was even working with his wife downtown to start a school for underprivileged children [St. Barnabas House]. . . . One of his most colorful songs had been about a negligent school bus driver in Colorado who accidentally drove a bus full of kids down a cliff. It had an original melody and because I liked the melody so much, I wrote my own set of lyrics to it. Len didn't seem to mind.'

This breathtaking ingenuousness tiptoes around the ethics of how Dylan stole the chords and tune of 'The Bus Driver', a song Chandler often performed but never recorded, about an incident in Greeley, Colorado, plucked from the newspapers, and turned it into the superior 'The Death of Emmett Till'. He was more straightforward when playing it for CYNTHIA GOODING in early 1962, saying then: 'I stole the melody from Len Chandler. . . . He uses a lot of funny chords, you know, when he plays, and he's always getting to, want me, to use some of these chords . . . trying to teach me new chords all the time. Well, he played me this one; said "Don't those chords sound nice?" An' I said they sure do, an so I stole it, stole the whole thing.' Playing the song on the Billy Faeir radio show on WBAI-FM that October he added informatively: 'Before I met him, I never sang one song in minor key.'

Eventually, Chandler retaliated. Broadside no.51 published his song 'Ain't No Use to Sit and Wonder Why, Chuck', which has the final line 'Don't think twice, we might fight.' This is not a knowing parody but a dreadful, ingenuous protest song of Chandler's own. Or rather, not.

Chandler was strongly involved with civil rights activity—and with Broadside, which he greatly helped. (The issue for November 5, 1963 got round to focussing on him, publishing several of his songs—'Secret Songs', 'To Be a Man' and 'Keep on Keeping On', plus two pages of biography, mainly about his anti-war efforts and civil rights activism.) He was married to JUDY COLLINS' sister in the mid-1960s and appeared at the Newport Folk Festival as late as 1969, still singing topical songs (this time notably 'Moon Men', about the moon landing by US astronauts). In 1971–72 he was one of the troupe that took the anti-Vietnam War show F.T.A. (officially 'Free the Army' but often understood to mean 'Fuck the Army') around the US West Coast and across the Pacific, playing as near as possible to US military bases; the show was a mix of satirical sketches and song, and the actors involved were principally Jane Fonda, Donald Sutherland and Peter Boyle; Len Chandler was its main folk star. The show was filmed and the result, F.T.A. (1972), contemporary re-release of which Fonda has allegedly squashed, provoked predictably mixed reactions.

The show's audiences were mainly servicemen and women, and at the time (and more so now) the film's power lies in the interviews with individual serving troops

> 'who openly question the purpose and planning of the American involvement in Vietnam. Most memorable here are the members of the U.S.S. Coral Sea, who presented a petition to their superiors demanding a halt to the bombing in Vietnam; African-American soldiers and marines who angrily decried racist attitudes among the white commanding officers at the U.S. military installations, usually with an upraised fist of the Black Power movement; women serving in the U.S. Air Force who talk unhappily about sexual harassment from their male counterparts; and soldiers who pointedly refer to the dictatorial government in South Vietnam which was being presented as the democracy which they were supposedly defending. The extraordinary air of dissent that rises out of F.T.A. provides a rare glimpse into a unhappy and demoralized fighting force stuck in a war which they did not believe in. . . . As for the F.T.A. show itself, it was actually a rather benign event full of soggy anti-war folks songs and silly military skits.'

So reports Phil Hall for the independent film review website Film Threat (re-circulated on that other independent film review website Rotten Tomatoes).

In the early 1970s too, Len Chandler formed the Alternative Chorus-Songwriters Showcase to promote new talent, as a direct result of which over 300 writers have been signed to recording and publishing contracts.

Eventually, despite two 1967 Columbia Records solo albums of his own (To Be a Man, produced by JOHN HAMMOND and The Lovin' People, on which he plays not only guitars but organ and 'English horn'), and despite his fine track record, he moved to the West Coast and worked in the field of education. At the same time, he became a co-founder and director of the Los Angeles Songwriters Showcase and a Senior Editor of something hideously called the Songwriter Musepaper.

[Len Chandler: 'The Bus Driver', unreleased; 'Ain't No Use to Sit and Wonder Why, Chuck', unreleased but published Broadside no.51, NY, 20 Oct, 1964. To Be a Man, Columbia CL 2459 / CS 9259, US (CBS BPG 62931, UK), 1967; The Lovin' People, Columbia CL 2753 / CS 9553, US, 1967. Broadside Chandler profile in no.34, NY, 5 Nov 1963. F.T.A., dir. Francine Parker, Duque Films / Free Theater Associates, US, 1972; Phil Hall, review for www.filmthreat.com/index.php. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home, London: Penguin edn., 1987, pp.93 & 257. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.260, 47, 91, 81–82. Dylan to Cynthia Gooding, NY, 13 Jan 1962, broadcast 'Folksinger's Choice', WBAI, 11 Mar 1962.]

Chapman, Tracy [1964 -] Tracy Chapman was born in Cleveland, Ohio, on March 20, 1964. She learnt piano, ukulele and guitar, and started writing songs while still a child. The Better Chance organisation awarded her a scholarship to attend the private Wooster School in Danbury, Connecticut, and from there she won a Minority Placement Scholarship to Tufts University in Boston, where she studied African culture and anthropology. She also began performing around Harvard Square, recorded some demo tapes and was signed to Elektra in 1987. She graduated before turning full-time to her music career and her début album was released in 1988; the single 'Fast Car' became an immediate top 10 hit on both sides of the Atlantic, followed by the further hits 'Talkin' 'Bout a Revolution' and 'Baby Can I Hold You?'.

That June 11, at London's Wembley Stadium (and live on television to six billion viewers worldwide) Tracy Chapman appeared as the new girl amid a ferocious array of mega-stars at the 70th Birthday Concert for Nelson Mandela—and wiped the floor with them all as her unique, rich voice, slightly shaky as if expressive of the effort of keeping passion contained, soared up from the huge stage. For many this was the first time they'd heard her or heard of her, and it was a rare experience to encounter such incontestably powerful talent as if out of nowhere. Her short dreadlocked hair and African gravity made her a striking figure; her record sales rose exponentially: the album went double-platinum and was a transatlantic no.1, despite its dark themes of political outrage, abuse and suffering.

At a time when Bob Dylan was dithering around offering albums like Down in the Groove, here was a contrastingly potent communicator, writing and performing songs of import and remonstration: a 'new Dylan' all the more interesting and contemporary for being a woman and being black.

Somehow, though, Tracy Chapman vanished almost as quickly as she had arrived. Her second album, Crossroads (1989), exemplified 'difficult-second-album' syndrome and though it went platinum, topped the UK charts and yielded another US top 10 single with its title track, it disappointed all who bought it and Ms. Chapman's career settled down as if back to the level of small gigs and coffee-house worthiness. The third album, Matters of the Heart (1992), did nothing to change this, though it scraped into the charts. Three years later and New Beginning almost was: its range was broader and it included at least two terrific tracks, 'Smoke and Ashes' and the genuinely funky, bluesy single 'Give Me One Reason', on which she is finally unafraid to loosen up and sound sexy and fun. It was her first huge US hit for six years. Since then she has kept on keeping on, with Amnesty appearances and the albums Telling Stories (2000), Let It Rain (2002) and Where You Live (2005).

On October 16, 1992 she made a brief solo appearance at the so-called Bob Dylan 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration, managing an odd mix of the powerful and cosy on an anthem with no obvious current applicability, 'The Times They Are a-Changin''; more interestingly, four years earlier, at the red-hot moment of her initial explosion onto the scene, she had played a series of dates on the same bill as Dylan, in August 1988. His Never-Ending Tour was then only two months old: these were exciting times. On August 21, in Vancouver, Canada, Tracy Chapman came on stage at the end of Dylan's own set to play guitar and share vocals with him on the encore number 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'; at the next concert, on August 23 in Calgary, she did the same; and the following night they stood onstage together for the third and last time, again for 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'. Hers was the more powerful voice those nights; but his had already proved resilient, and has proved the more so again since then. Now, suddenly, it's nearly 20 years since Tracy Chapman first emerged. That début album has sold over 10 million copies (far more than a Bob Dylan album ever has). Yet in spite of her rare talent and sumptuous, stand-alone voice, she's spent a long time being quiet.

[Tracy Chapman: Tracy Chapman, Elektra 60774, US, 1988; Crossroads, Elektra 60888, US, 1989; Matters of the Heart, Elektra 61216, 1992; New Beginning, Elektra 61850, 1996; Telling Stories, Elektra 62478, 2000; Let It Rain, Elektra 62803, 2002; Where You Live, Elektra nia, 2005. Sources include the www.rockonthenet.com/artists-c/tracychapman_main.htm timeline, Wikipedia and William R. Pringle's discography at www.folklib.net/uwp/wrp_chapman_tracy.shtml, all seen online 12 Jan 2006.]

Charles, Bobby [1938 -] Robert Charles Guidry, born February 21, 1938 in Abbeville, Louisiana, wrote, and recorded the original version of, Bill Haley's hit 'See You Later, Alligator', which THE BAND and Bob Dylan transmuted into 'See Ya Later, ALLEN GINSBERG' during the Basement Tapes sessions in West Saugerties, New York, June to August 1967. He also wrote FATS DOMINO's hit 'Walking to New Orleans' and wrote or co-wrote most of the lovely early 1960s hits by Clarence Frogman Henry, including the biggest, 'But I Do', using his real surname of Guidry.

Charles was later on the fringes of PAUL BUTTERFIELD's Better Days, and at The Band's farewell concert at the Winterland, San Francisco, on November 25, 1976 (filmed and recorded as The Last Waltz), he refused to sing 'See You Later Alligator' but followed a joyous rendition of JOHNNIE & JACK's 'Down South in New Orleans' with backing vocals on Dylan & The Band's performance of 'I Shall Be Released'.

[Bill Haley: 'See You Later Alligator', NY, 12 Dec 1955, Decca Nia, 1956; Clarence Frogman Henry: 'But I Do', New Orleans, c.Aug 1960; Argo 5378 (Pye International 7N 25078, UK), 1961. The Last Waltz soundtrack, Warner Brothers 3WS 3146, LA, 1978; film directed by Martin Scorsese.]

Charles, Larry [19?? -] Larry Charles was born in Brooklyn, New York, but seems very reluctant to state his date of birth. He is the director and co-writer with Dylan of his film Masked & Anonymous, 2003, initially with Charles credited as writer Rene Fontaine (and Dylan as Sergei Petrov). Charles' many claims for the film, and the partnership within it, include 'Shakespeare meets Cassavetes'. Interviewed about the 'experience' of meeting Bob Dylan, he said: 'It was the most life changing experience of my life.'

This eternal-hippie-in-Hollywood graduated from TV, where he made an unbilled appearance in the 'Seinfeld' TV series of 1992 as Stinky Man in the episode 'The Airport', having been Series Producer for 1990 and the writer of 18 episodes from 1991–94. He was also executive producer of series four of 'Curb Your Enthusiasm' and executive producer and a prolific writer of series like 'Mad About You' and 'Dilbert'. This qualified him to create an art movie with Bob Dylan?

[Larry Charles on Shakespeare & John Cassavetes, seen online 21 Aug 2005 at www.trevgibb.co.uk/Masked/Director.htm; on meeting Dylan, quoted from interview by Trev Gibb, ditto at www.trevgibb.co.uk/Masked/riffing_larry.htm.]

Charles, Ray [1930 - 2004] Ray Charles Robinson was born into rural poverty in Northern Louisiana on September 23, 1930 and went blind in childhood, a process that began soon after the accidental death of his younger brother. He was brought up by his mother. Taught piano informally, in the late 1940s he took a bus up to Seattle and got into music, meeting Quincy Jones and Lowell Fulson and joining the latter's band. Signed to Swingtime Records, his first recordings catch him as a Nat King Cole soundalike. Signed to Atlantic Records by Ahmet Ertegun in 1954, he found his own voice and made a series of mostly self-composed hit singles, fuelled in part by a flagrant and controversial secularisation of gospel songs (as with 'I Got a Woman', 'Leave My Woman Alone' and 'Hallelujah I Love Her So').

When his contract with Atlantic came up for renewal, Charles, a shrewd businessman, signed instead to ABC-Paramount, a major label, in a deal that gave the artist, unprecedentedly, ownership of his own master recordings. In the early 1960s he was banned from performing in the state of Georgia after refusing to play to segregated audiences; a state government ceremony, attended by Charles, gave him an official public apology in 1979. He died of cancer of the liver on June 10, 2004, aged 73.

The influence of his (mostly 1950s) R&B records on Dylan is one thing, and the influence of his seminal soul-country crossover work of the early 1960s is another.

First, Charles appears to be the source for a very early piece of near-plagiarism by Dylan. The fragment of a song called 'Blackjack Blues', which Dylan's first biographer, ANTHONY SCADUTO, says Dylan had told him was his 'first original folk song', comes almost verbatim from Charles' 1955 R&B-charting single 'Blackjack'. The Dylan lyric fragment is: 'Blackjack blues, yea yea yea / How unlucky can one man be? / Every quarter I make / Old Blackjack takes away from me.' Ray Charles' first verse ends with this: 'How unlucky can one man be? / Well, every quarter I get / Blackjack takes away from me.'

A later, less plagiaristic use of Ray Charles' R&B material by Dylan occurs in the mid-1960s. ROBERT SHELTON says that Dylan and PHIL SPECTOR were in an LA coffee-shop when they heard Charles' 'Let's Go Get Stoned' (written by Ashford & Simpson) on the jukebox, and were struck by the open upfrontery of the lyric. A few months later Dylan recorded 'Rainy Day Women Nos. 12 & 35', with its chorus of 'Everybody must get stoned'. As the webmaster of a 'Ray Charles Is God' website says of the song that inspired this (and what it says about Charles): 'He could be particularly pleasingly dark and wilful in his humor. Notably, he recorded "Let's Go Get Stoned" some scant few months after kicking a 20 year heroin addiction.' (He gives a better example: 'On SNL during the Carter administration, Ray waxed sentimental about their mutual Georgia roots, claiming to feel a special closeness to the president on the grounds that "his grandad used to own my grandad".')

It might also have been Ray Charles' late 1950s recording of the old blues song '(Night Time Is) The Right Time', included on his 1961 album The Genius Sings the Blues, that prompted Dylan's importing of the lines 'The night time is the right time / To be with the one you love' into his own Nashville Skyline song 'To Be Alone With You'.

Decades later, Dylan performed Ray Charles' 'What'd I Say' with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS at rehearsals for Farm Aid (LA, September 19, 1985) and then performed Ray Charles' Freddy Jones-penned 'Unchain My Heart', in US concerts in June and July 1986, soon after three attempts at recording it at early Knocked Out Loaded sessions that April and May—sessions at which he also twice attempted 'You'll Never Walk Alone', another song that many associate with Ray Charles, thanks to the memorably outrageous version he recorded in the early 1960s. (Britons find it hard not be hit over the head with renditions by the awful Gerry Marsden—he of Gerry & the Pacemakers—because he can always exploit a perverse fondness for it among crowds at football matches.)

Charles' R&B hit singles also almost foregrounded the back-up singers—he gave the Raelettes some of the lines in the lyrics, rather than just having them echo his own (again importing the devices of the gospel performance into the secular song). In London in June 1978, backstage at Earl's Court, Robert Shelton remarked to Dylan that a review of his warm-up dates in LA at the start of the month had said that his back-up singers sounded like the Supremes. Dylan retorted: 'Oh, no: not the Supremes—the Raelettes, maybe!' This was a shrewd remark: in retrospect, it's striking that many of Dylan's live 1978 song renditions had a distinctly Ray Charles flavour, both in his own exuberantly R&B phrasing and in his use of the back-up singers (his equivalent of the Raelettes), to whom he, like Charles, allocated a number of midsong lead vocal lines. A similar Ray Charles flavor can be detected on the tapes from Dylan's 1981 European tour, too.

Charles' crucial crossover album was Modern Sounds in Country and Western, released in 1962. Regarded as a 'sell-out' by R&B purists, but widely welcomed as bringing fresh life into country and pop, it was influential and immensely successful, as were a number of hit singles taken from it—one of which was the lovely 'You Don't Know Me', 1962. Dylan introduced this song into his concert repertoire, performing it with great affection in Andrarum, Sweden, May 27, 1989, and sang it at five further 1989 concerts and at five in 1991, including at South Bend, Indiana, November 6, 1991: an exceptional performance, managing to be both the ultimate prom band moment and an affecting tribute to Ray Charles.

('You Don't Know Me' was written by Eddie Arnold and Cindy Walker. As with Dylan's contribution to the WILLIE NELSON-Bob Dylan song 'Heartland', it is alleged that Arnold wrote only the title of 'You Don't Know Me' and his co-writer all the rest.)

The Ray Charles version of 'That Lucky Old Sun' also seems the prompt for Dylan's performances of this beguiling, neo-minstrel pop song, which he may have recorded in 1971 at the session that yielded the 'Watching the River Flow' single, and which he certainly offered in concert at Farm Aid, Champaign, Illinois, September 21, 1985, at 23 concerts in 1986, at Madison, Wisconsin, November 5, 1991, in Hollywood, May 19, 1992, and at the so-called 'free rehearsal' at Fort Lauderdale, September 23, 1995.

There is at least one further small connection between Ray and Bob. The main soloist in the Ray Charles band of the 1950s to early 1960s was Dave 'Fathead' Newman; he and Dylan play together behind DOUG SAHM on the track 'Me & Paul' on the fine album Doug Sahm & Band, 1972. Fathead is one of many long-suffering musicians in Ray Charles' band given sympathetic treatment in the vivid, old-fashioned biopic Ray.

[Ray Charles: 'Blackjack', Atlanta, 18 Nov 1954, Atlantic 1076, NY, 1955; 'The Right Time', NY, 28 Oct 1958, Atlantic 2010, NY, 1958, & on The Genius Sings the Blues, Atlantic 8052, 1961; 'What'd I Say', NY, Feb 1959, issued as 2-part single Atlantic 2031, NY, 1959 & on What'd I Say, Atlantic, NY, 1959; all reissued on the 3-CD set Ray Charles: The Birth of Soul—The Complete Atlantic Rhythm & Blues Recordings, 1952–1959, Atlantic & Atco Remasters Series, Atlantic 82310–2, NY, 1991. Ray Charles: 'Unchain My Heart', NY, May 1961, ABC-Paramount 10266, US, 1961; 'Let's Go Get Stoned', LA, late 1965, Crying Time, ABC-Paramount & then as single, ABC-Paramount 10808, US, 1966; 'You'll Never Walk Alone', nia, Modern Sounds in Country and Western, ABC-Paramount 410, Hollywood (HMV CLP 1580 & CSD 1451, London), 1962; 'You Don't Know Me', Hollywood, 15 Feb 1962, ABC-Paramount 10345 (HMV POP 1064), 1962; 'That Lucky Old Sun', Hollywood, 10 Jul 1963, ABC-Paramount 10509, 1963. The Ray Charles website is at www.morethings.com/music/brother-ray/index.html.

Bob Dylan: 'Unchain My Heart', Topanga Park, CA, 29 Apr, 1 May & 2 May 1986, all unreleased & uncirculated; 'You'll Never Walk Alone', Topanga Park, CA, 28 & 29 Apr 1986, unreleased & uncirculated; one version overdubbed with different bass player 28 May 1986, ditto. Dylan's remark re the Raelettes in this writer's presence, London, 17 Jun 1978; 'That Lucky Old Sun', reportedly recorded NY, 16–19 Mar 1971. Doug Sahm & Band: 'Me & Paul', NY, Oct 1972, Doug Sahm & Band, Atlantic SD-7254, NY, 1972. Ray, dir. Taylor Hackford, written Hackford & James L. White, Anvil / Baldwin / Bristol Bay, US, 2004.]

Charters, Samuel B. [1929 -] Samuel Barclay Charters was born in Pittsburgh on August 1, 1929. His family moved to Sacramento, California, in 1945 and three years later he began performing in jazz combos in the Bay Area. He began making field recordings by jazz and blues musicians in 1955, and while everyone else who was in Memphis in 1956 was excited by ELVIS PRESLEY, Charters was excited to find old blues singers from the pre-war era, still alive and functioning: 'GUS CANNON and Will Shade and everybody with the jug bands.'

When Charters found them, and recorded them again for the first time in over 20 years, it made him realise something simple and powerful: 'that these people weren't from another planet, they were part of our life and some of them were still alive.'

In November 1959, the New York publisher Rinehart published Sam Charters' book The Country Blues—and it proved one of those rare books that actually makes something happen out in the world. Effectively it kicked off the blues revival that became a shaping force within the whole burgeoning scene that encompassed the New Left, the civil rights movement, the Greenwich Village folk phenomenon, the rise of Bob Dylan and more.

The blues that Charters drew to people's attention, and which he invented the phrase 'country blues' to describe, was neither the vaudeville-jazz sort they'd heard by Bessie Smith nor the electric post-war blues of MUDDY WATERS, SONNY BOY WILLIAMSON and HOWLIN' WOLF. It was the great hidden mass of still largely unknown, pre-war, mostly down-home blues, southern and unamplified, and as richly diverse as life under the sea. The Country Blues was a revelation and an inspiration to many, and prompted young, white, urban aficionados to trawl the Deep South and 'find' a number of old, black, rural musicians, who duly appeared in the coffee-houses of Greenwich Village, Philadelphia, Cambridge and Washington, D.C.—among them many at whose feet Dylan was literally able to sit, soaking up some of the riches of their styles, techniques and musical heritage.

Charters' book didn't impress everybody. He pipped to the post the rather more precise and thorough-going, wide-ranging blues scholar and British architect Paul Oliver, whose book Blues Fell This Morning (in the US The Meaning of the Blues) arrived in 1960, as did American jazz writer Frederic Ramsey's Been Here and Gone, a richly photo-loaded account of travels through the 1950s South in search, as later editions said, 'of what might still remain of an original, authentic African American musical tradition'.

There was much carping too from some of those who felt that they already knew about all this music but hadn't troubled to write books about it. They felt that despite all the fieldwork Charters had done, in Alabama, New Orleans, Memphis and even the Bahamas, he didn't have a proper folklorist's interest in 'the tradition', but rather had the sort of flighty interest in 'originality' and 'creativity' that is just what you'd expect from a literary person with an inclination towards BEAT poetry.

Charters' critics also felt that there were far richer seams of pre-war blues than those he had mined: that many of the figures he championed were second-rate and that he gave too much attention to the light-weight, hokum end of the spectrum at the expense of the heavier, darker material born in the Mississippi delta.

In fact the LP issued as a companion to Charters' book contradicted this claim: it was deliberately wide-ranging but included tracks by BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON, BLIND WILLIE JOHNSON, SLEEPY JOHN ESTES, the very raw Tommy McClennan and ROBERT JOHNSON. It also included BLIND WILLIE McTELL's 1928 classic 'Statesboro Blues'—and after the HARRY SMITH compilation of 1952, AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC, the Charters record was the next most crucial release in the history of how pre-war music was regained.

Charters was subsequently responsible for 'discovering' the Bahamian songster Joseph Spence in 1958 (whose trademark rhythm Bob Dylan utilises on the faster, largely ignored version of 'Forever Young' on Planet Waves) and was active on the fringes of the Village scene in the early 1960s. Charters produced around 20 Folkways albums, recorded as part of the True Endeavor Jug Band, partnered HAPPY TRAUM's brother Artie in the New Strangers, was an A&R man for Prestige in 1963, oversaw many blues reissues and even produced early albums by Country Joe & the Fish. In the early 1970s he moved to Sweden and later that decade travelled in West Africa for his 1981 book The Roots of the Blues: An African Search.

Still alive, in 2000 Sam and his second wife, Beats-specialist literary scholar Ann Charters, established the Charters Archives of Blues and Vernacular African American Music at the University of Connecticut. But if he had done nothing else after The Country Blues, he would have earned his place in the history of the music, as a significant figure in bringing the pre-war blues world forward into the heart of the 1960s and right into the consciousness of Dylan's generation. And specifically, his LP The Country Blues almost certainly gave Bob Dylan his first hearing of the work of Blind Willie McTell.

[Samuel B. Charters, The Country Blues, New York: Rinehart, 1959; The Roots of the Blues: An African Search, New York: Marion Boyars, 1981. Various Artists: The Country Blues, RBR RF-1, NY, 1959. Charters' quotes, phone interview by this writer, 08 Aug 2002.]

Child, Francis James [1825 - 1896] Francis James Child was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on February 1, 1825. A Professor of English Literature at Harvard, he made a significant contribution to Chaucer studies (1863) and published a five-volume edition of Spenser (1885) but was also a pioneering collector of traditional (non-broadsheet) ballads, which he published in his The English and Scottish Popular Ballads, 1882–98 [five volumes], a standard work. His numbering system for these ballads is the universally accepted way to identify them. He also argued for attention to be paid to children's game songs, writing that they are 'the last stage of many old ballads'.

Child Ballads that Dylan has bumped up against in one way or another include 'Blackjack Davey' and 'Love Henry'. 'Blackjack Davey', 'Gypsy Davey' and 'The Raggle-Taggle Gypsies' are all versions of Child no.200. 'Love Henry' is essentially Child no.68, 'Young Hunting', of which he gives 11 versions (all from Scotland) but which is offered with over 40 variants in Bronson's standard companion work The Traditional Tunes of the Child Ballads—Vol. II (1962, pp.60–82). Dylan sings Bronson Variant 19 almost word for word with the addition of one verse from elsewhere.

Child also collected a variant of the 'Scarborough Fair' song cluster, from an 1827 manuscript, that offers this verse: 'Did ye ever travel twixt Berwick and Lyne? / Sober and grave grows merry in time / There ye'll meet wi a handsome young dame / Ance she was a true love of mine'—which, though located on a different borderline (Berwick is the last English town before you reach Scotland, on the east coast), is very close to Dylan's lyric in 'Girl of the North Country'.

Child died in Boston on September 11, 1896.

Chronicles* [album] See Booker T.

Chronicles Volume One* [2004] The first long-rumoured and then long-awaited volume of a trilogy of books of memoirs by Dylan was published by Simon & Schuster on October 5, 2004 (having originally been described by them as 'the most-awaited book of 2002' and listed in their fall catalogue that year, though at 92 pages shorter than the 2004 version). An abridged audio book, with narration by Sean Penn, was issued simultaneously on CD and on cassette. (Penn, if it matters, had never read for an audio book before.)

Six weeks later, the book was no.5 on the New York Times Hardcover Non-Fiction best seller list, and Amazon.com and Barnesandnoble.com had it as their all-round no.2 best seller. It reached no.2 in the New York Times non-fiction best-seller list by late December, and was nominated for a National Book Award. Clearly, like many aspects of what might be seen as the official marketing of Bob Dylan Heritage (by Dylan, his office, his music-publishing and his record company, and extending into areas like films—especially the MARTIN SCORSESE film No Direction Home, 2005), a striking aspect of Chronicles Volume One is its dollar power.

Its success was aided by its receiving generally rapturous reviews, often by somewhat surprised reviewers impressed by its clarity and 'candor'. Its accuracy was noted even by some who had a more specialist knowledge to measure it against. Elijah Wald, co-author with DAVE VAN RONK of the latter's own memoir of the folk revival years, The Mayor of MacDougal Street, wrote this: 'The Dylan book is extraordinarily honest, straightforward and accurate, at least about his early New York days. There are some minor lapses and shifts of memory, as is inevitable after forty-plus years, but everyone I know who was on the scene at that time is blown away at how clear a picture he paints of it.' He adds: 'As for Dylan's picture of Van Ronk, it is largely accurate as well as highly complimentary.'

Likewise IZZY YOUNG, who ran the Folklore Center in Greenwich Village when Dylan was new there, writes this about the book: 'His description of the Folklore Center, and the same for Dave Van Ronk, is priceless, and, more importantly, correct. . . . I lived in the center of the folk music revival in America and Bob Dylan made it real for me forty years later.'

On the other hand, you didn't have to be a Dylan aficionado to detect errors. One correspondent to the publisher's website (Paul Baragona, from Raleigh, NC) complained: 'I noticed on page 8 that Bob Dylan claims to have initially traveled to New York in a 1957 Impala. . . . Impala was not introduced until 1958. Sorry to be so picky, but the body styles were totally different.'

Others had more fundamental qualms about the book's hard-to-measure but certainly odd relationship to truth. Many noted that this unexpectedly direct and detailed narrative, offered with such vivid zing, and certainly giving the lie to the old saw that 'if you can remember the 60s you weren't really there', nonetheless avoids most of the major events in Dylan's life and career—among them his marriages, their break-ups, his going electric, his partnership with THE BAND, the making of the Basement Tapes or of any of his greatest albums, or becoming a Born Again Christian. And some felt that beyond what was missing there was a slippery quality about what was there.

Perhaps with an artist like Dylan this was inevitable. To some extent, indeed, this might apply to anyone. As writer NIGEL HINTON has commented, 'People ask what in fiction draws on personal memory. But memory and invention are impossible to untangle. No memory is untouched by invention and no invention untainted by memory. And I think Chronicles operates like that. I don't believe most of the things Dylan tells us, but I think we know more about him from this invented memory than from any attempt to reconstruct perfectly a sequence of events. The essence, the pure spirit of how he is and how he sees the world comes through the fictionalised memory.'

A less charitable but most interesting near-instant assessment came from CLINTON HEYLIN, whose article 'I Don't Believe You—Chronicles, Thru the Eyes of a Critic' (though he might have made that 'Thru the Green Eyes of a Biographer') was published in the UK fanzine Judas! in January 2005. He notes the book's 'gaping chasms in chronology, even within the corset-tight remit [Dylan] imposes', coming from 'a self-conscious artist painting a flattering, self-serving portrait', in which 'its 300 pages contain not a single accurate date. I mean, not one.'

Heylin also recalls that Dylan mentioned, 'back in the spring of 1963, that he was writing an autobiography of sorts . . . "about somebody who has come to the end of one road, knows there's another road there but doesn't know exactly where it is" . . .', and that Dylan had also kept a diary of the 1974 tour. He concludes: 'Chronicles confirms that he has been chronicling for many a year . . . this is no work of memory, even one that is working a lot better than others might previously have suspected.' Heylin is also perceptive on the detail of how many of Dylan's metaphors suggest by their clumsiness that they have been contributed by the contemporary Dylan rather than the more sure-footed younger man.

Complaint at all this 'circumspection and dissembling' is not always just: he claims it as typical that Chronicles produces 'the previously unknown FLO CASTNER', when in fact she is a prominent interviewee and witness to Dylan's Dinkytown period in the lengthy 2002 article 'Desire Revisited: Dylan in Dinkytown 1959' by Hans Eisenbeis; more generally Heylin refers to the book as 'Bob Dylan's 2004 autobiography' when it clearly isn't an autobiography but that lesser and more reasonably partial a thing, a memoir, and never claims to be more. Heylin concedes that despite everything, the book is 'still nail-hammeringly riveting', and argues reasonably that it could have been far better—'a genuine literary triumph'—had Dylan allowed an editor in on it.

An axe to grind, of course, differs from the inevitablitiy of 'fictionalised memory', and Dylan does offer both. Least impressive is the sour and dissembling poor-little-me rant about being abused by the special kind of fame that was his in the second half of the 1960s: 'A few years earlier Ronnie Gilbert, one of The Weavers, had introduced me at one of the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVALS saying, "And here he is . . . take him, you know him, he's yours." I had failed to sense the ominous forebodings in the introduction. ELVIS had never been introduced like that.'

So far simply a bit petulant, plus a little disingenuous to suggest that Elvis had never been made to feel 'owned' by the burden of fame. But then we get this: '"Take him, he's yours!" What a crazy thing to say! Screw that.' This is not the great wordsmith at his judicious or graceful best. And he goes on to offer this embarrassing piece of sulky special pleading, in which he wants it both ways so shamelessly that it's comic: 'All I'd ever done was sing songs that were dead straight and expressed powerful new realities.' Oh is that all? As Jim Kunstler comments, this suggests 'someone strikingly peevish, given the fantastic advantages and emoluments of his position in life. But the book as a whole is a different matter.'

The book as a whole is a surprisingly vivid, detailed, intensive, unpredictable delight, and most of all an absolutely invaluable, rich and (mostly) existentially truthful memoir about the long-gone world of Greenwich Village at the start of the 1960s—at the start, that is, of everything.

[Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, New York: Simon & Schuster, 2004 (poor-me rant p.115); Sean Penn, Chronicles Volume One (Abridged), New York: Simon & Schuster Audio, 2004. Nigel Hinton quoted with permission from private e-mail to writer Sarah Beattie, 16 Jan 2005. Elijah Wald quoted with permission from e-mail to the Pre-War Blues online discussion group pre-war-blues@yahoogroups.com, 11 Aug 2005 & e-mail to this writer 16 Aug 2005. Izzy Young, 'Bob Dylan's Chronicles', Judas! no.14, Huntingdon, UK, Jul 2005. Clinton Heylin: 'I Don't Believe You—Chronicles, Thru the Eyes of a Critic', Judas! no.12, Jan 2005. Hans Eisenbeis: 'Desire Revisited: Dylan in Dinkytown 1959', Rake, Minneapolis, Apr 2002, seen online 15 Aug 2005 at www.rakemag.com/stories/section_detail.aspx?itemID=2210&catID=146&SelectCatID=146. Jim Kunstler, online book review at www.kunstler.com/mags_dylan.html, 4 Aug 2005.]

Clancy Brothers & Tommy Makem An influential and popular US-based Irish folk group from the end of the 1950s onwards: the musically respectable flipside of the Dubliners—despite, as Dylan noted when comparing them to Northern Ireland's McPeake Family, having 'that touch of commerciality to them: you didn't mind it, but it was still there', and despite looking, in photos, like ads for knitting patterns. They're to be seen proving the point in archive footage unearthed in the film No Direction Home (2005).

Paddy Clancy was born in Carrick-on-Suir, Ireland, in 1922; brother Tom was born there in 1923; Liam was born in 1936. The older two left Ireland for Canada in 1947, crossed illegally into the US in 1948, working first in Cleveland, Ohio, and then moving via Chicago to New York City. Tommy Makem, born in Keady, Northern Ireland, in 1932, first joined them in 1956 in Chicago, shortly before the move to New York, where Paddy helped Folkways and Elektra to record Irish music and set up his own label, Tradition, which issued LPs by the McPeakes, Josh White, ODETTA and, from 1959 onwards, by, er, the Clancy Brothers & Tommy Makem. They had wanted to be actors, not singers, and Tom Clancy had some success at this—even playing on Broadway in Orson Welles' King Lear—but the others struggled in small venues until they switched to singing, which was immediately more popular with audiences. Their first two LPs, The Rising of the Moon and Come Fill Your Glass with Us, were followed by a 1961 appearance on the 'Ed Sullivan' TV show that emblazoned their name at once on the American public mind. In the late 1960s, Paddy Clancy returned to Ireland to take up dairy farming, and Tommy Makem went solo in 1969.

In Chronicles Volume One (2004) Dylan recalls, while dismissing the concept 'protest songs' and endorsing the very different category of 'rebellion songs', that the Clancy Brothers 'and their buddy Tommy Makem' were crucial purveyors of 'rebellion songs'. He says that these 'really moved me' and that 'they sang them all the time', and that in the White Horse Bar on Hudson Street in the Village, where he befriended Liam, its clientele, 'mostly . . . guys from the old country . . . would sing drinking songs, country ballads and rousing rebel songs . . .' In No Direction Home Dylan calls the Clancy Brothers & Tommy Makem 'musketeers'.

But Dylan was enthusing about them long before this. He told interviewers David Hammond and Derek Bailey much the same things at Slane, Ireland, in 1984: 'The times I remember the Clancy Brothers most was not mostly in the clubs where we played [the Village Vanguard, the Village Gate and Gerde's Folk City] but in those bars . . . the White Horse bar . . . you could always go there, any time, and they'd be singing . . . Irish folk songs. Actually I learnt quite a few there myself. . . . Liam always sang those ballads which always would get to me—I'd never heard those kind of songs before, close up, you know. I'd heard them on record but I hadn't heard them close up. All the legendary people they used to sing about—Brennan on the Moor, or Roddy McCorley—I wasn't aware of them, when they existed—but it was as if they'd just existed yesterday.' In the televised part of this interview he also said: 'They just reached a lot of people, you know, with their exuberance and their attitude. They're all great singers. They're all so different, too, aren't they?'

He adds: 'I never heard a singer as good as Liam ever. He was just the best ballad singer I'd ever heard in my life. Still is, probably.'

Liam Clancy is also to be seen in No Direction Home, sat at that White Horse Tavern bar doing his Stage Irishman act (once an actor . . .) and saying highly interesting things: particularly about Dylan being one of that recognisable category of person the Irish have a term for—a 'shape-changer'; but he too was recorded talking about Bob Dylan two decades earlier, and talking too about what Dylan had told him he remembered about him from the White Horse days. He told PATRICK HUMPHRIES in October 1984:

> '. . . I was coming through La Guardia Airport about six months ago, and I had the bodhran on my back, and the guitars, and the next thing I felt this body behind me, and I got this great hairy kiss on the cheek. Now when that happens in New York you're going to turn round and belt whoever it is. So I turn around and it's Bob Dylan. We stood talking for a little while and suddenly the whole thing flooded back to me—what it was all like at that time. He says: "I love you guys. And I love [ROBERT] SHELTON for bringing me to your first concert in [New York] Town Hall. You know what I remember about that concert, Liam? You sang a commercial about Donnelly's sausages!"'

In 2002 Liam Clancy published his autobiography, The Mountain of the Women: Memoirs of an Irish Troubadour, and in it he describes the importance of the White Horse bar not only to the Clancys but to the life of Greenwich Village in general: 'For us,' he writes at one point, 'the White Horse Tavern was the poetic, singing center of the Village.' But it was also where Dylan Thomas had committed suicide by whiskey in 1953, so it was on the tourist trail, and regulars sometimes perforce valued the back room more than the bar itself:

'Crowds of students would come on weekends to worship at the shrine. We, the locals, resented the invasion. This was our sanctuary: the back room was our singing place, the place where sea shanties, rebel songs, and raw love songs were exposed. This was where THEO BIKEL could cry over the beauty of his Old Testament recitals, where RICHARD FARIÑA could hold forth with snatches of his novel in progress' and 'where Jimmy [i.e. James] Baldwin could flaunt his homosexual intellectualism and snort scornfully at our ballsy shanties . . .' (Fariña was, according to Clancy, 'a regular' at the White Horse and a 'close friend', whom he calls 'the poet/singer/revolutionary'.)

In 1992, at the so-called Bob Dylan 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration in New York City, the Clancy Brothers and Robbie O'Connell with special guest Tommy Makem performed a gloriously unrockist, moving 'When the Ship Comes In' (with Paddy Clancy on harmonica and vocals, Liam on guitar and vocals, young whippersnapper Bobby Clancy on percussion and vocals, Tommy Makem on banjo and vocals, Robbie O'Connell on guitar and vocals, and G.E. SMITH on bass). Paddy came out of retirement for this concert—for the second time; they had re-formed in 1984 for a one-off concert and a new album, Reunion. For the party after the Dylan 'Celebration' concert, everyone repaired to Tommy Makem's club, the Irish Pavilion.

Liam wasn't happy with the sales figures of the 2-CD set of the concert. As HOWARD SOUNES recounted it, sales were good 'in the first few months and then . . . fell sharply. Artists who were on the CD received a percentage of royalties and were surprised to see how modest these were. "Some of the statements I got didn't read very well," [said] Liam Clancy. "You know, Denmark: two copies."'

In Patrick Humphries' 1984 interview with the Clancys, Paddy suddenly offers this odd little story about Dylan and his absorption of material back in the early days: 'You want to know where Dylan got his stuff? There was a little folk club here in London, down in the basement; we sang in it one night. . . . Anyway, AL GROSSMAN paid somebody and gave them a tape-recorder, and every folksinger that went up there was taped, and Bob Dylan got all those tapes . . .' And Liam agrees with this, adding: 'Yes, and the tune of "Farewell" [a song Dylan copyrighted in 1963 and is included in his official songbooks] . . . whoever was singing harmony was closer to the mike than the guy singing melody, and when [Dylan] wrote his version, he wrote it to the harmony not the melody line.'

The Clancys were carriers, not composers, of their material, so they have no cause to complain that Dylan took things from them (and generally they don't), but the songs he probably took specifically from hearing the Clancy Brothers & Tommy Makem performing live are: the traditional 'Brennan on the Moor', which becomes his 'Rambling Gambling Willie' (copyrighted 1962, and an outtake from The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, 1963), the traditional 'The Parting Glass', which mutates into 'Restless Farewell' on The Times They Are a-Changin', and the Appalachian song 'The Nightingale', whose tune Dominic Behan used for his song 'The Patriot Game', which the Clancys sang and from which Dylan in turn created 'With God on Our Side'.

Liam Clancy certainly recognised Dylan's artistic legitimacy: indeed he specifies the moment at which this really struck him, again in the interview with Patrick Humphries. He is recalling seeing Dylan at the 1965 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL and reacting to the solo acoustic performance of 'Mr. Tambourine Man' that came after 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue':

> 'I was actually filming at the Newport Festival that year. I was up a 12-foot platform filming with a telephoto lens, so I could zoom in close. And Dylan came out, and it was obvious that he was stoned, bobbing around the stage. Very Chaplinesque, actually. He broke into that "Tambourine Man" and I found myself standing there with tears streaming down my face, because—I saw the butterfly emerging from the caterpillar. I also saw, for the first time, the immense value of what the man was about. When he sang "my ancient empty street's too dead for dreaming", I knew it was Sullivan Street on a Sunday. So it was not only a street, it was our street. I suddenly realised that this kid, who had bugged us so often, had emerged into a very major artist.'

Tom died in Cork (Ireland) on November 7, 1990; Paddy died of cancer at home back in Carrick-on-Suir on November 10, 1998; Liam Clancy and Tommy Makem survive.

[Liam Clancy, The Mountain of the Women: Memoirs of an Irish Troubadour, New York: Doubleday, 2002, pp.250–51, 202. Bob Dylan, interview by Bono (who hadn't heard of the McPeake Family but liked the name), Slane, Ireland, Jul 1984, Hot Press, Dublin, nia, 1984; interview by David Hammond & Derek Bailey, Slane, 8 Jul 1984, partly broadcast RTE 2 TV, Dublin, Dec 1984 on 'It's a Long Way from Tipperary and Armagh: The Story of the Clancy Brothers and Tommy

Makem' (also broadcast Channel 4 TV, UK, 31 Dec 1985 & various US stations 1986); Chronicles, 2004, p.83 & 'Liam Clancy, by Bob Dylan', collected in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds., All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: Futura paperback edn., 1988, p.20; Patrick Humphries, 'Bob Dylan, by Liam Clancy', collected ditto, pp.20–21. The quotes re 'Farewell' & Albert Grossman, from same interview, first published with the rest in The Telegraph no.18, UK, winter 1984, pp.62–68, & collected in John Bauldie, ed, Wanted Man: In Search of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin rev. edn., 1992, pp.49–51. Reminder of specific song debts to the Clancys by seeing online 13 Jan 2006 Clancys section of www.bobdylanroots.com. Howard Sounes, Down The Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, New York: Grove Press, 2001, Chapter 9, manuscript p.470.]

Clapton, Eric [1945 -] Eric Clapton was born at Ripley in the English Home Counties on April 30, 1945. He became a Rooster, then one of Casey Jones' Engineers, then a Yardbird, then quit when that fragile group became too pop for his taste—though the effect of his work would soon enough be to turn blues into rock. He joined JOHN MAYALL's Bluesbreakers and then, with Ginger Baker and JACK BRUCE, formed Cream (the first 'supergroup') in the unequalled summer of 1966. He was by now already spoken of as Britain's finest blues guitarist, and while Cream was a quintessential part of Swinging London (and more King's Road Chelsea than Carnaby Street) its repertoire included much pre-war as well as post-war blues material, albeit sometimes barely recognisable. The band split at the end of 1968, and Clapton, whose songwriting included collaboration with GEORGE HARRISON on Cream's hit single 'Badge', next tottered into new creation Blind Faith, with ex-Traffics Stevie Winwood and Rick Grech. Blind Faith recorded one album, with a front cover deemed more tasteless now than then, played their one obligatory free concert in June 1969 and then some big-money US dates, and promptly disintegrated.

Clapton was soon nicknamed 'God' but, caught between a recognition that JIMI HENDRIX was at least as Godlike and a terror at his own reputation, Clapton's work became muted and nervous; he also fell victim to heroin addiction. Yet he played with JOHN LENNON's Plastic Ono Band and Delaney & Bonnie and in 1970 released his first solo album, Eric Clapton, the first time he had dared be a lead singer. It yielded a placid hit version of J.J. Cale's song 'After Midnight', which itself served notice of how laid back and unguitar-star Clapton now intended to be, even though afterwards he came the back-to-basics of the Derek & the Dominoes persona and some perkier playing on the album Layla and Other Love Songs.

He re-emerged, drug free, in 1973 and made a series of tediously mainstream rock albums, though some touching and poignantly-sung love songs came out of his widely publicised love-tussle with George Harrison and Patti Boyd in this period (especially on 1977's Slowhand) and his interest in the blues seemed given a fillip by his hearing its 1980s Texas reincarnation as personified by the Vaughan brothers, STEVIE RAY and JIMMIE. He returned to an older blues milieu with the styling of his mega-successful Unplugged album in 1992, and has been proselytising ROBERT JOHNSON into the ground ever since. For at least 20 years now he seems to have given annual multi-night concerts at London's beautiful Royal Albert Hall at which adoring fans still turn out dutifully for some of the world's most stultifyingly boring musical performances from a likeable man and ponderous artist who cannot but turn all he touches to the dullest gold, or more normally platinum. Since his heroin days, various other shootings-in-the-foot and personal tragedies have befallen him without discernible effect on his work.

It was inevitable that he and Dylan should come into working contact, for better and for worse. The main lines of their collaborations have been as follows. The first time Eric Clapton didn't play with Dylan was in London in 1965, when in the midst of the latter's last solo tour, he went into a small studio at his New York record company's behest to record a message for that year's annual Sales Convention: a message intended to gee up Columbia's rack-jobbers all over the world. The widely circulated tape of Dylan's predictably irreverent, but perhaps unpredictably gauche, doomed attempts is very funny. While he was at it, Dylan made an equally diffident but far more genuine attempt to lay down a cut of his still relatively new song 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now', playing piano and singing, backed by John Mayall's Bluesbreakers, who had been rounded up hastily for this brief and fruitless occasion. Eric Clapton was with the group and in the room at the time, but did not play. It was soon over, since Dylan proved himself too embarrassed to count the others in competently and the bemused British musos unable to get past this unprofessionalism or see the point of Bob Dylan at all.

At the Isle of Wight Concert in 1969, Clapton watched Dylan's performance and was far from bemused, observing shrewdly and at once that Dylan was 'being HANK WILLIAMS', even as most of the rest of us were fumbling in puzzlement at a Bob Dylan so uncannily different from the previous, 1966 version. Two years later, both artists took part in the Concert for Bangla Desh.

Clapton was one of the overfilled roomful of musicians (there were 20 others including vocalists: 21 others including Dylan) brought into Columbia's Studio E in New York City on July 28, 1975, for the second day of tentative sessions for the Desire album. Nonetheless, and undetectable though his contribution may be, Eric was present for that day's cut of 'Romance in Durango', which made it onto the album, and for a cut of 'Catfish' which later made it onto Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3.

In August 1975, Clapton released as a single a version of Dylan's 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' that was at once ineffably dreary and an enormous hit—in both respects, therefore, being a worthy follow-up to his version of Bob Marley's 'I Shot the Sheriff'. Early the following year, when Clapton was making one of his plodding solo albums (No Reason to Cry) at THE BAND's studio in Malibu, California, and had brought in ROBBIE ROBERTSON and RICK DANKO, Dylan came too, and he wrote 'Sign Language', a modest song pleasing mostly for Dylan's rhyming of 'language' with 'sandwich' and, on the jointly sung recording, for a relaxed feel that owes more to Robertson's guitar-work than Clapton's and rightly has Dylan's voice higher than Eric's in the mix. It was included on the album. That March 30 (1976), the two of them spent further time in the studio, each performing behind the other but also sharing vocals on 'Adelita' and 'Big River', and with Clapton attempting Dylan's 'When the Ship Comes In'. None of these tracks has been released. Both artists took part in the concert that became The Last Waltz that November.

In the course of the European leg of Dylan's huge 1978 World Tour, Eric Clapton guested twice. At Nuremberg on July 1, Clapton was a support act, but returned to the stage for the encore of Dylan's set, to play lead guitar on 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight' and stay for the final number, 'The Times They Are a-Changin''. On July 15, the last event of this leg of the tour, the gigantic gathering at Blackbushe Aerodrome in Southern England, Clapton was again a featured support act; but he came back on stage for the last Dylan number before the encore, and played on 'Forever Young'. And on that year's Clapton album Backless (nicknamed Spineless), he covered the Dylan-HELENA SPRINGS songs 'Walk Out in the Rain' and 'If I Don't Be There By Morning'.

On July 7, 1984, when Dylan and SANTANA played at London's huge Wembley Stadium, Eric Clapton joined Bob for a run of numbers at the end of his set, adding his guitar to 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat', 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue', 'Tombstone Blues', 'Señor (Tales of Yankee Power)', 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', 'Blowin' in the Wind' and 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'. Two years later, back in the studios in London on July 27–28, 1986 for a Dylan session intended to provide fresh material for his ill-advised film Hearts of Fire—material that Dylan had signally failed to compose—the musicians assembled behind him included Clapton on guitar, RON WOOD on bass and guitar and several others. They managed to get through some takes of John Hyatt's song 'The Usual', a 'Ride This Train', some stabs at Dylan's anyone-could-have-written-this-song 'Had a Dream About You Baby', some of Billy Joe Shaver's 'Old Five & Dimers Like Me', a 'To Fall in Love', a 'Night After Night' and a pleasant cut of Shel Silverstein and Dennis Locorriere's 'A Couple More Years'. Several of these made it onto the soundtrack album, several made it into the film, one made it onto Down in the Groove and one further cut even made it onto the Argentine Down in the Groove release.

Clapton was a distinguished guest at Live Aid in 1985, and seven years later a prominent figure at Dylan's so-called 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration at Madison Square Garden, New York, at which he was one of the inner circle of accompanists, with ROGER McGUINN, TOM PETTY, NEIL YOUNG and George Harrison. That October 15 when they rehearsed, Clapton and Dylan shared vocals on 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh It Takes a Train to Cry', and, with the others, on 'My Back Pages'. Clapton, naturally, also played guitar. At the event itself, before the ensemble finish, Clapton sang 'Love Minus Zero / No Limit' and gave a blistering version of 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right', a real reoccupation of the song as a surging blues.

In the same hall, seven years further on, Dylan joined Clapton as a surprise guest at his Benefit for the Crossroads (in aid of a centre Clapton established in Antigua to help drug and alcohol addicts), and this time Bob performed 'Don't Think Twice It's All Right' and 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry' before he and Clapton shared vocals on the Under the Red Sky song 'Born in Time' (Clapton had covered this song on his 1998 album Pilgrim); Dylan then performed 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat' and 'Not Dark Yet' before Clapton rejoined him for further shared vocals on 'Crossroads'. Dylan finished off by playing behind Eric's lead vocals on 'Bright Lights, Big City'. The subsequent telecast and DVD included Dylan's 'Don't Think Twice' and their shared 'Crossroads'. Predictably, neither artist is at his best here; but then neither is ever at his best when the two get together.

[Eric Clapton (with Bob Dylan): 'Sign Language', No Reason to Cry, Polydor RSO RS1-3004, US, Sep 1976, CD-reissued 1996; Eric Clapton: Backless, RSO 3039, 1981; Pilgrim, Reprise / Wea 46577, US, 1998. Eric Clapton: Benefit for the Crossroads, VH-1 telecast 17 Jul 1999; DVD issued US, 26 Oct 1999. Bob Dylan: Hearts of Fire soundtrack album, Columbia SC40870, Oct 1987; Hearts of Fire film, dir. Richard Marquand, Lorimar / Warners, UK, 1987; Down in the Groove, Columbia 120.017, Argentina, 1988.]

Clark, Alan [1952 -] Alan Clark was born in Durham, north-east England, on March 5, 1952, lived in nearby Birtley and then the equally nearby Great Lumley, which overlooks Durham County Cricket ground and the River Wear. He learnt piano from age six but outplayed the manager of a local Hammond Organs shop on organ when hardly able to reach the pedals, and was earning money in clubs by age 13. He rejected a place at the Guildhall School of Music in London and spent 1971 playing on a cruise ship between Miami, Haiti and Jamaica, where he encountered reggae music and lived a clubbing high life. From here he became a session musician whose trademark sound is 'to record two slightly different Hammond tracks and play them back together', which 'works particularly well on faster rock tracks.'

Early on he played in Splinter, a duo on GEORGE HARRISON's Dark Horse label, played in ERIC CLAPTON's band, recorded with Gallagher & Lyle in 1978–79 and toured with Lindisfarne in the same period. In late 1980 he had a glum week playing clubs with British Sinatra wannabe Matt Monro (it should have been glum, anyway) and then joined Dire Straits, which had formed in 1977 but never before had a keyboards player (though E Street Band pianist Roy Bittan played keyboards on the album Making Movies, recorded in summer 1980, shortly before Clark joined). Clark remained in Dire Straits right through till its disbandment in 1995.

One day in early 1983 he was in front man MARK KNOPFLER's Bank Street, Greenwich Village house when Bob Dylan called round to play demos of new songs. 'He appeared at the top of the stairs, the sun beaming through the open door behind him, like a superhero. Next thing you know, we're playing pool. He was quite good, but I won.'

Alan Clark duly played keyboards on the Infidels album, going into the studios in New York in 1983, starting on April 11 for five consecutive days, followed by a one-day gap and then another six consecutive studios days, then another four, and finally a last session on May 2. He plays, therefore, not only on the album but on the great tracks left unreleased until the 1991 box set the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, including 'Blind Willie McTell', on which he plays organ, and 'Foot of Pride'.

He returned to the studio for Dylan (though Dylan wasn't there) nearly two years after those sessions, on February 20 & 24 and March 4, 1985, for some overdubbing on Empire Burlesque tracks, and ended up putting synthesizers on 'Never Gonna Be the Same Again' and a number of unreleased tracks. Finally he found himself on Down in the Groove (misspelt as Alan Clarke) when an outtake from the Infidels sessions, the lugubrious 'Death Is Not the End', was placed, in desperation, on that 1988 album.

Since 1983, he and Dylan have '[run] into each other once or twice' but, he says, sounding a changed character from the old days in the north-east of England, Miami and Jamaica, 'I'm not one for turning up at people's gigs, less still for going backstage. Our paths will cross again.'

[Special thanks to Terry Kelly; all quotes from, and most facts re, Clark from Kelly's interview, The Bridge no.23, winter 2005, pp.6–15; birthplace & date c/o Kelly, e-mails to this writer, 26 & 27 Oct 2005; some Dire Straits detail from 'Mustafa Odabasi's Dire Straits Page . . . the first and the only Dire Straits page in Turkey', seen online 14 Jan 2006 at www.ada.com.tr/~modabasi/ds.htm.]

Clark, Charles Badger [1883 - 1957] See 'Spanish Is the Loving Tongue'.

Clayton, Paul [1931 - 1967] Paul Clayton was a field-recorder, folksong collector, singer, guitarist and songwriter, and a well-known figure in folk revivalist circles. He was a friend of, and a major conduit of songs for, Bob Dylan.

He was born Paul Clayton Worthington in the old whaling port of New Bedford, Massachussets, on March 3, 1931, though part of his family came from Virginia. He field-recorded blues songster Pink Anderson in Charlottesville, Virginia, in 1950, first recorded as an artist himself in 1952 and had established himself as a singer-guitarist by 1956, when a whole flurry of his folksong albums was released on the Folkways, Riverside and Tradition labels. Further 1950s albums, of which there were many, included collections of broadside ballads, lumberjack songs, an album recorded with Jean Ritchie and one titled Bobby Burns' Merry Muses of Caledonia.

In the interview with Dylan by CAMERON CROWE, published within Biograph, 1985, Dylan says of him: 'Paul was just an incredible songwriter and singer. He must have known a thousand songs. I learned "Pay Day at Coal Creek" and a bunch of other songs from him.'

ROBERT SHELTON's No Direction Home, 1986, says that it was from Clayton's adaptation of the traditional 'Scarlet Ribbons for Her Hair' that Dylan took the melody for his 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right', and he might have added that Dylan's lyric too owes something to Clayton's, which includes 'T'ain't no use to sit and wonder why, darlin,' and 'So I'm walkin' down that long, lonesome road, / You're the one that made me travel on . . .' This song, titled 'Who's Gonna Buy You Ribbons (When I'm Gone)', was first issued on a Monument Records single in 1959 and resurfaced on Clayton's 1961 album Home-Made Songs and Ballads.

In 1970 Dylan recorded Clayton's 'Gotta Travel On' for Self Portrait, and that album's record label duly credits Clayton as its composer (though GLEN DUNDAS' Tangled Up in Tapes 3rd edition, 1994, lists it as composed jointly by Clayton, Lazar, Ehrlich & Six—i.e. by Clayton plus David Lazar, Larry Ehrlich and Tom Six). In this case at least, however, Dylan knew the song before he knew Clayton. Robert Shelton's book dates their first meeting as in 1962, but the song is on the tape of Dylan made back in St. Paul, Minnesota, as early as May 1960. Perhaps Dylan knew the song then because Monument (the label for which ROY ORBISON had his run of mega-hits) had given the song to another artist on their roster, Billy Grammer, who in 1959 promptly had his first hit with it; Grammer's

'Gotta Travel On' reached the top five on the country charts and crossed over to the pop charts. Or perhaps Dylan knew the song because it had started out life as a 19th Century British melody that had been revived pre-Clayton by the Weavers—if 'revived' isn't too strong a word for it, in the case of the Weavers' insipid, repulsively winsome goody-two-shoes version.

Intriguingly, it's also likely that Dylan heard what must have been the far gutsier version performed live by BUDDY HOLLY, with which the latter certainly opened his final concert, at Clear Lake, Iowa, and which he therefore probably featured as the opener for the concert he gave at Duluth, Minnesota, which Dylan attended, two days earlier. And to complete a circle, it just may be that Holly himself knew the song from hearing Clayton perform it in the Village. As DAVID HAJDU reminds us in his book Positively 4th Street, Holly knew CAROLYN HESTER, who had recorded her first album with his producer Norman Petty, and Holly had attended those sessions. We know too that—perhaps prompted by Hester, or his own interest in her—Holly moved into a Greenwich Village apartment some time before his death. The enticing fact is, indeed, that had Holly lived a year or two longer, he and Dylan would probably have bumped into each other in the Village.

In any case, after the Self Portrait recording, Dylan also performed 'Gotta Travel On' at 16 of his 1976 Rolling Thunder Revue concerts.

Dylan is rumoured to have made a guest appearance at a Paul Clayton concert at the Showboat Lounge in Washington, D.C., as early as September 24, 1961. After their fortunes were swiftly reversed, Paul Clayton was a companion on Dylan's 1964 CAR-RIDE THROUGH AMERICA, and is warmly commemorated in Dylan's Chronicles Volume One, in which Dylan seems to say that he first encountered Clayton as 'a folksinger friend of [DAVE] VAN RONK' and describes him as 'good-natured, forlorn and melancholic', adding that he 'must have had at least thirty records out but was unknown to the American public—an intellectual, a scholar and a romantic with an encyclopedic knowledge of balladry'. He also says that Clayton would be one of those playing poker all night upstairs above the Gaslight, and remembers spending 'a week or so' in the cabin that Clayton retained in the mountains outside Charlottesville, Virginia. In the last Chronicles passage about Clayton, Dylan turns to the question of song sources, and claims that 'Paul got all his versions of songs by adapting transcriptions from old texts. He knew hundreds of songs and must have had a photographic memory. . . . I liked Clayton and I liked his friends.'

It has often been suggested that Clayton, who was gay, felt rather more for Dylan than that. Paul Clayton died in 1967, electrocuted in his bath. As Kristine Baggelaar and Donald Milton put it somewhat crassly and starkly in Folk Music: More Than a Song: 'After a history of a problem with pills, Paul Clayton took his life on March 30, 1967, and his death brought to light the fine tension between artistic creativity and insanity.'

[Paul Clayton: field recordings of blues songster Pink Anderson, Charlottesville, VA, 29 May 1950, issued on Rev. Gary Davis and Pink Anderson: American Street Songs, Riverside RLP 12-611, 1961. Paul Clayton: Bill Clifton & Paul Clayton: The First Recordings: A Bluegrass Session, 1952, Folk Variety FV 12004 (D), 1975 and Bear Family BF-15001, Vollersode, West Germany, 1979; Jean Ritchie & Paul Clayton: American Folk Tales & Songs, Tradition TLP 1011, 1950s; Bobby Burns' Merry Muses of Caledonia, Elektra EKL-155, NY, 1958; 'Pay Day at Coal Creek' and 'Gotta Travel On' issued on Paul Clayton, Folk Singer!, Monument MLP 8017, US, 1965. 'Who's Gonna Buy You Ribbons (When I'm Gone)', Monument 45-416, US, 1959; Home-Made Songs & Ballads, Monument M 4001, US, 1961. Paul Clayton & the Foc'scle Singers: Foc'sle Songs and Shanties, Folkways FA 2429, NY, 1959.

Billy Grammer: 'Gotta Travel On', Monument, US, 1959. The Weavers: 'Gotta Travel On', collected on The Weavers' Greatest Hits, Vanguard, NY, 1957. Glen Dundas, Tangled Up in Tapes, 3rd ed., 1994. David Hajdu, Positively 4th Street, p.32. Carolyn Hester's 1st album was Scarlet Ribbons, Coral 57143, 1958. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.25–26, 46–47, 260–261. Kristine Baggelaar and Donald Milton, Folk Music: More Than a Song, New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1976.

An invaluable resource for this entry was Stefan Wirz's American Music website, specifically the page www.wirz.de/music/claytfrm.htm, seen online 6 Aug 2005.]

Clinch Mountain Boys, the See Stanley, Ralph.

Cohen, John [1932 -] John Cohen was born in New York City in 1932 to folk-dancing parents of Russian descent. At 14 he encountered gospel music, from the kitchen staff at summer camp, and at 16 he heard WOODY GUTHRIE's Dust Bowl Ballads and some LPs of hillbilly music that he seized upon as part of his anti-middle-class rebellion. By then in Long Island, NY, he learnt guitar while still at school (no-one else there did) and he was soon listening to Library of Congress field recordings, and records of old-time fiddlers, LEADBELLY, Hobart Smith, Texas Gladden and others. At Williams College he turned away from fraternity life, hiking mountain trails, drawing and learning banjo. Nevertheless he transferred to the school of art at Yale University in 1951.

At Yale he was inspired by art teacher Josef Albers but drawn to photography by strongly disturbing shots by Robert Frank—disturbing in showing Cohen that 'art could be personal, biographical, even sentimental at the same time it was surreal. . . . It suggested a sense of action where an artist might move through the world and make images from his own experience.'

Taking up photography, he was in the right places at the right time to record in his quiet, vivid photos the struggles of peasants in Patagonia, the penurious life of musicians and others in Kentucky—see his superb black and white portraits of the great Roscoe Holcomb—but also of THE BEATS and the coffee-house life of Greenwich Village during the late 1950s and early 1960s.

After a lengthy trip to Peru, Cohen returned to New York City in 1957, moved into a loft and began working as a freelance professional photographer. At the same time, he was also an undimmed music enthusiast and by 1952 had been hanging out with the REV. GARY DAVIS, documenting his music and escorting him to concerts. In 1958 he formed the revivalist group the NEW LOST CITY RAMBLERS, with TOM PALEY and MIKE SEEGER, and though it faltered from time to time in later decades (Paley dropped out in 1962), Cohen could claim by 2000 to have been playing with the group for more than 40 years.

It was a group Bob Dylan admired, and he and Cohen got on well. The pictures Cohen took around the Village include gorgeous early shots of the young Bob Dylan. And when Cohen tried out movie film, his first test roll was three minutes of silent footage of a playful Huck Finn Dylan on the roof of Cohen's 3rd Avenue apartment block. Yet Cohen writes of this period: 'In the loft I also photographed . . . ALAN LOMAX and the Kentucky singer Roscoe Holcomb. THE STANLEY BROTHERS and Woody Guthrie visited, along with a stream of other musicians and artists. Over the distance of time, those years . . . seem very exciting, but in reality it felt mostly desolate and run down.'

Cohen made fieldtrips to Kentucky where he 'discovered', recorded and filmed Holcomb, and later brought him to New York to record him in the studio. This alone would have indebted us to him. Cohen also coined the phrase 'that high lonesome sound', which has moved from its original function as a description of Holcomb's unique, keening, wondrous voice, and has now come to describe Appalachian music in general.

Five decades' worth of Cohen's photographs have been published in his great book There Is No Eye: John Cohen Photographs, 2001, including shots of Dylan (plus a wonderful shot of Red Grooms, the artist remembered so ardently in Dylan's Chronicles as having been his favourite contemporary painter in those Greenwich Village days: a shot of Grooms running across 3rd Avenue with a huge framed canvas wedged precariously in an old pram).

The book's title comes from Dylan, from near the end of the prose poem that forms the sleevenotes to the Highway 61 Revisited album of 1965: 'you are right john cohen—quazimodo was right—mozart was right. . . . I cannot say the word eye anymore . . . there is no eye—there is only a series of mouths—long live the mouths—your rooftop—if you don't already know—has been demolished. . . . eye is plasma & you are right about that too . . .'

Photographs not in Cohen's book include the colour shots of Dylan used on the covers of the Self Portrait album, and not used, but taken by Cohen in 1970, and the colour shots Dylan got him to take from a great distance—'bring one of those lenses like a telescope, so you can take pictures from a couple of blocks away'—while he walked on New York City streets unrecognised.

All these photographs are published, however, along with a wide selection of the 1962 black and white shots of Bob, in Cohen's 2003 volume Young Bob: John Cohen's Early Photographs of Bob Dylan.

Accompanying the earlier of these two books is a terrific, eclectic CD collection, There Is No Eye: Music for Photographs, conceived and supervised by Cohen and featuring rare recordings made by him and others, including a Holcomb version of 'Man of Constant Sorrow' and Dylan's 'Roll On, John' (for detail on this cut, see Rinzler, Ralph).

In June to July 1968 John Cohen and HAPPY TRAUM conducted the three interviews with Dylan that appeared as one feature, 'Conversations with Bob Dylan', in Sing Out! magazine that October, much to the surprise of many Dylan followers, who had perhaps never expected him to return to the pages of this folk scene magazine. Dylan also surprised Cohen, when he mentioned biblical parables. Cohen asks: 'When did you read the Bible parables?' and Dylan responds: 'I have always read the Bible, though not necessarily always the parables.' Cohen comments: 'I don't think you're the kind who goes to the hotel, where the Gideons leave a Bible, and you pick it up.' Dylan, resenting, as ever, people's assumptions about him, retorts quickly: 'Well, you never know.'

Many decades later, Cohen is himself an interviewee—a modest, perspicacious one—in MARTIN SCORSESE's 2005 film No Direction Home. He lives and works in Putnam Valley, New York.

As if all the above were not enough for one lifetime, Cohen's work is in the collections of the Museum of Modern Art, the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York and many other places; from 1992 to 1997 Cohen was Professor of Visual Arts at the State University of New York in Purchase, NY, and one of his field recordings, of a young girl singing an Andean huayno in the Quechua language, is up there on the Voyager spacecraft, traveling beyond the solar system to the stars.

[John Cohen, There Is No Eye: John Cohen Photographs, New York: powerHouse Books, 2001; quote re desolation, p.83; Young Bob: John Cohen's Early Photographs of Bob Dylan, powerHouse Books, 2003; Dylan quote p.48. Various Artists: There Is No Eye: Music for Photographs, Smithsonian Folkways 4001, US, 2001. John Cohen & Happy Traum: 'Conversations with Bob Dylan', Sing Out! no.18, Oct–Nov 1968, New York, pp.6–23, 27.]

Cohen, Leonard [1934 -] Few people named Leonard Norman (or Cohen) are as cool as the poet, novelist and singer-songwriter born in Montreal, Quebec, on September 21, 1934. He learnt guitar as a teenager, co-founded a countryish folk group, attended McGill University, began his 50-year career by publishing his first poetry book in 1956 (Let Us Compare Mythologies), followed this in 1961 with The Spice-Box of Earth, moved to a Greek island, published his first novel The Favorite Game in 1963, the poetry volume Flowers for Hitler in 1964 and the novel Beautiful Losers in 1966. In 1967 he was signed to Columbia Records (Dylan's label) by JOHN HAMMOND (the man who'd signed Dylan) and made a début album whose influence seemed inversely proportionate to its commercial success.

Songs like 'Suzanne' and 'Hey That's No Way to Say Goodbye' conquered at once the world of bedsit suicide music, reshaping it with a lugubrious sang-froid that was easy to parody but hard to shut out. He changed the rules of noir with his almost expressionless monotone, remorselessly plinkety serenading guitar and eerily cheerful female vocal chorus, and divided people into those who adored, and those reduced to suffocating rage by, this music's handsome and intellectual creator. The Songs of Leonard Cohen (JUDY COLLINS had a hit with 'Suzanne' that managed to put it on the soundtrack of the summer of love) was followed by Songs from a Room (1969), which featured 'Bird on a Wire', and then Songs of Love and Hate (1971) and after Live Songs (1973) came New Skin for the Old Ceremony (1974).

Always more popular in Europe and Canada than the US, Cohen's career as a singer-songwriter was not helped by the 1977 album Death of a Ladies' Man, produced by a deranged, gun-toting PHIL SPECTOR, on which Bob Dylan and ALLEN GINSBERG were back-up vocalists on 'Don't Go Home with Your Hard-On', a song as uninteresting as its title is contrived. A volume of poetry the year after was titled Death of a Lady's Man. (Precious, moi?)

The 1984–85 album Various Positions included the song 'Hallelujah', which has proved compelling to many other artists, most notably Jeff Buckley (and least notably BONO). Dylan performed it with mixed success in concert (its 1988 début in Montreal was well wrought, its second and final outing of the year, in Hollywood, not so), and the two chatted about it in a café in Paris' 14th Arondissement some time afterwards. (The song had two endings; Dylan preferred the less bleak one: 'And even though it all went wrong / I'll stand before the Lord of Song / With nothing on my tongue but Hallelujah!' This was too cheerful for Jeff Buckley; the doomier ending is on his multi-million-selling album Grace.)

To ADRIAN DEEVOY Cohen reported the café conversation with Dylan as being 'a real good writers' shop talk. We really went into the stuff very technically. You couldn't meet two people who work more differently. He said, "I like this song you wrote called 'Hallelujah'." He said, "How long did that take you to write?" And I said, "Oh, the best part of two years." He said, "Two years?" Kinda shocked. And then we started talking about a song of his called "I and I" from Infidels. I said, "How long did you take to write that?" He said, "Oh, 15 minutes." I almost fell off my chair. Bob just laughed.'

This is, apart from anything else, illustrative of how much more willing Cohen is than Dylan to discuss the processes of his work straightforwardly—to give good 'shop talk'—in public. He does so with a lovely lucidity for German television in 1997, saying, among much else: 'I wish it didn't take so long to finish a song and to make a record . . . it seems to be a long process . . . it's trying to discover how I really feel about something. To move a song from a slogan to an authentic expression is really what the enterprise is about . . . discarding the lines that come too easy . . . waiting until something else bubbles up that is a little truer . . .'

He moves on, after elaborating on the writing stage, to the other stages: 'There's the writing of the song, which can be laborious and difficult; there's the recording of the song in the studio, which also takes a tremendous concentration . . . to materialize the songs. And then the third part of the process is singing the songs in front of other people.'

The monotone of the singing voice deepened as the years went by. The 1988 album I'm Your Man captured Cohen's 'new sound' perfectly: he still had the female chorus high in the mix, the same horribly catchy melody lines and the same showing off about their simplicity, but the voice now came as from the bottom of a well, the production values were higher, the synthesisers calmer, and as well as the title track and the near self-parody of 'Everybody Knows', there was the song Phil 'Wall of Sound' Spector could have wished he had produced, 'First We Take Manhattan'. The darker album The Future followed in 1992 and won him a Juno award for Best Male Vocalist. (He began his acceptance speech by saying: 'Only in Canada could somebody with a voice like mine win "Vocalist of the Year".')

Leonard Cohen once told ROBERT SHELTON that it was Dylan who had inspired him to sing his own poems. 'Dylan is not just a great poet, he's a great man,' Cohen added.

An early critical essay on similarities and differences between the two was Frank Davey's 'Leonard Cohen and Bob Dylan: Poetry and the Popular Song', published in 1969. Exactly 35 years later came the small book Dylan & Cohen: Poets of Rock and Roll, by an academic from Wales, David Boucher, whose Introduction manages to mistitle Cohen's 1977 album as Death of a Lady's Man; not a promising start. Cohen's poetry and prose is examined more attractively in STEPHEN SCOBIE's 1978 book Leonard Cohen.

Cohen said in 1997: 'The beautiful losers are still around, and I'm still with them.' In 2003 he was made a Companion of the Order of Canada, his country's highest civilian honour.

[Leonard Cohen: The Songs of Leonard Cohen, Columbia (CBS 63421, Canada & UK), 1967; Songs from a Room, Columbia (CBS 63587, Canada & UK), 1969; Songs of Love and Hate, Columbia (CBS 69004), 1971; Live Songs, Columbia (CBS 65224; short version CBS 63587), 1973. New Skin for Old Ceremonies, Columbia (CBS 69087), 1974; 'Don't Go Home with Your Hard-On', LA, Mar 1977, Death of a Ladies' Man, Warner Bros. BS-3125, 1977; Various Positions, Columbia (CBS 26222), 1984 & 1985. Quote on chat with Dylan: Adrian Deevoy: 'Brief Encounter: Leonard Cohen', The Telegraph no. 41 Romford, UK, winter 1991, p.30 (possibly reprinted from Q magazine, nia); quote on accepting Juno from Wikipedia; quote re Dylan inspiring him: Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, 1986, Penguin edn. p.230; other quotes: 'Leonard Cohen Special', Docklands TV, Germany, 1997. Bob Dylan: 'Hallelujah', Montreal, 8 Jul 1988 & Hollywood, 4 Aug, 1988.

Stephen Scobie, Leonard Cohen, Vancouver: Douglas & McIntyre, 1978. Frank Davey, 'Leonard Cohen and Bob Dylan: Poetry and the Popular Song' Alphabet no.17, London, Ontario, Dec 1969. David Boucher, Dylan & Cohen: Poets of Rock and Roll, New York: Continuum, 2004.]

Collins, Judy [1939 -] Judith Marjorie Collins was born in Seattle, Washington, on May 1, 1939, studied classical piano from the age of five and at 13 played at a public performance of Mozart's Concerto for Two Pianos. She was equally in a hurry about marrying her childhood sweetheart, and had a son when she was 19. She began folksinging to try to support him.

When the Exodus club opened in Denver in 1959, Collins became the regular opening act (alternating with WALT CONLEY) for national-name folk headliners like Josh White, Jimmy Driftwood and Bob Gibson. Collins and Conley both appear on the local Sky Lark label's 1959 album Folk Song Festival at Exodus, her songs being 'House of the Rising Sun', 'Tell Old Bill' and 'Two Sisters'—all of which Bob Dylan picked up on and was playing early on: in the case of 'Two Sisters' he was recorded performing it in a Minneapolis apartment as early as May 1960.

Back in Denver, Judy Collins performed at that year's Exodus Festival too, duly appearing on the equally obscure album 1960 Folk Festival at the Exodus, on the Sight and Sound label, performing 'The Prickili Bush', 'Johnny Has Gone for a Soldier', 'Tim Evans', 'Boots and Stetsons and Sixguns' and 'This Land Is Your Land'. She became a popular performer throughout Colorado and then moved across to Chicago, where she played at the Gate of Horn.

Arriving in New York, Judy Collins became at least briefly a member of two groups with awful folk-revival period names, the Homesteaders and the Wanderin' Five. With the former she recorded the 1962 album Railroad Bill on Riverside (on which she is uncredited; other members seem to have been Ronnie Gilbert, Mike Settle and Walter Raim); with the latter she appears on the album Hootenanny at the Limelight in the Village, issued without identifying any of the group by the obscure Somerset label around 1963.

Perhaps she went uncredited on these dull excursions because she had already signed to Elektra Records, which had released her début album in 1961, Maid of Constant Sorrow, which as its title suggests, concentrated on traditional material. (It includes 'Wild Mountain Thyme' and 'Pretty Saro'.) She swiftly became the nearest thing to a JOAN BAEZ rival, with a voice less pure, more soulful and just as easy to recognise. It wouldn't be controversial to say that along with Baez and JONI MITCHELL, Collins was the third great female singer to emerge via folk in the 1960s. Though she was shy of writing her own material, she was quick to catch the winds blowing through the Village and early to broaden her repertoire to embrace the songs of new writers.

She recorded Dylan material in 1963, and was the first to record LEONARD COHEN's 'Suzanne', releasing the latter on her indomitable 1967 album In My Life, which also offered a calmly independent reading of Dylan's 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues' (called 'Tom Thumb's Blues' on the sleeve), Donovan's 'Sunny Goodge Street', Randy Newman's 'I Think It's Going to Rain Today' and tremendous, sinuously dramatic versions of Jacques Brel's 'La Colombe', the medley 'Marat/Sade' and the BRECHT & Weill masterpiece 'Pirate Jenny'—though she makes almost everything on the album sound like Brecht & Weill, aided and abetted by arranger Joshua Rifkin (who may have his merits but has less feel for down-home music than a dog, and hasn't a clue how to end a track, so that every one of them simply comes to a solemn concert-platform sort of a halt). Despite him it's a numinous album and for many was a crucial part of 1967's soundtrack—a useful corrective, even, to too much smudgy flower-power music.

Her follow-up later that year, Wildflowers (on which she first ventured a run of songs of her own, the best of which was 'Since You Asked'), could not match it, hampered as it was by over-the-top string arrangements and the comparative mediocrity of Collins' own compositions. Yet it contained early and beautiful versions of Joni Mitchell's 'Both Sides Now' and 'Michael from Mountains' and further covers of Leonard Cohen and Brel material, and her next album, Who Knows Where the Time Goes, which includes electric guitar by JAMES BURTON, was produced by Stephen Stills, with whom she was involved; hers were the 'Suite: Judy Blue Eyes' in the CROSBY, Stills & Nash song of that name. After that came Whales and Nightingales (1970) which, very much of its time, did indeed feature humpback whales 'singing', but also featured a very promptly seized-upon cover of Dylan's 'Time Passes Slowly', only released on New Morning that October.

By 1975 she had descended to Stephen Sondheim's wretchedly portentous 'Send in the Clowns', one of those items with the same capacity for cultural assault as 'My Way' or 'Feelings'.

Yet in the early 1960s she had been drawn to social activism and in 1964 was among those helping to register black voters in Mississippi. This interest in politics has, as with so many, shifted in more recent decades into a general willingness to do good works, and she is a UNICEF representative and a campaigner for suicide prevention (that son she had at 19 killed himself when he was 33 in 1992) and for the abolition of landmines. She deals with the struggle to recover from her son's suicide in a 2003 book, Sanity & Grace: A Journey of Suicide, Survival and Strength; in the 1980s she had battled to overcome her own alcoholism. In 1996 she married her longtime partner Louis Nelson, an industrial designer.

Judy Collins has also written a novel, Shameless (described by Publishers Weekly as a 'lackluster thriller set in the glamorous world of rock and roll'), and the autobiography Trust Your Heart; and as early as 1974 she produced and co-directed the Oscar-nominated documentary film Antonia: A Portrait of the Woman, a homage to the piano mentor she had been taught by when she was ten, the Dutch-born American conductor and pianist Antonia Brico.

Her career has only touched Bob Dylan's in that they were around together now and again down the years, starting in the unlikely setting of Colorado when both of them were teenagers (both also appeared in May 1961 at the Indian Neck Folk Festival in Branford, Connecticut), and she had often covered his material—and in that at least on one occasion, he built a song from one of hers.

Collins was almost certainly the conduit to Dylan of the song 'Anathea', which she was performing in 1963 and recorded (with musicians including Jim, later ROGER McGUINN) on Judy Collins No. 3, released in March 1964, and from which he created his wonderful 'Seven Curses', which Dylan first recorded as a Witmark song demo in May 1963. Collins credits 'Anathea' to Neil Roth and Lydia Wood, but it has strong traditional elements and a dramatic storyline, and many of these elements, and the same storyline, reverberate through 'Seven Curses', a Dylan song it is impossible to feel came to him out of nowhere and yet which is, on his recording, so quintessentially a display of his strengths as writer and as singer. Stories of corrupt judges can only be brought individually alive by narrative detail, and 'Seven Curses' is rich in it.

Judy Collins willingly stresses that Dylan, as man and artist, has been there for her through what seems to have been the near-permanent disarray of her own life. The sleevenotes to her 1993 album of Dylan covers (which harbours not only predictable 1960s choices but two Slow Train Coming songs, plus 'Sweetheart Like You' and 'Dark Eyes' from the 1980s), the repulsively titled Just Like a Woman: Judy Collins Sings Dylan, may be gushy but is sincere, telling and gives some interesting detail:

> 'Dear Bobby. This is a love letter to you, who called to me from the precipice, you with your wild hair and your thin bones and your silver-tipped black boots, a figure of my imagination, a fact of my life. When I was at the edge, when death was at my door with his raven look and his hour-glass—your words, like the point of a knife, cut to the bone of memory. You spoke to me of timelessness, of light, told me where I had been, helped me not to fear where I was going . . .
>
> 'You materialize in some city, we embrace, and you are always a gentleman, always kind. I remember that summer at Newport, boats bobbing out on the harbor, sun dancing on the water, crowds screaming, critics saying you were a traitor. All of us, singers, audience, loved you because you didn't care what the critics said, because they were fools, because we knew we were fools, too, children of an uncomfortable and unfathomable, disturbing age, an age of shattered dreams, and nightmares. You gave words to our journey, treaties to our wars of the heart and the head, and your music moved in our bones. . . . And I remember another summer in Woodstock . . . at ALBERT [GROSSMAN]'s house when I woke from dreams to hear your voice, sweet and haunting, singing a new, wonderful song. Deep in the basement behind a closed door you sang softly . . . and I climbed out of my high feather-pillowed bed and crept down the stairs to sit outside your door. When I knocked and asked you to sing the song again, you did. . . . it was "Mr. Tambourine Man." My life was in turmoil and your songs were solace.
>
> 'There was that first summer of '59. I was singing at the Gilded Garter, a bar in Central City, Colorado, three shows a night. . . . You were playing a honky-tonk mountain bar over in Cripple Creek, singing for miners and cowboys and summer people. I was barely nineteen, you were even younger.
>
> 'When I moved to New York I found you in a funky bar in the Village, a sloppy hat drawn over your forehead and the tops of your eyebrows, your elbows on the bar, a drink in front of you. On stage at Gerde's you bent over your guitar, muttering the lyrics of WOODY and CISCO [HOUSTON]. . . . VAN RONK and JACK ELLIOTT and Cisco showed up sometimes, and Joanie and

PAUL BUTTERFIELD. . . . We howled at the moon on Broadway, you sang the old blues and then you found your own voice, giving our fears and our triumphs faces and names. Somebody sent me a copy of "Blowin' in the Wind." I couldn't believe that rumpled guy, slumped in the shadows of Gerde's . . . could have written such a breathtaking song.

'I recorded "I'll Keep It With Mine," which you said you wrote for me and the years went by. . . . And then I lost the treasure, almost lost my mind. It is unbearable sometimes, what happens in life, and I needed comfort. I found you on the journey again. . . . I have a fantasy that back in Minnesota you had a high tenor voice as a child. Right behind the raspiness in your singing there is a sweetness that never got lost, the tone always true to our hearts and memories. As I sang these songs I looked for you. I found you. And I found me.'

Her latest book is Morning, Noon, and Night: Living the Creative Life, which takes the feel-good, self-improving theme much too far, and declares this sort of thing: 'Creativity is a voice that calls us from dreams, that peeks out the corners of our eyes when we think no one is looking.' Oh dear. A far more appealing voice calls for the Judy Collins of the 1960s instead.

[Judy Collins: 3 tracks on Folk Song Festival at Exodus, Sky Lark SK-1002 (mono), US, c.1959; 5 tracks on 1960 Folk Festival at the Exodus, Sight and Sound SS-1002 (mono), US, c.1960; Maid of Constant Sorrow, Elektra EKL-209 (mono) & EKS-7209, US, 1961; Judy Collins No. 3, Elektra EKS 7243, US, 1964; In My Life, Elektra EKS-7320, US, 1967; Wildflowers, Elektra EKS-74012, US, 1967; Who Knows Where the Time Goes, Elektra EKS-74033, US, 1968; Whales and Nightingales, Elektra EKS-75010, US, 1970; Just Like a Woman: Judy Collins Sings Dylan, Geffen 2064 24612 2, US, 1993. The Homesteaders: Railroad Bill, Riverside RM 7537 (mono) & RS 97537, US, c.1962. The Wanderin' Five: Hootenanny at the Limelight in the Village, Somerset SF-19900, US, c.1963. Antonia: A Portrait of the Woman, dir. Jill Godmilow & Judy Collins; Direct Cinema / Rocky Mountain, US, 1974. Judy Collins, Trust Your Heart: An Autobiography, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987; Shameless, nia, US reprint 1995; Sanity & Grace: A Journey of Suicide, Survival and Strength, New York: Putnam, 2003; Morning, Noon, and Night: Living the Creative Life, New York: Tarcher, 2005.

Some details re 'Anathea' c/o the discussion of it seen online 14 Jan 2006 at Manfred Helfert's website page www.bobdylanroots.com/anathe.html; other sources include T. Fennel Crenshaw's Collins interview for Empire, seen online 14 Jan 2006 at www.empirezine.com/lyrics/4a.htm, and the invaluable detailed discography by Richard L. Hess at www.richardhess.com/judy/index2.htm.]

'Columbus Stockade Blues' [1960] Written by Tom Darby and Jimmie Tarlton, and first recorded by them (as Darby & Tarlton) in 1927, at their second recording session, this song is one of the 27 numbers Dylan sings on the very early—May 1960—home-recording made at the apartment of one Karen Wallace in St. Paul, Minnesota.

The relevant Columbus is in Georgia, not Ohio—indeed an alternative title for the song is 'Georgia Stockade' (as for instance by the Kingston Trio). The stockade itself, built in the 1850s, comprised two brick buildings: a jail and police HQ, in use until 1906 and listed on the US National Register of Historic Places in 1980. Columbus, GA, was the birthplace of Tom Darby, in 1884. Tarlton (real name Johnny James Rimbert) was born in Chesterfield County, South Carolina, on May 8, 1892.

Darby and Tarlton were one of the great, crucial, traditional country acts of the mid-1920s to mid-1930s, Darby playing rhythm guitar and singing lead, Tarlton lead guitar and harmony vocals (including yodeling). Tarlton is recognised as having brought the steel guitar into country music. Together they recorded from 1927 to 1933, mostly for for Columbia and Victor, enjoying huge success. Their 'Columbus Stockade Blues', released on a 78rpm record coupled with 'Birmingham Jail', from the same session, was their biggest, career-launching hit. It sold over 200,000 copies, one of Columbia's biggest selling records. Unhappily, however, they had accepted a $75 flat fee instead of royalties.

The first track they ever recorded, 'Down in Florida on a Hog', is mentioned by Dylan in Chronicles Volume One as a record heard at somebody's father's house in St. Paul [probably in 1959]: 'I always thought "A-wop-bop-a-loo-lop [sic] a-lop-bamboo [sic]" had said it all until I heard Darby and Tarlton doing "Way Down in Florida on a Hog [sic]." Darby and Tarlton, too, were out of this world.'

Tom Darby also recorded three short sessions with Jesse Pitts as the Georgia Wildcats in 1931, though four of their six tracks remained unissued; Jimmie Tarlton cut thirteen sides under his own name in 1930 and 1932. Both gave up their music careers in 1935, but were 'rediscovered' during the folk revival at the beginning of the 1960s. Only Tarlton recorded again, though both gave live performances, separately and together. Tom Darby died in 1971, Jimmie Tarlton in 1979.

ELVIS PRESLEY sings a few lines of 'Columbus Stockade Blues' in 1973 at the start of take 4 of a recording of 'Promised Land', issued 25 years afterwards.

[Darby & Tarlton: 'Columbus Stockade Blues', Atlanta, GA, 10 Nov 1927. Bob Dylan: 'Columbus Stockade Blues', St. Paul, MN, May 1960; Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.241. Elvis Presley: 'Promised Land', 15 Dec 1973, Rhythm and Country: Essential Elvis Vol. 5, RCA 07863676722, NY, 1998. The Kingston Trio: 'Georgia Stockade', nia, Back in Town, Capitol T/ST-2061, NY, nia.]

'Congratulations' A song Dylan composed, and on which he takes lead vocals, on the 1988 album The Traveling Wilburys Volume 1, though all songs are credited to the group. Not to be confused with the earlier song 'Congratulations', which was, as Andrew O'Hagan put it, 'sung by Cliff Richard to remind people that happiness is a feeling constantly under threat from the songs that celebrate it.'

['Congratulations', Traveling Wilburys Volume 1, LA, 7–16 May, 1988; Wilbury / Warner Brothers 9 25796-2, USA, 18 Oct 1988. Andrew O'Hagan, 'Four Funerals and a Wedding', London Review of Books, Vol.27, no.9, 5 May 2005.]

Conley, Walt [1929 - 2003] Walter Conley was born in Denver, Colorado, on May 20, 1929 but raised by adoptive parents 158 miles away in Scottsbluff, Nebraska (a depressingly long way from anywhere). He and his mother returned to Denver after his father's death, he won a football scholarship to junior college—where, as throughout his life, he was almost the only black person in the community—and worked summers on a Taos, New Mexico, dude ranch. In Taos he met the Weavers, and PETE SEEGER allegedly gave him a guitar and set him on the road to folk music.

After Korean War navy service and more college, he slid into a folk career, beginning with calypsos when HARRY BELAFONTE was in vogue, and singing in a deep, adequate baritone. When the Exodus club opened in Denver in 1959, he became the regular opening act (alternating with JUDY COLLINS) for national-name folk headliners like Josh White, Jimmy Driftwood and Bob Gibson. Conley and Collins both appear on the local Sky Lark label's 1959 album Folk Song Festival at Exodus. Conley's tracks, which open the LP, are: '900 Miles', 'Worried Man Blues', 'Passing Through' and 'John Henry'.

In the summer of 1959 or 1960, Dylan arrived to try his luck, hustle around and hang out. Walt Conley may or may not have been a performer whose repertoire offered Dylan material he wanted—Conley seems to have been playing whatever was popular, but is unlikely to have been any more up-to-date or wide-ranging than Dylan's musician friends back in Dinkytown, but ROBERT SHELTON reports that it was from Conley that Dylan picked up an anti-KKK song, 'The Klan'. When Dylan got back to Minneapolis, he let his friend HARVEY ABRAMS think it was his own.

What Dylan certainly got from Walt Conley was recorded repertoire and hospitality: Walt let him stay at his house on East 17th Avenue near Williams Street. Dylan repaid him by stealing a pile of his records. 'Yeah,' Dylan told Shelton, 'I was run out of Denver for robbing a cat's house.' Conley's friend Bob Turner told the Rocky Mountain News years later: 'I think Walt felt that when Dylan got big, he could have at least returned a few.'

In the early 1970s Conley moved to Hollywood and earned small rôles in TV hit series (The Rockford Files', 'The Six Million Dollar Man'), while doing voice-overs for ads and performing in Pasadena. He returned to Denver in 1983, opened his own club and booked in names like DAVE VAN RONK. In the 1990s, still performing himself, he formed an Irish folk band, Conley & Company, that proved highly popular. 'If U2 can sing American blues,' he said, 'I sure as hell can sing Irish folk songs!'

The 'founding father of the Denver folk scene' died in Denver aged 74 on November 16, 2003.

[Information in part from http://waltconley.freeservers.com, seen online 7 Oct 2005, and Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, Penguin edn. pp.64 & (re Harvey Abrams) 68. Bob Turner quoted from Conley's obituary, Rocky Mountain News, Denver, CO, 19 Nov 2003. Conley & others: Folk Song Festival at Exodus, 1959, Sky Lark SK-1002 (mono), Denver, 1959.]

Cooke, Sam [1931 - 1964] Sam Cook was born January 22, 1931 in Clarksdale, Mississippi, but grew up in Chicago, one of eight children of a Baptist preacher; they formed the Singing Children when he was nine. Later he moved over to the Highway QCs and then replaced R.K. Harris as lead tenor of the Soul Stirrers. With this innovative and contemporary gospel group he began recording in 1951 (though his singing at this point is often overrated: his version of THOMAS DORSEY's great song 'Peace in the Valley', pallid and unmemorable, cannot compare with those by ELVIS PRESLEY and LITTLE RICHARD).

He 'went secular' in 1957, becoming Sam Cooke and starting a long and splendid run of hits, almost all his own compositions, many of which have been covered time and again by artists of the stature of VAN MORRISON. He was a consummate vocalist and a bright, lithe, sexy young man, whose TV appearances helped make black sexuality visible to young white America. He may have learnt his trade in gospel but church-going modesty was not his style.

Sam Cooke was very popular but never popular enough. Most of his work is of undimmed excellence: great records by a terrific songwriter and a masterful soul singer of panache, integrity and expressive generosity. In 1960–63 he was in his prime, not least in live performance (try One Night Stand: Sam Cooke Live at the Harlem Square Club, 1963).

By the end of 1963, Cooke had notched up 18 top 30 hits since 1957; but pop success was not enough. Earlier that year he had heard Bob Dylan's 'Blowin' in the Wind' and is reported to have felt shaken that it had been 'a white boy' who had written so potent a song—a song that elo-quently, if implicitly, addressed the urgent issues of political struggle that so deeply involved his own race. He began performing the Dylan song himself (a version is captured on the album Live at the Copacabana, 1964), but his more profound response was to write the moving, thoughtful and dignified 'A Change Is Gonna Come' (originally called 'My Brother') which he recorded on January 30, 1964.

Despite the quality of the song and Cooke's recording of it, it was slipped out as an album track (on Ain't That Good News) and its release as a single was long delayed. On December 11, 1964, Cooke died after being shot in unclear circumstances in an LA motel. He was 33 years old. Two weeks later, and with one verse edited out, 'A Change Is Gonna Come' was released . . . as the B-side of 'Shake'.

Dylan mentions the song in Chronicles Volume One; the context is complex but this is what he writes: 'Sometimes you know things have to change, are going to change, but you can only feel it—like in that song of Sam Cooke's, "Change Is Gonna Come" . . .' And in an interview in 2001, he reveals an awareness of Cooke's early gospel group the Highway QCs, recalling that when he was '12 years old, listening to the radio . . . at midnight the gospel stuff would start, and so I got . . . to be acquainted with the Swan Silvertones and the Dixie Hummingbirds and, you know, Highway QCs . . .'

Dylan cut a version of Cooke's 'Cupid' with GEORGE HARRISON in a New York City studio in May 1970 (which would have been effective had Dylan remembered more than a handful of the words) and attempted Cooke's hit 'Chain Gang' at March and April 1987 studio sessions for the Down in the Groove album. (These remain uncirculated.)

'A Change Is Gonna Come' was revisited by THE BAND on their Moondog Matinee album of oldies in the 1970s, and on Dylan's 1978 world tour, on which various of his back-up singers were given solo spots (with Dylan and the band playing behind them). CAROLYN DENNIS sang 'A Change Is Gonna Come' in Hitler's old Zeppelinfeld stadium at Nuremberg that July 1 and again at Blackbushe Aerodrome in England two weeks later.

Matching song to venue with his usual quiet shrewdness, Dylan finally performed a respectful version of 'A Change Is Gonna Come' himself live at the home of early-60s R&B and black aspiration, the Apollo Theater in Harlem, NYC, on March 28, 2004, 40 years after the creation of the song for which his own work had been a catalyst.

In 2004, Rolling Stone magazine asked 172 prominent music-industry figures, including artists such as JONI MITCHELL, to vote for the 500 Greatest Songs of All Time. Sam Cooke's 'Change Is Gonna Come' came in at no.12—two places higher than 'Blowin' in the Wind'.

Dylan, however, was at no.1 with 'Like a Rolling Stone'.

[The Soul Stirrers: 'Peace in the Valley', nia, CD-reissued on Sam Cooke: My Gospel Roots, Xtra 26471, UK, 2005. Sam Cooke: One Night Stand: Sam Cooke Live at the Harlem Square Club, 1963, NY, 12–13 Jan 1963, RCA PL85181, Rome, 1985; 'Blowin' in the Wind', NY, 7–8 Jul 1964, Live at the Copacabana, Victor LPM /LSP-2970, NY, 1964; 'A Change Is Gonna Come', 30 Jan 1964, RCA 8486, NY, 1964. Bob Dylan: 'A Change Is Gonna Come', NY, 28 Mar 2004, broadcast on NBC-TV's program 'Apollo at 70: A Hot Night in Harlem', NY, 19 Jun 2004; Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.61; interview for WTTW-TV, Chicago, 27 Oct 2001. The Band: 'A Change Is Gonna Come', Bearsville, NY, Mar–Jun 1973, Moondog Matinee, Capitol SW-11214, 1973. Bob Dylan, Rolling Stone poll seen online 7 Aug 2005 at www.rollingstone.com/rs500moretext.]

Coolidge, Rita [1944 -] Rita Coolidge was born on May 1, 1944 (some sources claim 1945) in Lafayette, just outside Nashville, Tennessee, part Cherokee but one of four children of a Baptist minister and schoolteacher. She and sisters Priscilla and Linda formed singing group the Coolidge Sisters, a local success, after which Rita took an art degree at Florida State University. While a student she sang on advertising jingles and made her first single, 'Turn Around and Love You', a regional hit on the West Coast, which brought her to the attention of the Mad Dogs & Englishmen stars Joe Cocker and LEON RUSSELL. (This 40-strong touring commune or circus was Cocker's 1970 US tour, and caught him in his prime.) Her beauty brought her to people's attention while she was standing on stages as a back-up singer for them on the tour; she thus appears in the important concert film of the same name in 1971 (reissued in wide screen, 1995), though her turgid solo number, 'Superstar', was cut from the original film release for contractual reasons. Leon Russell wrote the hit song 'Delta Lady' about her, and she was supposedly Stephen Stills' muse for three: 'Cherokee', 'The Raven' and a song called 'Sugar Babe'.

In November 1970 she met KRIS KRISTOFFERSON, whom she married on August 19, 1973; the same year she appeared in the film Mad Dogs & Englishmen she also appeared, uncredited, as a singer in Vanishing Point. In 1971 she signed a new solo deal with A&M records and made a number of indifferent-selling albums. Her first film as an actor was SAM PECKINPAH's Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid, in which she starred with Kristofferson, James Coburn and Bob Dylan. The only time she appears on the soundtrack album with Dylan is on 'Billy 4', the one issued track recorded in Mexico. It was recorded (along with much unreleased but circulated material) in Mexico City on January 20, 1973 and Coolidge and Kristofferson are backing singers.

After this project, she continued to pursue her fading solo career but also made duet albums with Kristofferson, notably From the Bottle to the Bottom in 1974 and Lover Please in 1976, the year she also appeared as herself in the Streisand-Kristofferson vehicle A Star Is Born. Coolidge was five months pregnant when, in May 1977, her baby suddenly died; she responded by concentrating on a new album, Anytime . . . Anywhere, which included a slowed-down re-make of Jackie Wilson's old hit 'Higher and Higher' that became her first and only platinum hit, after which came other inexplicable singles successes, all from the Karen Carpenter school of musical excitement, as with the Boz Scaggs song 'We're All Alone' and CAROLE BAYER SAGER's 'I'd Rather Leave While I'm in Love'. She and Kristofferson divorced in 1980.

Coolidge provided the voice of Melissa Raccoon in the TV hits 'The Christmas Raccoons' (1980) and 'The Raccoons on Ice' (1981) but after Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid her first movie acting rôle was over a quarter of a century later, in a comedy with a Native American setting, Christmas in the Clouds, a hit at film festivals in 2001.

Native American culture had increasingly interested Ms. Coolidge and in 1994 she and her sister Priscilla, plus Priscilla's daughter Laura Satterfield, were harmony singers on the Turner TV special 'The Native Americans'; on the soundtrack album Music for the Native Americans, by ROBBIE ROBERTSON & the Red Road Ensemble, they were featured upfront on 'The Cherokee Morning Song', using the group name Coolidge. This prompted them to record together more actively in their own right, and under the group name Walela (Cherokee for hummingbird) they have since recorded a number of CDs, starting with a self-titled album that includes a fine 'Amazing Grace' sung in the Cherokee language. Walela appeared, representing the US and the Cherokee Nation, at the opening ceremony for the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City. A remastered 2-CD version of Delta Lady: The Rita Coolidge Anthology includes most of her hits (described very reasonably by Village Voice critic Robert Christgau as 'sultry cornpone' and less reasonably as 'Andy Williams with cleavage') and was released in 2004.

[Rita Coolidge: 'Turn Around and Love You', Pepper 443, US, 1969; Anytime . . . Anywhere, US, 1977; Delta Lady: The Rita Coolidge Anthology CD reissue, Hip-O, US, 2004. Rita Coolidge & Kris Kristofferson: From the Bottle to the Bottom, US, 1974; Lover Please, US, 1976. Coolidge: 'The Cherokee Morning Song' & other harmony vocals on Robbie Robertson's Music for the Native Americans, Capitol 28295, US, 1994. Walela: nia on original releases; all CDs reissued Triloka, US, 2002. Mad Dogs & Englishmen, dir. Robert Abel & Pierre Adidge; A&M Films / Creative Assocs., US, 1971. Christmas in the Clouds, dir. & written Kate Montgomery; Random Ventures / Stockbridge, US, 2001.]

Cooper, Ray [1942 -] Raymond Cooper was born on August 19, 1942 in Watford, Hertfordshire, southern England, and came to sudden visibility as a percussionist extraordinaire when he was part of ELTON JOHN's touring band starting at the beginning of the 1970s. On stage he brought dramatically to the forefront, and with good humoured panache, the previously lowly rôle of percussion player (always regarded as an optional extra person tinkling and swooshing away irrelevantly at the back). Thin as a whippet, balding and intense, his playing was ferocious and his theatrical sense assured.

In the same decade he also managed to play in a band called Alphalpha and in one of Britain's cheeriest and worst artificially constructed bands, the Wombles (designed to put music to a children's TV series about litter-collecting creatures in ill-fitting nylon-rug costumes, but which somehow escaped into the middle of the road and enjoyed enormous success with no less than six albums and many singles), while also bringing his session playing skills to albums by America, Harry Nilsson, Joan Armatrading, Carly Simon, Rick Wakeman, Donovan, THE ROLLING STONES, GEORGE HARRISON, the Who, Herbie Flowers, Elton John, Phil Manzanera, Bryan Ferry, Gallagher & Lyle, PAUL McCARTNEY & Wings, Colin Blunstone, Art Garfunkel and more besides.

After JOHN LENNON's death, the 17-year-old Julian Lennon dropped out of school and soon afterwards moved to London, where he stayed with Ray Cooper for a recuperative six months. In the 1980s Cooper continued to flourish, playing on sessions for several of the above all over again, plus Ian Dury, RINGO STARR, Pink Floyd, ERIC CLAPTON, INXS, MICK JAGGER, Ravi Shankar and others. He also worked in films, co-producing with George Harrison a number of George's Handmade films, including Terry Gilliam movies like Brazil (1985) and The Adventures of Baron Munchausen (1988) as well as Neil Jordan's stylish British thriller Mona Lisa (1986). Cooper also took small acting rôles (a technician in Brazil, for example) and composing music scores for other films, including, more recently, Fear & Loathing in Las Vegas in 1998. In 1992 he was very visible on Eric Clapton's MTV Unplugged.

Ray Cooper's work has bumped into Bob Dylan's several times. First, from May 7–16, 1988, he played percussion on all the tracks for The Traveling Wilburys Volume 1 (except 'Handle with Care', recorded in April and without him) at DAVE STEWART's home studio in Los Angeles. In April 1990 in Bel Air, Cooper was on all the sessions for Traveling Wilburys Volume 3, including for the recording of the single of 'Runaway' and the Romanian orphan appeal fundraiser 'Nobody's Child'. Eighteen months later he was there in Seville, Spain, playing behind Dylan and the rest of the world on 'All Along the Watchtower' and 'I Can't Turn You Loose' at the October 17, 1991 concert that was part of the Guitar Legends Festival. Finally, on May 20–22, 1994, there he was in Nara, Japan, playing alongside the Tokyo New Philharmonic Orchestra, drummer JIM KELTNER and others at the Todaiji Temple Great Music Experience extravaganza, all backing Bob Dylan as he delivered, in these unusual circumstances, versions of 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall', 'I Shall Be Released', 'Ring Them Bells' and a second, ensemble 'I Shall Be Released' each night. Thus Cooper also appears on the Dylan single release of 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall', recorded live on the last night of the three.

Coopers & Lybrand In the interview material Dylan provided for the retrospective Biograph box set in 1985, he rails against artists letting their work get used for adverts; he's rightly proud of having not joined in; and he's conscious of how perilous it is.

Subequently he has joined in—joined in the CO-OPTION OF REAL MUSIC BY ADVERTISING and the turning of his art into a tool for selling other things. On US television in the first week of January 1994, there appeared minute-long commercials for the mega-accountancy consulting agency Coopers & Lybrand, using a Richie Havens recording of 'The Times They Are a-Changin''.

If this were not shameful in itself, the fact is that Coopers & Lybrand was a deeply unsavory organisation that anyone with a serviceable moral radar would have known to avoid. They were investigated in Britain in the case of their auditing of the notorious swindler Robert Maxwell's business affairs. They were also, to quote British MP Frank Field, 'auditors of all the development companies by which the funds were lost' by the Church Commissioners, the money-handling division of the Church of England—and were then appointed to carry out the technical side of the report commissioned to investigate those losses! Field told the then Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. George Carey, when Carey appeared before the House of Commons Social Services Select Committee in May 1994 that 'Some of us felt that Coopers & Lybrand should be investigated, not just the Commissioners.'

The Maxwell-related investigation began in 1993; in 1994 Coopers & Lybrand attempted, unsuccessfully, to have this investigation halted, and in February 1999, as a result of the investigation, it was announced that the company and four of its senior employees were to be fined a record amount: with costs, nearly £3.5 million (currently $6 million). The fine, detailed in a long-awaited report from the tribunal of the Accountants Joint Disciplinary Scheme, was accompanied by severe criticism of the firm.

So Dylan leases out a song to them: a song only heeded in the first place because of its political integrity, and only sought by the advertising industry for the kudos of this special credibility. Two years later, in October 1996, 'The Times They Are a-Changin'' was back on TV as a jingle, this time sung by a choir of children promoting the Bank of Montreal. PETE SEEGER may be an infinitely lesser talent than Bob Dylan, but his integrity is in better shape.

In 1998 Coopers & Lybrand completed a global merger with the similar firm Price Waterhouse, becoming PricewaterhouseCoopers. On July 30, 2002, PricewaterhouseCoopers Consulting was sold to IBM.

[Frank Field MP quoted from Private Eye no.847, London, 3 Jun 1994.]

co-option of real music by advertising, the By the mid-1980s rock'n'roll, once the music of the youthfully alive, had become overblown and encrusted with its own corruption; what was underground and radical had become corporate mega-product. Rock music was no more culturally separate from Reaganism than the Pentagon.

The music had become corporate rock in two senses: the music industry itself had become such big business that boardroom policy dictated who got signed and who got marketed; and the music itself had been gobbled up by mainstream commerce. Where once the music had been living outside the law and being honest—an outlaw on the opposite side from TV and musicals and soap operas and ads—by 1985 the co-option of real music by advertising and the whole squashy cottonwool entertainment mainstream had been achieved. In the 1950s, rock'n'roll had been shocking: condemned from the pulpit and thrillingly rebellious; in the late 1960s, rock was underground and radical: it was going to change the world and abolish the suits. By 1985 the empire had struck back. It owned the music and threw it back in people's faces.

In 1993 at a cultural studies conference Philip Tagg delivered this tirade about where rock had gone:

> 'What sort of socialisation strategy is encoded in . . . rock? It seems to me that we are hearing individuals who beat the fascinating but overbearing system by screaming louder than it, by roaring or chain-sawing their way through it. . . . Hence the heavy-metal audience's arm raised in a collective V-sign as the singer or lead guitarist rides away into another heroic urban sunset. Unfortunately, the emancipatory potential of this . . . strategy can degenerate into the vulgar entrepreneurial egoism of the Thatcher and Reagan era and into its musical equivalent—hyper-melodic pomp and its elevation to a hegemonic position . . . we have witnessed the obvious promotion of the corporeal from Youth Subcultural Division Four to the premier league of capitalist culture. Young US-Americans are not recruited into the marines by Sousa marches but by Van Halen . . . Vauxhalls [cars] are sold to the tune of "Layla", Fords to the ex-Queen guitarist Brian May's "Driven By You" . . .'

With Empire Burlesque Bob Dylan seemed to join this party. The album's writing, as well as its sound, seemed saturated in the shallow histrionics of this corporate rock. Yet that same year, in the interview within the Biograph box set, Dylan still seemed adamant about not caving in directly like the Van Halens and Brian Mays:

> 'Rock'n'roll, I don't know, rhythm and blues or whatever, I think it's gone. In its pure form. There are some guys true to it but it's so hard . . . everything is against it. I'd like to see CHARLIE SEXTON become a big star, but the whole machine would have to break down right now before that could happen . . . stock-broker rock, it's now a highly visible enterprise, big establishment thing. You know things go better with Coke because Aretha Franklin told you so and Maxwell House Coffee must be OK because RAY CHARLES is singing about it. Everybody's singing about ketchup or headache medicine or something. In the beginning it wasn't anything like that, had nothing to do with pantyhose and perfume and barbecue sauce . . . you were eligible to get busted for playing it. It's like Lyndon Johnson saying "we shall overcome" to a nation wide audience, ridiculous . . . there's an old saying, "If you want to defeat your enemy, sing his song" . . .'

Within a decade Dylan started selling his own music to TV ads (see Coopers & Lybrand). The year after that he was grubbing around on much lower levels of gratuitous commerce. On the back of the tickets for his Edinburgh concert of April 5, 1995 was a 'Special Offer' for McChicken Sandwiches™ . . .

How can it have come to this?—Bob Dylan promoting battery chickens. Don't say it's nothing to do with him. Would that stance suffice if the ad was from the British Nazi Party? All it takes is a simple clause in his contract with the promoter prohibiting these sordid commercial tie-ins.

In 1993, Dylan also discarded his life-long eschewal of political endorsement—a fastidiousness the young Bob Dylan had had the sense to maintain without a moment's hesitation—and threw one of his silliest hats into the ring to appear at the inaugural concert for President Clinton, singing so risibly incomprehensible a version of his magnificent 'Chimes of Freedom' that the whole First Family was smirking and fidgeting through it while the oleaginous Tony Bennett waited in the wings unable to believe his luck.

In February 1996, Dylan and his band were hired to give a private concert in Phoenix, Arizona, for 250 senior staff of something called Nomura Securities International. It was to be the first of several such demeaning occasions. The following September, looking about as comfortable as he should have done, Dylan performed three songs for Pope John Paul II: one of the most pro-actively right-wing popes of recent decades.

The 'pantyhose' soon followed. In 2004, an exclusive 9-track compilation CD of Dylan's work was sold at lingerie retailer Victoria's Secret—a division of Limited Brands Inc.—and that April Dylan himself appeared in their television ads. The CD, called Lovesick, included a remix of the track 'Love Sick' unavailable elsewhere (slightly longer, and with a clearer sound than the Time Out of Mind version), and its artwork offered three previously unpublished Dylan photos. It could be purchased for $10, but only with any Victoria's Secret item.

The year after, Dylan became the latest musician to sign up with the Starbucks Corporation in an exclusive CD deal. If, within the first 18 months of its release, you wanted to buy Live at the Gaslight 1962, with its previously unreleased tracks (long bootlegged but never circulated in this quality before), you had to go to the coffee shop equivalent of Burger King to buy it.

Dylan himself talks in the Biograph interview about how 'Sometimes you feel you're walking around in that movie Invasion of the Bodysnatchers and you wonder if it's got you yet, if you're still one of the few or are you "them" now.'

Well, yes.

[Bob Dylan: 'Chimes of Freedom', America's Reunion on the Mall, Lincoln Memorial, Washington, D.C., 17 Jan 1993; Namura Securities International private performance, Biltmore Hotel, Phoenix, 2 Feb 1996. Performance for Pope John Paul II at the World Eucharistic Congress, Bologna, Italy, 27 Sep 1997; Lovesick, Sony A72812, US, 2004; Live at the Gaslight 1962, NY, Oct 1962, Columbia/Legacy A 96016, US (COL 82876728622, Belgium), 2005.

Philip Tagg, 'From Refrain to Rave: The Decline of Figure and the Rise of Ground', paper delivered at the Convegno sulle culture del rock, Istituto Gramsci/La Repubblica, Bologna, Italy, May 1993.]

'Copper Kettle' 'Copper Kettle', of which Dylan released an odd but effectively atmospheric version on Self Portrait, is a traditional southern mountain song, much favoured around Greenwich Village in Dylan's time there. It is on JOAN BAEZ's third album, Joan Baez in Concert, and was published in the same issue of Sing Out! as 'Little Sadie' in 1964.

Dylan's recording, as with all the music he touches on Self Portrait, brings back to life the spirit of the age that the song is all about, and does it immeasurably better than those purists to whom his version is anathema. Dylan's has violins and women on it (and features the latter in a way that recalls the use of the back-up singers on the 1950s hit 'The Three Bells' by the Browns); but for an inspired example of his own unique expressiveness, hear the way his own voice enacts the sound of rotten wood snapping as he lands on 'rotten' in the line 'Don't use no green or rotten wood'.

Dylan has never performed this fine song in concert.

[Bob Dylan: 'Copper Kettle', NY, 3 Mar (+ overdubs without Dylan, 12, 17 & 30 Mar) 1970. Joan Baez in Concert, Vanguard VRS-9112, NY, 1962, CD-reissued Vanguard VDM 79112-2, NY & London, 1996. Sing Out! Vol.14, no.6, NY, Jan 1964. (The same magazine's booklet Reprints from Sing Out! Volume 9, NY, 1966, also includes 'Copper Kettle' & 'Little Sadie', along with 'It Hurts Me Too'—here titled 'When Things Go Wrong with You'—and 'Belle Isle'.) The Browns: 'The Three Bells', nia, RCA Victor 20-7555, NY (RCA 1140, London), 1959.]

Corcoran, Neil [1948 -] Cornelius David Corcoran was born in Cork, Ireland, on September 23, 1948. He first took an interest in Dylan's work in 1964. An academic at the University of St. Andrews, Scotland, he has published many books on modern literature including critical works on David Jones, Seamus Heaney and Elizabeth Bowen. His writing on Dylan includes 'Going Barefoot: Thinking About Bob Dylan's Lyrics', published in The Telegraph in 1987 (see 'Tangled up in Blue') and he was editor of the rather poorly received book of essays Do You Mr. Jones?: Bob Dylan with the Poets and Professors, published in 2002, which includes his preface, an introduction to the book called 'Writing Aloud' and one essay, 'Death's Honesty'.

Neil Corcoran's real contribution to the Dylan world was to persuade the University of St. Andrews to award Bob an honorary doctorate in 2004, and to persuade Bob to accept it: the first such acceptance since Princeton in 1970.

The speech Corcoran gave at the ceremony, on the afternoon of Wednesday, June 23, 2004, was at once scrupulous and heartfelt, efficiently compressed yet warmly eloquent, and full of freshly specific ways to praise familiar virtues. He said this:

> 'Chancellor, it's my privilege to present Bob Dylan for the Degree of Doctor of Music, honoris causa.
>
> 'In one of his first concerts in New York in the 1960s Bob Dylan said that he'd recently been asked to contribute to a book about Woody Guthrie, the great folksinger, songwriter and political activist. He'd been asked to say 'What does Woody Guthrie mean to you in 25 words?', and Bob Dylan said, 'I couldn't do it'. So instead he read 'Last Thoughts on Woody Guthrie', a tender poem about Guthrie and the spirit of American idealism. I feel similarly incapable when I'm asked to say what Bob Dylan means to me in a few minutes. In fact, what I'm here to say isn't really what he means to me, but what he means to the University of St Andrews that we should have offered him the honour of a doctoral degree. It goes without saying that his acceptance of our invitation deeply honours us, and I really can't say what a great privilege and pleasure his presence here is today.
>
> 'Bob Dylan was born Robert Allen Zimmerman in Duluth, Minnesota, in 1941 and grew up in Hibbing, on the Canadian border. He briefly attended the University of Minnesota, and then made what's become an almost mythical trip to New York to visit the dying Woody Guthrie, and to begin the career, which he continues still—writing, singing, recording and performing his songs. Performing is what he'll be doing once more tonight; and not the least of Bob Dylan's claims on our attention is his mercurial, devoted and exceptional commitment to the constant renewal of his work that performance involves. It's as true now as it ever was that "no one sings Dylan like Dylan".
>
> 'Bob Dylan's life as writer and singer has the aspect of vocation, of calling, and his is an art of the most venturesome risk and the most patient endurance. He's spent a lifetime applying himself to such long-sanctioned forms of art as folk, blues, country and rock music. And, partly by transfusing them with various kinds of poetic art, he's reinvented them so radically that he's moved everything on to a place it had never expected to go and left the deepest imprint on human consciousness. Many members of my generation can't separate a sense of our own identity from his music and lyrics. He's been for us an extension of consciousness—a way of growing up, and a way of growing more alive. And his work acts like that for succeeding generations too—witness the eager younger people who attend his concerts, which still sell out as soon as they're advertised. Bob Dylan possesses, in several senses of the phrase, staying power. He keeps on keeping on.
>
> 'His magnificent songs will last as long as song itself does. There are the early songs of political engagement, songs like "The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll", songs inseparable from the history of the American civil rights movement. There are the revolutionary songs of the mid-1960s, songs that seem to well up out of nowhere, an electric nowhere of American turbulence, songs like "Subterranean Homesick Blues" and "Mr. Tambourine Man", "Desolation Row" and "Like a Rolling Stone"—songs that made their time as much as it made them. And then there are, always, the love songs—songs of longing and desire, of hope and hopelessness, songs like "Boots of Spanish Leather" and "Lay, Lady, Lay", "Tangled up in Blue" and "Lovesick"—songs that make Bob Dylan one of the great writers of the drama of human relationship.
>
> 'And there are so many other songs and other kinds of song: devotional songs like "Precious Angel" and "I Believe in You", and poignant songs of older age such as "Not Dark Yet", songs of resilience, songs of what it means to have come through. Truly, there is God's plenty in Bob Dylan's work; and something FRANZ KAFKA said about Charles Dickens seems to apply to him too—"his vast, instinctive prodigality": a kind of volatile superplus of creative energy and momentum. Bob Dylan's work has been one of the places where the English language has extended itself in our time.
>
> '"What are your songs about?" Bob Dylan was once asked. "Oh," he said, "some of them are about three minutes, some of them are about five minutes, and some of them, believe it or not, are about eleven minutes". And songs are about time, about passing the time and filling the time, and doing these things well. Bob Dylan has passed our time very well.

'Our graduand has been given numerous awards, including France's highest cultural accolade, when he was made a Commander of the Order of Arts and Letters in 1990, and a Hollywood Oscar for his song "Things Have Changed" in 2001. But he's accepted only one honorary degree—from Princeton in 1970. It seems appropriate that his second such degree should come from Scotland's oldest university, since Scottish border ballads and folksongs have been the inspiration for some of his melodies, and his great song "Highlands" is an elaborate riff, or descant, on Robert Burns.

'Chancellor, in recognition of his incomparable contribution to musical and literary culture, I invite you to confer on Bob Dylan the Degree of Doctor of Music, honoris causa.'

[Neil Corcoran, 'Going Barefoot: Thinking About Bob Dylan's Lyrics', The Telegraph no.27, Romford, UK, summer 1987. Do You Mr. Jones?: Bob Dylan with the Poets and Professors, ed. Neil Corcoran, London: Chatto & Windus, 2002.]

Cordwell, John [1944 - 2001] See 'Judas!' [shout].

'Corrina Corrina' [1963] Dylan included a superbly performed version of this old song on The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan (accompanied by BRUCE LANGHORNE and others), and several outtakes have circulated, in which the variations—particularly of pace: a strikingly slower earlier take appeared on one of the first bootleg LPs—are interesting but don't improve upon the issued version nor illuminate anything to do with the song, which may have originated with Bo Chatmon (aka Chatman and aka Bo Carter) of the MISSISSIPPI SHEIKS, and which has been recorded by dozens of other artists, especially in the 1930s. As with Dylan's treatment of the Sheiks' 'Blood in My Eyes' on World Gone Wrong, 30 years after 'Corrina Corrina', he takes a lightweight, cheery little number and makes it new, in this case as something sexy, yearning and tender, rueful and contemplative. On Freewheelin' it served to confirm what 'Song to Woody' on Dylan's début album had suggested: that this very young man could bring an enviably mature, convincing detachment to songs of secular devotion, and utilise the strengths of old styles to create something memorable and fresh—including the delicate falsetto jump on 'plea-please', derived from Kokomo Arnold (perhaps via Josh White), and lyric phrases pulled from other old blues.

The song is also related to 'Alberta', which Dylan includes two versions of on Self Portrait in 1970 and to the standard 'C.C. Rider'. Bo Chatmon cut 'Corrine Corrina' at his début session in around December 1928 in New Orleans (more than a year before the first Mississippi Sheiks sides were made) and it was issued on 78rpm on Brunswick, Supertone and Vocalion, in each case with a B-side as by another artist, John Oscar. BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON had recorded a 'Corrina Blues' in Chicago around April 1926.

For an especially vituperative attack on Dylan's 'Corrina Corrina'—on his version, his motives and more besides—see 'Race/Music: Corrine Corrina, Bo Chatmon, and the Excluded Middle' by Christopher A. Waterman of the University of California in Los Angeles, posted online in 1998 before its appearance in Music and the Racial Imagination, a book edited by Ronald Radano and Philip V. Bohlman in 2000. Waterman concedes that Dylan's 'Corrina Corrina' gives the song its 'most radical transformation', but this is only to be deplored. It is a version 'in which the Greenwich Village wunderkind deconstructs and reassembles the song in accordance with the ideological norms of the urban folk revival, and the aesthetic contours of his own emergent *auteur*ship.' Dylan, he argues, is dishonestly trying to make Chatmon's work into 'a folk song', dishonestly trying to give it 'the authentication of a white subject via the black other', dishonestly throwing in a line from a ROBERT JOHNSON song—this was bad, you see, because it contributed to the white lauding of Johnson and didn't acknowledge that Johnson himself took from many sources—and dishonestly claiming composer royalties instead of giving them 'to Bo Chatmon and Mayo Williams'.

This is an argument that keeps on shooting itself in the foot. Among the many small points those less seething than Professor Waterman might like to make are these:

Is the line 'I got a bird that whistles, I got a bird that sings', which Waterman notes as coming from Johnson's 'Stones in My Passway', supposed to be original to Johnson or not? If yes, why not complain that Dylan is doing Johnson down instead of lauding him like a typical white folkie? If no, why mention Johnson at all, since Dylan doesn't? Further, why present Johnson's drawing on other people's work as a secret known only to Professor Waterman? It isn't. And why present it as deplorable? Chatmon didn't create everything he sang, either (except, apparently, in this case).

As for the royalties question, if Dylan's version is so horribly radical a transformation and so unfaithful to the Chatmon 'original', why should he not take some credit for it? And were Dylan's version sufficiently faithful to Chatmon's to satisfy even Professor Waterman, why should J. Mayo Williams receive half the royalties? As Waterman himself acknowledges, Williams was the producer, the talent scout, the record-company fixer, and taking half the composer credit on your artists' songs was merely the common industry scam. Everyone knew that. Bo Chatmon certainly did. No, Professor, at least let's agree to hold the Mayo.

Dylan would also have known the pop single version, a hit for Ray ('Tell Laura I Love Her') Peterson in 1961, in that style of the moment, a frothy white concoction of swooping strings and overwrought vocal cords, the latter giving way in the middle so that the strings can play the hopelessly perky melody in unison in place of a guitar solo. This was not one of producer PHIL SPECTOR's finest creations; it was Peterson's second and last top 10 hit. (He went country, then became a Baptist minister yet kept touring on the oldies circuit, and he died of cancer at the age of 69 on January 25, 2005.)

To switch from Ray Peterson's to Dylan's version is like turning from a mosquito's whine to Paul Robeson and a string quartet. The only extant live Dylan recording of the song is from Gerde's Folk City, probably in late April 1962. In the studio he cut it that April 24—two takes have circulated—and then he returned to it not at the next session, or the next, but on the one after that, on October 26, when seven takes were attempted, one of which was issued on a single and the other, only slightly different, became the more familiar Freewheelin' track. On August 11 Dylan had also been recorded performing it at DAVE WHITAKER's home in Minneapolis (though this remains uncirculated); there is no extant trace of his having ever recorded or performed it since—except that November, when he recorded it again as a Witmark music-publishing demo.

His claim to copyright is hard to pin down. The original Freewheelin' LP label gives the song credit as 'Adapted and Arranged by Bob Dylan', which was certainly true; the SACD reissue label says 'All songs written by B. Dylan except "Honey Just Allow Me One More Chance"'; and on the www.bobdylan.com website it just says 'arranged by Bob Dylan'.

[Bob Dylan: 'Corrina Corrina' (take 4), NY, 26 Oct 1962 (c/w 'Mixed-Up Confusion', NY, 14 Nov 1962), Columbia 4-42656, NY, Dec 1962; 'Corrina Corrina' (take 7), The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, 1963.

Blind Lemon Jefferson; 'Corrina Blues', Chicago, c. Apr 1926; Bo Chatmon (as Bo Chatman): 'Corrine Corrina', New Orleans, c.Dec 1928. Ray Peterson: 'Corrina Corrina' c/w 'Be My Girl', 1961, Dunes 45-DU2002, US, 1961.

Christopher A. Waterman, 'Race/Music: Corrine Corrina, Bo Chatmon, and the Excluded Middle' (© 1998), in Ronald Radano & Philip V. Bohlman, eds, Music and the Racial Imagination, Urbana, IL: University of Chicago Press, 2000.]

Corso, Gregory [1930 - 2001] One of THE BEATS, Gregory Nunzio Corso was born in New York City on March 26, 1930. He served three years in prison for attempted robbery as a teenager. His first poetry collection was The Vestal Lady of Brattle (1955), and in 1961 he published a novel, The American Express. His better-known 1958 poetry collection Gasoline (with back-cover blurb by JACK KEROUAC) is cited by Dylan as an influence, and in Chronicles Volume One Dylan describes Corso as 'heavy' and 'hip, cool', and says that his poem 'Bomb' touched the spirit of the times.

We can also hear in this passage from his poem 'Marriage' (from The Happy Birthday of Death, 1960), something that will sound familiar for followers of Dylan's 1960s work: 'So much to do! like sneaking into Mr Jones' house late at night / and cover his golf clubs with 1920 Norwegian books / Like hanging a picture of RIMBAUD on the lawnmower'. It seems clear that Dylan moved Corso's work forward, making something more biting, multi-layered and consequential: less cautious, less anxious to please.

Corso, like ALLEN GINSBERG, attended Dylan's post-concert party after his 1964 Hallowe'en Concert at the Philharmonic Hall, NYC. Corso died in Minnesota on January 17, 2001. On May 5, his ashes were buried in Rome's 'English Cemetery', in a tomb in front of Shelley's grave (and near Keats'). The last thing thrown into the grave was the residue of a joint that had been ritually smoked over it.

[Dylan cites Corso's Gasoline in the interviews for Biograph, 1985, and mentions Corso in Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.47, 111 & 235.]

Costello, Elvis [1954 -] Declan Patrick MacManus was born on August 25, 1954, and emerged in the foment of the British punk scene of 1976–78 as its most talented singer-songwriter (though perish the term, back then). He took his grandmother's maiden name, Costello, and posed as someone who would have sold her with no hesitation; and he took the King's first name as an act of deflationary irreverent defiance (though the same gesture had been made before, by Reg Presley of the Troggs, and no-one had minded in any case). He was only four or five years younger than the 'old hippies' that he and his combative manager were going around saying should be lined up against a wall and shot, but he was sharp and adept at the whole punk stance, and looked as if his suppressed past had probably been more mod than rocker.

Signed to one of the new indy labels but under the umbrella of one of the old majors, Elvis Costello & the Attractions released My Aim Is True in 1977. He was an immediate hit on album and with a series of singles, all of which combined punk attitude with witty lyrics, immensely catchy tunes—'Alison', 'The Angels Wanna Wear My Red Shoes', '(I Don't Want to Go to) Chelsea', 'Watching the Detectives', 'Pump It Up'—and a beat-combo sound that was, endearingly, only slightly more dangerously modern than BUDDY HOLLY & the Crickets, to whom Costello owed a great deal. Live, they were less similar to the Sex Pistols, the Jam, the Clash or the Buzzcocks than to the early 1970s pub-rock acts like Ian Dury & the Blockheads (themselves updated equivalents of cockney music-hall acts.) Further albums followed—This Year's Model, Armed Forces, Get Happy—yielding more hit singles, including the lovely, anthemic 'Oliver's Army', which was richer in sound—more reminiscent of the Beach Boys' 'God Only Knows' than of the Crickets—and as Margaret Thatcher and the 1980s came in and punk faded from modishness, Costello grew in stature, concentrated more on albums and singer-songwriterliness, and to a melody by Clive Langer wrote the angry lyrics to 'Shipbuilding', a much-admired condemnation of Thatcher's Falklands War, that was briefly a hit for Robert Wyatt. He confessed his interest in old-fashioned country music, collaborated with George Jones, and later with a string ensemble, the Brodsky Quartet and even with PAUL McCARTNEY. Goodbye Cruel World, Blood and Chocolate, Spike, Mighty Like a Rose, Brutal Youth—the albums flowed on into the 1990s and beyond, and Costello settled into his niche as serious senior figure in the British musical establishment.

In the middle of Dylan's spring 1995 European tour leg, Elvis Costello was the support act, though only for five shows, and these not even consecutively. He played solo acoustic sets each time, and tried out new material. Half of Dylan's audience stayed in the bar.

Costello's first show was Paris on March 24. Then, avoiding Brighton and Cardiff, he played the three London Brixton nights (March 29–31), avoided Birmingham, Manchester, Edinburgh, Glasgow and Belfast, and played the support spot one last time in Dublin on April 11. On three out of the five, he also came on stage during Dylan's set. At the second London Brixton concert, on March 30, Costello came on for the last encore number, sharing vocals and playing guitar on 'I Shall Be Released'; the following night he was there for the same song, followed by a bonus (well, depending on point of view) 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'—this time with Chrissie Hynde and CAROLE KING on backing vocals too. Finally, in Dublin, Costello and VAN MORRISON both joined Dylan at the end, for the same two songs as before. Four years later, in New York, Costello joined Dylan on stage once again, on July 26, 1999, to share vocals and play guitar on one more 'I Shall Be Released'.

When British punk exploded into being in 1976, and pursued its generally healthy reign of terror through till late 1978, its main enemy had been Progressive Rock. Before punk, it had got to the point where no-one in Britain dared to get on a stage, even in a pub, unless they had monstrous megawatt equipment and could play 15 chords. Punk saw this for the nonsense it was and did something about it—and the boom whereby hundreds of obscure singles of very primitive technical quality were issued on hundreds of tiny independent labels was a demonstration that when you feel you have something to say, the technology is not going to inhibit you. Now Bob Dylan had known that all along, and in spirit had always been on that side of things—but for other reasons, he was one of the enemy to the punk army: he was the 1960s; he was an old hippie. (According to DEREK BARKER, Dylan was physically attacked by Sex Pistol Sid Vicious back-stage at the Music Machine in Finchley on the night of June 14, 1978, while Dylan was in London for that year's extraordinary run of 'come-back concerts' there.) When Elvis Costello was 'new', he couldn't be caught praising Dylan; by the 1990s, he was happy to be his support act; and by the 2000s, he was readily going to extremes in praising Dylan's newest studio album, "Love and Theft", as the best he'd ever made.

Like most people, he'd become one of the old farts he used to rage against. He was asked in a recent interview: 'Did you ever get people at record labels telling you, "Elvis, with all this genre-hopping, you're diluting the brand"?'—and Costello replied: 'But who would that person have been? That figure of extreme authority who's been on the job five years, or me who's been in the job 25 years? I rank everybody now. If Bob Dylan were to come up to me and say that, I might have a thought for it. But there's not too many people that have been doing what they do as long as I've been doing what I do.'

[Elvis Costello: My Aim Is True, Stiff SEEZ 3, UK, 1977; quote from 'Question & Answer with Elvis Costello' by Chris Willman, Entertainment Weekly, LA, 13 May 2002. Derek Barker, '1978 and All That', collected in 20 Years of Isis: Bob Dylan Anthology Volume 2, New Malden: Chrome Dreams, 2005, p.231.]

Cott, Jonathan [1942 -] Jonathan Cott was born in New York City on December 24, 1942, and lives there still. His books include Wandering Ghost: The Odyssey of Lafcadio Hearn, Conversations with Glenn Gould and, in fall 2005, the extraordinary On the Sea of Memory: A Journey from Forgetting to Remembering, prompted by what happened to Cott at the end of the 1990s, when, after electroshock treatments for severe clinical depression, he could remember nothing he had experienced between 1985 and 2000. The book combines autobiography with a scrutiny of 'the mysteries of human memory' and the rôles played in our lives by both remembering and forgetting.

Cott first took an interest in Dylan when he saw him perform in a Greenwich Village café in 1963 and bought The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan. His first published work about him was an article/review of Eat the Document in Rolling Stone in 1971. He has also written one book about him and edited another. The first, Dylan, mixing criticism with biography and collecting terrific photographs, is from 1985; the second, Dylan: The Essential Interviews, is from 2006.

In 1978 Cott interviews Dylan himself—on a bus from Portland, Maine, to the airport, on the plane to New Haven, CT, and in his dressing room at the Veterans' Memorial Coliseum, on September 17, 1978. When he asks about the 1978 album Street Legal, a classic encounter between the interpreter and the artist ensues, as TERRY KELLY points up (albeit with a bad case of mixed metaphors): 'Cott fires an arsenal of quotations and references he finds relevant to "Changing of the Guards" at a typically taciturn Dylan. The loquacious Cott builds up to a tidal wave of feverish explication, peppered with Tarot card references, songwriting sub-codes and . . . subconscious images. . . . He tells a still-silent Dylan that he believes each floor of "the palace of mirrors" contains another significant image or level of awareness. . . . After what seems like a lifetime of silence, Dylan eventually puts Cott out of his misery. "I think," Dylan mumbles, "you might be in some areas I'm not too familiar with."'

[Jonathan Cott, Dylan, New York: Dolphin/Doubleday, 1985; Dylan: The Essential Interviews, New York: Wenner Books, 2006; Eat the Document review, Rolling Stone no.47, US, 4 Mar 1971; the 1978 interview, 17 Sep 1978, partly published Rolling Stone 16 Nov 1978; On the Sea of Memory: A Journey from Forgetting to Remembering, New York: Random House, 2005. Terry Kelly, 'All of F. Scott Fitzgerald's Books', The Bridge no. 14, UK, winter 2002.]

Cotten, Elizabeth [1895 - 1987] Elizabeth ('Libba') Cotten was born near Chapel Hill, North Carolina, on January 5, 1895 and started playing her older brother's banjo when she was a young girl. At 11, already playing a borrowed guitar 'upside down and backward' because she was left-handed, she started work as a domestic servant to save up for her own guitar. She acquired this eventually and started both playing and writing her own songs but, pressured out of performing by her local church, she resumed domestic work. In 1943, aged almost 50, she moved to Washington, D.C., to work as housekeeper to ethnomusicologist Charles Seeger (father of PETE). The Seegers encouraged her to resume performing music, and MIKE SEEGER produced her début album for Folkways in 1957.

This introduced her most successful composition, 'Freight Train', which by April 1957 was a hit for others, including, in both the US and skiffle-mad Britain, the Chas McDevitt Skiffle Group & Nancy Whiskey. ('Last Train to San Fernando' by Johnny Duncan & the Blue Grass Boys was to arrive just as Chas & Nancy were pulling out of the charts.)

This début album was reputedly among those 'borrowed' by Dylan from JON PANKAKE in Minneapolis, and its contents included 'Oh Babe It Ain't No Lie', which he performed over 30 years later at his unusual four-set appearance at Toad's Place in New Haven, Connecticut. In some of his 1996 concerts Dylan then included 'Sugaree', a JERRY GARCIA/GRATEFUL DEAD reworking of a song much associated with Elizabeth Cotten in the early 1960s, 'Shake Sugaree': indeed it was the title of another of her Folkways albums (and she may in fact have written this 'folksong'); and on his first tour-dates of 1997, in Japan, Dylan reintroduced 'Oh Babe It Ain't No Lie'. Altogether he has performed it 49 times in concerts across three continents, most recently in Little Rock, Arkansas, on August 14, 2001.

The blues critic Andrew M. Cohen writes of 'Freight Train' and the two songs covered by Dylan that they are the songs Elizabeth Cotten will always be associated with; that 'they are prime examples of Piedmont-style guitar playing and simple enough . . . for beginning guitarists. Since the late 1950s untold thousands of young folkies have used them . . .', while her début recording, because it was 'one of the very few recordings of . . . authentic black folk song . . . became one of the most influential, especially in college communities.'

Elizabeth Cotten performed at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL in 1964 (and is on the Vanguard release Newport Folk Festival 1964 Blues II from that event, singing 'Oh Babe' and 'Freight Train' again); she recorded another Folkways album in 1965–66 and played at the Mariposa Folk Festivals in 1970 and 1974. She performed at Carnegie Hall at the age of 76, and died in Syracuse, New York, on June 29, 1987, aged 92.

In a 1989 book by Brian Lanker and Barbara Summer, I Dream a World: Portraits of Black Women Who Changed America, Elizabeth Cotten was recognised as one of those women.

[Elizabeth Cotten: Negro Folk Songs and Tunes, Washington, D.C., 1957, Folkways FG3526, NY, 1957; 'Freight Train' & 'Oh Babe It Aint No Lie', live, Newport, RI, 23–26 Jul 1964, Newport Folk Festival 1964 Blues II, Vanguard LP 9181, NY, nia; 'Shake Sugaree', NY?, Feb 1965, Shake Sugaree, Folkways 1003, NY, c.1967. Elizabeth Cotten Live!, nia, Arhoolie LP 1089, El Cerrito CA, nia., also includes 'Freight Train' & 'Babe, It Ain't No Lie'.

Bob Dylan: 'Oh Babe It Ain't No Lie', New Haven, CT, 12 Jan 1990 & as follows in Japan, 1997: Tokyo, 9–11 Feb; Kurashikim, 13 Feb; Fukuoka, 14 Feb; & Osaka, 17–18 Feb 1997; 'Sugaree', Berlin, 17 Jun 1996; Utrecht, 20 Jun 1996; Munster, 1 Jul 1996; Pistoia, Italy, 7 Jul 1996; Pori, Finland, 21 Jul 1996; Stockholm, 27 Jul 1996; Atlanta, GA, 3 Aug 1996; Atlanta, 1 Dec 1997.

Jerry Garcia: 'Sugaree', San Francisco, 1971, Garcia, Warner Brothers BS 2582, LA, 1972. (By the Grateful Dead it 1st appeared officially as: 'Sugaree', San Francisco, 1974, Steal Your Face, Grateful Dead GD LA620 J2GD 104, San Francisco, 1976 & had become the Dead's 25th most performed song by the end of 1993. Brian Lanker & Barbara Summer, I Dream a World: Portraits of Black Women Who Changed America, New York: Stewart, Tabori & Chang, 1989. Andrew M. Cohen quoted from his useful entry on Cotten in the Encyclopedia of the Blues vol.1, New York: Routledge, 2005, p.228.]

country music, Dylan's early interest in Dylan is known to have taken an interest in country music, on radio and on record, in the late 1940s to early 1950s—that is, pre-dating its re-energising by the EVERLY BROTHERS and others of the rock' n'roll generation, and dating from his own boyhood.

This is evident from, for example, the line 'An' my first idol was HANK WILLIAMS', offered in the sleevenote poem for JOAN BAEZ in Concert, Part 2, 1964, and from Dylan's much later comments on hearing songs like 'I Forgot More (Than You'll Ever Know)' on the radio when he was growing up. Performing it as a 1940s-style country harmony duet with TOM PETTY at 55 concerts in 1986, he introduced it at one of them by remarking: 'Very seldom do you hear a real song anymore. But we were lucky enough to grow up when you could hear 'em all the time. All you had to do was just switch on your radio . . .' Perhaps this reveals why he had chosen to include the song on Self Portrait in 1970—though you may also be reminded of the rather different assertion in those lines from 'Visions of Johanna' just four years (and an aeon) earlier: 'The country music station plays soft / But there's nothing, really nothing, to turn off.'

Notwithstanding that last, ROBERT SHELTON's biography No Direction Home reports: 'I had always found Dylan more aware of the country currents than most other city folk singers . . . [around 1961]. He often alluded to HANK SNOW, Hank Thompson, Bill Andersen. . . . He repeatedly told associates that he regarded country music as the coming thing, long before he cut Nashville Skyline . . .' And when Shelton, visiting Dylan's boyhood home in Hibbing, MN, in 1968, was shown the old records (78s and vinyl) left behind in his bedroom, he says they included 'a flood of Hank Williams's lonesome blues', some Webb Pierce and the LP Hank Snow Sings JIMMIE RODGERS' Songs. In more recent years Dylan has paid fulsome tribute, in interviews and the like, to the hillbilly-country-bluegrass influence of groups like the Delmore Brothers and the STANLEY BROTHERS.

[Dylan comments on 'I Forgot More', Sydney, Australia, 24 Feb 1986. Joan Baez in Concert, Part 2, Vanguard VRS-9113, NY, 1964. Hank Snow: Hank Snow Sings Jimmie Rodgers' Songs, RCA Victor LSP/LPM-2043, NY, 1959.]

'Covenant Woman' and 'Pretty Boy Floyd' Despite being one of the duller performances on the Saved album, 'Covenant Woman' was a significant song for Dylan himself. He put it on a single, and on the first gospel tour, months before Saved had even been recorded, he performed it live at all 26 concerts: and he always placed it first among those featured songs that were not drawn from Slow Train Coming. On the second gospel tour, in early 1980, he gave it the same prominence at all 24 concerts. Then he dropped it altogether for the April–May dates but brought it back in for that year's fall tour.

The song's significance for Dylan may come down to its being an address of private gratitude (made somewhat public by the lyric) to MARY ALICE ARTES, the woman who prayed that Dylan be brought to Christ and asked a VINEYARD CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP pastor to visit him (see also 'Born Again' period, the) and whom he also seems to address in the Slow Train Coming song 'Precious Angel'. The chorus of 'Covenant Woman' includes the straightforward 'I just got to thank you / Once again / For making your prayers known / Unto heaven for me'.

Like 'Precious Angel', the verses of 'Covenant Woman' suggest a fusing of spiritual and earthly passion, but there's another detectable affection here too, as he lingers warmly along this gentle, eloquent line: 'You know that we are strangers in a land we're passing through'. His delivery seems to recall the younger Dylan's fondness for all those romance-of-the-road, leaving songs.

Scripturally, though, Dylan is bending an ear to God's recurrent exhortation to His people to treat strangers with kindness. This is no mere Gentle Jesusism, but a command insisted upon time and again in the Old Testament. The point is to remind people of their own ancestral suffering as captive strangers in Egypt:

'Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt' (Exodus 22:21). 'Also thou shalt not oppress a stranger: for ye know the heart of a stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt' (Exodus 23:9). 'And if a stranger sojourn with thee in your land, ye shall not vex him. But the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt . . .' (Leviticus 19:33–34). '. . . as ye are, so shall the stranger be before the Lord. One law and one manner shall be for you, and for the stranger that sojourneth with you' (Numbers 15:16). 'Love ye therefore the stranger: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt' (Deuteronomy 10:19).

In the New Testament, this theme is linked to the subject of angels. Hebrews 13:2 advises: 'Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.'

This idea is paralleled by, and perhaps is the conscious inspiration for, part of the lyric of WOODY GUTHRIE's song 'Pretty Boy Floyd', which

Dylan got around to recording in 1987: 'And Pretty Boy found a welcome at every farmer's door. / Others tell you of a stranger that come to beg a meal / And underneath a napkin left a thousand-dollar bill.' (A few lines later, Guthrie adds a note 'from' Floyd, left with a gift of food: 'You say that I'm an outlaw, you say that I'm a thief / Well here's a Christmas dinner for the families on relief.' This dovetails into the argument of the song's most famous line: 'Some will rob you with a six-gun and some with a fountain-pen'—the line quoted by Dylan in his own early song 'Talkin' New York'—before the song ends with 'You won't never see an outlaw drive a family from their home.')

Dylan's first known extant recording of this song (an amateur recording, and unissued) has him contributing back-up vocals, guitar and harmonica behind RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT, live at a club in Greenwich Village in July 1975—and his official 1987 recording is modelled on Elliott's two classic recordings of the song, one made in England in 1956 and the other in New York in 1960. Dylan also performed the song live at the Bridge School Benefit Concert in Oakland, California, on December 4, 1988.

The link between the biblical text and this quintessential Guthrie lyric tends to corroborate the notion that Dylan's lines from 'Covenant Woman', as delivered, still carry a residue of affection for the romantic songs of an earlier era.

[Bob Dylan: 'Solid Rock' c/w 'Covenant Woman', single, Muscle Schoals, AL, 15 Feb 1980, Columbia 1-11318, NY, 2 Jun 1980; 'Pretty Boy Floyd', back-up vocals, guitar & harmonica behind Ramblin' Jack Elliott, live NY, 3 Jul 1975; and LA, prob. Apr 1987, Folkways: A Vision Shared, Columbia OC 44034, NY (CBS 460905 1, London), 1988.

Woody Guthrie: 'Pretty Boy Floyd', 26 Apr 1939, reissued Folkways: The Original Vision, Smithsonian Folkways SF400001, Washington, D.C., 1988. Ramblin' Jack Elliott: 'Talking Miner's Blues' c/w 'Pretty Boy Floyd', London, c.1956, 78 rpm Topic TRC98, London, c.1956; and 'Pretty Boy Floyd', NY, Jun 1960, Jack Elliott Sings the Songs of Woody Guthrie, Prestige PR13016, Bergenfeld, NJ, 1960/61.]

Crackers, the See Band, The.

Crooks, Richard [1942 -] Richard Crooks, a longtime session drummer, who was born on January 16, 1942 in Chicago and grew up in Gilroy, California, played on the September 1974 New York sessions—that is, the original sessions—for Blood on the Tracks.

He has played drums on many Tom Chapin albums and albums as obscure as the Hitman Blues Band's Angel in the Shadows, but he has also recorded and played with many, many others, from Roy Buchanan to Jean Ritchie, and including Dr. John, JOHN SEBASTIAN, PAUL SIMON (he's on 'Mother and Child Reunion' and others of the period), MARIA MULDAUR, LEONARD COHEN (he's on Various Positions, and therefore on tracks like 'Dance Me to the End of Love', 1985), Loudon Wainwright III and Steve Forbert. He also plays on the Village People's 1979 album Live and Sleazy and plays spoons on BETTE MIDLER's Bathhouse Betty (1998). He is currently the drummer in the David Bromberg Band (2006). He lives in Bronxville, NY, in the summer months, but winters in Key West, Florida.

Crosby, David [1941 -] David Van Cortland Crosby was born in Los Angeles on August 14, 1941, a son of the cinematographer Floyd Crosby, whose credits included High Noon but who enjoyed just as much his B-movies like Monster from the Ocean Floor and the Rogert Corman-directed Attack of the Crab Monster, and Aliph Van Cortland Whitehead. David and his older brother Floyd (aka Ethan and Chip) grew up in Santa Barbara and became child multi-instrumentalists. Though David's musical interests were initially jazz and classical, he became drawn into the folk music revival at the start of the 1960s and started to travel around the US as a singer-songwriter after his parents' 1960 divorce. Both brothers briefly joined folkie group Les Baxter's Balladeers and while with them David met Cass Elliot and through her, later, Graham Nash, who in 1969 would manage to move up in the world from dull Manchester-based beat group the Hollies to join Crosby in Crosby, Stills & Nash (with Stephen Stills). In the interim, though, Crosby returned to live in LA in 1963 and the following year formed THE BYRDS with Jim (later ROGER) McGUINN, Gene Clark, Chris Hillman and Michael Clarke. Crosby was an excellent musician with a fine ear, and while McGuinn gave the group its defining electric 12-string sound, Crosby pioneered those high, ethereal harmonies that were taken up later by everyone from the GRATEFUL DEAD to the Eagles. His contribution was particularly strong on Byrds albums like Younger Than Yesterday and Notorious Byrd Brothers.

In August 1967 Crosby quit—he felt forced out—in the middle of the recording of their sixth album. He ran away to Florida and bought a 60-foot wooden schooner, The Mayan, and at a local club saw an unknown singer-songwriter, JONI MITCHELL.

Crosby told Wally Breese in 1997: 'I went looking for a sailboat to live on. I wanted to do something else. Find another way to be. I was pretty disillusioned. I walked into a coffee house and was just completely smitten. She was standing there singing all those songs—"Michael from Mountains", "Both Sides Now", and I was just floored. I couldn't believe that there was anybody that good. And I also fell . . . I loved her . . .' Crosby helped kickstart her career, and eventually produced her début album, protecting her from the record company's insistence on a folk-rock sound.

In 1968, Crosby began writing songs with Stephen Stills, then with NEIL YOUNG in Buffalo Springfield. Crosby and Stills brought in Nash, and in 1969 released Crosby, Stills & Nash, which topped the US charts and featured as a highlight Crosby's spacey-Elizabethan song 'Guinevere' and the co-written 'Wooden Ships'. Young joined that summer, they appeared as the biggest 'supergroup' since Cream at Woodstock and then in 1970 they released Déjà Vu. Off and on, Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young have kept on recording and touring for over 30 years. In 1970, Crosby also released his first solo album (though it was crammed with other star players), If I Could Only Remember My Name, a record widely rubbished at the time but now often considered a landmark record full of Crosby's progressive harmonic ideas and exploratory songwriting.

That same year, Crosby accompanied Bob and SARA DYLAN to Princeton and stood at his side (along with Dylan's music publisher Naomi Saltzman's husband Ben) giving moral support through the ceremony at which Dylan was presented with his honorary doctorate in music from this prestigious Ivy League university. As Dylan recalls almost 35 years later, in Chronicles Volume One, 'Somehow I had motivated David Crosby to come along' and in the end, after 'whispering and mumbling my way through the ceremony, I was handed the scroll. We piled back into the big Buick and drove away. It had been a strange day. "Bunch of dickheads on auto-stroke," Crosby said.' A succinct verdict, but less interesting than Dylan's, which was the New Morning song 'Day of the Locusts'.

Dylan also offers a thoughtful description of Crosby as he was at that time, still in his 20s, with the success of the Byrds behind him and now the first name in the mega-successful Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young, and yet already metamorphosing from an anonymous, shy, slim youth into a swelling but endearing mix of the Cheshire Cat and the Penguin:

> 'Crosby was a colorful and unpredictable character, wore a Mandrake the Magician cape, didn't get along with too many people and had a beautiful voice—an architect of harmony. He was tottering on the brink of death even then and could freak out a whole city block all by himself . . . I liked him a lot. . . . He could be an obstreperous companion.'

The catalysts, of course, were drugs and alcohol, a resultant paranoia and a fascination with firearms. As Crosby's official online biography states: 'for Crosby, success led to increasingly destructive habits, and eventual alienation from most of his friends and fellow musicians. As the 1980s began he found himself in the grips of a serious drug abuse problem. . . . The crash came in 1985, when a drug-related arrest in Dallas a few years earlier resulted in a prison term for Crosby. He spent a year in Texas jails before the court overturned his conviction on appeal . . .' On top of which, Crosby's father died in September 1985.

His drug years were supposed to be behind him when, in 1988, he published an autobiography, Long Time Gone, that described in painful detail his former degradations and slide. Yet, as the official online tale concedes (it doesn't mention Long Time Gone), 'Crosby endured a new series of personal disasters in the 1990s. These included a serious motorcycle accident, financial woes due to criminal mishandling of his business affairs, and severe earthquake damage to his . . . home, followed by its loss through foreclosure. . . . [And then] his liver, damaged by years of substance abuse and . . . Hepatitis "C," went into rapid deterioration.' In 1995 Crosby was taken into hospital and received a liver transplant.

The official story, still online in January 2006, then ends with a de-toxed, happily married Crosby having a new baby, Django, after being reunited with his 30-year-old professional musician son, James Raymond, who had traced his famous father the same year Crosby gained his new liver. The two of them, plus Jeff Pevar, formed the new group CPR (for Crosby, Pevar & Raymond) in 1998 and it is still going. Meanwhile CSN&Y undertook mega-successful US tours in 2000 and 2002 and issued the stubbornly titled Looking Forward, featuring Crosby's equally defiant song 'Stand and Be Counted'. He has also published a campaigning book of the same name, and as a result fronted a spin-off documentary TV series celebrating musicians' activism and social awareness on issues like human rights and the environment.

Unfortunately, this narrative omits the fact that in 2004, when Crosby left some luggage behind when leaving a New York hotel, the hotel staff found a quantity of marijuana, a 45-caliber handgun and a knife. Crosby was charged with illegal possession of a hunting knife and of a handgun and ammunition as well as possession of drugs.

All this lurid personal dysfunction gets in the way of the recognition of Crosby's achievement as a main player in the shaping of rock (and so popular consciousness) in the 1960s and 1970s. But time will tell. And in any case, even in the midst of all the mayhem, in the spring of 1990 Crosby was still able to meet up again with Bob Dylan, 20 years after their 'strange day' at Princeton, this time in the studio in LA, to lend his 'beautiful voice' to 'Born in Time' and '2 × 2' on Dylan's album Under the Red Sky.

Crosby says time will tell, too: and he thinks it will come down more favourably for Joni Mitchell than for Dylan: 'In a hundred years when they look back and say, "Who was the best?"—it's going to be her. . . . She's a better poet than Dylan and without question a far better musician. I don't think there's anybody who can touch her.'

[David Crosby, If I Could Only Remember My Name, US, 1970. David Crosby, Long Time Gone, New York: Doubleday, 1988. Crosby, Stills & Nash, US, 1969. Crosby quotes from 'A Conversation with David Crosby (Part One)' by Wally Breese, 15 Mar 1997, seen online 15 Jan 2006 at www.jonimitchell.com/Croz97A.html. Bryan Alsop's official biography on Crosby's website http://crosbycpr.com, seen ditto. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.132 & 134.]

Cross, Billy [1946 -] William Cross was born on July 15, 1946 in New York City. He started playing music in local band the Esquires while still at high school in 1962. While a Columbia University student he launched his own band, the Walkers, and after graduating in 1968 joined Sha Na Na, the most prominent and least objectionable of the pastische-1950s revival bands that emerged at the end of the 1960s during that glorious but hip-snobbish period when the music of the 1950s felt much further away and less relevant than it has done since. Billy Cross appeared in this guise at Woodstock in 1969.

He left Sha Na Na for very brief 1970 stints with Cat Mother and the All Night Newsboys and joined the cast of the Broadway musical Hair (so switching from a rocker to a hippie pastiche). After Broadway, he joined the Hair national touring company and as its musical director toured with the group for a year, returning to New York in 1973. Here he scuffed around with club dates and small Broadway jobs (though these included some involvement with PAUL McCARTNEY on the 1974 show Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band); but he also began working as a session guitarist, and at the Electric Ladyland studios in the early 1970s he worked with, and learnt engineering and studio production from, the late JIMI HENDRIX's engineer Eddie Kramer.

In 1974 he visited Denmark for the first time, which led to annual visits there until eventually he made it his home base. Between mid-1970s trips there, Cross played live dates in New York with Robert Gordon, Link Wray, MICK RONSON, Meat Loaf and others and in 1977 joined with ROB STONER and HOWIE WYETH to form the short-lived rock group Topaz.

This led to Billy Cross stepping into the Dylan world, and working alongside Stoner again he became the fake-blonde long-haired lead guitarist (and occasional backing vocalist) on Dylan's huge 1978 world tour: 114 concerts, starting in Tokyo on February 20 and finishing in Florida on December 16. Cross is therefore to be heard on the live double-LP Bob Dylan at Budokan, but he also went into the studios with Dylan for the sessions that yielded 1978's studio album Street Legal. These sessions began in late April 1978 in Santa Monica. There is a circulating rehearsal tape from an undated session that month at which ten songs were recorded; then on April 25 the album sessions began, yielding nothing that day but continuing on April 26 to 28 and concluding on May 1st. Billy Cross is the lead guitarist on all tracks.

Cross was not retained for the early 1979 sessions for Slow Train Coming, and returning to Denmark he played with the Delta Blues Band on their live recording No Overdubs in 1979, after which the two fused into the Delta-Cross Band. This toured and recorded in Europe until disbandment in 1983, by which time Cross had drawn himself to the attention of Dylan-watchers again by recording a rare Dylan song not copyrighted till 1981, 'Legionnaire's Disease', but learnt from a soundcheck during the 1978 tour. The song appears on Up Front, the second of the Delta-Cross Band's four albums, and as the B-side to their single 'Back on the Road Again'.

Since 1983, Billy Cross has been freelance producing and session playing and made an eponymously titled solo album in 1985. Today he teaches at the Rhythmic Conservatory of Music in Copenhagen, plays with both a rock group, Cross, Schack & Ostermann, and the acoustic trio Everybody's Talking (with Jimmy Colding and Lars Måsbøl), and nearly 20 years after the first, released a second solo album, Life Is Good, in 2004. He used to look like a TOM PETTY wannabe; now he sounds like one.

[Billy Cross: Billy Cross, 1985; Life is Good, Kick Music, Denmark, 2004. Delta Cross Band: 'Legionnaire's Disease' c/w 'Back on the Road Again', Medley MdS 176, Denmark, 1981; Up Front, Medley, Denmark, 1981.]

' 'Cross the Green Mountain' [song & video, 2003] Commissioned from Dylan to play over the closing titles of the 2003 film Gods and Generals, which is about the first half of the American Civil War, this long, dolorous ballad hovers between the portentous and the touching. It doesn't stand up on the page—it's full of awkwardnesses of word order such as 'I think of the souls in heaven who we'll meet'—but it has the virtues of sounding like a long, unwinding movie in itself, of a dark, stately vocal, and of Dylan compressing into the lyric much of what was felt and rumoured at different phases of the war: the early disorientation at its having broken out at all, the bravado and the glory, the capacity for grandiloquent declaration and the later onset of dread that the war would stretch out into a future of hopeless carnage. This jostling of conflicts within the conflict is embedded into a song of shifting voices and episodes, making for an historically informed meditation.

It's been suggested that he quotes on the quiet from W.B. Yeats' poem 'Lapis Lazuli', written in 1938 as Europe headed into World War II, and which includes the phrase 'Heaven blazing into the head'—in Dylan's opening stanza there is 'Heaven blazing in my head'. Others have identified tips of the hat to Civil War poems by Herman Melville ('brave blood to spill' comes from 'The Scout Toward Aldie', in Battle-Pieces and Aspects of the War, 1866) and to the less well-known Southern poet Henry Timrod, 1829–1867 (that 'dim Atlantic line' comes from his poem 'Charleston'). But beyond this period colouring Dylan has rightly minimised the scissors-and-paste assemblage technique so prevalent on the "Love and Theft" album, and the imported phrases are occasional, overtly quoted and extemporised upon with some finesse, as for instance when stanza ten begins with 'Stars fell over Alabama' only to add, at once, 'I saw each star', and to end that verse with the chiselled couplet 'Chilled are the skies, keen is the frost / The ground's froze hard and the morning is lost.'

The song marks a return to subject matter that has always been dear to him. He writes revealingly in Chronicles Volume One of his responses towards the American Civil War but had he not done so we would still have those two adjacent songs on the solo acoustic album of a decade earlier, World Gone Wrong, 'Two Soldiers' and 'Jack-a-Roe', which he sings with such intense empathy and such alert interest. (See American Civil War in World Gone Wrong, the.)

The video made to accompany ''Cross the Green Mountain' mixes footage from the movie with sequences shot in the vast Hollywood Cemetery for Confederate troops in Richmond, Virginia; these show us glimpses of TONY GARNIER and LARRY CAMPBELL, and longer shots of Dylan surveying an encampment's dead and wounded, and the cemetery itself, both from on horseback and on foot. Wearing the false beard and wig that he puzzled us all by wearing first at his NEWPORT FESTIVAL performance of July 2002 he looks, on the video, more like Fagin than a figure from the Civil War.

Gods and Generals, directed by Ronald F. Maxwell, who also wrote the screenplay, is based on the book by Jeffrey M. Shaara. It was not well received by the critics when released in 2003, but may be superior to Maxwell's 1993 film Gettysburg (it is a prequel to this), which was much derided for its glut of continuity errors and anachronisms (a plane flying over, for one). The Gods and Generals soundtrack album includes the full version of the Dylan song; a Limited Edition 'bonus' DVD contains the Dylan video plus a video for Mary Fahl's 'Going Home' and 'extra' movie scenes.

[''Cross the Green Mountain', Studio City, CA, late Jul 2002, Gods and Generals Original Motion Picture Soundtrack, Sony Classical / Sony Music Sountrax SK87891, US, 4 Feb 2003; special sequences for the video filmed Richmond, VA, 23 Nov 2002.]

Crow, Sheryl [1962 -] Sheryl Suzanne Crow was born on February 11, 1962 in the Missouri town of Kennett: 'It's a nice town, with nice people in it / . . . Kennett', as its official song has it. Her mother was a singer and music teacher and her father a trumpet playing lawyer (they had both been in swing bands) and she grew up hearing popular music and studying classical, moving on to take a degree in the latter at Missouri State University. While a student she sang with a college group named either Kashmir or Cashmere but after graduation she taught in an elementary school in suburban St. Louis before making more money on the side singing on jingles, including for McDonald's. (All these years later, in contrast, she's a celeb magazine fitness icon: yet another 40-something wonderwoman, and until recently engaged to the world's best cyclist, Lance Armstrong.)

Tapes of her jingle singing got her into session work when she moved to LA. She was a backing singer on Michael Jackson's Bad tour for 17 long months, and shared lead vocals with him on one song per night. She returned to session work after that, then made a very expensive solo album 'too polished to release', and then in 1993 released Tuesday Night Music Club, from which came two semi-successful singles before a third, 'All I Wanna Do', became a vast hit and propelled the previously sleeping album to multi-million sales and Crow into the big time. By August 1994 she was performing to 300,000 people at Woodstock II (at which Dylan also performed).

Crow is a spirited live performer whose strengths are open simplicity, acoustic singer-songwriterliness and modish pluck; yet in the studio she is a multi-instrumentalist, playing bass, Wurlitzer, percussion, organ, steel guitar, keyboards, harmonica, electric and acoustic guitar, electric and acoustic 12-string electric and clavinet.

Employing, not for the first time, the tactic of having as his support act that month's hot new young performer, Dylan opened his run of May 1995 Never-Ending Tour concerts in LA with Sheryl Crow on the bill. On the third and final night, she was brought on at the end of Dylan's set too, to share vocals on 'I Shall Be Released'. Five months later, in New Orleans (on October 16) Crow again came on stage at the end of his concert, playing accordion on 'Alabama Getaway', 'The Times They Are a-Changin'' and the so often unavoidable 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35', and singing on the chorus on the first of these three. That year Crow also headlined her own tour and was support to the Eagles at their enormous comeback concerts and, more modestly, to Joe Cocker.

After Bob Dylan tried out his then-new song 'Mississippi' at the sessions for Time Out of Mind in Miami in January 1997, and rejected the result, he revisited the song for "Love and Theft", the next new studio album four years later (luckily for us, since it is without question a major highlight of that album). But in between, he gave the song to Sheryl Crow, none of whose virtues are apparent on her adenoidal, foggy, upbeat self-produced version (inside which, somewhere, lurks the keyboard work of BENMONT TENCH), which was released on her third solo album, The Globe Sessions, in 1998. Crow said at the time: 'I was so excited that he thought about me singing it. It's an undeniably brilliant song.' Perhaps he had given her the song around December 19, 1997, the night she appeared on stage with him once again at the fourth of his five LA concerts of December 1997 (part of that month's 'club tour', which had begun at the start of the month in Atlanta), when near the end of his set she played guitar and sang on 'Highway 61 Revisited' and played accordion and sang on 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'.

In 1998 Crow played on a rather larger scale in New York's Central Park, with star guests including CLAPTON and KEITH RICHARDS, from which came 1999's Sheryl Crow and Friends: Live—There Goes the Neighborhood. In 2002 came C'mon C'mon, in 2003 a greatest hits collection, The Very Best of Sheryl Crow and in 2005 Wildflower. In 2004 she appeared, unadvisedly, wrestling with 'Begin the Beguine' in the Cole Porter biopic De-Lovely. She has continued to produce and devise hit-making remixes for other artists, and to write songs, though rarely with lines as courageous and memorable (and unlike Cole Porter's) as on the co-written 'Love Is a Good Thing', from her 1996 second album, Sheryl Crow: 'Watch out sister, watch out brother / Watch our children while they kill each other / With a gun they bought at Wal-Mart discount stores'.

When it came to selecting a Dylan track for the Starbucks album Artist's Choice: Sheryl Crow—Music That Matters to Her (2003)—tagline: 'Spend an hour with Sheryl Crow's record collection'—her choice was neither a protest song nor 'Mississippi' but 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right' from Freewheelin', recorded when Crow was nine months old.

[Sheryl Crow: Tuesday Night Music Club, A&M 126, US, 1993; Sheryl Crow, A&M 587, 1996; The Globe Sessions, A&M 540959, 1998; Sheryl Crow and Friends: Live—There Goes the Neighborhood, A&M, 1999; C'mon C'mon, Uniscope, US, 2002; The Very Best of Sheryl Crow, A&M, 2003; Artist's Choice: Sheryl Crow—Music That Matters to Her, Hear Music / Universal Music Special Markets 069493585-2, US, 2003; Wildflower, 2005. De-Lovely, dir. Irwin Winkler, written Jay Cocks; Winkler / Potboiler / UA, US, 2004.]

Crowe, Cameron [1957 -] Cameron Crowe was born in Palm Springs, California, on July 13, 1957 and grew up in San Diego, with rock'n'roll banned from the house. After a brief, defiant stint in the bad local group the Masked Hamster, he began writing for the underground San Diego Door (like LESTER BANGS before him). He joined the staff of Rolling Stone while still a teenager, but quit to stay on the West Coast when the magazine moved East in 1977, though he remained a contributor. At the end of the 1970s he published a hit book, Fast Times at Ridgemont High, and then wrote the screenplay for the 1982 movie version.

Thus began a successful life writing and later also directing movies, which have included the overrated Jerry Maguire (the soundtrack and soundtrack album of which offered a previously unissued take of Dylan's 'Shelter from the Storm') and the much better (and autobiographical) Almost Famous. He has also made music TV specials and videos with TOM PETTY, Pearl Jam and others. But in September 1985 Crowe conducted a series of interviews with Bob Dylan that were published within the box set Biograph: interviews that enabled Dylan to talk, sometimes with surprising candour, about his life, beliefs and views on contemporary culture—but also to offer explanations of how he came to write particular songs, and/or comments as to what particular songs were 'about' (often discussing this at some length), in a way that he had never done in public print before. Some credit for this valuable, energetic and beguiling material must go to Cameron Crowe, who was still in his 20s when he conducted these interviews and already a success in his own right, but who here put himself wholly and unobtrusively in the service of drawing out Dylan for Dylan's sake.

[Cameron Crowe: Fast Times at Ridgemont High (book), New York: Simon & Schuster, 1981; Fast Times at Ridgemont High (film), dir. Amy Heckerling, 1982; Jerry Maguire, dir. Cameron Crowe, 1996; Almost Famous, dir. Crowe, 2000. Bob Dylan: 'Shelter from the Storm', NY, 17 Sep 1974, Jerry Maguire: Music from the Motion Picture, Epic Soundtrax EK 67910, US, 10 Dec 1996.]

Crudup, Arthur 'Big Boy' [1905 - 1974] Arthur William Crudup was born into rural poverty in Forest, in southern Mississippi, on August 24, 1905 and was singing in church by the age of ten. He worked as a labourer before taking up the guitar at the unusually late age of 32 but was soon playing at local parties. In the depths of the Depression he struggled to stay in music but in 1940 joined gospel group the Harmonizing Four, moved to Chicago with them in 1941 (living, to begin with, in a wooden crate under the 'L' station) and then quit the group and turned back to the blues. Discovered by a Victor talent scout, he was asked to perform that same evening in front of towering figures like Tampa Red, BIG BILL BROONZY and LONNIE JOHNSON. His guitar playing was simple but he was a strong songwriter with a spare, field-holler voice, and after impressing this intimidating audience he was signed up. He recorded over 80 sides between 1941 and 1956, scoring 78rpm successes with a handful.

His fame in the wider world rests on the fact that ELVIS PRESLEY's first record, the immortal 'That's All Right', recorded in July 1954, was a revolutionary revival of an Arthur 'Big Boy' Crudup song. (When Presley moved from Sun to RCA at the beginning of 1956, he swiftly recorded another old Crudup 1940s record, 'So Glad You're Mine'.)

Yet it's an example of how timeless Elvis Presley's exciting new transmissions could be that the line 'That's alright, mama, that's alright for you' figures in a much earlier blues classic than the Crudup song. It's a stanza from BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON's seminal 'Black Snake Moan' (cut in Chicago as 'That Black Snake Moan' in 1926 and recut in Atlanta as 'Black Snake Moan' in 1927). The lines 'Mama that's alright, sugar that's alright for you / That's alright mama, that's alright for you / . . . just the way you do' then recurred the following year in one of the two takes of Ishman Bracey's terrific ''Fore Day Blues'. Then, on the early Crudup side 'If I Get Lucky', in 1941, he not only tried out the lines 'That's alright mama, that's alright for you / Treat me low-down and dirty, any old way you do' for the first time but did it with a style of hollering that admits a debt to Bracey as much as to Jefferson.

The connection makes sense: Crudup hung out in Jackson, Mississippi, in the 1940s, when Ishman Bracey was the city's most popular and active musician. In turn, it was 150 miles up Highway 55, in Memphis, that Elvis saw Crudup perform. Somewhere there's an interview with Elvis in which he's asked, when he's the ultimate star, if he had imagined that kind of fame and success for himself when he started out. Elvis replies: 'No. When I started out I just wanted to be as good as Arthur Crudup was when I saw him live in '49.'

One of the Crudup records Presley surprised Sam Phillips by knowing was 'Rock Me Mama', and this is the other Crudup song besides 'That's All Right' that Dylan recorded. He tried 'That's All Right' fairly early in his own career, at the session of October 26, 1962 that yielded both the Freewheelin' and the slightly different single-release version of 'Corrina Corrina', and again at the session of November 1; these have circulated but remain unissued. A little over ten years later Dylan tried Crudup's 'Rock Me Mama' at the sessions for Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid in 1973, to no especially significant avail. It's a simple song, anonymous in character and Dylan does nothing much with it—or at least, you'd say so until you find that in 2004 the group Old Crow Medicine Show include the song under the title 'Wagon Wheel' and credit this title partly to Dylan and his music publishing company. (And don't credit Crudup at all.) The two known Dylan takes have never been released but have circulated in rather poor quality.

Other Crudup records have Dylan connections. His 'Death Valley Blues' (see the entry on Dylan's song 'Dignity') tells a story that takes place out on Highway 61; his 'Mean Old Frisco Blues' is one of the very few pre-1950s records to use the phrase 'special rider', which Dylan took as the name of his most important music-publishing company; Crudup made a record called 'That's Your Red Wagon' in 1945; his 1941 revisit to CHARLEY PATTON territory on 'Black Pony Blues' includes the phrase 'she fox-trot and pace' which Dylan echoes in his own 'New Pony' blues on Street Legal in 1978; and Crudup recorded a 'Dirt Road Blues' in 1945.

Presley had always credited Crudup, both in interviews and on the record label; but royalties paid never reached the musician and he remained in poverty even while being labelled 'the father of rock'n'roll'; in response he liked to refer to his most famous fan as 'Elvin Preston'. He had returned to southern Mississippi by the end of the 1940s—like BLIND WILLIE McTELL, his sound had become passé in Chicago—and though he made the occasional foray into Memphis, he was back to playing rural juke joints by the early 1950s. It is a bellowing irony that the same year Elvis Presley shot to national prominence and that undreamt of fame, 1956, Arthur Crudup gave up music and returned to farm work.

However, he was still only 50 years old, and he survived long enough to receive an eventual $60,000 in back royalties when 'rediscovered' in 1965 by Dick Waterman, who pointed him towards the folk revival movement. He toured the US East Coast and Europe as a rightly valued survivor of the pre-war country blues world, recorded with British musicians on a UK trip in 1970 and back in the US even went out as the support act to Bonnie Raitt.

Arthur 'Big Boy' Crudup suffered a fatal stroke and died while still a working musician, in Nassawadox, Virginia, on March 28, 1974.

[Arthur Crudup: 'If I Get Lucky', 'Death Valley Blues' & 'Black Pony Blues', Chicago, 11 Sep 1941, the 1st on King of the Blues Vol. 3 (EP), RCA RCX204, London, 1962; the others on Bluebird Blues, RCA LPV-518 (Vintage Series), NY, 1965; 'Mean Old Frisco Blues', Chicago, 15 Apr 1942, The Rural Blues, RBF FR-202, NY, 1964; 'That's Your Red Wagon' (unreleased till 1983) & 'Dirt Road Blues', Chicago, 22 Oct 1945, the latter on Victor 20-2757, NY, 1947; 'That's All Right', Chicago, 6 Sep 1946, known by Presley from the 78rpm Victor 20-2205 (c/w 'Crudup's After Hours'), NY, 1946.

Bob Dylan: 'That's All Right', NY, 26 Oct 1962; 'Rock Me Mama', Burbank, CA, Feb 1973; both unreleased. Elvis Presley: 'That's All Right', Memphis, 5–6 Jul 1954, Sun 209, Memphis, 1954. Blind Lemon Jefferson: 'That Black Snake Moan', Chicago, c.Nov 1926, Black Snake Moan: Blind Lemon Jefferson, Milestone MLP-2013, NY, 1970. 'Black Snake Moan', Atlanta, 14 Mar 1927, Jazz Vol. 2: The Blues, Folkways FP55 & FJ-2802, NY, 1950. Ishman Bracey: 'The 'Fore Day Blues' (alternate take), Memphis, 31 Aug 1928, Jackson Blues 1928–1938, Yazoo L-1007, NY, c.1968, CD-reissued YAZCD1007, NY, c.1988. (The lyric fragment quoted is not on the better-known take, issued on The Famous 1928 Tommy Johnson-Ishman Bracey Session, Roots RL-330, Vienna, 1970; both takes are CD-reissued on Ishman Bracey & Charley Taylor, Document DOCD-5049, Vienna, c.1991.) Old Crow Medicine Show: 'Wagon Wheel', Old Crow Medicine Show, Nettwerk, US, 2004.

Main sources: Michael Gray, Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan; Rick Anderson, entry in The Blues Encyclopedia, New York: Routledge, 2005, pp. 240–243, and Tony Russell, The Blues From Robert Johnson to Robert Cray, London: Arum Press, 1997, p.105.]

Cruzados, the See the Plugz.

cummings, e.e. [1894 - 1962] Edward Estlin Cummings was born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, on October 14, 1894. He styled himself e.e. cummings right from the publication of his first poetry collection, Tulips and Chimneys, in 1924.

There's a superficial correspondence between cummings' long obtuse titles ('If Up's the Word; And a World Grows Greener', 1958) and Dylan's ('It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', 1965) but each of cummings' is a title that is the opening line of the poem in question; with Dylan, such titles are wilfully gangling yet cryptic summaries of a mood contained within the song concerned. But Dylan's work itself acknowledges the notice he's taken of cummings' long titles. As noted in WISSOLIK & McGRATH's Bob Dylan's Words (1994) a Dylan phrase that occurs very early on in his 1960s novel Tarantula, i.e. 'a much of witchy', alludes to cummings' 'What if a Much of a Which of a Wind', from 1944.

Then there's the fact, so obvious as to have remained unstated, that Dylan's ostentatious refusal of capital letters all through the poetry of 11 Outlined Epitaphs, 'Advice for Geraldine on Her Miscellaneous Birthday' (very much a modernist poet's title), 'Alternatives to College' and Some Other Kinds of Songs, and all through the Bringing It All Back Home, Highway 61 Revisited and World Gone Wrong sleevenotes, as well as in Tarantula, is all in the wake of e.e. cummings.

Wissolik & McGrath find three further tips of Dylan's hat to cummings' work in Tarantula: namely, an allusion to his title 'Your Sweet Old Etcetera' (1925) and two direct quotes from the poem 'Buffalo Bill's' (1920): 'Jesus he was a handsome man', and 'blueeyed boy', both taken from the poem's final lines 'Jesus / he was a handsome man / and what i want to know is / how do you like your blueeyed boy / Mister Death'. They note too that Dylan uses 'my blue-eyed son' recurrently in 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall'. We might add that the cummings passage is specifically echoed—the tone exactly seized and duplicated—in 'I Shall Be Free', where Dylan recites: 'What I want to know, Mr. Football Man, is / What do you do about Willy Mays . . . ?' and then again (with T.S. ELIOT thrown in too) in the 'Mouthful of Loving Choke' section of Tarantula: '"& i think i'm gonna do april or so is a cruel month & how do you like your blue eyed boy NOW mr octopus?"'. These are allusions he returns to in a fine passage of reminiscence, a decent piece of prose poetry itself, within the sleevenotes for Biograph. (See Beats, the.)

Finally (less attractively, but tellingly all the same) there's a tone of hectoring assertiveness that cummings often resorts to—as here: 'his flesh was flesh his blood was blood; / no hungry man but wished him food; / no cripple wouldn't creep one mile / uphill to only see him smile' (from 'My Father Moved Through Dooms of Love', 1940), and that Dylan debases further into those sentimentalized portraits of hobo-saints and friends in early songs like 'Only a Hobo' and 'He Was a Friend of Mine' and to which he returns for 'Hurricane' and 'Joey' on Desire.

e.e. cummings died in North Conway, New Hampshire, on September 3, 1962.

[e.e. cummings' Complete Poems, 1913–1962 was published posthumously, in 1973. Wissolik & McGrath, Bob Dylan's Words, Greensburg, PA; Eadmer Press, 1994.]

Daniels, Charlie [1936 -] Charles Edward Daniels was born in Wilmington, North Carolina, on October 28, 1936 and grew up moving around somewhat—mostly living in Wilmington, Elizabethtown and Spartanburg, South Carolina, but always listening to Pentecostal gospel music live and R&B and country music on the radio. He learnt to play guitar, fiddle and mandolin and began performing and songwriting after graduating from high school in Goldston, North Carolina, in 1955. After forming bluegrass band the Misty Mountain Boys and playing guitar for female vocalist Little Jill in a Wilmington bar, he joined the Jaguars, a rock'n'roll band. In Texas they bumped into singer, songwriter and then-tyro producer BOB JOHNSTON, who produced their instrumental single 'Jaguar'. Later, with Johnston, Daniels wrote an ELVIS PRESLEY side, 'It Hurts Me,' which was issued only as a B-side yet deserved better, securing from Presley one of the best, most heartfelt vocal performances for several years, on which he seemed to awake from the stupor induced by making all those vacuous 1960s films. It was at Johnston's urging, at the beginning of 1969, that Daniels moved to Tennessee and applied himself to session work in Nashville.

D

He was at once employed, via Johnston, on a run of Bob Dylan albums, beginning with Nashville Skyline. Daniels played guitar and dobro from the very first session (February 13, 1969). He returned in the spring for the first of the Self Portrait sessions, playing guitar on April 24–25 & 26 and on May 3, and then returned once more in mid-March 1970 and early that April to contribute to the overdubs recorded in Nashville on tracks Dylan had begun in New York earlier that month.

Charlie Daniels also played guitar on Dylan's JOHNNY CASH TV show appearance, filmed on May 1, 1969 and a year later to the day was playing at the session by Dylan and GEORGE HARRISON that yielded, among much else, the version of 'If Not for You' released on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 over 20 years later in 1991. Daniels also played on the New York Dylan sessions held on the first five days of June 1970, which yielded much that has never circulated but from which some of the tracks on the Dylan album were taken, and which, from June 3 onwards, started to provide material for the New Morning album too, on which the studio paperwork suggests Daniels was playing guitar and dobro again (as on 'Went to See the Gypsy'), though the album liner notes online at bobdylan.com credit him with playing electric bass.

By now, though, the session musician had his own first album deal, and that year released the first of what has become an astonishing number of albums, almost all of which have since been billed as by the Charlie Daniels Band. That first album, Charlie Daniels, contributed forcefully to the then-nascent genre, southern rock. He scored a hit as early as 1972 with the novelty song 'Uneasy Rider' on his third album, Honey in the Rock (since renamed after that hit single) and the next album, Fire on the Mountain, was the first of many to go platinum. Several have gone triple platinum. By the time of Songs from the Longleaf Pines in 2005—which sports a creepy recitation of the 91st Psalm, read as if he's pointing a gun at your head—there were a total of 45 such albums, an excess that included no less than three Christmas albums and an increasing tendency, in song and album titles, towards the combatively rightwing and redneck. 'The South's Gonna Do It', America, I Believe in You, '(What This World Needs Is) A Few More Rednecks' and the vigilante barbarism of 'Simple Man' were among the espousals of this good ole boy's repellant world view.

By 2003 Daniels was publishing 'An Open Letter to the Hollywood Bunch', a diatribe against everyone who was anti-war and in foaming defence of George W. Bush's illegal adventurism in Iraq. Sample: 'You people are some of the most disgusting examples of a waste of protoplasm I've ever had the displeasure to hear about. Sean Penn, you're a traitor to the United States of America.' (Worse, there's a misplaced apostrophe: '. . . disbanded it's horrible military . . .') This was collected in a book full of Daniels' political philosophising, Ain't No Rag: Freedom, Family and the Flag (of which surely no-one need read any more than the title). It was not his first book; in 1985, he had published a collection of short stories, The Devil Went Down to Georgia, named after one of his songs.

On the 4th of July 2005 his first DVD release was recorded live in front of 100,000 people in Nashville. That September, Daniels and the band toured US bases in Eastern Europe, Kuwait and Iraq. He cut a bizarre figure out there, resembling as he does these days a cross between a ZZ Top and Santa Claus—but at least he'd put himself where his loud mouth was.

[Charlie Daniels/Charlie Daniels Band: Charlie Daniels, Capitol 11414, US, 1970; 'Uneasy Rider', Honey in the Rock (aka Uneasy Rider), Kama Sutra 2071, US, 1972; 'The South's Gonna Do It', Fire on the Mountain, Kama Sutra 2603, 1974–5; Simple Man, Epic EK-45316, US, 1989; America, I Believe in You, Liberty 80477, US, 1993; '(What This World Needs Is) A Few More Rednecks', Freedom & Justice for All, Audium Entertainment, US, 2003; Songs from the Longleaf Pines, Koch, US, 2005; CDB DVD Live, Koch, 2005. Charlie Daniels, The Devil Went Down to Georgia, Atlanta: Peachtree, 1985; 'An Open Letter to the Hollywood Bunch', collected in Ain't No Rag: Freedom, Family and the Flag, Washington, D.C.: Regnery Publishing, 2003. The Jaguars: 'Jaguar' c/w 'Roundabout', Fort Worth, TX, 1959, Epic 5-9308, 1959.]

Danko, Rick [1942 - 1999] Richard Clare Danko was born at Walsh, near tiny Simcoe, Ontario, just south of the Six Nations Reservation (and just east of a small town named Woodstock, as it happens), on December 29, 1942. He grew up in a musical family, quit school at 14 to concentrate on music, joined RONNIE HAWKINS & the Hawks as rhythm guitarist at 17, and then learnt to play bass on the job—eventually developing his very distinctive style, 'percussive but sliding'. After the group quit Hawkins they went out on the road as LEVON & the Hawks, recorded under the additional name the Canadian Squires, and in 1965 met Bob Dylan.

That September the group rehearsed with Dylan in Woodstock, New York, ready for further live gigs beyond those already played with Levon & ROBBIE (and other, non-Hawk musicians) in the aftermath of 'going electric' at Newport that July. The first Dylan concert Danko played was probably October 1 at Carnegie Hall. Four days later the group went into the studio with Dylan for the first time, followed by more live concerts and on November 30 a second studio stint—two days after Helm had quit—from which comes the single 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?'. This session has also now yielded the version of 'Visions of Johanna' released on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7, 2005.

Back in the studio in New York at Dylan's behest on January 21–22, 1966, the Helmless Hawks helped create that quintessential mid-60s Dylan record, 'She's Your Lover Now' (finally issued on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991). On January 25–28, Dylan got Robertson and Danko back into the studio without the others, added them to AL KOOPER on organ, Paul Griffin on piano, BOBBY GREGG on drums and, alongside Danko as a second bassist, Bill Lee. These sessions yielded 'Sooner or Later (One of Us Must Know)'—and therefore got Danko and Robertson onto Blonde on Blonde (though Danko's name is missing from the credits). They also yielded the rather inferior version of 'I'll Keep It with Mine' that was also issued on Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3.

Then came Dylan's 1966 tour, beginning in Louisville, Kentucky, on February 4 and going across the States, into Canada and Hawaii, over to Australia and then Europe, where they began in Stockholm, Sweden, on April 29 and ended at the Royal Albert Hall in London on May 27. Every musician was crucial to the consummate glory of those performances, but Danko's bass playing was especially dramatic on the intro to the hurled-out 'Like a Rolling Stone' that came at Manchester in response to the shout of 'Judas!' from someone in the crowd, with Dylan's retort of 'I don't believe you!' followed by the explosive challenge of that bass riff coming in, making Dylan's second sentence—'You're a liar!'—part of the song itself: part of the opening tumult.

After all that came the calm of Woodstock and West Saugherties, 1967, when the Hawks were working very differently with Bob Dylan, laying down the Basement Tapes and preparing to turn into THE BAND. Here Dylan began to seek out Danko as his vocalist of choice to harmonise with, whereas within the Hawks he had rarely been more than automatically backing vocalist to MANUEL and Helm.

The exceptions amount to little more than these: that Danko takes lead vocal on Robertson's 'song sketch' '(I Want to Be) The Rainmaker', 1965; he shares lead vocals with Helm & Manuel on the 1965 Levon & the Hawks single 'Go Go Liza Jane'; that he takes lead vocal on the Dylan-free Basement Tapes tracks 'Caledonia Mission' and 'Ferdinand the Imposter'; and that he shares lead vocal with Manuel on another such track, 'Will the Circle Be Unbroken'.

At any rate, it's sometimes been argued that herein lies one of the benefits Dylan derived from working with the Hawks: that harmonising with Danko's countrified wail freed Dylan up to sing out in a country style himself. Danko was the first person Dylan had sung with while fronting an electric group. And it was Danko to whom Dylan gave his dog Hamlet (allegedly after discovering that Hamlet's pedigree was suspect).

The Woodstock sessions saw Dylan and Danko in songwriting partnership too: the great 'This Wheel's on Fire' is a Dylan-Danko composition (though Danko again misses his credit on the original LP cover of The Band's Music from Big Pink) and it is Danko who has won the right to be lead vocalist on their début album recording of the song. Again he's lead singer on 'Caledonia Mission' too, and on 'Long Black Veil', and shares lead vocals on 'The Weight'. He also plays violin on 'Chest Fever'.

On the second album, Danko plays trombone on 'Across the Great Divide' and 'Unfaithful Servant', violin on 'Rag Mama Rag' and 'The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down', and he sings lead on 'When You Awake', 'Look Out Cleveland' and 'Unfaithful Servant'; on the third album, Stage Fright, he sings lead on the title song, and shares lead with Manuel on 'Time to Kill' and with Helm & Manuel on 'The Rumor' and 'W.S. Walcott Medicine Show'. And he plays violin on 'Daniel & the Sacred Harp'.

On Cahoots he co-wrote 'Life Is a Carnival' with Helm and Robertson. It was his first writing credit since Music from Big Pink. Things were falling apart within the group. On Moondog Matinee he played rhythm guitar on one track but only bass on everything else. His main contribution was his lead vocal on SAM COOKE's 'A Change Is Gonna Come'—a lead vocal that wasn't credited on the album sleeve and had many people, GREIL MARCUS included, assuming it was by Richard Manuel.

On Islands Danko managed a co-composer credit with Robertson on 'Street Walker' and with Robertson and HUDSON on the title track, but he wanted out. He, as much as Robertson, wanted to call a halt, and welcomed the grand bow-out that became The Last Waltz.

In a way Danko was the keenest of all to make solo albums, though he looks bereft at the prospect of an uncertain future when, in that film, SCORSESE asks him what his plans are; and in fact after the first solo album, in 1977, 14 years elapsed before the next. Danko's solo (and soloish) albums were: Rick Danko (1977), Danko/Fjeld/Andersen (1991), Ridin' on the Blinds (also an album of shared billing with Eric Andersen and Jonas Fjeld, 1994), In Concert (a poorly recorded return to solo billing, and also to the material of classic Band days, 1997) and Live on Breeze Hill (a better offering, with a larger band, 1999). These were followed by the posthumous Times Like These (a far worthier collection than either of its immediate predecessors, 2000), One More Shot (a live Danko/Fjeld/Andersen CD added to a re-release of their first album from ten years earlier, 2001) and the discountable rehash of A Memorial Edition (2002).

Many Band aficionados feel a special affection for that first solo album—not because it sounds like The Band but because it doesn't. It sounds like Danko in full bloom. Less is more here; his vocal work and his harmonies are tremendous; and the album's particular treats include his song 'New Mexicoe' (co-written with BOBBY CHARLES), which weirdly combines ERIC CLAPTON's electric guitar with Garth Hudson's ghostly hillbilly accordion.

So much promise. And yet . . . Nothing happened to the album at the time, and Danko seemed to disappear in the late 1970s to early '80s—though in fact he turned up on other artists' records, including EMMYLOU HARRIS' Quarter Moon in a Ten Cent Town and Joe Cocker's Luxury You Can Afford. In 1983 he retreated back into the reformed Band—and even then, when those 1990s Band albums finally arrived, it was only on the third and final one, Jubilation, that Danko co-wrote any of the material.

Outside of the group, however, he was not inactive. Encouraged by Levon Helm, Danko took an acting rôle, as the unnamed father of a kidnapped child, in the 1986 film Man Outside (as do Hudson, Helm and Manuel). He played live music with many people, including PAUL BUTTERFIELD and Jorma Kaukonen, and in 1987 released Rick Danko's Electric Bass Techniques, an instructional video. In 1990 (again with Helm and Hudson) he made a guest appearance in Roger Waters' 'The Wall' concert in Berlin (and so in the TV film of the concert, The Wall: Live in Berlin) and then in 1991, prompted by the success of a shared low-profile gig in Woodstock and a follow-up tour of Norway, came Danko/Fjeld/Andersen, which won Norway's equivalent of a Grammy, and is widely felt to capture some of Danko's best work. It was issued in the US in 1993.

By this time Danko and Dylan had combined again. Levon Helm and Rick Danko gigged at the Lone Star Café in New York City in February 1983, and on the 16th, Dylan joined them to sing and play guitar on 'Your Cheatin' Heart', 'Willie and the Hand Jive', 'Ain't No More Cane' and 'Going Down'. In 1992 Danko was a member of The Band that took part in the so-called 30th Anniversary Concert for Dylan at Madison Square Garden, at which they performed 'When I Paint My Masterpiece' and joined the ensemble for the penultimate song of the evening, 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'; on January 17, 1993, he (and Garth and Levon) played with Dylan at President Bill Clinton's inauguration party, the so-called 'Absolutely Unofficial Blue Jeans Bash (For Arkansas)'. And then in 1997, Dylan's long-serving band member TONY GARNIER joined The Band to play stand-up bass on three numbers at their March 20 show in Carnegie Hall, and on August 18, 1997, at a Dylan Never-Ending Tour concert in Wallingford, Connecticut, Rick Danko joined Dylan on stage twice over—to sing with him and play guitar on 'This Wheel's on Fire' and, a few songs later, on 'I Shall Be Released'.

Rick Danko died in his sleep at his home in Woodstock on December 10, 1999. Steve Forbert wrote a tribute song for him, 'Wild as the Wind', which means well and doesn't avoid acknowledging the rôle cocaine played in his life and demise. But Danko's own posthumous album Times Like These is a more substantial tribute to his considerable talents. Everyone who knew him misses the sweet, good-humoured person that it's agreed he was. Everyone who knew the music of The Band misses his artistry.

[Rick Danko: Rick Danko, Arista AB-4141, US, 1977; In Concert, Foxborough, MA, 22 Feb & Clinton, NJ, 6 Mar, 1997, Woodstock Records, US, 1997; Live on Breeze Hill, Breeze Hill/Woodstock, US, 1999; Times Like These, Breeze Hill, US 2000 (different version issued Cora-Zong / Nordic 255034, 2003). Danko/Fjeld/Andersen: Danko /Fjeld/Andersen, nia, Norway, 1991 & Rykodisc, US, 1993; Ridin' on the Blinds: Grappa GRCD 4080, Norway, 1994 (Rykodisc 10371, US, 1997). Man Outside, dir. & written Mark Stouffer, US, 1986. Steve Forbert: 'Wild as the Wind', Neptune, NJ, nia, Just Like There's Nothin' to It, Koch KOC-CD-9534, NY, 2004. For a full Danko discography see http://theband.hiof.no/albums/danko_index.html.]

Darby & Tarlton See 'Columbus Stockade Blues' [1960].

Darby, Tom [1884 - 1971] See 'Columbus Stockade Blues' [1960].

Davis, Blind Gary [1896 - 1972] See Davis, Rev. Gary.

Davis, Jesse Ed [1944 - 1988] A full-blooded Kiowa Indian and teenage ELVIS PRESLEY fan, Jesse Ed Davis was born in Norman, Oklahoma, on September 21, 1944. He started his journey towards becoming a superbly versatile blues guitarist in his early teens by acquiring, like all those penurious pre-war blues guitarists who'd gone before him, a cheap Stella guitar. He formed his first band as a teenager (describing it later as 'an abortive Kingston Trio imitation'), acquired his first electric guitar in seventh grade (a Silvertone) and was taught to play the blues by 'the first really professional musician' he met, a 'black cat named Wallace Thompson' who played in the piano bar lounge of Uncle Tom's Hickory Pit Barbecue. Before launching into a music career he took a degree in literature at the University of Oklahoma; he came out the other end and started touring behind CONWAY TWITTY.

In 1964 he decided to call on his old acquaintanceship with LEVON HELM, who gave him a place to stay when he moved to California. He joined Taj Mahal's band, which included CHUCK BLACKWELL on drums, and played on his albums Taj Mahal (1967), Giant Step (1968–9) and The Natch'l Blues (1969). It was on their version of BLIND WILLIE McTELL's 'Statesboro Blues' that Jesse Ed Davis first added slide guitar to his repertoire. MICK JAGGER and KEITH RICHARDS, fans of Mahal and his band, brought them into the film THE ROLLING STONES' Rock'n'Roll Circus, made in December 1968 (as a TV Special), which brought Davis to the attention of JOHN LENNON, ERIC CLAPTON, GEORGE HARRISON and others.

Davis started doing session work in every area of music, eventually playing for B.B. King, Steve Miller, Helen Reddy, David Cassidy, Albert King, WILLIE NELSON, Rod Stewart, LEON RUSSELL, Wayne Newton, BOOKER T., Gary Lewis & the Playboys, John Lennon, JOHN LEE HOOKER, Jackson Browne, Donovan, NEIL DIAMOND, 5th Dimension, GEOFF MULDAUR, the Pointer Sisters, DAVID BLUE and Jackie de Shannon. That's quite some list. Davis' own musical taste was even broader; in 1974 he told interviewer Steven Rosen he felt that Charlie Parker was in his blood.

1971 seems to have been an especially happy year. Davis produced and played on Gene Clark's second solo album White Light and recorded his own début solo LP, Jesse Davis, on which he wrote most tracks, sang and played keyboards as well as guitars, and on which Leon Russell, Clapton and Gram Parsons all featured. He appeared at the Concert for Bangla Desh, clinched a warm working relationship with George Harrison—whose Native American cousin he somewhat suggested in appearance—by playing on his 'Bangla Desh' single; he did sessions for Leon Russell, Delaney & Bonnie, Buffy Sainte Marie, Ben Sidran and others; and he put onto Jackson Browne's début album (issued January 1972) the striking guitar solo on the track 'Doctor My Eyes'. In 1972 he also made his own second solo album, Ululu, on which he had written less but included MERLE HAGGARD's 'White Line Fever', George Harrison's 'Sue Me, Sue You Blues' and THE BAND's 'Strawberry Wine', and called in CLYDIE KING and Merry Clayton on background vocals. In 1973 came a label change and a third solo album, Keep Me Comin', on which he returned to more self-penned numbers and featured a battalion of background vocalists and a seven-man horn section.

From the mid-1970s onwards life proved difficult for Davis, despite worldly success and the respect in which his playing was held. He played on John Lennon's Walls and Bridges and Rock'n'Roll Songs, contributed the poignant slide guitar to Clapton's No Reason to Cry track 'Hello Old Friend' and many other things besides—including singing on Bryan Ferry's album These Foolish Things (1973) and playing on Bert Jansch's LA Turnaround and Harry Nilsson's Pussy Cats (both 1974)—but he lived a life of LA-based excess, often hanging out with Lennon and Nilsson through binge drinking sessions and once fighting Lennon so hard while both were drunk that Davis' girlfriend called in the police.

Though drugs were as much a part of Davis' life as alcohol, he could continue to play and function on tour and in the studio (working with Van Dyke Parks, Keith Moon and RINGO STARR), and it was in this period that he and Bob Dylan came together, first on the LEONARD COHEN session that Dylan and ALLEN GINSBERG dropped in on in March 1977, all of them contributing to the track 'Don't Go Home With Your Hard-On', released on Death of a Ladies' Man. On the last two days of the same year, Davis rehearsed with Dylan in Santa Monica for a place in the 1978 World Tour band. In the event, he didn't get it or didn't take it.

In the mid-1980s Davis met up with fellow Native American performer John Trudell, and told him: 'I can make music for your words.' Trudell said later: 'With Jesse and me, we each came from our collective Indian experience, and had our individual experiences in the non-Indian world. We had both literally been to the last door of hell, opened it and saw what was inside.' Their first album together, aka Graffiti Man, comprising ten tracks of Trudell's spoken poetry fused with Davis' guitar and keyboards, was issued on Trudell's own small label Peace Company, and only on cassette; yet Dylan not only heard it but told Rolling Stone magazine it was 'the best album of 1986' and had it played over the PA system to the crowds in the intermission at his July 1987 concerts with THE GRATEFUL DEAD. Four months earlier, that March 5 in a Hollywood studio, Jesse Ed Davis and Dylan came together one last time. It was a Dylan session, and with four other musicians (on unspecified instruments) they recorded takes of four songs: 'Street People', 'Sidewalks', the ELIZABETH COTTEN song 'Shake Sugaree', and 'My Prayer' (possibly the old hit by the Platters). None was issued. None has circulated.

Davis and Trudell—who now barely mentions Davis on his own website's discography—made a second album together that year, called Heart Jump Bouquet, and a Tribal Voice series recording, . . . But This Isn't El Salvador. But Jesse Ed Davis died of a drug overdose on June 22, 1988 in a laundromat in Venice, California.

[Jesse Ed Davis: Jesse Davis, Atco SD33-346, US, 1971, CD-reissued Atlantic 7567-80772-2, 1999; Ululu, Atco, 1972; Keep Me Comin', Epic KE32133, US, 1973. John Trudell & Jesse Ed Davis: aka Graffiti Man, Peace Company TPC5158 (cassette only), US, 1986; Heart Jump Bouquet, TPC-21587 (cassette only), US, 1978; . . . But This Isn't El Salvador, Tribal Voice, nia, US, 1987.

George Harrison, 'Bangla Desh', Apple R5912, US, 1971. Jackson Browne: Jackson Browne, Asylum 7E-5051, US, 1972. John Lennon: Walls and Bridges, Apple SW-3416, US, 1974; Rock'n'Roll, Apple 3419, US, 1975. Eric Clapton: 'Hello Old Friend', No Reason to Cry, RSO 2479179, US, 1976. The Rolling Stones Rock'n'Roll Circus, dir. Michael Lindsay-Hogg; ABKCO, US, 1968, re-released US, 1996. Steven Rosen interview, Guitar Player, US, Mar 1974. John Trudell quoted from profile seen online 19 Jan 2006 at www.spitfiretour.org/trudell.html. Some discographical detail from www.geocities.jp/hideki_wtnb/jessedavis.html; none from www.johntrudell.com/discography.html.]

Davis, Rev. Gary [1896 - 1972] Gary Davis, who was born in Laurens, South Carolina, on April 30, 1896, was one of those whose influence touched both other blues musicians of the pre-war era and the post-war folk and blues revivalists. Among the former, Davis' dexterous finger-picking guitar style especially affected BLIND BOY FULLER, whom he taught, and among the latter he was a dramatic presence whose repertoire and delivery pressed upon everyone from DAVE VAN RONK to Taj Mahal, though part of his armory was his attempted replication of the songs and style of BLIND WILLIE JOHNSON.

The Reverend Gary Davis (aka Blind Gary Davis) comes recommended by ROBERT SHELTON for a 'marvellously rough and penetrating voice' and for carrying on 'Blind Willie Johnson's tradition of "the holy blues"', deploying 'Heartfelt blues vocal and guitar language, dressed up in religious togs by a curbstone preacher.' The pioneering British blues critic Bruce Bastin calls him 'superb' and 'a superlative guitarist'. Other blues connoisseurs are less keen; while recognising his technical mastery it is very possible to be unmoved by his somewhat brusque, often overbearing style. And Blind Willie Johnson he ain't.

His first recordings were made in New York City over three days in 1935. He moved to New York in the early 1940s, recording next in 1945 and frequently thereafter. He was around to be heard and admired before the rush of 'rediscovered' pre-war greats arrived on the folk revival scene, was established within before Bob Dylan was first exploring Greenwich Village, and was thus a major figure on the Folk Festival and college circuit (appearing, for instance, at the Mariposa Festival of 1959 and at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL in 1963). Dylan lists him in Chronicles Volume One as one of the singers he'd heard on record before he reached New York City—one of those he had come there to find; later in the book he says he had followed him around in those early Greenwich Village days, seeing him as 'one of the wizards of modern music' and as someone who looked 'like he'd been raised upright and was watching over things, keeping constant vigilance over what was happening.' An eerie impression for a blind man to convey.

Items in Gary Davis' sets that have a connection with Dylan's own include 'You're Goin' Quit Me Baby' [sic], 'Jesus Met the Woman at the Well', 'Motherless Children', 'Cocaine Blues' and 'There Was a Time When I Was Blind'.

Dylan was taped singing this last item and Davis' 'Death Don't Have No Mercy' in Minneapolis back in May 1961. (Aeons later, in the psychedelic 60s, THE GRATEFUL DEAD made a near-endless version of the latter one of their standards). And though on his début-album track 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down', Dylan says he learnt the song from (E)RIC VON SCHMIDT 'in the green pastures of Harvard University', he was aware that it could be traced back to Davis' 'Baby, Let Me Lay It on You'—and further back beyond that all the way to MEMPHIS MINNIE and her second husband, Joe McCoy. Davis finally committed it to tape in 1968, his version predictably close to Blind Boy Fuller's, confirming that he had had it in his repertoire since the 1930s. (For a more detailed history, see separate entry on this song.)

At some point when Dylan was exploring out loud with SUZE ROTOLO the possibility of marrying her, he suggested, if more than half jokingly, that they could get Davis to perform the ceremony—or at least sing at it.

Dylan recalls Davis in these Greenwich Village years as switching—oddly, for someone who was ashamed of his blues side and was supposed to have renounced it—between religious and devil's music:

'Strange, he used to sing "Twelve Gates to the City", "Yonder at the Cross" and then "Baby, Let Me Lay It on You".' This typical piece of Dylan eloquence tells us with brevity something that's true in spirit and in its surprisingly specific detail too. The Davis discography confirms that Dylan's recollection is likely to be absolutely right. At a 1962 gig he sang 'Sally, Where You Get Your Liquor

From?' straight after 'If I Had My Way (I'd Tear the Building Down'), and when, later in the 1960s, he recorded at his music-publisher's office, Davis followed 'Oh Glory, How Happy I Am' with 'Cocaine Blues'.

Gary Davis, who remained secretive all his life about the details of when and how he had become blind, died in Hammonton, New Jersey, on May 5, 1972.

[Davis first recorded his 'Twelve Gates to the City' as by Blind Gary, NY, 26 Jul 1935, 1st vinyl-issued Rev. Gary Davis 1935–1949, Yazoo L-1023, NY, 1970. His first recordings of the Dylan-connection items were: Rev. Gary Davis: 'You're Goin' Quit Me Baby', 'Oh Glory, How Happy I Am' & 'Cocaine Blues', NY, 1963 or 1968, Let Us Get Together, Kicking Mule SNKF 103, London, 1973; Blind Gary Davis (with SONNY TERRY): 'Jesus Met the Woman at the Well' & 'Motherless Children', NY, Apr 1954, Blind Gary Davis with Sonny Terry, Stinson SLP 56, NY, 1954; Blind Gary Davis: 'There Was a Time When I Was Blind', NY, 29 Jan 1956, Rev. Gary Davis & Pink Anderson Gospel, Blues and Street Songs, Riverside LP 148, NY, prob. 1961; Rev. Gary Davis: 'Death Don't Have No Mercy', Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 24 Aug 1960, Harlem Street Singer, Prestige Bluesville BVLP 1015, Bergenfield, NJ, 1961; Blind Gary Davis: 'Baby, Let Me Lay It on You', Ann Arbor, MI, 1968, Lo' I Be With You Always, Kicking Mule LP1, London 1973. He never recorded the title 'Yonder at the Cross'. Rev. Gary Davis: 'If I Had My Way' and 'Sally, Where You Get Your Liquor From', Paoli, PA, 8 Sep 1962; Philadelphia Folk Festival Vol.2, Prestige International 13072, c.1963.

Bob Dylan: 'Death Don't Have No Mercy' & 'It's Hard to Be Blind', Minneapolis, May 1961, unissued. The Grateful Dead: 'Death Don't Have No Mercy', San Francisco, 2 Mar 1969, Live/Dead, Warner Bros. 2WS 1830, LA, 1969.

Bob Dylan 1st quote from the Biograph box set interview, 1985; Chronicles Volume One quote p.191 (& earlier listing p.9). Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, 1986. Bruce Bastin, Cryin' for the Carolines, London: Studio Vista, 1971, p.26. For more on Davis see Robert Tilling's 1992 book Oh! What a Beautiful City: A Tribute to Rev. Gary Davis 1896–1972.]

Day, Aidan [1952 -] Aidan Day was born on April 19, 1952. An English Literature academic, he was at Edinburgh University from 1984 to 2001, becoming Professor of Nineteenth Century and Contemporary Literature in 1999; in 2001 he became Professor of British Literature and Culture at the University of Aarhus, Denmark. His books include Romanticism, 1995, Angela Carter: The Rational Glass, 1998, and Tennyson's Scepticism, 2005. He and CHRISTOPHER RICKS were joint editors of the 31-volume facsimile-edition hardback series The Tennyson Archive (1987–1993).

Aidan Day first listened to Dylan with interest in 1972. His first work on Dylan was no.3 in the Wanted Man Study Series edited by JOHN BAULDIE, Bob Dylan: Escaping on the Run, 1984, which had first been delivered as an undergraduate lecture at the West London Institute of Higher Education that February. His essay 'Reels of Rhyme: Mr. Tambourine Man' was published in The Telegraph in 1986, and, slightly revised, republished in All Across the Telegraph the following year. Most recently he contributed the essay 'Looking for Nothing: Dylan Now' to the book Do You Mr. Jones?: Bob Dylan with the Poets and Professors, 2002.

His most substantial scrutiny of Dylan's work, however, lies within his 1988 book Jokerman: Reading the Lyrics of Bob Dylan, which, three years ahead of STEPHEN SCOBIE's Alias Bob Dyan, was the first to pioneer a postmodernist approach to Dylan's work, the first to apply to him the preoccupations of post-structuralist criticism—in which the canon has crumbled, the 'authority' of the author has gone and the most interesting source for the work is the work itself.

This new criticism is based on ideas that had been hovering in the outside critical-intellectual world since late 1960s/early 1970s work by Roland Barthes, Jacques Derrida and other cultural studies guerrillas (though this slow momentum of ideas really began far earlier, perhaps with a book of radical linguistics by Ferdinand de Saussure published in 1916, which leads into the post-Saussurean linguistics of the 1970s of Jacques Lacan, Louis Hjelmslev and others; there is also the German Rezeptionsästhetik developed from Hans Robert Jauss by Wolfgang Iser and others).

Post-structuralist criticism is especially alert to questions of identity, its fragmentedness and open-endedness. This means a stress on who-and-what Bob Dylan is, and what his 'text' is, and a keen scrutiny of his 'self-referring' songs, his 'self-reflexive texts'—for instance those products of the Muse which are about seeking, chasing and needing the Muse (a prime example is 'Mr. Tambourine Man'); those songs which, as Day puts it so concisely, 'take as their immediate subject the creative processes by which they are themselves brought into being'.

Likewise postmodern questions about how we see the individual and the self fire Day's interest in Dylan's 'non-linear narratives': songs like 'Tangled Up in Blue' that don't have a fixed or clearly identifiable voice telling a clear sequential story—songs which, he argues, reflect the non-linear (tangled up) way the human brain is currently thought to perceive and interpret the world in front of it and the past behind it. His concern here is for 'lyrics which open out into an exploration of the workings of the psyche as a whole': including 'Shelter from the Storm', 'Isis' and (via 'I Shall Be Released') 'Tangled Up in Blue'.

This last excites Aidan Day also because of a fundamental effect that comes, he argues, from the way the lyric splits its 'I' into an 'I' and a 'he', and splits its 'she' into what may be a series of shes, and into 'she' and 'you'. The effect is this:

> 'Considerable inventive effort on the part of the reader is provoked whether the lyric is taken either as one story or as a series of stories. Co-operation in the making of the story may be demanded of the reader of any narrative. The specially modernist feature of "Tangled Up in Blue" is that the fragmentation of linear structure, together with the indeterminacy generated by that fragmentation about whether we are in the presence of one or more stories, encourages specific awareness of the creative role of the audience in reading or hearing narrative.'

That's at the heart of the new-critical claim, and it's followed up by an eloquent, admirably confident passage of Barthesian generalisation about our deep psyches:

> '. . . teasing us into generating story, "Tangled Up in Blue" also explores the extent to which the mind is fundamentally disposed to think in terms of story or narrative. The conscious self is inseparable from the stories of its own life that it ceaselessly recites, however silently, to itself. . . . in the same way cultures frame themselves through myths of origin, through histories and through fictions of the future . . . the subject of the lyric is in one sense the inescapability of the narrative impulse itself. But more than this, in its disturbance of narrative order the lyric simultaneously inquires into the possibility of something beyond such order.'

Day similarly looks at 'Brownsville Girl', and then slides back across the years to Blonde on Blonde to find Dylan's 'Visions of Johanna' again advancing a post-structuralist concern, by questioning the validity of 'the fixities of a classical canon'. Day is very good here on what's very good about 'Mona Lisa musta had the highway blues / you can tell by the way she smiles', noting that this frustration with canonised fixity 'is pictured acutely and comically as being experienced from within the canon. Established orders are not modified simply from without, but themselves contain the seeds of their own exhaustion. The colloquialism which here defines the Mona Lisa's unease—her boredom with her own status—itself constitutes an affront to and an erosion of the laws of approved respect that conventionally hem her in.'

There could be no better fusion than this between the critic's clear statement of his post-modernist idea and the equally clear summation of how Dylan's intuitive lines evoke the truth of it. It's at such moments, and there are many, that Day's seems a great book.

It seems a pity, therefore, that after many chapters admirably alert to language, and liberatingly adept at using it, Aidan Day ends up spending ten pages on the song his book is named after, 'Jokerman', as if it's a philosophy essay: you'd not think there was poetry there at all. Many lines of the song are quoted, but apart from the one phrase 'with fine ironic understatement' Day never says a word about how they work or what they achieve. They're just there on the page, shining out against prose like this: 'Recurrently imaged as occupying a position removed from ordinary reality he is at the same time never envisaged as fully transcending that reality. . . . But, more complexly, across the lyric as a whole, the principle of the Jokerman resists containment within a constant dualistic frame of reference.' It's a pity because Aidan Day himself wouldn't hone in on so brilliant a user of language as Bob Dylan at all if he didn't prefer language that's alive to language that isn't.

Day himself says now that while he is 'still happy with some of the ideas in the book' he is 'not happy with the manner in which' he wrote it. Nevertheless, the book stands up for itself, and thanks to it, Day's contribution has been a large one, both introducing post-structuralist ideas into the writings about Dylan and highlighting those areas of Dylan's art that seem to reflect such ideas right back at us.

[Aidan Day, Romanticism, London: Routledge, 1995; Angela Carter: The Rational Glass, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1998; Tennyson's Scepticism, London: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005; Bob Dylan: Escaping on the Run, Bury, UK: Wanted Man Study Series no.3, 1984; 'Reels of Rhyme: Mr. Tambourine Man', The Telegraph no.24, Bury, summer 1986 & Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds., All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: Sigwick & Jackson, 1977; 'Looking for Nothing: Dylan Now', Do You Mr. Jones?: Bob Dylan with the Poets and Professors, ed. Neil Corcoran, London: Chatto & Windus, 2002; Jokerman: Reading the Lyrics of Bob Dylan, Oxford: Blackwell, 1988 & (slightly amended) 1990. Quotation above is from the 1990 edition.]

Deevoy, Adrian [1964 -] It's generally forgotten that when the Never-Ending Tour started, in June 1988, it wasn't called that at all. It had no real name, official or otherwise, but was sometimes called 'Interstate 88', after the design on its backstage passes. Adrian Deevoy, born in London on September 5, 1964 and first interested in Dylan's work at the age of five (his mother says), and who became a UK music journalist on Q magazine's staff in the 1980s, has the distinction of having invented the term 'the Never-Ending Tour'—a name he put to Dylan during a Rhode Island interview for Q in October 1989.

Oddly, when he wrote the interview up for the magazine, Deevoy put the phrase into Dylan's mouth (nothing odd about a journalist doing that, the artist mutters), like so: '[Deevoy:] "Tell me about the live thing. The last tour has gone virtually straight into this one." "Oh," he begins, establishing brief, cautious eye contact. "It's all the same tour. The Never-Ending Tour . . ."'

But when you listen to the recording, it goes like this:

AD: 'Tell me about the live thing. You've gone straight into this, into this tour again—one tour virtually straight into the next one.'
BD: 'Oh, it's all the same tour.'
AD: 'It's the Never-Ending Tour.'
BD [unenthusiastically]: 'Yeah. Yeah.'

So it was Deevoy, not Dylan, who coined this phrase we all use.

[Adrian Deevoy: Dylan interview, Narraganset, RI, Oct 22, 1989, published Q no.39, London, Dec 1989. Also author of 'The Untold Story of an Extraordinary Fax to Q Magazine, The Telegraph no.50, Romford, UK, winter 1994; & co-writer, with Kevin Godley, of screenplay Where the Treetops Glisten, due to go into production 2006.]

Dennis, Carolyn [1954 -] Carol Yvonne (aka Carolyn) Dennis, born in Compton, Greater Los Angeles, in April 1954, is a gospel singer and gospel/rock backing vocalist who has appeared on albums by, among others, the Carpenters, Harry Chapin, TRACY CHAPMAN, Art Garfunkel, Michael Jackson, Gladys Knight, Olivia Newton-John, SMOKEY ROBINSON, David Soul, BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN, Candi Staton, Donna Summer and STEVIE WONDER. She has also appeared on stage with Bob Dylan, as well as on a number of his albums. When first prompted to work with him, she is reputed to have asked 'Who is Bob Dylan?' She soon found out.

Carolyn Dennis married Bob Dylan on June 4, 1986 and they have a daughter, Desiree Gabrielle Dennis-Dylan, born January 31, 1986 in Canoga Park, California. She is mentioned in the long dedication list on the sleeve of that year's album, Knocked Out Loaded. Carolyn Dennis filed for divorce on August 7, 1990, and obtained it in October 1992. This information was first 'revealed' in the HOWARD SOUNES biography of Dylan, Down the Highway: The Life of Bob Dylan, 2001.

Carolyn Dennis joined Dylan's ensemble in 1978, starting after the February–April first leg of the tour, which had gone through Japan, New Zealand and Australia. First she was brought into the studios to sing back-up on the Street Legal sessions, and then when the North American leg of the tour began on June 1 in LA, JERRY SCHEFF replaced ROB STONER on bass and Carolyn Dennis replaced Debi Dye, joining Jo Ann Harris and HELENA SPRINGS on backing vocals.

She remained part of the group until the tour's last night, December 16 in Hollywood, Florida, and in the course of it sang SAM COOKE's 'A Change Is Gonna Come' solo at Nuremberg, Germany, on July 1 and in front of 300,000 people at Blackbushe, England, on July 15. At soundchecks she, Harris and Springs sang 'One More Cup of Coffee', 'To Ramona', 'Mr. Tambourine Man', 'Where Are You Tonight (Journey Through Dark Heat)?', 'Am I Your Stepchild?', 'True Love Tends to Forget' and 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35', and as from November 10 (in Seattle), most concerts' second halves began with the three of them singing 'Rainy Day Women'. She also brought her childhood friend REGINA McCRARY (aka Regina Havis) into Dylan's orbit by getting him to audition her when the tour arrived in Nashville on December 2.

Throughout the tour, Dylan gave playful onstage introductions of his backing group personnel. Examples, from September: at Portland, Maine on the 16th: 'My current girlfriend, Carolyn Dennis'; New Haven, Connecticut, on the 17th: 'my ex-girlfriend, Carolyn Dennis'; Springfield, Massachusetts, on the 26th: 'On the left my fiancée Carolyn Dennis; and in the middle, my current girlfriend, Helena Springs'; Uniondale, NY, on the 27th: 'my fiancée Carolyn Dennis—wishful thinking!' At Greensboro, North Carolina, on December 7 he introduced 'my ex-girlfriend Jo Ann Harris, my new girlfriend Helena Springs and my fiancée Carolyn Dennis.' For the last few gigs of the tour, he called her 'the true love of my life, my fiancée. Carolyn Dennis.'

Dennis, Springs and the newly recruited Regina McCrary then put backing-vocal overdubs onto the Slow Train Coming album in May 1979 in Sheffield, Alabama—and then Regina replaced Dennis for Dylan's first gospel tour, in November–December 1979.

She was then in the group that played the short second gospel tour, from January 11 (Portland, Oregon) to February 9 (Charleston, West Virginia); she was then absent from the recording sessions for the Saved album in February, and from the third and last gospel tour, from April 17 (Toronto) to May 21 (Dayton, Ohio); but returned to take part in the magnificent concerts that fall from November 9 at the Fox Warfield, San Francisco, to December 4 (Portland, Oregon again); on most nights of the tour she sang 'Walking Around Heaven All Day' as a solo mid-way through.

Next she took part in the concerts starting June 10, 1981 in Chicago and finishing July 25 in Avignon, France—in which she sang lead solo on 'Walking Around Heaven All Day', this time every night—but then there was a four-years-plus gap. Dennis next worked with Dylan when he made some demos in a Hollywood studio on Hallowe'en 1985 (we don't know what songs these were: they haven't circulated), and then in Topanga Park, California, in late April to early May 1986 she was among those recording 'You'll Never Walk Alone', 'Unchain My Heart', 'Lonely Avenue', 'Without Love', 'It's Too Late', 'Come Back Baby (One More Time)' and 'Wild and Wicked World' with Dylan—none of which has been released—as well as Knocked Out Loaded material, and overdubs on a couple of other unreleased tracks, 'So Good' and 'I Need Your Lovin''.

Two days after their marriage Dennis was back-up singing on stage with Dylan at the Amnesty International Benefit Concert in Inglewood, California, and for the rest of the second leg of the True Confessions Tour with Dylan and TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS, finishing on August 6, 1986, at Paso Robles, CA. The other side of Dylan's subsequent dates with THE GRATEFUL DEAD, Dennis was part of the 1987 Temples in Flames tour beginning with Dylan's début in Israel on September 5 and ending at London's Wembley Arena on October 17.

On record, she was also on Shot of Love, Empire Burlesque and Down in the Groove. (She is sometimes wrongly listed as a participant on the albums Dylan and Saved.)

In Chronicles Volume One Dylan writes of Dennis many times, though referring to her only as 'my wife', and dealing with the period around the recording of Oh Mercy (on which there are no background vocals). Dylan describes her first as someone who 'could make me feel like I wasn't in some godforsaken hole.' She is also glimpsed announcing that she's 'going up to bed' rather than listen to BONO and Bob drone on for hours while drinking a case of Guinness. Then she's riding on the back of Dylan's 1966 Harley-Davidson Police Special motorcycle on the beautifully described trip they take around small parts of Louisiana (though again she prefers reading John Le Carré out on the patio of King Tut's Museum to the conversation inside between Dylan and the mysterious Sun Pie). The last thing he writes about her is that she has 'the ability to see a grain of truth in just about anything.' She leaves New Orleans to take part in a gospel play in Baltimore.

Carolyn Dennis is the daughter of MADELYN QUEBEC, who has also been a Dylan back-up singer.

[Website http://home.cogeco.ca/~mansion1/carolyndennis.html lists artists whose albums Dennis has appeared on, but re Dylan albums wrongly lists her as singing on Dylan and Saved; correct information re her concert and studio contributions is listed by Trevor Midgley at www.geocities.com/trevormidgley/GiggingBands.html, seen online 5 Aug 2005. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, pp.164, 175, 199–209 & 211.]

Desire* [1976] Dylan's 18th album and the next newly recorded studio work after Blood on the Tracks, it proved to be Dylan's biggest seller, finding him a new following among teenagers who would hardly have been toddlers when the mid-60s Dylan was so much in vogue. After such a predecessor it was bound to be a disappointment but it is an important album nonetheless—a work with its own distinctive unity yet with most of Dylan's traditional strengths: not least wit, warmth, energy and a beautiful disregard for finishing things off with professional songwriterly polish.

The downside is, in part, that the featherweight pop song is back in Dylan's repertoire with 'Mozambique' and the protest song is back in 'Hurricane', the weakness of which is shown by how much better the music is than the ideas behind the words; the hollowness of 'He could have bin the champion of the world' having been assured, years and years earlier, by Dylan's own youthful, sharper 'Davey Moore'.

Even on the more substantial songs on Desire there is a distinct falling-away from the incisiveness of the Blood on the Tracks collection, by virtue of Dylan's shift of preoccupation, away from an engaged concentration on the corrosions of time and failures of love, and towards a more mystical, religious focus.

'Oh Sister' thrusts this new emphasis at us, yet also suggests, with a plainness it's hard to understand how we could have ignored at the time, that part of Dylan's religious focus is on its way to the conventionally Christian: 'We grew up together from the cradle to the grave / We died and were reborn and then mysteriously saved.' (It also seemed to stand, back then, as a hopelessly clumsy attempt at dialogue with the new 1970s generation of liberated woman—clumsy not least in making bluntly clear, from lines like 'And is our purpose not the same on this earth / To love and follow His direction?' that he had not been listening to a word of the new politics of gender. It seemed important at the time.)

All of this sternness underrates the album, in some ways caused more by the fact of its coming after Blood on the Tracks than because of its own weaknesses—which are, after all, largely the result of its limitations of scope and intention. More importantly, Desire revealed a Dylan still wanting to experiment, still refusing to stand in one place.

One experiment was the songwriting collaboration with JACQUES LEVY, who co-wrote every song on the album except for 'One More Cup of Coffee' and 'Sara'. (For more on 'Sara' see Poe, Edgar Allan.)

The resulting album has exploratory strengths of its own that were easy to overlook when it was new and remain difficult to write about even now. Never before had Dylan so utterly made his word content the servant of his music. The precise, almost mathematical interlocking of the two is primarily what concerns him on this album. He is serving an apprenticeship here, at something new. Who else would have done that, after scoring so total a success as Blood on the Tracks?

The nature of this apprenticeship—of honed communication of feeling, emotion sparked off at the innate mystery of things and places and sounds—is well suggested in ALLEN GINSBERG's short sleevenotes to the album. They merit much re-reading and make a lot of unpindownable sense—in exactly the same way as the album itself.

Recorded in the summer lull before the first Rolling Thunder tour and released soon after it, the stand-out tracks are 'Isis', 'Romance in Durango' and 'Black Diamond Bay', but 'Hurricane', 'One More Cup of Coffee' and 'Oh Sister' are breathing down their necks.

[Recorded NY, 28 & 30–31 Jul and 24 Oct 1975, released as Columbia PC 33893 (CBS 86003 in UK), 5 or 16 Jan 1976.]

Desolation Row Information Service, the See Baldwin, John.

'Dharma & Greg' [1999] In August 1999 Dylan was filmed participating briefly in episode 51 of the TV sitcom 'Dharma & Greg', shown on ABC-TV that October 12. The episode was titled 'Play Lady Play' and Dylan is seen as himself yet as a bandleader sitting there as Dharma (Jenna Elfman) on drums says 'You count it in'. Dylan replies, 'I'll count it in, yeah. Yeah!' A short conversation follows, in which she casts doubt on his taste for funkiness. Dylan picks up a guitar, sketches some maralinga and polka-style riffs and laughs.

Dylan agreed to take part after being asked by one of the sitcom's writers, Eddie Gorodetsky, a Dylan acquaintance. Taping took an hour. Dylan appeared unbilled.

Diamond, Neil [1941 -] Neil Leslie Diamond was born in Brooklyn on January 24, 1941—making him exactly four months older than Bob Dylan. He is a singer-songwriter who has enjoyed a number of hits with records that manage to be both oleaginous and knowing, so fusing two unappealing qualities. His only known connection with Bob Dylan is that because ROBBIE ROBERTSON had produced a Neil Diamond album, Diamond was squeezed into the roster of artists performing at THE BAND's so-called Farewell Concert in San Francisco on November 25, 1976—squeezed in, ignominiously, by reducing MUDDY WATERS' performance time—and that reportedly when he came off stage he said to Dylan, 'Beat that!': to which Dylan replied, 'Waddaya want me to do—go on stage and fall asleep?'

Diaz, César [c.1952 - 2002] César Carillo-Diaz was the Puerto Rican guitar amplifier specialist, a technician and designer brought onto the Never-Ending Tour staff by G.E. SMITH, whom he'd known since 1970, to look after Dylan's and Smith's equipment. He was born in Old San Juan, Puerto Rico, around 1952, played guitar from the age of six and moved to the US mainland while playing in Johnny Nash's group in 1969.

When G.E. Smith was leaving Dylan's band, Diaz was promoted to temporary guitarist band member—a number of people were tried out in this period—first playing on stage on September 11, 1990 in Santa Fe, New Mexico, and the next night in Mesa, Arizona. There was then a one-month break, and when the tour resumed in Greenvale, New York, on October 11, Diaz was again a guitarist, remaining so for each concert from then until the last of the year, at Detroit on November 18. On stage he had a nifty slouch, wearing a variety of headgear and black leather trousers, and could have been a slimmer brother to bass player TONY GARNIER.

He remained a band member for the whole first leg of the 1991 tour, from Zurich on February 28 through to the fourth and final Mexican concert in Mexico City on March 2. He remained on the team as a techie and guitar tuner and was always available to come back up front when required, as for the last seven songs of Dylan's 18-song set in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, that November 15th.

On the last day of June 1992 he was brought on stage at Dylan's Dunkirk festival set to play guitar on the sixth song, 'What Good Am I?' and to play dobro on the tenth, 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall'. Twelve days later, in Antibes on the French Riviera, César played guitar on 'Highway 61 Revisited' in mid-set. In London on February 7, 1993, he played guitar on 'Mr. Tambourine Man', also in mid-set, and that July 13, in Cascais, Portugal, he played on a number of songs.

Diaz left later in 1993 to devote more time to his amplifier business and to be at home with his family more often, yet as late as December 1995, when the last leg of that year's Never-Ending Tour reached Philadelphia, he made a brief swansong appearance, playing on the last encore number of the night, 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'. He had played at a total of around 50 concerts, and on the televised Grammy Awards Show of February 20, 1991.

He was a thoughtful interviewee on the subject of Bob Dylan's musicianship, not sharing the widely held view that it is mainly characterised by its dodginess. This 'outspoken advocate of tube amps and vintage guitars', as Guitar Player magazine described him in 1993, said of Dylan: 'Whoever he learned to play the guitar from must have been very old, because his chording and approach to melody is so old-fashioned. For example, he plays a first-position Dm [D minor] by fingering F on the D string, A on the G string and D on the B string. He has this formula worked out where he plays these triadic shapes all up and down the neck.' (Which we can now see corresponds closely to what Dylan, in Chronicles Volume One, says—in much less clear terms—that he was taught by the pre-war guitar great LONNIE JOHNSON.)

Diaz went on to tell the magazine: 'I've seen Bob do some amazing ragtime and Travis-style fingerpicking. Listen to his first album, and you'll hear some incredible shit! And the tone of those Gibson guitars! The recorded sound of the acoustic guitar was defined by him. Listen to that original version of "Don't Think Twice". When he starts doing that flatpicking thing on the low strings—my God, not even DOC WATSON had that kind of tone.'

It was Diaz's testimony too that gave us this example of Dylan's eccentricity on the road in the early 1990s: 'the crew stay at Hyatt Regency and all the nice hotels, and Bob and the band stay at Motel 6 at the side of the road away from town. . . . he likes to see what the low life is like so he can get inspiration. So we would stay at all these places where you . . . would roll back the sheets to go to sleep and you could see that somebody had slept there the night before.'

César Diaz, who towards the end of his life became a great friend of DEREK & TRACY BARKER of Isis fanzine, died in the US while waiting for a second liver transplant on April 26, 2002 at age 50.

[César Diaz, 1st quote Guitar Player, nia, quoted from Isis no. 48, UK, 1993; 2nd quote interview by Derek Barker, Old San Juan, Puerto Rico, 23–25 Mar 1999, 'A Chat with César Diaz, part 2', Isis no. 84, UK, Apr–May 1999.]

Diddley, Bo [1928 -] Otha Ellas Bates, later known as Ellas or Elias McDaniel, aka Bo Diddley, was born near McComb, Mississippi, on December 30, 1928, was adopted by his mother's cousin in infancy and moved to Chicago in childhood. From 1946 to 1951 he played in the Washboard Trio but signed to Chess Records' Checker label in 1955, swiftly establishing his reputation and imposing his defiantly zany persona on the worlds of R&B and rock'n'roll with the eponymous hit 'Bo Diddley', which utilised a distinctive and 'primitive' shuffle beat and laid down a blueprint for much of his own subsequent work as well as for records by others, notably including BUDDY HOLLY's 'Not Fade Away' (which Bob Dylan began to perform in concert as from the first night of the opening leg of the 1999 part of the Never-Ending Tour). Bo Diddley employed an array of preposterously shaped electric guitars (mostly custom Gretsches) and was an early live exponent, long before JIMI HENDRIX, of playing his instrument behind his head and with his teeth.

In Chronicles Volume One, 2004, Dylan recalls that one of his Minnesota-based singer friends, DAVE RAY, was 'a high school kid who sang . . . Bo Diddley songs on a twelve-string guitar, probably the only twelve-string guitar in the entire Midwest'. Bob Dylan, Bo Diddley: spoken aloud, they're strangely similar names.

At the rehearsal for his unusual Supper Club gigs in New York City in 1993 Dylan played an instrumental version of 'Bo Diddley'. More significantly, George White's 1995 book Bo Diddley—Living Legend claims that the debt of Dylan's Blonde on Blonde track 'Obviously 5 Believers' is to a 1956 Bo Diddley track, 'She's Fine, She's Mine'. Certainly you could make a case that the Dylan arrangement owes something to the shuffle-beat, maracas and harmonica set-up that Diddley creates on that record, but White seems unaware of the earlier blues records upon which the Diddley song too is based.

If Bo Diddley and Bob Dylan both look back here to MEMPHIS MINNIE and her 'Me and My Chauffeur Blues', they also share the more unlikely repertoire item 'Some Enchanted Evening'. Diddley, appearing live on the Ed Sullivan TV Show after having been told at rehearsal by the irascible Sullivan to stop singing 'Bo Diddley' because it was wrong to sing a song mentioning his own name all the time, and to sing 'Some Enchanted Evening' instead, duly did so—but segued into 'Bo Diddley' in the middle. Bob Dylan recorded 'Some Enchanted Evening' at a Los Angeles session for the 1990 album Under the Red Sky during March–April 1990; it remains uncirculated.

Under the Red Sky was the album on which Dylan explored nursery rhyme in an intelligent, resourceful and poetic way, befitting someone who understands that it is not a dismissable, trivial genre but a legitimate, often highly valuable branch of folksong. One of the many African-American recording artists who preceded him with a more conventionally playful (and often rather suggestive) recycling of better-known nursery rhymes was our friend Bo Diddley. A song called 'Nursery Rhyme' is on one Diddley album, while 'Babes in the Woods' and 'Hey, Red Riding Hood' are on others—this last on an album titled 500% More Man. RONNIE HAWKINS may or may not have known this when he made his immortal remark: 'Abraham Lincoln said all men were created equal, but he never saw Bo Diddley in the shower.'

[Bo Diddley: 'Bo Diddley', Chicago, 3 Mar 1955, Checker 814, Chicago, 1955; 'She's Fine, She's Mine', Chicago, 10 May 1955, Checker 819, Chicago, 1956; Chuck & Bo, Volume 2, Pye International 44012, London, c.1963; Bo Diddley: 'Nursery Rhyme', Chicago, Spring 1959, Have Guitar—Will Travel, Checker LP 2974, Chicago, 1960 (1st UK-issued Bo Diddley Rides Again, Pye International NPL 28029, 1963); 'Babes in the Woods', Chicago, Jul 1962, Bo Diddley, Checker LP 2984, Chicago, 1962 (Pye International NPL 28026, 1963); 'Hey, Red Riding Hood', Chicago, 25 Jul 1965, 500% More Man, Checker LP(S) 2996, Chicago, 1965. Bob Dylan: 'Not Fade Away', 1st performed Fort Myers, FL, 26 Jan 1999; 'Bo Diddley', rehearsal, NY, 16 Nov 1993. Dylan quote from Chronicles Volume One, p.256. Bo Diddley & Ed Sullivan as described by Paul Gambaccini, undated interview with Spencer Leigh, Baby, That Is Rock and Roll: American Pop 1954–1963, p.75; Ronnie Hawkins quote, ditto p.132.]

Digby, Sir Everard [1578 - 1606] See 'Judas!' [shout].

'Dignity' [1989] The search for dignity is writ large all over Oh Mercy. It's therefore a pity that the album opens with as weak an upbeat track as 'Political World', when the song 'Dignity' would have been so much more germane. 'Political World', despite the multi-layering of the three guitars and dobro, and the double drumming (there are conga drums in there, credited as 'percussion'), and despite one or two isolated flashes of cutting edge, is exactly the kind of rockin' number that shouldn't have made it onto the album. There's no wildness, no clear sense of what Dylan is on about—and no heart in it, which is what makes it impossible to warm to. It's a bore, as so many of these things are. Dylan's account of wrestling with it, which he gives in Chronicles Volume One, is far more beguiling than the track itself.

At least as upbeat and rockin' as 'Political World' but an infinitely better piece of writing, with a far more appealing melody, with heartfelt energy and good humour, the great song 'Dignity', which describes so resourcefully the yearning for a more dignified world, would have been the album's ideal opening track. It scorches along musically, declaring its allegiance to the timeless appeal of the blues, while sounding, above all things, fresh. Its lyric, meanwhile, though 'Dylanesque' in that it sounds like no-one else's work and sounds like a restrained, mature revisit to a mode of writing you might otherwise call mid-1960s Dylan, is fully alert and freshly itself, admits of no leaning on laurels, and has the great virtue that while not every line can claim the workaday clarity of instructional prose, the song is accessible to anyone who cares to listen, and offers a clear theme, beautifully explored, with which anyone can readily identify.

'It fits in,' wrote Mel Gamble, 'with . . . an album . . . based on self-examination . . . [and] the attempt to separate the important from the distractions and irrelevancies that clog up day to day life.' The song is both one of those 'you know [is] going to be special' when you first hear the opening bars, and one of those where 'you never want the song to end.' For others, it is one of those like 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall', where every line might be the beginning of a separate song.

That would be a lot of separate songs—'Dignity' has 16 verses of four lines each, in which recurrently the singer describes a lengthy search for dignity in the turmoil of a fragmented world in which people jostle and hustle among themselves but show no sign of genuine community, and in which places are also described as lost, inhospitable and bleak. All this is achieved, however, at a rollicking pace, with dancing deftness and indomitable humour, so that the mood of the song is the opposite of bleak.

The verses divide between two different rhyme-schemes. The predominant one uses the attractive AAAB pattern, with the 'B' the same in every verse of this construction, because each ends on the title word 'dignity'—and how he loves to land on it! He rolls it around in his mouth, slowing it down, feeling its contours—'dig-ni-teeee!'—as if in the very act of saying it he can explore its elusive qualities. This core construction, and many of its lyric ground-rules, are established in the opening verse: 'Fat man lookin' in a blade of steel / Thin man lookin' at his last meal / Hollow man lookin' in a cottonfield / For dignity.'

Some of the song's characters are bumming and hustling, watching their backs or chancing their arm but many, though living in what seems insoluble isolation, are united with the narrator in a common yearning for the dignity missing in contemporary life. No moral superiority is being claimed here by the writer. This is the ballad of a thin man, fat man, hollow man, wise man, young man, poor man, blind man, drinkin' man, sick man and Englishman. Plus a couple of somebodies, the cops, Mary Lou, the maid, Prince Philip, the sons of darkness and the sons of light, another somebody and a someone, plus the tongues of angels and tongues of men in general.

There are 11 more verses of this construction, plus four that are built differently, in an AABC pattern, where the B and C may or may not half-rhyme. The first time around, they do (this is the third verse): 'Somebody got murdered on New Year's Eve / Somebody said dignity was the first to leave / I went into the city, went into the town / Went into the land of the midnight sun', in which there is a half-rhyme between 'sun' and 'town'. Next time around, in verse seven, there is a sort of semi-rhyming, if you will, between 'men' and 'me': 'I went down where the vultures feed / I would have gone deeper but there wasn't any need / I heard the tongues of angels and the tongues of men / And there wasn't any difference to me.' (That second line is a fine example of the song's freshness, with its apparent spontaneity of direct address—its undercutting of the declamatory by the unexpected straightforwardness of informal conversationality, its clipped modernity of tone.) But in the two verses of this pattern later in the song—verses 11 and 15—there is no such half-rhyming, and the unusual AABC pattern is strictly observed. The effect is not at all that you notice, in listening, an absence of resolving rhyme, but that combined with the unresolved fifth note of the scale on which the final word of each verse lands, your ear waits for what is to come: tells you that there is more to come, that the search for dignity is itself not resolved. Thus form becomes realised as content.

The difference of shape between the two kinds of verse is matched by quiet distinctions in their subject matter. The format of 'Fat man . . . Thin man . . . Englishman . . .' never occurs in the AABC verses, which tend to focus on places the narrator goes—great, sweeping places—rather than on characters: 'I went into the city, went into the town, / Went into the land of the midnight sun . . .'; 'I went down where the vultures feed . . .'; 'In the bordertowns of despair . . .'; 'Into the valley of dry bone dreams . . .' When he does encounter people in these sections of the song, they too are presented in vague or sweeping generalised terms: 'Footsteps runnin' cross the silver sand . . .'; 'Somebody got murdered . . .'; 'Somebody said . . .'; 'Someone showed me . . .'; 'I heard the tongues of angels and the tongues of men . . .'; 'I met the sons of darkness and the sons of light . . .'

However, these distinctions between the two sorts of verses are never stressed, and the entire song is repeatedly interwoven with threads of correspondence, sometimes of the most delicate and subtle kind and sometimes with robust, abrasive mock-correspondences that keep you stimulated and guessing. Thus there are phrases that echo each other in form but depart in content, for example as when that 'went into the city, went into the town' is slyly mismatched later by 'went into the red, went into the black', or when different kinds of metaphor are bumped together as if they are of the same order, or even as if they are not metaphors at all but actual physical actions, as with the splendid 'He bites the bullet and he looks within', where there is the added surreal implication that the one 'action' is consequent upon the other: that he bites the bullet and then looks within to see what damage the bullet has caused, or where it's landed, and whether he's still alive.

There are many such games played here, and played lightning-fast, in passing. Since Dignity is spoken of throughout as a missing character, as in detective fiction (as in a film), might not 'Somebody' be a character too—such that when Dylan sings that 'Somebody got murdered on New Year's Eve / Somebody said Dignity was the first to leave' this not only has the odd effect of making Dignity the prime suspect (rather than simply a Good Guy) but also makes it possible to see at this murder scene that it is Somebody's own dying testimony that fingers Dignity.

The opening couplet alone has weird comic resonances. 'Fat man lookin' in a blade of steel / Thin man lookin' at his last meal', which draws on the two meanings of 'his last meal', achieves by doing so a bizarre fleeting picture of the fat man wielding either a carving-knife or an executioner's blade: either way putting him into an uneasy relationship with the thin man. At the very least, you wonder if the thin man is looking at his own last meal or at the fat man's stomach, into which what should have been his own meal has just disappeared.

Then there is this quiet implied pun on thinning hair, almost at the end of the song (balancing the thin man at its beginning): 'Combin' his hair back, his future looks thin', and the adroit comic moment in this surreal one-line scene: 'Met Prince Philip at the home of the blues', very pleasingly augmented like this: 'He said he'd give me information if his name wasn't used / He wanted money up front, said he was abused / By Dignity.' It would be high comedy merely for a Dylan song to mention Prince Philip, but to place him in so unlikely a milieu as anywhere that might call itself 'the home of the blues' creates a glorious incongruity. It also creates a sort of namesake version of Prince Philip in the mind: putting him together with the idea of the blues conjures up a figure in that other destination-point of the black diaspora, the Caribbean, in which there are plenty of flamboyant singers and musicians with names like Prince Buster. Making you hear Prince Philip as a name of this sort is a fine bonus comic payoff.

As the lines pile up, of course, so does the preposterousness of the Prince Philip idea. Hence no sooner have we savoured the picture of this meeting, and its meeting-place, than we relish the notion of him acting the cheap con-artist, offering to sell suspect information right there on the street and then throwing in a hard-luck story for good measure—or else we picture it now as being someone else, someone who is a con-artist, with Dylan throwing in the extra joke that while he's claiming to be this extravagantly high-profile and notoriously indiscreet figure, he's also trying to do a deal that hinges upon protecting his anonymity.

And at the end of the verse, if we take it that this is Prince Philip, Dylan's 'said he was abused / by Dignity' works as a wonderfully compressed summation of how it might feel to be trapped inside the machinery of the Royal Family. To characterise a lifetime of dressing up and parading about in risible ritual and ceremonial show as 'abused by Dignity' is confident cutting to the bone indeed. And to put this complaint into the mouth of someone as brutishly insensitive and graceless as Prince Philip, whose name is a byword for the unthinking verbal abuse of others, is delicious. To achieve all this in 30 words is, well, Dylanesque.

The detail of the song is always careful; everything dovetails; everything is balanced; and where there is doubt, ambiguity or contradiction, it is intended. The list of who is looking where, for example, shows evidence of the kind of care absent in the listings in 'Everything Is Broken'. The young man looks 'in the shadows that pass'—a poetic ellipse of the idea that the young, impatient of history and precedent, are entranced by the illusions of the moment, believing that 'now' is the only worthwhile moment, while his opposite—not the old man but the wise man (the old not necessarily being wise at all)—looks 'in a blade of grass': that is, in something that sounds just as fragile and temporary as a passing shadow but is strong enough to hold several connotations. We might take it that, like every grain of sand, it is in such things as the blade of grass that the believer 'can see the master's hand'; or, like BLAKE, we might take it that in looking in the blade of grass, again as into a grain of sand, he is seeking a vision of the world. We can take it that unlike the young man in thrall to the temporarily fashionable, the wise man understands that the natural world is all that really matters. We can take it that by its very temporariness the blade of grass tells the essential truth that 'everything passes'—that everything

'comes to pass', to quote from Bob Dylan and to remember a fragment of a different poet's work (John Crowe Ransom's 'Spectral Lovers') quoted by CHRISTOPHER RICKS in the essay on Dylan's use of American and English English, 'Clichés That Come to Pass': '. . . swishing the jubilant grass / Beheading some field-flowers that had come to pass.'

At times, too, 'Dignity' offers unlooked-for extra tidiness, as when that 'blade of grass' in verse two echoes the 'blade of steel' in verse one, or when, in that first verse, there is the neat gradation in lines one-two-three of men who run fat-thin-hollow, while all through the song small surprises act as cumulative energy, a recurrent renewal of stimulus, as when we expect, after 'searching high, searching low' that 'searching everywhere I' will be completed by 'go' and isn't: it's 'searching everywhere I know' instead.

In the 12th verse, out of nowhere, and to most pleasing effect, we suddenly get, for the first and only time, an extra rhyme, by means of an internal rhyme, on one of the AAA lines: '. . . got no coat / . . . in a jerkin' boat / Tryin' to read a note somebody wrote / About dignity.' This both disrupts the pattern we've grown to know and at the same time of course is not mere surprise for it's own sake but to make the line enact the 'jerkin'' motion he's ascribing to the boat. (Regrettably, he has always revised this line in concert to eliminate the internal rhyme, altering it to the inferior 'Tryin' to read a letter somebody wrote'.)

NIGEL HINTON declares it to be his favourite of all the 'big' songs of the last 25 years: more loved than 'Brownsville Girl', 'Angelina' or even 'Blind Willie McTell'. He writes:

> 'What I particularly like about it is the consistency of its conceit: Bob Dylan as Sam Spade, or any one of those hard-bitten, cynical LA-based private dicks, conducting his B-movie, film noir search through the corrupt world in search of the missing character, Dignity. I like the array of characters—all those sons of darkness and sons of light—typical of the wonderful supporting actors who people those films (Sidney Greenstreet as the Fat Man, Elisha Cook Jnr. as the Blind Man, and Thelma Ritter as the maid, perhaps?). And I love the little familiar scenes from those movies—the murder at the New Year's Eve party, the wedding of Mary Lou who, frightened and nervously looking over the singer's shoulder at the other guests, whispers that she could get killed if she told him what she knew (played by the young Lauren Bacall?), and the continual echo of films—the drinking man in a crowded room full of covered up mirrors could come straight from Citizen Kane (played by Joseph Cotten—drink, instead of cigarettes). The images come straight from a medley of dimly remembered movies: the chilly winds blowing the palms; the house on fire; looking out of a window from behind billowing net curtain while asking the maid for some hot poop on the case; the bordertowns of despair (Mexico, of course—perhaps A Touch of Evil, Orson Welles' Tijuana masterpiece); the blackheart wind sending those tumbleweeds rolling down the dusty street while the Englishman (Leslie Howard) stands there so incongously, combing his hair back; the sick bed of the the man who lovingly fingers his books while praying for a cure; and the con artist pretending he's Prince Philip and trying to bum some money in exchange for dodgy information—'abused by dignity', him: ha!
>
> 'Dignity is also so perfectly what the Sam Spade persona would be looking for. Truth, Fame, Fortune, Hope, Faith and all the other rewards offered by the world or the illusions offered by the purveyors of the spiritual world have been seen through by this guy—he's heard the tongues of angels and the tongues of men and he can't see any difference. The most he can hope for is to live with dignity: but in this corrupt and deluded age, where and what is it? And in this topsy-turvy place the most you get by way of help is a note that somebody wrote—but of course you're trying to read it on a rolling river in a jerking boat: a wonderful metaphor for the struggle of trying to make sense of things. Such an alive and direct picture of us all, without comfort (no coat) and with nowhere to hide (fade), in our little craft being swept headlong towards the rapids, trying to find out why.
>
> 'And the language is so Chandleresque: "the valley of dry-bone dreams", "bites the bullet", wind "sharp as a razor blade". The song even ends in the kind of despairing, enigmatic way that the best films noirs do—standing at the edge of the lake, knowing that everywhere leads to dead ends and that the case won't get solved. It's a black and white masterpiece.'

As with so much of Dylan's finest writing, its credible possibilities are open, and the opposite of limiting. 'Dignity' makes perfect sense in that film noir context: it holds its own, as Hinton says, as that sustained conceit. Yet the song's fundamental quest for something both precious and elusive through a world of travail holds to a far more ancient archetype, and as such resonates on other levels. The archetype of this quest is also contained, for instance, in the search for the Holy Grail (medieval legend having it that the bowl used by Christ at the Last Supper was brought to Britain by Joseph of Arimathea, so that in the time of knights in silver armour, seeking its whereabouts was a physical and spiritual quest). It is there too in the Pilgrim's Progress of JOHN BUNYAN's hero, Christian (of which more shortly). While Bob Dylan summarises such questing in a single line of his 1970s song 'Dirge'—'In this age of fiberglass, I'm searching for a gem'—'Dignity' devotes itself to envisaging such a quest.

It succeeds at doing so in the genre of Hollywood film noir, but there's also more than a hint here of the ordeals of Job, when God has afflicted him and he wanders, seeking recognition and the restoration of dignity, and asking 'How long will ye vex my soul, and break me in pieces with words?' As he wanders, he asks the servant for recognition—in effect, 'have you not seen me?'—just as Dylan's narrator asks the maid has she not seen Dignity. As we know, Job's faith triumphs and he finds acceptance in the end, but not before being in the position Dylan parallels at the inconclusive end of 'Dignity', where there are 'So many dead ends, so much at stake.'

In Job's case he cries out that God 'hath fenced up my way that I cannot pass, and he hath set darkness in my paths.' As with Job, there is a strong mood of 'how long, Lord?' (or as Dylan expresses it elsewhere, 'How much longer? How much longer?') about the wanderings here in search of 'Dignity', which ends on 'Sometimes I wonder what it's gonna take / To find dignity.'

As Dylan does so magnificently well elsewhere, here too we have a case where he rides the parallel lines between biblical language and modern American speech. Nigel Hinton hears 'the valley of dry-bone dreams' as 'so Chandleresque'—yet this lovely phrase draws upon, but does not better, one wonderful sound-bumping line from blues artist ARTHUR CRUDUP, 'I went down in Death Valley, among the tombstones and dry bones': a line that Dylan might have written and been admired for. In turn, as Crudup's mention of 'Death Valley' hints, this is poetic ellipsing of biblical text. The 'valley of the shadow of death' resides in the Old Testament book that follows Job, in Psalm 23:4—through which its narrator, David, walks fearing no evil, knowing that God is with him; and many gospel lyrics have been founded upon this text. The splendid 1930 LONNIE JOHNSON title 'Death Valley Is Just Half Way to My Home' may hover in the back of Arthur Crudup's and Bob Dylan's mind. There's also 'You've Got to Walk That Lonesome Valley', a 'sermon with singing' by Rev. F.W. McGee. (The fusion of biblical with modern American speech is contained in the very name Death Valley, of course; it is a US National Monument in California-Nevada, serendipitously just west of Las Vegas and almost immediately south-west of Skull Mountain and the Nellis Air Force nuclear testing site.)

Among the 123 other verses of the King James Bible that contain a 'valley', many involve travail experienced as rather more arduous than David's, and these include 'the valley of slaughter' and 'the valley of the dead bodies' in Jeremiah, and in Ezekiel 'the valley which was full of bones.' The phrase 'dry bones' comes only from Ezekiel (37:3–4), in which the prophet, set down in a valley of human bones, is asked by God, 'Son of man, can these bones live?' to which Ezekiel replies 'O Lord God, thou knowest.' So God says '. . . say unto them, O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord.' Through Ezekiel's unlimited faith and willingness, and God's power, the whole valleyful of bones becomes fleshed out, and the people of Israel come alive again. This is not, in the end, the same place as Death Valley, and it is this vision that is the stimulus for further gospel songs called 'Dry Bones in the Valley' and even 'In the Valley of Dry Bones'. In turn, Dylan's 'In the valley of dry-bone dreams' draws upon these phrases.

The song holds other moments and phrases where Dylan bestrides such parallel lines. Nigel Hinton's 'Sam Spade persona' can quite well be described as having 'heard the tongues of angels and the tongues of men' and seen through both. You can hear the phrase on the tongue of Dylan's old favourite, Humphrey Bogart; yet as Dylan and Nigel Hinton both know, the phrase rearranges that in St. Paul's address to the Corinthians: 'Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal.' (I Corinthians 13:1.)

Dylan swaps this around doubly. First, either for the sake of cadence or the more neatly to make his point that there 'wasn't any difference' between them, he puts his angels before his men. Second, where Paul's illustration has him speaking with the two kinds of tongue, Dylan has his narrator listening to them instead. And in saying that there 'wasn't any difference', Dylan manages to emphasise the part of Paul's text that he doesn't actually cite at all: namely, that those he hears speaking are all 'as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal.'

There is one other extraordinary parallel that Dylan achieves inside his song. While Nigel Hinton hears the lines 'Drinkin' man listens to the voice he hears / In a crowded room full of covered-up mirrors' as part of 'the continual echo of films', in this case calling to mind Joseph Cotten in Citizen Kane, the same lines also depict a scene from Jewish religious ritual. To observe the practice of shiva, during the period of mourning after a funeral, the committed mourners must gather together in one of their houses and remain there a week. Inside the house, no music can be played and every mirror must be covered up.

Far more thoroughgoingly, however, 'Dignity' parallels Christian's journey of quest for the Celestial City in The Pilgrim's Progress (a quest presented as a dream in Bunyan's book). Christian too has to pass through the Valley of the Shadow of Death, as well as a river (the River of the Water of Life), somewhere on fire (the Burning Mount) and despair (the Giant Despair). Dylan's long geographical cataloguing of his wide-ranging journey ('searching high, searching low'), including travelling into the city, into the town, into the land of the midnight sun, down where the vultures feed, across the silver sand, down into—in a beautifully Dylanesque flash of existential truth—'Tattoo Land', as well as along so many roads and up against so many dead ends, is the equivalent of the geographical catalogue in Pilgrim's Progress, which takes in the Hill Difficulty, the Valley of Humiliation, By-path Meadow, Doubting Castle and, most famously, the Slough of Despond.

And just as Dylan's song presents the quality of Dignity as a character, so Bunyan gives us characters called Ignorance, Much-afraid and, yes, Mercy. The Dylan song is sly, quick-witted, darkly modern and full of Americana where Bunyan's work was pious, plodding and bursting with 17th century England; but Bunyan's work was written as an allegory of the Christian life and 'Dignity' too can withstand being seen, and even intended, as just such an allegory.

Nigel Hinton sees his movie ending 'at the edge of the lake, knowing that everywhere leads to dead ends and that the case won't get solved'; but does the song end so darkly? The last word is not of dead ends but with the 'How long, Lord?' question, the keep-on-keeping-on faith that holds on through all trials and tribulations, implying that the quest will be pursued and that eventual success is anticipated. It is only in the meantime, and sometimes, that resolve flags: 'Sometimes I wonder what it's gonna take / To find Dignity.' 'How long will ye vex my soul, and break me in pieces . . . ?', as Job puts it when times are tough in different times—and the point about Ezekiel's valley of dry bone dreams is that in the end, through faith, new life is given.

Dylan's commentary on the writing and recording of 'Dignity', given in Chronicles, is fascinating, not least for the background information that it came to him the day he heard the news of the death of the basketball player Pistol Pete Maravich, who collapsed and died on a Pasadena basketball court—'just fell over and never got up'—and for the energised description of how the song came about. 'It's like I saw the song up in front of me and overtook it,' he writes, before also explaining why, having written it, he was in no hurry to rush into recording it, and then, in due course, what a struggle the attempt to record it duly proved. (See O'Brien, Brendan.)

In spite of these difficulties, as a song it succeeds completely. What is so liberating and invigorating about 'Dignity' is that while it is free-spirited and ineffably relaxed, fluid as mercury and malleable as clay on the wheel, it is at the same time so meticulously assembled, beautifully thought-out and thrillingly well-crafted.

[Bob Dylan: commentary on 'Political World', Chronicles Volume One, pp.165, 166 & 183–185; commentary on 'Dignity', pp.168–169, 189–190, 191. Bob Dylan: 'Dignity', New Orleans, prob. 13 Mar 1989.

Mel Gamble: 'Dignity', Homer, the slut no.5, London, Jan 1992. John Crowe Ransom, 'Spectral Lovers', nia, quoted in Christopher Ricks, 'Clichés That Come to Pass', in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds., All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987. Nigel Hinton: e-mails to this writer, 30 & 31 Mar 1999, reprinted with permission. Citizen Kane, dir. Orson Welles, written Herman J. Mankiewicz & Welles, starring Welles, Joseph Cotton, RKO, US, 1941 (in which when the Hearst-type newspaper mogul dies, 'a magazine reporter interviews his friends in an effort to discover the meaning of his last words': Halliwell's Film Guide, ed. John Walker, London: HarperCollins 11th edn., 1995); A Touch of Evil, dir. & written Orson Welles, U-I, US, 1958 (in which a 'Mexican narcotics investigator honeymooning in a border town clashes with the local police-chief over a murder': Halliwell, ditto).

John Bunyan: The Pilgrim's Progress: From This World to That Which Is to Come, Part I published 1678, Part II 1684. The first Job passage starts at 19:2, continues thru the dead-end dark paths (v11) & asking the servant's recognition (v16) thru to the terrific 'and I am escaped with the skin of my teeth' (from v20).

Arthur Crudup: 'Death Valley Blues', Chicago, 11 Sep 1941, Bluebird Blues, RCA Victor LPV-518, NY, 1965. Lonnie Johnson: 'Death Valley Is Half Way to My Home', NY, 23 Jan 1930. Rev. F.W. McGee: 'You've Got to Walk That Lonesome Valley', Chicago, 7 Jun 1927, CD-reissued Rev. F.W. McGee Complete Recorded Works Volume 1 (1927–1929), RST Blues Documents BDCD-6031, Vienna, nia.

Jeremiah 7:32 & 21:13 contain 'the valley of slaughter', Jeremiah 21:40 'the valley of the dead bodies' & Ezekiel 37:1 'the valley which was full of bones'. (The Jubilee Gospel Team: 'Dry Bones in the Valley', NY, c.Sep 1928. Joe McCoy: 'Dry Bones in the Valley', Chicago, 15 May 1935. Rev. R. McFryar: 'In the Valley of Dry Bones', NY, 29 Aug 1928.) That 'room full of covered-up mirrors' corresponds to the practice of Shiva noted from Kevin Lawler & Steve Watson: 'The Importance of "Señor (Tales of Yankee Power)" When Considering Dylan's Conversion to Christianity (I'm Exiled. You Can't Convert Me)', Dignity no.16, Welwyn Garden City, UK, Jun 1998.]

Dignity* fanzine See Baldwin, John.

Domino, Fats [1928 -] Antoine 'Fats' Domino, born 26 February 1928, became the most successful New Orleans big-band R&B million-seller of the long era between 1955 and the early 1960s: a man who gave us hit after huge, endearing hit, with a fat, simple sound and a warm, much-imitated faux-naïve voice that built many memorable self-penned songs into mountains on the music landscape.

One of the creators of rock'n'roll, and by far the biggest-selling rhythm & blues artist of the 1950s, his originality was such that these labels don't quite fit him. Nor was he anything so flimsy as pop, yet his records often crossed onto the pop charts, so that while he was crucial in breaking down the musical colour barrier, he was too mainstream and popular to retain credibility as a blues singer. He brought a new, heavy back-beat to white ears, yet trailed old-fashioned jazz-band habits behind him. Out in his own uncategorisable stratosphere, Fats Domino sold astonishing quantities of records much loved by blacks and whites alike, until that point in the 1960s when a new black consciousness rejected all the pre-soul stars, and white consciousness shied away from hit-singles artists and the suddenly embarrassing, unhip simplicities of 1950s music. Fats seemed further away in 1970 than he does now.

In the classic photos, Fats Domino's head is a perfect cube, thanks in part to his trademark flattop haircut. This, unique to Domino in the 1950s, became fashionable among young black males in the US and UK 30 years later. (In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan, describing how he envisages some future rap star rising to artistic greatness, writes that it will be someone 'with a chopped topped head'.) In Guy Peellaert & Nik Cohn's book Rock Dreams, Domino is painted at home, in a pink stage suit but grinning into the casserole his tired wife Rose Mary is stirring. His eight smiling children surround him, and Fats is saying 'Clean living keeps me in shape . . . and New Orleans home cooking.'

He never was master of the bon mot, but he was one of the few true giants of post-war American popular music. No-one sounded like him, yet when you ask who he influenced, the answer is everyone.

The second number he ever recorded was 'The Fat Man' (named after a radio detective), which sold 800,000 in the black market and gave the 22-year-old the first of his many gold discs. In 1955 came 'Ain't It a Shame' (aka 'Ain't That a Shame'): and though Pat Boone's cover topped the pop charts, Fats' original chased it, the blackest sound that had ever hit the Hot 100, and the no.1 R&B side for 11 weeks.

So great was his reach that it was he who taught white pop fans about idiosyncratic flexibility in lyrics—particularly in rhymes—through odd emphasis (later a Dylan trick) and odd pronunciation. These were specific lessons Dylan must have picked up from Fats Domino.

In his 'Good Hearted Man' (1961) he manages, by his accent and his disregard for consonants, to make the word 'man' rhyme with 'ashamed': no mean feat. Dylan not only walks this forward so that in 1965's 'I Wanna Be Your Lover' he can rhyme 'hers' with a laughing 'yours!' but then runs with it to score a previously undreamt-of goal by rhyming 'January' with 'Buenos Aires' in 1981's 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar'.

In 1961 Fats Domino issued a record called 'Rockin' Bicycle'—but, delightfully, he sang it as 'Rockin' Bi-sic-l', and its lyrics included nifty formulations like 'If we don't be in front we'll be right behind', and 'Let 'em take the bus / 'n' leave the 'sic-l to us.' There's plenty of evidence in Dylan's work of this Domino oddity of emphasis, too: as for instance, in 'Absolutely Sweet Marie', to achieve the rhyme of 'half-sick' with 'traffic'. In 'Jokerman', in the 1980s, when Dylan comes to rhyme 'scarlet' with 'harlot', well, any other white person would do it straight—would maximise the rhyme by sounding both as '-arlutt'. Dylan sings 'scarlett' and then snatches a full rhyme by singing 'harlett' to match!

Domino also comes up, maybe accidentally, with the pathetic use of bathos, which again is something that Dylan has used. 'Fell in Love on Monday' (1960) includes this hilarious couplet: 'Her hands, were soft, as cotton / Her face, could never, be forgotten.'

All these winsome characteristics can be found in abundance in this great artist's earlier work too: on the big hits like 'Blue Monday', 'Blueberry Hill' (which Domino didn't write but makes utterly his own), 'I Hear You Knockin'' and 'My Blue Heaven' (or as Fats has it, 'Mah, Blee-oo, He*avon*'). Of course, all these things were in the great tradition of idiosyncratic pronunciation exemplified in black song from the beginning of time, but we encountered them first from Fats Domino.

GLEN DUNDAS' Tangled Up in Tapes Revisited, 1990, says that Fats Domino's early 'Please Don't Leave Me' (so early—the start of the 1950s—that his voice was an octave higher than later on) was among the songs Dylan rehearsed in Woodstock in September 1965. Decades later—August 3, 1988—Dylan ventured a very Fats Dominoid version of 'I'm in the Mood for Love' in concert in Hollywood. It also emerged in the 1990s that Dylan sang the same song on the Basement Tapes in 1967.

Then with Dylan's Time Out of Mind, which echoes many records of the period in which Fats Domino was in his pomp, it's natural that we should encounter Fats himself once more.

The first vocal remark of the album, 'I'm walkin'', is the title of one of Domino's greatest hits. Of course it's also a very anonymous remark, but that doesn't stop us remembering that Fats Domino whispers behind Bob Dylan many times down the years. It's impossible that Dylan should sing that phrase without being conscious of its Fats connection. Especially since one of the spiritual homes of Dylan's album is New Orleans, which would not be the same place without Fats Domino, the most famous epitomiser and greatest populariser of New Orleans R&B. Everyone knows too that all his classic and hit recordings were made there and he names this, his hometown, in his lyrics—not least in the case of his big 1960 hit 'Walking to New Orleans'. In Dylan's line 'I'm goin' down the river, down to New Orleans', then, it is hard not to hear an allusion to Domino's early classic 'Going to the River'. Elsewhere on Time Out of Mind we encounter the Domino title 'Sometimes I Wonder', and the allusion that seems the most subtle yet the most certain: namely, the line from ''Til I Fell in Love with You' where he sings that he's 'thinkin' about that girl who won't be back no' mo'.' This 'who won't be back no' mo'' echoes in every way—the attractively bouncy distribution of the syllables, the accent on that 'no' mo'', the mournful tone, as well as the words themselves: all these recreate Fats Domino's singing about the girl who 'won't be back no' mo''—and left a note to say so—in another 1960 hit song 'It Keeps Rainin''. One of the girls Dylan is thinkin' about who won't be back no' mo' cannot but be the one on Fats Domino's great record. And you can bet that her hands were soft as cotton.

[Fats Domino: 'The Fat Man', New Orleans, 10 Dec, 1949, Imperial 5058, LA, 1950; 'Ain't It a Shame', New Orleans, Feb 1955, Imperial 5348, 1955; 'Let the Four Winds Blow' c/w 'Good Hearted Man', New Orleans, May 1961, Imperial 5764 (London-American HLP 9415, London), 1961; 'What a Party' c/w 'Rockin' Bicycle', New Orleans, Aug 1961, Imperial 5779, (London-American HLP 9456), 1961; 'Fell in Love on Monday', New Orleans, Dec 1960, Imperial 5734, 1961; 'Blue Monday', New Orleans, Feb 1955, Imperial 5417, 1955; 'Blueberry Hill', LA, Jul 1956, Imperial 5407, 1956; 'I Hear You Knockin'', New Orleans, 4 Nov 1958, Imperial 5796; 'My Blue Heaven', New Orleans, Dec 1955, Imperial 5386, 1956; 'Please Don't Leave Me', New Orleans, 18 Apr 1953, Imperial 5240, 1953; 'I'm in the Mood for Love' c/w 'I'm Walking', both New Orleans, 3 Jan 1957, Imperial 5428, (London American HLP 8407), 1957; 'Walking to New Orleans', New Orleans, Apr 1960, Imperial 5675, 1960; 'Going to the River', New Orleans, Dec 1952, Imperial 5231, 1953; 'Sometimes I Wonder', New Orleans, Feb 1951, Imperial 5123, 1952; 'It Keeps Rainin'', New Orleans, Dec 1960, Imperial 5753, 1961. The Imperial sides are all CD-reissued in the $200 8-CD box set Out of New Orleans, Bear Family BCD 15541, Vollersode, Germany, 1993. Beware cheap imitations.

There is one fine post-Imperial Domino LP, the self-produced Sleeping on the Job, New Orleans, 1978, Conmedia, Germany (Sonet SNTF 793, London), 1979.

Dylan quoted from Chronicles Volume One, p.219.]

'Do Right to Me Baby (Do Unto Others)' [1979] On the final night of Dylan's great 1978 World Tour, he included in his repertoire the first live performance of a 'Born Again' song. It would turn up the year afterwards on the Slow Train Coming album. It was 'Do Right to Me Baby (Do Unto Others)'.

The phrase behind the sub-title and chorus of this song is taken not from the passage in Deuteronomy 19:20 that Dylan draws on in 'Wedding Song' and 'I and I': '. . . life shall go for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot'—teaching drawn upon in the story of Samson, in which the Philistines say to the men of Judah: 'To bind Samson are we come up, to do to him as he hath done to us', after which Samson tells them, similarly: 'As they did unto me, so have I done unto them' (Judges 15:10–11).

Rather, Dylan is following Christ's reversal of the same passage of Deuteronomy preached within the Sermon on the Mount, in which he says: 'Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets.' (Matthew 7:12). This comes a few verses after his saying: 'Judge not, that ye be not judged'—which is the opening sentence of Matthew 7. (In Luke 6:37 Christ's words are given as 'Judge not, and ye shall not be judged . . .') Dylan echoes this directly in the opening line of his song: 'Don't wanna judge nobody, don't wanna be judged'.

A once-famous and still-interesting spin on this apparent clear choice between two contrasting ways of dealing with the world occurs in the children's book The Water Babies, 1863, by Charles Kingsley (1819–1875), himself the embodiment of muscular Christianity and a leading figure in the so-called Christian Socialist movement. In The Water Babies the hero meets the fairy who punishes those who ill-treat others, Mrs. Bedonebyasyoudid, and her sister, Mrs. Doasyouwouldbedoneby. The first explains that she is 'the ugliest fairy in the world; and I shall be, till people behave themselves as they ought to do. And then I shall grow as handsome as my sister, who is the loveliest fairy. . . . So she begins where I end, and I begin where she ends; and those who will not listen to her must listen to me . . .'

Christ's injunction '. . . all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them . . .' is rendered in modern Bibles as 'do unto others as you would have them do unto you', which Dylan uses directly as the final (and summarising) chorus-line of 'Do Right to Me Baby (Do Unto Others)'.

(He also refers to this injunction indirectly in the companion song 'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking': it is 'the golden rule' to which he refers, when he complains preachily that 'You remember only about the brass ring, / You forget all about the golden rule.')

'Do Right to Me Baby' is not all dry sermonising. It includes the beautifully trademarked Dylan bite of 'Don't wanna amuse nobody, don't wanna be amused.'

On the three all-gospel tours (November–December 1979, January–February 1980 and April–May 1980), Dylan sang the song at every concert except one: the penultimate night of the third tour. That fall, when he reintroduced some secular songs into the set, and toured from November 9 until December 4, he sang 'Do Right to Me Baby' only once, on November 18 in San Francisco—and he has never played it since.

[Bob Dylan: 'Do Right to Me Baby (Do Unto Others)', débuted Hollywood, FL, 16 Dec 1978.]

Donne, John [1572 - 1631] Born in London, John Donne's maternal grandfather was the dramatist John Heywood. He was educated at Oxford but left without taking a degree. After forays in Cambridge, London and at sea, he became chief secretary to the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal and in 1601 a Member of Parliament, before a secret marriage to a minor brought him brief imprisonment, dismissal from office and social disgrace. After further travels, he took holy orders, ending up as Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral. Little of his poetry appeared in his lifetime but subsequently he has enjoyed universal recognition as one of the greats among the metaphysical poets.

Dylan's work sometimes calls John Donne to mind. Donne's modernity stems partly from the renowned directness of statement in the opening lines of his poems: 'For Godsake hold your tongue, and let me love'; 'Now thou hast lov'd me one whole day'; 'Oh do not die, for I shall hate / All women so when thou art gone'. One of Dylan's contributions has been to reintroduce such directness to white popular music. That Donne immediacy—directness balanced by intelligent discretion—is at work here: 'Go 'way from my window / Leave at your own chosen speed' (the song is 'It Ain't Me Babe'). And here: 'You got a lot o' nerve to say you are my friend' ('Positively 4th Street'). And here: 'I hate myself for loving you' (the opening line of 'Dirge', from Planet Waves).

These and others share with Donne more than plain directness and the conversational tone: more, even, than the measuredness both writers communicate, which takes its power from the sense that intellect is engaged in the communicating. Common to both is the bond between the passion and the rhythm. It was another poet, Coleridge, who pointed this out in Donne's case. He wrote: 'To read Dryden, Pope, etc, you need only count syllables; but to read Donne you must measure Time, and discover the time of each word by the sense of Passion.'

That must go down as an equally useful approach to Dylan's metre. Coleridge's point is proved by a song like 'The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll'—or, come to that, 'Like a Rolling Stone'. The vibrant and intricate changes of rhythm in each occur through the investment of different words with differing degrees of feeling.

Another point in relation to Donne is this. Donne's tricksiness appeals to our habit of expending the intellect on trivia—and Dylan is not exempt from this, as songs from 'I Shall Be Free No. 10' through to 'Million Dollar Bash' transparently show. Donne in this sense suits our times very well. It takes a serious man to be funny; it takes a sizeable mind to write satisfying minor love songs. Donne would have made a great songwriter for this reason. He could have done excellent, tricksy things for people like, say, Elvis Costello. A line from Donne's 'The Good-Morrow', for instance, would, adapted slightly, make a perfect Carole King title: 'You Make One Little Room an Everywhere'. And the phrase 'catch a falling star' originates with Donne, not Perry Como. The other John Donne opening that would work as intelligent, delicate, strong songwriting is that of his poem 'The Triple Foole': 'I am two fooles, I know, / For loving, and for saying so / In whining poetry . . .' That is the kind of conscious flirtation with ideas and nonsense that Dylan has exploited so well. The 1960s Dylan song most seeped in this kind of tricksiness is perhaps '4th Time Around', from Blonde on Blonde, with its stretched-out metaphors of sexual innuendo culminating in the rebounding pun on 'crutch', which Donne would have appreciated.

Finally, it is striking that Donne and Dylan both find it hard to subjugate intensity and passion into an appropriate devotional stance in their later religious work. Both artists exhibit a constant difficulty with the war of the flesh and the spirit. Donne's secular love poetry gets to pointing towards Christ (notably in 'The Canonization', where orgasm is likened to the death of Christ and the Resurrection) just as Dylan's does, on Street Legal and Blood on the Tracks in particular; and in the religious work of both men the passion they applied to lovers is no less lustily transferred to the Lord. At the same time, the religious work of both lacks general appeal, so that both artists end up with a substantial body of very popular secular work and a largely unheeded religious output.

[Donne's opening lines are from 'The Canonization', 'Woman's Constancy' and 'A Feaver', all c.1593–1601. Coleridge quoted from the Introduction in John Donne: A Selection of His Poetry, ed. John Hayward, 1950, which also quotes Coleridge's verse 'On Donne's Poetry', which begins with the splendid 'With Donne, whose muse on dromedary trots'. That last phrase, by chance, is paralleled (if parallels can be so bumpy) by Dylan's 'cemetery hips', from the opening song of the electric half of his 1966 concerts, 'Tell Me Momma' (a parallel more pronounced when, on the bootleg that was for many years the only way to hear this, it sounded like 'cemetery kicks').

Donne's 'For love, all love of other sights controules, / And makes one little roome, an every where' is from 'The Good-Morrow'; 'Goe, and catche a falling starre' is the opening line of one of the two Donne poems titled 'Song'. These, plus the other 'Song' and 'The Triple Foole', quoted above, all belong to the period c.1593–1601. Perry Como's record 'Catch a Falling Star' (NY, 9 Oct 1957) was, with 'Magic Moments' (NY, 3 Dec 1957), a double-sided hit in 1958 (RCA 20-7128).

Hayward quotes a 'friend' of Donne making a comment that many will feel rings an approximate bell in Dylan's case: that Donne wrote 'all his best pieces ere he was twenty-five years old'. Hayward notes too that 'Donne did not suddenly sober down when he took Holy Orders at the age of forty-three.']

'Don't Fall Apart on Me Tonight' [1983] By the time of Infidels, on which 'Don't Fall Apart on Me Tonight' appears, Bob Dylan had become the canonised fixity experiencing the very Mona Lisa syndrome he had sung about from the privileged position of flexible youth in ‘Visions of Johanna’. By 1983, aged over 40, ‘it’s like I’m stuck inside a painting / That’s hanging in the Louvre / My throat starts to tickle and my nose itches / But I know that I can’t move.’ Yet as so often with the revisits in newer songs to ideas and images from older ones, the newer version is less succinct, vivid and striking. ‘Mona Lisa musta had the highway blues’ is more audience-trusting, more humour-sharing, more quotable and far sharper than the expression of only some of what it contains in that clumsily catalogued, over-explained ‘My throat starts to tickle and my nose itches / But I know that I can’t move’. More is less.

This is not the only resonance within ‘Don’t Fall Apart on Me Tonight’. When, on the lines immediately preceding those above, Dylan sings ‘But if I could I’d . . . build you a house made out of stainless steel’, it is a ‘found line’ (in this case a fragment of conversation he overheard in the street, as he mentions somewhere in the course of discussing songwriting), but it surely got itself ‘found’ by Dylan—commended itself to his attention where very many others do not—because it had the resonance of echo. It echoes and contradicts his own earlier ‘Build me a cabin in Utah’, from ‘Sign on the Window’, which in turn echoes a common blues formula: the ‘I’m-going-to-build-me-a . . .’ stanza. When you hear, as unavoidably happens, those two Dylan lines together, their place in the cumulative life of this stanza is hard to disavow. It is a stanza that takes in MEMPHIS MINNIE’s ‘I’m going to build me a bungalow, just for me and my bumble bee’, Pearl Dickson’s ‘I’m going to build me a castle, out of ice and snow’, Clifford Gibson’s identical ‘I’m going to build me a castle, out of ice and snow’, Will Weldon’s ‘I’m going to build me a castle, fifteen storey high’ and Willie Brown’s ‘I had a notion, Lord and I believe I will / I’m going to build me a mansion, out on Decatur Hill’. Clamouring for house-room here too are Joe McCoy’s ‘That Will Be Alright’, which begins: ‘I’m going to build me a house, out on the sea’ (also echoed by Dylan’s ‘Well, meet me in the middle of the ocean’ on his 1962 blues ‘Down the Highway’) and even Dylan’s own 1990 third-person variant, ‘He’s got that fortress on the mountain / With no doors, no windows, so no thieves can break in’ (from ‘Handy Dandy’, on Under the Red Sky), which invokes a castle built out of ice and snow of the heart.

In this way, ‘Don’t Fall Apart on Me Tonight’ is one of Dylan’s non-blues songs in which his inwardness with blues consciousness shows through. It does too when the first verse of the lyric reaches this: ‘You know, the streets are filled with vipers / Who’ve lost all ray of hope / You know, it ain’t even safe no more / In the palace of the Pope.’

Used like this, ‘vipers’ passes by with just enough drawing of attention to itself for the listener to register where it’s from. Which is here: ‘O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?’ (from both Matthew 3:7 and Luke 3:7); ‘O generation of vipers, how can ye, being evil, speak good things?’ (from Matthew 12:34) and ‘Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?’ (Matthew 23:33.)

It’s a pity that though Dylan doesn’t quite manage here to pass off the biblical term as contemporary American speech, he succeeds with a secondary achievement (it’s almost a private joke), punning on ‘vipers’ so as to meld the biblical with the jazz/blues patois of the 1920s–1940s. A ‘viper’ seems to arise around 1925 as a street term for a police informer (a spin on the phrase ‘a snake in the grass’, as is the modern term ‘a grass’ and the subsequent ‘supergrass’); by the 1930s it is adopted, stigma-free, as a name for a dope-smoker or dealer. Hence the song ‘If You’se [or You’re] a Viper’, recorded by many people from 1930s jazz violinist Stuff Smith to minor blues singers like Rosetta Howard and Lorraine Walton. These lines give the song’s flavour: ‘Dreamed about a reefer five foot long / The mighty mezz but not too strong / You’ll be high but not for long / If you’se a viper.’ There was another number called ‘A Viper’s Moan’, there was Sidney Bechet’s ‘Viper Mad’, and in ‘Really the Blues’, an unreliable but entertaining memoir by the indifferent jazz musician and consummate drug-dealer Mezz Mezzrow (a white man who lived as a black man), there is this splendid variation: ‘Poppa, you never smacked your chops on anything sweeter in all your days of viping.’ So Dylan’s lines ‘You know, the streets are full of vipers / Who’ve lost all ray of hope’ work neatly enough on these two levels: as biblical and historical-streetwise allusion, and as biblical and old doper talk.

Unfortunately, by the time the matching lines have limped past us, we’ve lost more than we’ve gained. Dylan’s ‘vipers’ get lost because the verse ends so bluntedly. The idea that ‘the palace of the Pope’ has traditionally been a ‘safe’ place seems exasperatingly dumb. It fits with the dumbness inherent in phrases like ‘I just don’t think that I could handle it’, and indeed the phrase ‘Don’t Fall Apart on Me Tonight’: both prime examples of nasty Californian therapy-speak.

[Bob Dylan, ‘Don’t Fall Apart on Me Tonight’, NY, backing track prob. 12 Apr 1983, vocal overdubbed 5 Jun–Jul 1983; unissued but circulated take with original vocal, 12 Apr 1983; 10 further uncirculated outtake attempts (incl. fragments), 12 Apr 1983.

Memphis Minnie: ‘Bumble Bee’, Memphis, 20 Feb 1930; Rare Blues of the Twenties [sic], Historical HLP-2, Jersey City, NJ, c.1967. Pearl Dickson: ‘Twelve Pound Daddy’, Memphis, 12 Dec 1927; Frank Stokes’ Dream, 1927–1931 (The Memphis Blues), Yazoo L-1008, NY, 1968.

Clifford Gibson: 'Ice and Snow Blues', NY, 26 Nov 1929; Clifford Gibson: Beat You Doing It, Yazoo L-1027, NY, c.1971. Will Weldon (with the Memphis Jug Band): 'Peaches in the Springtime', Memphis, 13 Feb 1928; Harmonicas, Washboards, Fiddles, Jugs, Roots RL-311, Vienna, 1968. Willie Brown: 'M and O Blues', Grafton, WI, 28 May 1930; The Mississippi Blues 1927–1940, Origin Jazz Library OJL-5, Berkeley, CA, 1963. Joe McCoy: 'That Will Be Alright', NY, 18 Jun 1929; Memphis Jamboree, 1927–1936,Yazoo L-1021, NY, 1970.

Stuff Smith: 'If You'se a Viper', NY, 13 Mar 1936. Lorraine Walton: 'If You're a Viper', Chicago, 9 Feb 1929. Rosetta Howard (with the Harlem Hamfats): 'If You're a Viper', NY, 5 Oct 1937. Sidney Bechet with Noble Sissle's Swingers: 'Viper Mad', NY, 10 Feb 1938; Sixteen Original Jazz Classics: Reefer Songs, Stash ST100, Tenefly, NJ, c.1973. (This LP also offers Bob Howard & His Boys: 'If You're a Viper', nia, 7 Feb 1938.) Mezz Mezzrow with Bernard Wolfe, Really the Blues, New York: Random House, 1946 (re-pub'd London: HarperCollins 1993); quotations from this & from Stuff Smith's version of 'If You'se a Viper' appear in Andrew Kowl, ed, The High Times Encyclopedia of Recreational Drugs, New York: Stonehill, 1978.]

Don't Look Back* [film, 1967] This extraordinary black and white film of Bob Dylan's 1965 tour of Britain was the first film of any Dylan tour, and turned out to document the last solo acoustic tour of Dylan's career. The signs of what was to come were already there. The first electric album had already been made, and released in the US, by the time Dylan flew in to England at the end of April 1965 for a press conference followed by eight concerts, opening in Sheffield on April 30 and then playing Liverpool, Leicester, Birmingham, Newcastle and Manchester, and finishing at London's magnificent Victorian edifice, the Royal Abert Hall, on May 9 and 10. And while Dylan had charted for the first time in Britain in March with the single of 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', the following month it was being chased up by 'Subterranean Homesick Blues'. The film itself begins with what has been hailed as the first pop video, the film to accompany the 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' record, shot in the alley near the Savoy Hotel with ALLEN GINSBERG lurking in the background and a wondrously stylish Bob dropping big word-cards on the ground.

Besides, the Dylan who arrived in Britain trailing the Don't Look Back film crew behind him did not look like a folk singer: he was modishly thin, Chelsea-booted and black leather jacketed; his hair wasn't huge yet, but it made everyone else's look like they worked in a bank. (See also 1965–66: Dylan, pop & the UK charts.) And he began as he meant to go on, talking hip and talking back, pioneering his daring reproaches to inane press-conference questions. He's asked why he's carrying a gigantic light bulb; he says a friend gave it to him. He's asked 'What is your real message?' He answers: 'My real message? Keep a good head and always carry a light bulb.'

Accounts differ sharply as to how the film came to be made. The most plausible seems to be that Dylan's manager ALBERT GROSSMAN wanted a film made but didn't want to have to pay for it. He brought in producer John Cort and the two of them then turned to Grossman's old friend HOWARD ALK and his wife Jones Alk (who had worked as a hat-check girl in Grossman's Chicago club, the Gate). Alk was a trustworthy, suitably hip character who had by this time also become a friend of Dylan's; he was also a film editor. They still needed a production company to take it on, and Alk approached Richard Leacock, a filmmaker he much admired and was on good terms with (good enough that he always called him Ricky). But Leacock's response was: 'I'm not going to make a film about a guy who sings "Malaguena".' He couldn't be dissuaded from the notion that Dylan was a folksinger of that bland, uninteresting ilk. So Leacock said no, but his partner, D.A. PENNEBAKER, said yes. Because of Grossman's financial approach, Pennebaker was able to make the film largely on his own terms.

Thus it was that the film came about with the Alks still on board but with little personal or artistic sympathy between Pennebaker and them—and no agreement, in retrospect, as to how valuable the contribution of each was. Pennebaker not only directed the film, but also 'authored' a book of the film, published by Ballantine in 1968. On the front cover it says 'Bob Dylan: Don't Look Back, a Film and Book by D.A. Pennebaker', even though the contents are a transcript of scenes from the film, plus over 200 stills taken from it. As Pennebaker's preface states: 'This is not the script from which Don't Look Back was made. The film was made without a script. This is simply a transcript of what happened and what was said.' At the back of the book it states: 'The film Produced by Albert Grossman, John Cort and Leacock Pennebaker Inc.'

Pennebaker thought the Alks were bohemian amateurs; they thought he was too plodding and straight. When you see concert footage shot from the front, it's by Pennebaker; that's how he liked to do it. When you see footage shot from the wings, it's by Alk. Pennebaker has consigned him to the wings because he thinks that's of less interest; but it often yields more interesting, and always more intimate, material. (This is even more striking in the following year's tour film, Eat the Document.) According to Jones, Pennebaker would also tell Alk things like 'Go and film some pigeons in Trafalgar Square'; and Pennebaker agrees that he only regarded Alk as operating a 'fallback camera'.

Dylan too probably felt that Pennebaker was a little unimaginative. Jones Alk remembers that Pennebaker always wanted to call his films by the name of the person who was its subject, and wanted to call this film Dylan. When he told Dylan this, Dylan pulled a face and said 'Why don't you call it Pennebaker?'

Nevertheless they all settled down to it. Pennebaker says that Bob Van Dyke 'recorded the concerts'; Jones Alk says that she was in charge of the sound on the film itself; Howard Alk filmed what he pleased. Pennebaker even ended up saying that he 'would really like to thank Jones and Howard Alk who helped make it work'. Dylan's early unease about the whole thing was banished by his deciding to just go with the flow and play the part of this person in this movie.

The result was an extraordinary document, capturing in an aptly fresh, cinema-vérité style an artist coming to the peak of his powers, intensely alive, intelligent and charismatic—and allowing unprecedented backstage rights to the cameras. It was a core part of the anti-showbiz stance Dylan was pioneering that you were allowed to see the very immediate moments before and after the artist was on stage. When it was new, Don't Look Back gave us an undreamt-of privileged access to its 23-year-old star. The only complaint people had was that it never showed much interest in, or gave any generous footage from, the song-performances from the concerts themselves.

As time has passed the film has become an ever more valuable historical document, too (though the use of the word 'man' in every sentence, man, has long seemed risibly quaint). It's also mordantly funny: never more so than when the soon to be High Sheriff of Nottingham comes to call on Bob backstage, or when Albert Grossman gets together with one of the pompous big-name hustlers of the British 'entertainment industry', Tito Burns, forces him to negotiate British TV appearances for Dylan right there in front of us all, and makes this wily bully-boy look a bumbling fraud alongside Grossman's genuine article.

The film premièred at the Presidio Theater in San Francisco on May 17, 1967; that September 6 it opened at the 34th Street East Theater in New York City. The book was published in April 1968. The film was released on DVD in 2000 with audio tracks in Dolby Digital 2.0 Stereo, a commentary by D.A. Pennebaker and 'tour manager' BOB NEUWIRTH, an alternate version of the 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' mini-movie and five uncut song performances: 'It Ain't Me Babe', 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue', 'Love Minus Zero/No Limit', 'The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll' and 'To Ramona'.

In 2005, not long before the MARTIN SCORSESE film No Direction Home hit the screen (and probably not unconnected with its being announced), a bootleg 2-DVD set of raw outtake footage from Don't Look Back came into circulation, bulging with the complete concert performances that had only been glimpsed in tiny tantalising fragments in the film itself.

[Don't Look Back, dir. D.A. Pennebaker, Leacock-Pennebaker, US, 1967; DVD: New Video Group, US, Jan 2000. Quotes from Richard Leacock & Bob Dylan, plus other detail, from Jones Alk, phone-call with this writer 01 Nov 2005.]

Dorsey, Thomas A. [1899 - 1993] Thomas Andrew Dorsey was born in tiny Villa Rica, Georgia, on July 1, 1899, the son of a Baptist preacher. As a child he worked as a circus water boy, moved to Atlanta at age 11, started selling soda pop at the city's 81 Theatre and there encountered the likes of Bessie Smith 'doing those blues numbers and shaking everything they had.' He became a successful vaudeville pianist, moved to Chicago in 1916, kept his options open by joining the Pilgrim Baptist Church and studying at the Chicago School of Composition and Music. He was Ma Rainey's pianist and band leader—and travelled the south with her Rabbit Foot Minstrel show—from 1924 to 1928. He had begun to write songs, especially for Paramount and Brunswick/Vocalion Records, and was a staff arranger for the Chicago Music Publishing Company. As Georgia Tom, he and Tampa Red had the biggest hit of 1928 with the hokum'n' innuendo of 'It's Tight Like That', followed by more in the same vein both with Tampa Red and with BIG BILL BROONZY, and in the 1930s he worked with many others including MEMPHIS MINNIE.

At the same time, he was active in performing church music, and in 1930, in the middle of playing a church concert, Dorsey received a telegram reading 'Hurry home. Your wife is very sick. She is going to have the baby'; he telephoned back to be told that she was dead; the baby died shortly after. This made him turn away from his career as a bluesman to writing hymns, though only after resisting the impulse to do the opposite. He felt that 'God had been unfair' and wanted to plunge back fully into the secular blues; but his turmoil resolved itself the other way and he was able to say afterwards: 'I was doing alright for myself but the voice of God whispered, "You need to change a little".' Though influenced by composer C.H. Tindley (who founded the Tindley Methodist Church, Philadelphia, where Bessie Smith is buried), Dorsey brought to his sacred songs blues feeling and syncopation, and this powerful combination of styles created the musical revolution that was modern gospel music. He became the first black publisher as well as composer of songs in the genre, and a prolific writer who can be said to have been a shaping force in African-American consciousness.

In 1933 he founded the still-active National Convention of Gospel Choirs and Choruses. Dorsey composed over 500 published songs, among them the best-loved and most widely recorded in the entire gospel repertoire, including 'Precious Lord, Take My Hand' (aka 'Take My Hand Precious Lord') and 'Peace in the Valley', propelled to popularity partly by the new power of radio and partly by a working alliance with Mahalia Jackson, whom he'd first met in 1929. He became her musical advisor and accompanist from 1937 to 1946, and she sang his songs in church programmes and at conventions, promoting his compositions. Her signature song became 'Precious Lord Take My Hand' (which she would eventually sing at Martin Luther King's funeral in Atlanta in 1968).

The new style of Dorsey's religious songs was not without controversy, though. In ALAN LOMAX's The Land Where the Blues Began, he deplores these new me-me-me gospel songs of the 40s as against the old spirituals of an earlier era, and deplores Dorsey's 'Precious Lord Take My Hand' especially. He says the new songs elevated the preacher to a new primacy over the congregation that suppressed the previous democracy of worship (though it certainly wasn't every church that had an all-participating congregation before the Dorsey generation came along).

The pull between secular and religious music was ever-present in Dorsey's life, as for so many of the singers of the pre-war era, and it is unsurprising that his influence on the music world Bob Dylan inherited should be detectable on both sides of that divide. Today it would be impossible to read these four consecutive lines from Georgia Tom's 1928 'Grievin' Me Blues' without being reminded of Dylan's mid-1960s work; re-formulated, they infuse at least the chorus of 'Tombstone Blues', the opening of 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' and something of the spirit of both: 'Daddy's got the washboard, mama's got the tub / Sister's got the liquor and brother's got the jug / My water-pipe's all rusted, water's running cold / Someone's in the basement trying to find the hole.'

Of course, only something of the spirit of the Dylan lines is there—the upbeat rhythmic facility—because the innovative transformation Dylan makes is via the context in which he places his own so-similar lines. The context removes the tone of jolly family just-folksiness, replacing it with an opposite consciousness: that of the alienated loner at odds with, yet surrounded by, people obdurately going about their own incomprehensible business and, 'in the basement', communing with their own drug-paranoia.

In fact, though, the Dorsey of this period wasn't really 'just-folksy' at all but a cool, sly, city dude. There's a wonderful photograph of him, republished in Paul Oliver's book The Story of the Blues, in which, dressed sharper than we'll ever be, he's cupping his hands to light a cigarette. His eyes, feral and knowing, pierce the camera-lens: except for the fact that he's black, it's a shot the Hollywood of 40s film noir would have killed for.

On the religious side, no-one interested in popular or gospel music could have avoided the impact of Thomas A. Dorsey's work, and Dylan's own gospel compositions would have been different had Dorsey's not existed. More specifically, Dylan must have grown up knowing the early 1950s hit version of 'Peace in the Valley' by white artist Red Foley (which was a hit with black audiences too), and then the immaculate and gloweringly powerful ELVIS PRESLEY recordings of 'Peace in the Valley' and 'Take My Hand Precious Lord' from 1957. Presley's are classic soul-in-torment versions, and his 'Peace in the Valley' recognises the song's genius: indeed makes it a work of darker genius, emphasising the intense, gothic spookiness of the lyrics, in which, for instance, 'the night is as black as the sea'. Its pinnacle is this re-statement of the biblical vision of the peaceable kingdom: 'Well the bear will be gentle and the wolves will be tame / And the lion shall lay down with the lamb / And the beasts from the wild shall be led by a child / And I'll be changed, changed from this creature that I am.' (See also 'the lion lies down with the lamb'.) The song was performed much less satisfactorily by Bob Dylan in concert in 1989 (Frejus, France, June 18).

Probably the last survivor of the key figures born around the turn of the century who were originally recording in the 1920s, Dorsey died in Chicago on January 23, 1993, aged 93.

[Georgia Tom: 'Grievin' Me Blues', Chicago, c.6 Sep 1928, Rare Blues of the Twenties, No. 1, Historical HLP-1, NY, 1966. Tampa Red & Georgia Tom: 'It's Tight Like That', Chicago, 24 Oct 1928. Dorsey photograph in Paul Oliver, The Story of the Blues, London: Penguin, 1969, p.99. Sources includes Michael W. Harris, The Rise of Gospel Blues: The Music of Thomas Andrew Dorsey in the Urban Church, New York: Oxford University Press, 1992 edn., Dorsey 2nd quote p.219, telegram p.217; Dorsey 1st & 3rd quote www.honkytonks.org/showpages/tadorsey.htm, seen online 29 Jul 2004.]

Douglas, Steve [1938 - 1993] Steven Douglas Kreisman was born in Hollywood on September 24, 1938, served in the US Navy Drum and Bugle Corps after leaving school and became one of rock-'n'roll's greatest sax players. He came to prominence playing on Duane Eddy's instrumental records of the late 1950s. Eddy used three other tenor sax players in this period (Jim Horn, Gil Bernal and Plas Johnson) but on many of them, Eddy's 'million dollar twang' guitar sound, shudderingly reverberative and deep, would concede half a verse or so to Douglas' gorgeously beefy, crucially unjazz-like solos—and between the two of them, on 'Cannonball' (1958), 'Yep!', 'Forty Miles of Bad Road' (1959), 'Peter Gunn' (1960) and others, they created one of the defining sounds of 1950s teenage rebellion, epitomes of the strutting toughness of teddy boys and rock'n'roll. And it has to be said that now, hearing these old records anew, it is Duane who sounds overly simple and seemly, mild and polite to a fault; the sax holds up far better.

Douglas, pianist Larry Knetchel and Al Casey went out on the road as the Rebels on Dick Clark Bandstand package shows but Douglas also kept up session playing, and in this capacity worked on lots of PHIL SPECTOR wall-of-sound hit singles (those 'little symphonies for the kids', as Spector called them); his is the growling baritone blasting into the middle of the Crystals' 'Da Doo Ron Ron'. He made a solo album, Twist, in 1962 (of course it was in 1962) but also augmented a whole slew of the surf records of the early 1960s, among them hits by Jan & Dean and the Beach Boys, including 1965's masterwork Pet Sounds, as well as recording with everyone from the Lettermen to Lesley Gore.

In the 1970s Steve Douglas played with Mink DeVille, Ry Cooder, Mickey Hart and the Ramones, among others, and in 1978 he joined Bob Dylan's uniquely large line-up for the 1978 World Tour. Dylan made a point of stressing Douglas' rock'n' roll credentials, and used him not only for the 114 concerts that of that year, in Japan, Australia, Europe and the US, but also on the 1978 album Street Legal. He came back three years later for the Shot of Love sessions in late April and early May 1981. On the released album he plays the alto sax on 'Dead Man, Dead Man' and 'Every Grain of Sand'.

In the early 1980s Douglas also played with Duane Eddy again, along with the great Hal Blaine on drums and, at one point in 1983, Ry Cooder on second guitar. He reappeared in Dylan's professional life on some Knocked Out Loaded sessions exactly five years after his Shot of Love contributions, playing on the overdubs of April 28–29, 1986 onto the original recording of 'Driftin' Too Far from Shore' made on July 26, 1984, and on attempts at 'You'll Never Walk Alone', 'Unchain My Heart' and 'Without Love' made between April 29 and May 5, 1986, all in Topanga Park, California. More significantly, at the same sessions he plays on the Knocked Out Loaded tracks 'They Killed Him', 'You Wanna Ramble', 'Precious Memories', 'Maybe Someday' and 'Brownsville Girl'. Their association fizzled out in an unused session in Hollywood some time in April 1987, at which Douglas played on still-uncirculated versions of 'Look on Yonder Walls', 'Rollin' and Tumblin', 'Red Cadillac and a Black Mustache' and two takes of BILLY LEE RILEY's song 'Rock with Me Baby'.

Steve Douglas died of heart failure at the beginning of a session for Ry Cooder in LA on April 19, 1993.

Down in the Groove* [1988] Dylan's 33rd album (if you count the compilations), and bearing, like so many of the same era, a title determined to undercut any idea that inspired work might lie within. After a silence of nearly two years, here was a further devaluing of the whole notion of a new Bob Dylan album as something significant, and another refusal to offer new songs of his own. If it had been better recorded and Dylan had brought some creative alertness to his vocals, instead of rasping through on automatic, this could at least have been a Self Portrait II: there are interesting song selections here; but Dylan treats them maladroitly, fails to commend them as a purposive collection and throws in feeble makeweights: 'Had a Dream About You Baby', recycled from the soundtrack of the quaintly atrocious Hearts of Fire film of 1987; the risibly turgid 'Death Is Not the End', cut at the Infidels sessions and rightly rejected then; and two songs with lyrics by ROBERT HUNTER rejected even by the GRATEFUL DEAD as under-par: the tetchy, braggartly 'Silvio' and the shrivellingly dull-minded 'Ugliest Girl in the World'. This quality of work was so far below that of Dylan's albums of the 1960s that it just depressed the hell out of you. Continued silence would have been more dignified than this.

[Recorded London, 27–28 Aug 1986, Los Angeles, Apr 1987 and LA or Malibu, May 1987; released as Columbia OC 40957 (LP) & CK 40957 (CD), 19 or 31 May 1988.]

Drake, Pete [1932 - 1988] Roddis Franklin Drake was born in Atlanta, Georgia, on October 8, 1932. He grew up to be an innovative steel guitarist and eminent Nashville session musician, a producer and music publisher. In the mid-1950s, still based in Atlanta, he had his own group, full of players who were later big names: Jerry Reed, JOE SOUTH, DOUG KERSHAW, Roger Miller (playing fiddle) and country singer Jack Greene (playing drums). He said later: 'We kind of wore ourselves out, so I decided to move to Nashville.' But 'the steel guitar was kind of dead then, in 1959. Everybody was trying to go pop. They was putting strings and horns on Webb Pierce records, and nobody was using steel guitar. So I starved to death the first year and a half. Then I worked with DON GIBSON a while, then Marty Robbins.'

Eventually he played behind many artists, including THE EVERLY BROTHERS, ELVIS PRESLEY, GEORGE HARRISON (on All Things Must Pass, including the mega-hit 'My Sweet Lord'). He introduced the so-called 'talking steel', heard on his own hits 'Forever' (1964) and 'Talking Steel' (1965). It's also been claimed that he singlehandedly opened 'the entire pop and rock field to the sounds of the pedal steel': though Dylan's using him in 1967 surely had something to do with that.

Pete Drake first played steel guitar behind Dylan on the final two tracks of the 1968 John Wesley Harding album, 'Down Along the Cove' and 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight', both recorded in Nashville on November 29, 1967, and then on all four sessions for the Nashville Skyline album, beginning on February 13, 1969 and concluding February 18. These included the large number of duets sung by Dylan and JOHNNY CASH, which not only included the issued take of 'Girl of the North Country' but also the 'One Too Many Mornings' filmed and included in the 1969 film Johnny Cash: The Man and His Music and a widely circulated tape of further duets.

Nashville Skyline was released on April 9, and just under two weeks later Pete Drake was back in the studios for Dylan to play on the earliest of the sessions that eventually yielded Self Portrait and Dylan. In the midst of these, on May 1, 1969, Drake backed Dylan and Cash on Bob's delightful appearance on ABC's 'Johnny Cash TV Show', broadcast on June 7. He seems to have stopped playing on the studio sessions after that of May 3: the final session of 1969. (The 1970 sessions for the same albums featured steel guitar from Lloyd Green and Norman Spicher.)

Pete Drake's health declined badly in the 1980s, from an accumulation of illnesses including emphysema, diabetes and heart trouble. He moved to Florida in 1987, but got bored, moved back to Nashville and tried to restart his business activities. He died there of lung failure on July 29, 1988.

[Pete Drake interview quotes online 9 Mar 2005 at www.calsharp.com/music/Pete.html; some other detail from www.countryworks.com.]

Drawn Blank* [book, 1994] This hardback book of Dylan's selected drawings, presented as being 'sketches for paintings', mostly done on the road 'from about 1989 to about 1991 or '92 in various locations mainly to relax and refocus a restless mind', as he put it in September 1994 in his short foreword to the book, was published in the US late that same year and comprises 124 unnumbered pages containing 92 sketches. It's a modest achievement, likely to have gained publication only because Bob Dylan's name can be attached to it, and it certainly lacks most of the fun and vigour of the drawings published decades earlier in the first official song lyrics book, Writings & Drawings of Bob Dylan (1973), which were clearly influenced by the sketches by WOODY GUTHRIE contained in his 1943 autobiography, Bound for Glory, though some of the feel for that old rough-and-tumble perspective remains. Drawn Blank reveals a Dylan still curious about outside life, still observing the real world and its ordinary detail: something his songwriting does not always show. The world observed here is sometimes the almost Van Goghian shaking vernacular chunkiness of chairs, kitchens, cupboards, balconies, feet, old wooden houses and vibrant individuals; at other times the view is bleak and featureless, the world glimpsed on tour outside a series of hotel-room windows, devoid of human activity or architectural interest, while inside, a few large-breasted women loll about looking bored. One way and another there's a lot of blank that gets drawn here, but much to notice too.

At the time of its publication there were many who sniffed that Dylan's 'restless mind' would have been better occupied 'refocusing' on writing songs. The book emerged when Dylan's most recent two albums had contained none of his compositions; but you can't reasonably tell creative people what they should concentrate on; and as so often with Dylan, to appraise this work now that it's now longer new and therefore no longer being taken to augur anything, its virtues come on stronger and its weaknesses recede.

[Bob Dylan, Drawn Blank, New York & Toronto: Random House, 1994.]

Drummond, Tim [1940 -] Timothy Lee Drummond was born in Bloomington, Illinois, on April 20, 1940 but spent a year of his adolescence in Charleston, South Carolina, where he began playing guitar, and on his return to Chicago joined local groups Wild Child Gibson and Eddie Cash & the Cashiers. He changed to playing bass when working for CONWAY TWITTY, but didn't care for Twitty's switch to country music and moved to Cincinnati, playing clubs with early 1960s minor pop star Troy Seals and Lonnie Mack and session playing behind Hank Ballard (composer of 'The Twist') and James Brown.

By 1968 Drummond was in James Brown's hardworking touring band—just as Black Power was in its pomp, and Brown was being criticized as an Uncle Tom for his single 'America Is My Home'. (The next single was to be 'Say it Loud—I'm Black and I'm Proud'.) It didn't go down well with Brown's audience that Drummond, his bassist, was a whitey. Drummond stuck it out; but these were dramatic days—so that when, at the end of the 1970s, he went out on the gospel tours with Dylan, playing to partially hostile audiences again, it must have all seemed pretty tame.

Drummond quit Brown's band exhausted, moved to Nashville and with such high-level credentials became a top session player for R&B performers like Margie Hendricks and Joe Simon, country artists like Ronnie Milsap and then for NEIL YOUNG. Drummond played on Young's Harvest (issued 1972), became one of his Stray Gators, toured with him and moved to California. In the end he played on Young's albums Time Fades Away (1973), On the Beach (1974), Zuma (1975), American Stars 'n' Bars (1977), Comes a Time (1978), Hawks and Doves (1980), Everybody's Rockin' (1983) and Harvest Moon (1992). He also played on most of the CROSBY & Nash album Wind on the Water and on Crosby, Stills and Nash (1977).

Drummond has also played on albums by Ry Cooder, J.J. Cale, the Beach Boys, RICK DANKO, Don Henley and many others—and in 1990 he was on the soundtrack of the Dennis Hopper film The Hot Spot, playing in a heavyweight ensemble led by Miles Davis, Taj Mahal and JOHN LEE HOOKER.

Drummond first played with Dylan at the SNACK Benefit on March 12, 1975 in San Francisco—on this occasion playing guitar, not bass.

Then, in the middle of his later session work and his involvement with Neil Young, Drummond became a key part of Bob Dylan's Born Again story. After California rehearsals, he was brought down to the Muscle Shoals studios in Sheffield, Alabama, to be the bass player on the Slow Train Coming sessions, starting on April 30, 1979 and completed on May 4—and then he went out on the road with that first gospel tour, beginning that November 1 in San Francisco and ending in Tucson, Arizona, on December 9. He played too on Dylan's 'Saturday Night Live' TV appearance that October 20 and then on the first gospel tour of 1980, from January 11 in Portland, Oregon, through to February 9 in Charleston, West Virginia.

On both of those tours, on the Saved album begun just three days after that last concert, and on the next tour, from April 17 in Toronto through to May 21 in Dayton, Ohio, the drummer was JIM KELTNER—and on that last day in Dayton, Bob Dylan told an interviewer: 'I think Jim Keltner and Tim Drummond are the best rhythm section that God ever invented.'

God's and Bob's dream team held together through the brief fall tour too, from San Francisco on November 9 on back to Portland, Oregon, on December 4, and for the Shot of Love sessions in Santa Monica and LA in March to May 1981. Tim Drummond seems to have missed only the final session, on May 15 in LA, at which 'Heart of Mine' was recorded—and on June 15 & 16 he and Keltner were brought in to overdub on this anyway. By this point, the first 1981 tour had begun (in Chicago on June 10) and Tim Drummond was still there, and stayed there for all the June–July dates (finishing on July 25 in Avignon, France) and was back for the fall tour from October 16 in Milwaukee through to November 21 in Lakeland, Florida.

This was to be his last date as part of Dylan's band, but it has not been the last time they worked together. Both were in the same studio, probably in New York, around the end of 1995 or early in 1996, playing on two songs for CAROLE KING's ex-songwriting partner Gerry Goffin—'Masquerade' and 'Tragedy of the Trade'—with Drummond on bass and Dylan on guitar. Both tracks were released on Goffin's album Back Room Blood in 1996.

Drummond also owns four music publishing companies—Barn Yard Music, Dragin River Music, Gamblin Heart Music and Tornado Alley Music—and with this hat on too he bumps into Bob Dylan. One of the outtakes from the Shot of Love sessions was a song called 'Fur Slippers' (a title unheard but much bandied about at the time in the world of Dylan aficionados because it sounded so, well, so unBorn Again: so WARHOL Factory, 1966ish). Like the title track of the Saved album, it proved to be a joint composition by Dylan and Drummond, but this one remained unreleased and uncovered until a version emerged on the soundtrack of the CBS-TV mini-series 'Shake Rattle and Roll' in 1999 by one of the few performers who still goes out on the road more relentlessly than Dylan—B.B. King.

[Tim Drummond with Miles Davis, Taj Mahal, John Lee Hooker & others: The Hot Spot: Original Motion Picture Soundtrack, Verve 46813, US, 1990; Tim Drummond with Northern Blues Gospel AllStars: Northern Blues Gospel AllStars, Northern Blues Music NBM 0013, 2002. Main source www.timdrummond.net; others include the James Brown biography at www.soulexpress radio.com/soulbiob.htm; both seen online 18 Jan 2006. B.B. King: 'Fur Slippers', Shake Rattle and Roll, Uni/MCA, US, 1999. Dylan quote, interview by Karen Hughes, Dayton, OH, 21 May 1980, The Dominion, New Zealand, 2 Aug 1980.]

Duluth, Minnesota As Dylan writes truthfully in his poem 'My Life in a Stolen Moment': 'Duluth's an iron ore shipping town in Minnesota / It's built up on a rocky cliff that runs into Lake Superior / I was born there—my father was born there—'. It was still called Zenith City in those days, but by the time Bob Dylan was born there on May 24, 1941, though still the third-largest city in Minnesota, its population of 100,000 was going down.

Duluth is a scruffy, tough little city full of whiskery geezers hitting the precipitous streets that tumble down to the industrial waterfront where the wind comes off the water. The lake is so huge it's like the sea, making Duluth feel like a seaport, with a constant wind, tough people, a slight sense of menace, or at least the sense that you better have your wits about you on these colourless and poverty-soaked streets.

The ore from Hibbing leaves Duluth by boat to Chicago and points east. In the opposite direction came the immigrants from Russia, the Ukraine and, like Dylan's maternal grandmother's family, Lithuania, coming in via Liverpool, New Brunswick, Montreal and Michigan and along the Great Lake to Superior, across the bay from Duluth. You can see it all from the upstairs windows of 519 3rd Avenue East, the fast-deteriorating house the Zimmermans lived in when Bob was a baby. The alley down the side is strewn with foul rubbish, including big lumps of raw meat that the rats haven't eaten yet. There's no blue plaque on the wall here, no commemoration at all.

Armed with DAVE ENGEL's excellent book Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues: Dylan in Minnesota, you can drive up and down the grid of shabby roads, looking for, and finding almost all of, the apartments and houses through which the Zimmerman family passed in stages when they arrived here, becoming Americans and struggling to chase the Dream. A tough place to start.

Hard for the very young Bob too. Here is St. Mary's Hospital, where Dylan was born, and the dour, forbidding Nettleton elementary school where Bob shamed his father by having to be dragged the two blocks to it kicking and screaming. It's so ordinary, so drab. The change when Bob moved to Hibbing High was quite some upgrade. For Dylan's father, there was another school. Dominating the heights of Duluth is the Victorian monstrosity that he attended as a child, Central High, looking as if it's been built out of dogshit, and with a ludicrous 300-foot tower.

On 'Something There Is About You', from Planet Waves, Dylan sings this: 'Thought I'd shaken the wonder and the phantoms of my youth / Rainy days on the Great Lakes, walkin' the hills of old Duluth . . .' But he also writes of Duluth again, 30 years later, in the vivid prose of Chronicles Volume One:

> 'Duluth, even though it's two thousand miles from the nearest ocean, was an international seaport. Ships from South America, Asia and Europe came and went all the time, and the heavy rumble of the foghorns dragged you out of your senses by the neck. Even though you couldn't see the ships through the fog, you knew they were there by the heavy outbursts of thunder. . . . Foghorns sounded like great announcements. The big boats came and went, iron monsters from the deep. . . . As a child, slight, introverted and asthma stricken, the sound was so loud, so enveloping, I could feel it in my whole body and it made me feel hollow. Something out there could swallow me up.'

[Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, pp. 273–74. Dave Engel, Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues: Dylan in Minnesota, Rudolph, WI: River City Memoirs-Mesabi, 1997.]

Dunbar, Sly [1952 -] See Sly & Robbie.

Dundas, Glen [1941 -] Glen Thomas Dundas was born on September 7, 1941, in Port Arthur—which is now called Thunder Bay, and where Glen still lives—in Ontario, Canada, at the northern end of Highway 61 and the Mississippi River, just north of Dylan's birthplace of Duluth, Minnesota. He first took an interest in Dylan's work in 1965 and his first publication was Tangled Up in Tapes, the 1987 first edition of the invaluable reference work that he has now given us five editions of, the most recent titled Tangled: A Recording History of Bob Dylan and published in 2004.

This is a large-format, generously illustrated published database, comparable only to the work of MICHAEL KROGSGAARD, which lists, track by track and song by song, in chronological order, every extant recording of Bob Dylan, whether made officially in a studio (and whether issued officially or not) or recorded on an amateur tape, from the earliest known recordings (made in 1956) through to the last concert performance of 2003. In every case, Dundas also indicates whether the recording has been circulated amongst collectors and which live tracks are 'line recorded', i.e. have been taken from the sound mixer in the concert hall or some pre-mixed source or similar.

There is also a complete listing, with description, of every known extant professional film, TV and video appearance Dylan has ever made or been glimpsed in (though occasionally the Dundas judgment is wildly askew, as when he describes Dylan's feeble and near-impenetrable version of 'Chimes of Freedom' from the inauguration celebration for President Bill Clinton on January 17, 1993 as 'robust').

In the 2004 edition there is also an admittedly incomplete list of other people's songs covered by Dylan, listing who composed and wrote them, a chart of how many appearances Dylan is known to have made year by year since 1961 and a listing, for every track on every Dylan album, of how many times he has performed it live—from which, of course, it's also possible to see at a glance which songs have never been offered in concert—plus the total number of song performances derived from each album. (Thus for instance to the end of 2003 we can see that Dylan had given 3,112 song performances from The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan and only 418 from Street Legal, and that he has drawn more from Bringing It All Back Home than Blonde on Blonde.)

Glen Dundas has occasionally written a piece in a Dylan fanzine too, such as the lengthy 'Walk the Line' in the Winter 1999 issue of The Bridge, but his magnum opus is unquestionably the Tangled series. The present work has necessarily drawn extensively on Glen Dundas' own.

In November 1991, Dylan was handed a copy of Dundas' Tangled Up in Tapes Revisited on his tour-bus somewhere in the mid-west, and is reported to have handed it back remarking that it only showed where he'd been—and that he'd appreciate instead a book that showed him where he was going. But Dylan well understands that past and future are not two separate books, and that, as he put it in 1981's self-searching song 'Need a Woman' (a version of which was released on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3), 'whatever's waiting in the future could be what you're runnin' from in the past'.

[Glen Dundas, Tangled Up in Tapes, Thunder Bay: SMA Services, 1987; Tangled Up in Tapes Revisited, ditto 1990; Tangled Up in Tapes: The Recordings of Bob Dylan (3rd ed.; hardback), ditto, 1994; Tangled Up in Tapes: A Recording History of Bob Dylan (4th ed.) ditto, 1999; Tangled: A Recording History of Bob Dylan, ditto, 2004; 'Walk the Line', The Bridge no.4, Gateshead, UK, winter 1999.]

Dunn, Tim [1952 -] Timothy Dunn was born in Painesville, Ohio, on July 31, 1952. He first took an interest in Dylan's work in 1971, co-edited the fanzine Look Back from 1987 to 1992, was a contributing editor and staff researcher for fanzine ON THE TRACKS 1993–2004 and is a regular contributor to ALAN FRASER's extraordinary website 'Searching for a Gem'. His book 'I Just Write 'Em as

They Come': An Annotated Guide to the Writings of Bob Dylan was published in 1990; in 1996 came The Bob Dylan Copyright Files, in 1998 The Dylandex 1962–1997: An Index to Authorized and Unauthorized Bob Dylan Songbooks, Lyrics Collections & Sheet Music (And a Little More) and in 2000 The Bob Dylan Copyright Files Supplement 1. In 2006 the books on Dylan copyrights were superceded by the much expanded The Bob Dylan Copyright Files 1962–2005.

The first of these attempted to log every known item of Dylan writing (song or not), including rumoured works, through to 1989, with lists of official releases, recording and publication dates and annotations. The second book, and the supplement, reproduced relevant US copyright registrations from the US Copyright Office Catalog of Copyright Entries and online database. The Dylanex 1962–1997 has a self-explanatory sub-title, but it also covered Broadside, Sing Out! and other publications that included otherwise exclusive Dylan writings. The 2006 edition of the copyrights book broadens out to include annotations and a far wider variety of copyright registrations, such as for versions of Dylan songs on which he guests with other artists, songs by other people derived from Dylan songs and his Broadside magazine songs (copyrighted by publication rather than registration), with a chronology of initial copyrights and a composers index. Not everyone's idea of fun.

In his other life, Tim Dunn gained a Master of Library Science degree at Kent State University in 1976 (six years after 29 members of the US National Guard fired into a crowd of unarmed student protesters there, killing four and injuring others). He has worked for the Geauga County Public Library in Chardon, Ohio, since 1977 and is its current Head of Cataloging.

[Tim Dunn, all books, Grand Junction, CO: Rolling Tomes / Not-A-CES, except The Bob Dylan Copyright Files 1962–2005, Concord, OH: Not-A-CES, 2006.]

Dylan* [album, 1973] Unlucky 13th album—though it barely counts, since Dylan didn't intend its compilation or release. Essentially a malicious record company response to Dylan's signing with a new label, Asylum, in the US—a deliberate release of the worst tracks they could find in their vaults without going to the trouble of looking very far back: Dylan warming up before recording other things; Dylan messing about; outtakes largely from the New Morning sessions; and all compounded by a mix that brought the back-up vocals horrendously far forward. Two ironies: despite all this malice aforethought, the album isn't as bad as they meant it to be; and Dylan subsequently returned to Columbia/CBS because of Asylum's less effective sales-distribution system, not because of this shoddy bully-boy tactic of a release. Best tracks: 'Can't Help Falling in Love' (simultaneously witty and touching), 'Mr. Bojangles' and 'A Fool Such as I'.

[Recorded Nashville, TN, 24 & 26 Apr 1969 and NY, 1–4 Jun 1970; released as Columbia PC 32747 (CBS 69049 in UK), 16 Nov 1973. (Never CD-issued in US or UK, CD versions were released Japan 1990 & Europe 1991.)]

Dylan & the Dead* [1989] Yet another live album, in this case recordings from 1987 that you'd assume set out to humiliate Bob Dylan and prove how awful such joint concerts were: but in fact Dylan was given all the tapes and made these choices himself. He can't remember the words to any of the songs, the vocal sound is miserable and THE GRATEFUL DEAD are lumpenly uninspired. As ever with Dylan's live albums, it would have been possible to compile something distinctive and compelling instead, in this case from tapes that show Dylan and the Dead making sense as a unit blessed with the bounty of each partner's openness to the spontaneity of the moment. Richard Williams wrote of the 'wasted majesty' of this version of 'Queen Jane Approximately'; this was wishful thinking. (Wasted, yes; majesty, no.) Dylan's abject incompetence at groping for the words makes it rather a form of public self-abasement, excruciating and sad to witness. By the time this was released, Dylan was more than seven months into the Never-Ending Tour, and feeling rather better.

[Recorded in concert Foxboro, MA, 4 Jul, Eugene, OR, 19 Jul, Oakland, CA, 24 Jul and Anaheim, CA, 26 Jul 1987; released as Columbia OC 45056 (LP) & CK 45056 (CD), 6 or 9 Feb 1989.]

Dylan, Anna [1967 -] Anna Lea Dylan, only daughter of Bob and SARA DYLAN, was born in Woodstock, New York, on July 11, 1967. JAKOB DYLAN has said in interview that she is 'an artist'; she has chosen to have no public presence in that professional capacity. She is believed to be married and living in Santa Monica, California.

Dylan being 'bored' by his acoustic material 1965–66, the myth of The received wisdom seems to be that Dylan was so bored by the predictability of everything when he played his solo tour of Britain in 1965 that he had to go electric, and then, excited as he was by that, had to suffer the tedium of pushing his way through the acoustic first halves of all those 1965–66 'electric' shows. C. P. LEE's book Like the Night not only repeats this line but argues that Dylan's boredom was showing by the time he came to perform 'Mr. Tambourine Man' at Newport the previous year, 1964—offering as aural evidence that Dylan sounds stoned and his harmonica solo is 'lazy'.

Er, hang on a minute. First, the confident assertion that Dylan is stoned at Newport 1964 sits strangely with Lee's later description of Dylan at Manchester '66 as using only an 'almost stoned drawl'. Second, if Dylan is giving the harp on 'Mr. Tambourine Man' at Newport '64 less than his full attention, this is quite clearly because he's so enthralled by, so *un*bored by, the song. This performance of it is only two weeks after he recorded the duet version with RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT—when the song is so unfinished that the chorus offers 'and there ain't no place I'm goin' to'. Even Bob Dylan hasn't tired of something so new-born, so much a wondrous new level of creation. And actually, you don't need to remember the chronology. You only have to hear the way he sings it back then to know that (stoned or not) he is far from bored.

The same surely seems true of the 1965 performances of which we see and hear such scandalously fleeting moments in Don't Look Back. You've only got to listen to them: part of their compelling, entrancing power is the never-known-to-make-a-foolish-move, living-on-instinct deftness of the man-I'm-not-even-25 Bob Dylan, who but rarely needs even to touch a toe down on the highwire he's tracing—but part of the entrancement too is the unremitting compulsion to communicate that fizzes out of every pore, out of each unfaltering syllable. The level of direct and pure communication given off here—just listen to that tape of Newcastle '65. This is not a man suffering from boredom on stage.

It's probably the filmmaker, D.A. PENNEBAKER, who was unengaged by these performances, which is why we're given so shockingly little of them, and so sacrilegiously chopped up, on his otherwise wonderful film. At the time people didn't protest because the off-stage material was and is so gripping, no-one had dared dream of getting such access, such private revelation, and the off-stage Dylan there on film was so stupendously cool and beautiful and, excepting a couple of minor callow moments, so intelligent and wise. But really, if anyone else—the BBC, say—had shot footage of Dylan 1965 in performance and only shown little fragments, it would have been trumpeted as proof of their outrageous insensitivity.

Pennebaker says Dylan was bored on stage because Pennebaker wasn't enthralled by it. The myth starts there. Dylan off-stage rivets Pennebaker, and us: not least for the spikiness born of his off-stage boredom.

All this could be said at any time—but in 2005 came the bootleg release of a 2-DVD set of outtakes from Don't Look Back, yielding the treasure of many complete song performances. Unsurprisingly, this blows away any lingering possibility of claiming that the Dylan captured in these concerts is 'bored' with his acoustic material.

Nor, surely, is Dylan bored with his acoustic set in Britain in May 1966. Those soft and slurred yet ice-clear enunciations, those thrillingly magical harmonica trips through unmapped synapse connections . . . every sound purrs out perfectly from an imperative core of calm and silence. This is not the sound of Bob Dylan being bored. (We know how that sounds: we hear it for at least part of almost every concert of the last twenty years.)

Dylan, Bob, family background of See Stone/Edelstein family, the, and Zimmerman family, the.

Dylan in books of quotations General books of quotations sometimes include one or two, rarely more, from Bob Dylan, and they're always 'The answer my friend is blowing in the wind' or 'The times they are a-changin''. They should be offering a plethora of quotes, from 'Are you for sale or just on the shelf?' to 'He bought the American dream but it was all wet'; from 'i accept chaos. i am not sure whether it accepts me' to 'What looks large from a distance, close up ain't never that big' and 'To live outside the law you must be honest'.

In 1945, the Gnostic Gospels, known in Egypt as the Nag Hammadi Codices, were found near the town of Nag Hammadi, near Abydos, centre of the cult of Osiris and other death cults, and associated with Anubis, the jackal-headed god of embalming. These gospels are 4th century Coptic translations of 2nd century Greek originals, except that the Gospel of Thomas might date from about 50 AD, which would make it as old or older than the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. The Gospel of Thomas contains 114 sayings of Christ, including some which inspired the early Greek mystics known as the Gnostics. This is one: 'If you bring forth what is within you, what you bring forth will save you. If you do not bring forth what is within you, what is within you will destroy you.'

Bob Dylan is with the Gnostics here: these remarks have always made fundamental sense to him, and he restates them, or builds upon them, in at least two songs contemporaneous with 'Angelina'. He shares their assumptions in 'Need a Woman', when he observes that 'Whatever's waiting in the future / Could be what you're runnin' from in the past', and he re-states their message in that line from 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' in which he refers to '. . . the madness of becoming what one was never meant to be.'

You might also hear Christ's words as the impetus behind a compelling, quiet motto from 'Angelina' itself. There are lines of Dylan's that tiptoe into the brain without the warning that obvious brilliance signals: sayings that settle in unobtrusively, and make themselves quietly useful about the place, until you find yourself calling on their services surprisingly often. The lovely last verse of 'Angelina' contains such a saying. To put it in context, you need this much of it: 'In God's truth, tell me what you want and you'll have it of course / Just step into the arena.'

This surely expresses a great truth: that to get what you want, you must be prepared to put the whole of yourself into contesting for it, must fully enter the world in which lies the prize you seek, no matter how the odds are stacked, or how ugly the howling crowd . . . and that it must be a prize you truly want, your choice informed by some self-knowledge. Which is why a decent round-up of Dylan quotations ought to include 'Just step into the arena'. It may be less catchy than 'To live outside the law you must be honest' but it holds as much truth, and one has more occasion to say it.

Dylan interpreters There is a common confusion between critics and interpreters of Dylan. The critic's function is a large and porous topic but 'Dylan interpreter' is a much narrower, clearer term and a far less useful creature, whose mutton-headed aim is to say what Dylan's songs are 'about'. The first 'interpreter' was A. J. WEBERMAN but prurient journalism, especially when Dylan was new and could be presented as a novelty item, also went in for much superficial message-hunting in his songs. It provokes, in the artist, an appropriate defensiveness: '. . . I do know what my songs are about.' 'And what's that?' 'Oh, some are about four minutes, some are about five minutes, and some, believe it or not, are about eleven or twelve.' (Dylan's Playboy interview, March 1966.)

He goes on to deplore 'interpreters' overtly nearly 20 years later, complaining on the sleeve-notes to Biograph: '"You're a Big Girl Now", well, I read that this was supposed to be about my wife. I wish somebody would ask me first before they go ahead and print stuff like that. I mean it couldn't be about anyone else but my wife, right? Stupid and misleading jerks sometimes these interpreters are . . .'

In fact this instance opens up a more nebulous area, because the 'interpreter' here (the present writer) was a critic: one who never mentioned Dylan's wife at all until after Dylan chose to issue the explicitly autobiographical song 'Sara', on Desire, and did so in the case of 'You're a Big Girl Now' feeling that if it wasn't about his wife, it ought to have been, because part of the song's sinewy strength is that it speaks to an experience widespread among those of Dylan's generation, who found in the 1970s that much-vaunted theories of principled non-monogamy were a source of anxiety in practice, especially when feminism had emboldened all those ex-Hippie Chicks. All the same, the song is alive independently of the 1970s, and of any other specific social conditions or cultural moment—which rather reiterates the point that 'interpretation' is unwise and militates in favour of reductiveness, as criticism ought not to do.

In the same passage, Dylan goes on to say: '. . . I don't write confessional songs . . . well, actually I did write one once and it wasn't very good—it was a mistake to record it and I regret it . . . back there somewhere on maybe my third or fourth album.' He means 'Ballad in Plain D', on Another Side of Bob Dylan.

GREIL MARCUS wrote eloquently on these issues—on reductive interpretations of what works of art are 'about'—back at the end of the 1960s, addressing himself to a 'rock' readership in 'Let the Record Play Itself', San Francisco Express-Times, February 11, 1969:

> 'The game is still going on . . . "As I Went Out One Morning", a song in which Tom Paine guest stars, is about a dinner Dylan attended years ago, at which he was presented with the Tom Paine Award by the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee. Dylan, during his acceptance speech, said something about how he might understand how Lee Harvey Oswald felt, and the audience booed. This interpretation makes Dylan a real interesting guy. He waits for years to get a chance to get back at an unfriendly audience, and all Tom Paine means to him is the bad memory of an award dinner. Poor Tom Paine. The fellow who came up with this job [Weberman] has said: "I consider Bob Dylan America's greatest poet." Well, naturally; why should such a mind waste his time on a lesser figure? It's not just that such terms are pointless . . . but is this sort of thing—the Tom Paine Award Dinner Revenge—is this what makes a great poet?
>
> 'Poetry, music, songs, stories, are all part of that realm of creation that deepens our lives and can endow our lives with a special kind of grace, tension, perhaps with beauty and splendor. Meaning has many levels—one might meet the artist himself on one of those levels, find friends on another, reach a fine solitude in the light of another man's creation on yet another level. That kind of power in art might be scary—it might be sure enough to survive interpretation and the enforcement of the particular. . . . Take these lines from "London" by WILLIAM BLAKE: "But most thro' midnight streets I hear / How the youthful Harlot's curse / Blasts the newborn infant's tear / And blights with plagues the Marriage hearse". Now what that "means", it was once explained to me, is that a prostitute got syphilis, gave birth to a deformed child, the father of which also died of the disease. . . . That can all be confirmed by balancing and referring the images in the verse—but is it necessary to grasp that . . . in order to feel the weight and power of Blake's vision of London? Blake's words transcend the situation about which he's writing.'

Likewise, says Marcus, with Dylan: 'One will never "understand" "Just Like a Woman" by proving, logically, that it is about transvestites or Britain (Queen Mary and the fog) even if, by some chance, the song really is "about" such things.'

Dylan himself argues this case neatly at the end of 'Gates of Eden' where he commends his lover for valuing her dreams 'With no attempts to shovel the glimpse / Into the ditch of what each one means.'

Dylan, Jakob [1969 -] Jakob Luke Dylan was born in New York City on December 9, 1969, the youngest child of Bob and SARA DYLAN. He is the child for whom Dylan is supposed to have written the Planet Waves song 'Forever Young'. When he was 12, in 1982, Bob took him to a gig by the Clash at the Hollywood Palladium. After attending art school, Jakob formed the band the Wallflowers, singing, playing lead guitar and writing all the songs. The band's début album, The Wallflowers, came out quietly in 1992 and though not a great commercial success (it sold 40–45,000 copies at the time: 'failure' is a relative term), it achieved in one fell swoop a complexity of resonance and a musical dignity that make it a remarkably fine rock album. Anyone who has since been captivated by Jakob Dylan's work on the subsequent albums by newer incarnations of the Wallflowers should go back to it. Its lead musician's character is already fully formed here: likeable and straightforward, intelligent and articulate, he's no-one's imitator and far too shrewd to strain for effect. The album cover, however, typified its excess of modesty, stemming from Jakob's determination not to use his father's name too readily: it shows only the lower halves of the musicians and the drummer's dog. Inside, the photo of their faces hides them behind the lettering of the credits. The back cover doesn't even mention their names. You could say that even the band's name suggests undue shyness.

The LA-based Wallflowers left Virgin after that one album, opened tours for the Spin Doctors, Cracker and 10,000 Maniacs, including supporting the Maniacs at Minneapolis' Historic Orpheum Theater, which Bob Dylan had long since owned by this point. Jakob's grandmother, Bob's mother Beatty, came to the concert. Jakob, who spent summers in Minnesota, remembers seeing the musical Beatlemania at the theater.

The band signed to a new label and recorded Bringing Down the Horse with veteran producer T-BONE BURNETT. (He wasn't called in as a Bob Dylan contact: Jakob sent a demo tape to Burnett and let it jump out of the pile on its own merits.) Issued in May 1996, Bringing Down the Horse made a slow start, reached the top 10 the following March and has now sold over six million, helped by its including the tracks 'One Headlight', '6th Avenue Heartache' and 'Three Marlenas', which became hit singles, but also helped by conforming more to the norms of mainstream rock. It's more à la SPRINGSTEEN and less quirkily à la Jakob Dylan than its predecessor, unfortunately.

The albums may have been few and far between but the Wallflowers worked, live, even harder than Jakob's father, playing 275 gigs in 1997 alone. Bob played an unrepresentatively meagre 97 that year, though it was the year of his hospitalisation with a heart infection. After he recovered, he and Jakob shared a bill for the first time, at a private concert for the employees of a Silicon Valley firm, Applied Materials, that November 14 in San Jose.

That year brought a further conjunction, far less welcome. A.J. WEBERMAN turned his attention on the son as well as the father. As Rolling Stone's Gerry Hirshey reported it, having first summarised the Garbologist's hounding of Bob and Sara in Greenwich Village in 1970 when Jakob was a baby: 'And now, like some howling ancestral curse, he has descended, fangs dripping, upon the son. The Scavenger has boasted that he rooted through Jakob's soiled Pampers. And a quarter-century later, he tosses up more alleged flotsam of that infancy, online, offering photo negatives of Bob feeding his baby boy a bottle, pouring venomous supposition into tracts he calls "Analysis of Jakob Dylan's Poetry.'"

The third album, Breach, released after another gap in 2000, sold far less well but signalled a step forward in Jakob Dylan's preparedness to write less guardedly—to frisk himself less for untoward autobiographical confession in his lyrics, for contraband Dylanesque turns of phrase. Eventually he came out and said this: 'Every other songwriter in the world has been influenced by my dad. So why should I be any different?' The fourth Wallflowers album was 2002's Red Letter Days, and in 2005 came the much-praised Rebel, Sweetheart, produced by BRENDAN O'BRIEN. None has sold as well as the multi-platinum second album, but Jakob Dylan knows better than to care about that.

Jakob has often discussed his father in interviews, but never other than with a disarming mix of honesty and discretion. Meanwhile he keeps on keeping on with his own serious-minded but unsolemn, engaging and purposive work. As they say in Cockney soap operas, the boy done good.

[The Wallflowers: The Wallflowers, Virgin America CDVUS 54, US, 1992. Gerry Hirshey, 'Jakob's Ladder', Rolling Stone no.762, NY, 1997. Quote re being influenced by 'dad' as a songwriter, Nigel Williamson: The Rough Guide to Bob Dylan, London: Rough Guides, 2004, p.366. See also the useful website www.the-wallflowers.net.]

Dylan, Jesse [1966 -] Jesse Byron Dylan, Bob's eldest son, was born to SARA DYLAN and Bob on January 6, 1966 in New York City. He worked his way up from helping to film pop videos through TV commercials, including for Coca-Cola, Pepsi and MTV, to becoming a film director. He directed, among others, brother JAKOB's first Wallflowers video, 'Ashes to Ashes', Lenny Kravitz's 'It Ain't Over 'til It's Over' and TOM PETTY's 'A Face in the Crowd'. He also devised the album cover concept and photographs for Tom Waits' albums Bone Machine (1992) and Blood Money (2002).

In 1996 it was reported that he would make his directorial début with a Disney film to be called The Deedles Down Under; this didn't happen. Nor did he direct, as announced in 1998, the movie version of the Sega arcade game The House of the Dead (which Bob Dylan's office supremo JEFF ROSEN was going to produce). However, Jesse Dylan was given 'special thanks' in the credits of The Matrix Revisited in 2001, and that year also directed the comedy film How High, written by Dustin Abraham and starring rappers Method Man and Redman. In 2003 he directed the brash sex comedy American Wedding, written by Adam Herz, the third film in the American Pie series.

In 2005 Jesse Dylan directed the critically unacclaimed family comedy about sports, Kicking & Screaming, written by Leo Benvenuti & Steve Rudnick (which manages to include the great Robert Duvall), and was co-producer on the Michael Almereyda film William Eggleston in the Real World. Jesse Dylan is married to the actor Susan Traylor, whose credits include appearing as Mrs. Brown in Bob Dylan's Masked and Anonymous, 2003.

[How High, dir. Jersey Films / Native Pictures Productions, US, 2001; American Wedding, Universal, US, 2003; William Eggleston in the Real World, dir. & written Michael Almereyda, produced Almereyda, Jesse Dylan & Anthony Katagas, Keep Your Head / High Line Productions, US, 2005.]

Dylan Liberation Front See Weberman, A. J.

Dylan, Maria [1961 -] See Himmelman, Maria.

Dylan, Samuel [1968 -] Samuel Abram (or Abraham) Dylan was born in Woodstock, New York, on July 30, 1968, the second-youngest son of Bob and SARA DYLAN. Bar Mitzvahed in Israel in 1982, he later attended Hampshire College where he met his future wife, fellow student Stacy Hochheiser, and was, perhaps only briefly, a member of the band the Supreme Dicks. As blogger Jack Carneal recalls:

> 'A number of years ago we played some shows in California with a band called the Supreme Dicks. They'd gone to Hampshire College at the height of the 80s hippy revival and said they'd come up with the most obnoxious name possible mostly in order to tweak dorky earnest hippie sensibilities of their liberal Yankee counterparts. One of the Supreme Dicks looked familiar to all of us. . . . the familiar Dick [was] Sam Dylan, son of Bob and Sara . . .'

Hampshire College sat on 800 acres of orchard and farmland in South Amherst, Massachusetts, and admitted its first students in 1970. When Sam Dylan graduated in about 1990, his father arrived on the campus by helicopter. By the time the Supreme Dicks played a session for John Peel on BBC Radio in October 1995 Sam Dylan was no longer in the group, which by this point had already made two albums, The Unexamined Life (1993) and Workingman's Dick (1994)—though the latter was a compilation of 'archival recordings' from 1987–1989, and therefore may include Sam Dylan. This online review suggests the band's flavour (if the title of the album doesn't already point at one area of homage): 'Intentionally blasé, insomnia-soaked vocals and cryptically nonsensical lyrics intermingle with meandering guitar/rhythm section, stumbling through climaxes and decrescendos with muddled spontaneity and a penchant for subtle tongue-in-cheek absurdity; whereas others would fail miserably in their attempts to create anything of interest by following this treacherous path, this is the territory of the Supreme Dicks, and they comport themselves with aplomb.'

Samuel has been known to attend his father's concerts, as for instance at the Staples Center in Los Angeles in October 1991, when he and JAKOB were together in the audience. According to Jakob, his next-oldest sibling has become a photographer, though he has no online presence in this capacity. His wife Stacy Hochheiser co-edited the Hampshire College student paper In Black and White, which she and her two colleagues closed down in November 1986 'due to apathy and workload', but within a year she had become a founding co-editor of its replacement, then unnamed but running as Name This Paper, in October 1987. The paper becomes called Legal Grafitti and then The Permanent Press. One of her co-editors is called, er, Chris Dick.

[Jack Carneal quoted from 'The Lion in the Road', 9 Aug 2005, seen online 11 Nov 2005 at http://altogethernow.blogspot.com. The Supreme Dicks: Workingman's Dick, Freek FRR002, UK, 1996; excerpt online at www.apexonline.com/freek/catalogue.html; review seen 12 Nov 2005 at www.angelfire.com/ca/musicmix/faves/FavesPre1996.html.]

Dylan, Sara [1939 -] Shirley Marlin Noznisky was born in the large port of Wilmington, Delaware, on October 28, 1939, the daughter of a scrap-metal dealer shot not 'in a stickup', as alleged by AL ARONOWITZ, but by a drunken fellow Eastern European immigrant with whom he had been friendly and who believed, wrongly, that Isaac Noznisky was responsible for losing him his job. He was shot in the face with a .38 bullet in a neighbourhood sweetshop on the morning of Sunday, November 18, 1956, soon after the two men quarrelled in the street; the bullet severed a main artery to the brain and he died in the Delaware Hospital two days later. He was buried in the Workers Circle section of the Wilmington Jewish Community Cemetery that Thursday, November 22.

Isaac Noznisky had been born around 1894 in Poland (though he sometimes told officials he was from Russia) and had become a US citizen in 1912; by 1920 he and two brothers, Israel and Charles, were in Chester, Pennsylvania, in the household of his sister and brother-in-law. Isaac was a blacksmith, but brother-in-law Abe was a junk dealer. Around 1924 Isaac married; by 1930 he, wife Bessie and six-year-old son Jules (the only one of the three who could read and write) were sharing another house in Port Chester and working in the mushroom industry. They moved to Wilmington around 1931.

There they set up in business as I. Noznisky & Son, Junk Dealers, at South Claymont Street and Christiana Avenue. Shirley was 16 when her father was killed. Jules continued to run the junk business after their father's death. By the end of the 1950s Bessie, daughter Shirley, Jules and his wife Adele were living on West 38th Street, a block away from their earlier family home. Shirley was a student. Her mother is said to have suffered a stroke many years earlier.

In 1960 Shirley moved to New York City and that same year became the third wife of a little-known magazine photographer, Hans Lownds, who was, reportedly, 25 years older than her (and thus more than twice her age). He persuaded her to change her first name too, declaring: 'I can't be married to a woman named Shirley'. Thus she became Sara Lownds, though the marriage did not last long and soon after daughter Maria was born in October 1961, she was working for the film production company Drew Associates as secretary to its founder, the American cinema verité and camera pioneer Robert Drew, who started the company in 1960. D.A. PENNEBAKER and his associate Richard Leacock were also working for Drew then, before they quit to start their own production company. Pennebaker says of Sara Lownds in this period: 'She was supposed to be a secretary but she ran the place.' Robert Drew says: 'I had a contract with Time Inc.: our office was in the Time-Life building, and when I needed a secretary they would send me one. They were devilish about sending me the most attractive young women and Sara Lownds was one of them. We do not have records going back that far but my recollection is that she worked at Drew Associates in 1961 and 1962. I know it couldn't have been '63. I knew nothing about her personal life, but she was extremely gracious and competent.'

By late 1964 she had met Bob Dylan, either while reportedly driving her little MG sports car around Greenwich Village or through her waitress friend Sally Bueler, who in 1964 married ALBERT GROSSMAN. It's been said that they met at this wedding. By the beginning of 1965 Sara was living with her daughter in the Chelsea Hotel; Dylan rented an apartment there in order to court her.

It's sometimes said that Hans Lownds had 'transformed her into a magazine cover girl' but there's no evidence that she was ever a successful model, though the Ford Agency commissioned JERRY SCHATZBERG to take test shots of her and at one stage she was briefly a Playboy bunny girl. This, together with Hans Lownds' own low career profile, led many people to put two and two together and make five: to assume that her ex-husband was Victor Lowndes (sic), the prominent Playboy executive who was in charge of the serious money of Hugh Hefner's casino operations, owned a London mansion called Stocks and in the 1970s persuaded Playboy Pictures to co-finance the Monty Python film And Now for Something Completely Different. Since it was known that Dylan's 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands' was 'about' Sara, and that his 'Lowlands' played upon the name 'Lownd(e)s', the assumption was that his marvellously dismissive line 'And your magazine husband, who one day just had to go' was the clincher for this pairing.

In recent times it's been said that this merely got Victor Lowndes scratching his head and trying to recall which of his many bunnies people were linking him with; in fact he was so unamused that when ROBERT SHELTON made the mistake of linking Sara with Victor Lowndes in early drafts of his biography No Direction Home, Lowndes threatened to sue and Shelton had to eliminate the suggestion from his text.

Of course, 'your magazine husband' equally well fitted Hans Lownds, while one of the strengths of the line, taking it beyond mere sneering, is the lovely ambiguity of whether he 'one day just had to go' at his own behest or at hers. In the particular case, that isn't our business; and for the great majority of listeners, for whom the personal subtexts are meaningless and don't interfere, that ambiguity is part of the innate mystery of the song. Which doesn't stop the subtext being interesting: and the Nozniskys' junk-dealer background certainly adds an extra layer of resonance to the mysterious evocativeness of the song's previous line—'with your sheet-metal memory of Cannery Row'. Your ears are also likely to hear anew that innocuous line in 'From a Buick 6' that introduces his 'soulful mama' like this: 'She's a junkyard angel . . .'

Bob Dylan married Sara Lownds in a private ceremony in Mineola, Long Island, on November 22, 1965, either in the judge's chambers or outside under an oak tree, depending who you believe. (Outdoors on the East Coast in late November?) Dylan adopted Sara's daughter Maria, who grew up to marry singer-songwriter PETER HIMMELMAN. Sara and Bob Dylan had four children, JESSE Byron Abram, ANNA, SAMUEL and JAKOB, all born between 1966 and 1971.

Jakob has referred to the painful experience of hearing the Blood on the Tracks album: 'When I'm listening to "Subterranean Homesick Blues", I'm grooving along just like you. But when I'm listening to Blood on the Tracks, that's about my parents.' But he has also paid tribute to the upbringing both parents gave him, though he lived mostly with his mother. He said in 2005: 'My father said it himself in an interview many years ago: "Husband and wife failed, but mother and father didn't." I've got a life that really matters to me, and that's because of the way I was raised. My ethics are high because my parents did a great job.'

The parents' separation was indeed a main theme of Blood on the Tracks, but in 1975 they reconciled, after Sara Dylan, back from a holiday in Mexico, turned up for the very last summer session-day at the studios where Dylan was recording the next album of new material, Desire. JACQUES LEVY told HOWARD SOUNES that as she stood there in the control booth, he sang what would turn out to be the album's final song, 'Sara'. This song not only broke precedent by its outright personal naming, but enfolds the autobiographical-sounding claim of recalling 'staying up for days in the Chelsea Hotel / Writing "Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands" for you', alludes to past family holidays and ends, plainly enough, by asking: 'Don't ever leave me, don't ever go.' Levy said: 'You could have heard a pin drop. She was absolutely stunned by it. And I think it was a turning point. . . . The two of them really did get back together.'

They were together that fall for the Rolling Thunder Revue tour and therefore the making of Renaldo & Clara, in which Sara features prominently, taking part in many of the improvised acting scenes, including the sequence where, coming up from under ALLEN GINSBERG's recitation from 'Kaddish', Dylan's funky piano-pounding audio track of 'She Belongs to Me' accompanies the prolonged footage of Sara walking rainy city streets.

It was a year on from this filming—in late 1976—before the Dylans moved into the Malibu house they'd been building, with its famous copper onion-dome roof; Sara filed for divorce mere months later, on March 1, 1977. She gained temporary custody of the children, hired Marvin M. Mitchelson to fight her cause, won custody, and in the June 29, 1977 divorce settlement gained an unspecified sum of money. Robert Shelton speculated in the 1980s that it may have been as much as $10 million. According to Ed Caesar in the Independent 20 years later, it was a great deal more than that: 'Lownds won $36m from the settlement, as well as half the royalties from songs Dylan had written during their marriage.' A condition of the settlement was that Sara would remain silent about her life with Dylan. She has done so.

Sara's mother had died many years earlier; her brother Jules died in 1990, and his wife Adele in June 1998.

Of course, Dylan fans still picture Sara as she was in Renaldo & Clara, because they haven't seen her since. But she'll be 70 years old in three years' time.

[Noznisky research by this writer & Sarah Beattie incl. 1920 & 1930 Census pages; Wilmington, DE, City Directories for 1955, 1959 & 1961; Wilmington Morning News, 19 Nov 1956, pp.1 & 2, 21 Nov, pp.1 & 5, 22 Nov p.19; Journal Every Evening, Wilmington, 19 Nov 1956, pp.1 & 6, 20 Nov, p.24, 21 Nov, pp.1 &4; Sunday News Journal, Wilmington, 7 Jun 1998, Sectn B4; special thanks to Rhonda Allende at Wilmington Public Library. Hans Lownds quote from Wikipedia, seen online 10 Nov 2005 at http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sara_Lownds; quotes from Aronowitz & Pennebaker from Andy Gill & Kevin Odegard, A Simple Twist of Fate: Bob Dylan and the Making of Blood on the Tracks, New York: Da Capo, 2004, Ch.1. Robert Drew quoted from phone call with & e-mail to this writer, 17 Nov 2005. Jerry Schatzberg info e-mail to this writer 26 Dec 2005. And Now for Something Completely Different, dir. Ian MacNaughton, UK, 1971. Jakob Dylan quoted from Anthony de Curtis interview, New York Times, 10 May 2005. Jacques Levy quote in Howard Sounes, Down the Highway, New York: Grove Press, 2001; Sounes also first pioneered Noznisky background research. Ed Caesar, Independent, London, 23 Sep 2005.]

earliest blues & gospel recordings, Dylan's These are the earliest known recorded blues and gospel performances by Bob Dylan. Some songs in his very early repertoire are hard to categorise; but at the very least we can count the following:

St. Paul, Minnesota, May 1960: 'Delia' and 'Blue Yodel No. 8 [Muleskinner Blues]'. Minneapolis, August 1960: 'K.C. Moan'.

Minneapolis, May 1961: 'Death Don't Have No Mercy', 'Still a Fool', 'James Alley Blues'. Gerde's Folk City, NY, September 1961: 'Ain't No More Cane'.

NY, November 4, 1961: 'In the Pines', 'Gospel Plow', 'Back-water Blues', 'Fixin' to Die'. NY, November 20, 1961: 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down', 'In My Time of Dyin''. NY, November 32, 1961: 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean', 'Highway 51'. NY, November 23, 1961: 'Worried Blues'.

Minneapolis, December 22, 1961: 'Baby Please Don't Go', 'Candy Man', 'Stealin'', 'Dink's Song', 'Wade in the Water', 'In the Evening' and 'Cocaine'.

Where had these songs come from? 'Delia' was traditional, and a repertoire item of BLIND WILLIE McTELL (to be revisited by Dylan over 30 years later on his 1993 folk and blues album World Gone Wrong). 'Blue Yodel No.8' was a JIMMIE RODGERS song. 'K.C. Moan' by the MEMPHIS JUG BAND, from 1929, was one of the tracks on HARRY SMITH's seminal AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC anthology.

'Death Don't Have No Mercy' and 'Cocaine' were both from the REV. GARY DAVIS (aka Blind Gary Davis); 'Still a Fool' was from MUDDY WATERS; 'James Alley Blues', by RICHARD RABBIT BROWN, from 1927, was another American Folk Music track; 'Ain't No More Cane' and 'In the Pines' had been popularised by LEADBELLY (though the former title was also well-known in folkie circles by ALAN LOMAX himself: it was one of the tracks on his 1958 LP Texas Folk Songs). 'Gospel Plow' was rewritten by Dylan from a traditional song. 'Back-Water Blues' came from Bessie Smith, and 'Fixin' to Die' from BUKKA WHITE. 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down' has been claimed by many; see separate entry. The sleevenotes to Dylan's début album say that he had never performed 'In My Time of Dyin'' before he recorded it, and couldn't remember where he'd got it but in fact it was based on BLIND WILLIE JOHNSON's 'Jesus Make Up My Dying Bed' [Dallas, December 3, 1927]. (It's quite similar to 'Fixin' to Die'.) 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean' comes from BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON, and had been collected on the American Folk Music anthology. 'Highway 51 Blues' came from CURTIS JONES, and 'Worried Blues', created from common-stock phrases, seems to have been assembled by Hally Wood, a white transcriber and annotator of folksong recorded by Alan Lomax.

'Baby Please Don't Go' was a 1935 hit by BIG JOE WILLIAMS that turned into a classic blues repertoire item. 'Candy Man' was such an item too, but unattributable to anyone in particular. The Memphis Jug Band had recorded 'Stealin', Stealin'' in the 1920s; 'Dink's Song' and 'Wade in the Water' were traditional, and 'In the Evening' (aka 'When the Sun Goes Down') was from Leroy Carr, perhaps via SONNY TERRY & BROWNIE McGHEE.

E

Two of these songs Dylan had picked up from what was, after Harry Smith's anthology, the next crucial vinyl issue of previously hard-to-obtain pre-war blues material, the 1959 LP The Country Blues, issued to accompany SAM CHARTERS' pioneering book of the same name—the book that spurred so many people to go down south, winkling out old blues singers from their anonymous penury and presenting them in northern coffee-houses.

This LP featured the Memphis Jug Band's 'Stealin', Stealin'', which Dylan sang onto the same 1961 tape as his own 'I Was Young When I Left home', and Bukka White's 'Fixin' to Die Blues', which Dylan put on his début album.

One way and another then (and see also pre-war blues, Dylan's ways of accessing), by the end of 1961, Dylan knew enough pre-war blues and gospel that he could confidently perform and record almost 25 such repertoire pieces, and this while also going through his GUTHRIE-fixation period.

[Blind Willie McTell: 'Delia', Atlanta, 5 Nov 1940. Jimmie Rodgers: 'Blue Yodel No. 8, Hollywood, CA, 11 Jul 1930. Memphis Jug Band: 'K.C. Moan', Memphis, 4 Oct 1929 & 'Stealin', Stealin'', Memphis, 15 Sep 1928. Rev. Gary Davis: 'Death Don't Have No Mercy', Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 24 Aug 1960 & later re-recordings, & 'Cocaine Blues', nia but mid-1960s. Muddy Waters: 'Still a Fool', Chicago, 11 Jul 1951, Chess 1480, Chicago, 1951. Richard Rabbit Brown: 'James Alley Blues', New Orleans, 11 Mar 1927. Bessie Smith: 'Back-Water Blues', NY, 17 Feb 1927. Bukka White: 'Fixin' to Die Blues', Chicago, 8 Mar 1940. Blind Willie Johnson: 'Jesus Make Up My Dying Bed', Dallas, 3 Dec 1927. Blind Lemon Jefferson: 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean', Chicago, c.Feb 1928. Curtis Jones: 'Highway 51 Blues', Chicago, 25 Jan 1938. Big Joe Williams: 'Baby Please Don't Go', Chicago, 31 Oct 1935. Leroy Carr: 'When the Sun Goes Down', Chicago, 25 Feb 1935.]

earliest extant recordings, Dylan's It's an odd process, but as we have travelled further and further away from the 1950s, earlier and earlier recordings made by Bob Dylan in that decade have emerged, surprising us with their existence.

The first pre-1961 item to emerge—in 1978—was a fall 1960 tape of 11 songs, supposedly recorded at Dylan's Minneapolis apartment, which was partly of WOODY GUTHRIE songs but also included the Dylan-written 'Talking Hugh Brown' (Brown being a friend of his). The tape circulated but never created much excitement. In 2005 one track—now called 'Rambler, Gambler' though previously known as 'I'm a Gambler'—was issued on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: the Soundtrack; but the film itself contained not only a fragment of this song but fleeting moments too of 'Streets of Glory', described in the screen credits as 'Traditional, Arranged and Performed by Bob Dylan', and of a version of the MEMPHIS JUG BAND's 'K.C. Moan' from this tape, and the tape's enticing, very funny aural glimpse of Dylan's tremendous Irish accent on 'Johnny I Hardly Knew You'; all were credited as 'Courtesy of Cleve Pettersen and the Minnesota Historical Society,' and the tape was dated more specifically as from August 1960, and to have been recorded at the University of Minnesota in Minneapolis by Cleve Petterson, on a new tape-recorder. He is said to have recorded 'a dozen' songs, but this may still be an approximate description, rather than suggesting that there is a track never previously known about or circulated.

Next, and this emerged later in 1978, was a 27-song, 36-minute recording made even earlier, at the apartment of a Karen Wallace in St. Paul, Minnesota, in May 1960, featuring a sweet-voiced young Dylan (a comparison has often been made to the Nashville Skyline voice). But its authenticity remained in doubt for some time so far as a number of discographers were concerned. MICHAEL KROGSGAARD did not include it in the 1988 edition of his listings Master of the Tracks: The Bob Dylan Reference Book, and in GLEN DUNDAS' 1990 Tangled Up in Tapes Revisited 'doubt as to the authenticity of this tape' was mentioned. Only in the 1990s, then, were all the main specialists in Dylan recordings information convinced that it was genuine.

The power of television was illustrated in 1993 when a BBC-TV documentary team visited Minnesota and were offered something that not even ROBERT SHELTON's assiduous and privileged researches in the North Country had managed to discover—a tape made at Dylan's own boyhood home in 1958 (long before he was Bob Dylan) with one of Shelton's interviewees, Dylan's 'best buddy', John Bucklen.

This features Bob Zimmerman the rock'n'roller, playing piano and guitar and singing snatches of five songs (with some shared vocals by Bucklen) interspersed with conversation between the two. The songs are 'Little Richard' (composed by Dylan), 'Buzz Buzz Buzz' (a hit for the Hollywood Flames in late 1957 to early 1958), 'Jenny, Jenny' (a LITTLE RICHARD song), 'We Belong Together' (a minor chart hit in March that year for an adenoidal black harmony duo from the Bronx called Robert & Johnny, i.e. Robert Carr and Johnny Mitchell) and the unknown 'Betty Lou' (sometimes listed wrongly as 'Blue Moon'). Four were first heard, though incompletely, on BBC-TV's excellent 'Highway 61 Revisited', first broadcast in the UK on May 8, 1993.

Later still—indeed not until the 21st century had arrived—did we find that there was an even earlier extant recording of Bob Dylan, made in a custom recording facility in the Terlinde Music Shop in St. Paul, Minnesota, on Christmas Eve, 1956! He and two friends from summer camp, LARRY KEGAN and HOWARD RUTMAN, are all aged 15; Dylan is on piano and shares vocals with the others as they race through incomplete versions of eight songs in little more than nine minutes.

The songs are: 'Let the Good Times Roll' (an R&B million-selling instant classic that year by Shirley & Lee: a record that's been giving pleasure ever since), 'Boppin' the Blues' (a small hit by CARL PERKINS, also 1956), an unidentified song with almost no lyric beyond the phrase 'Won't you be my girl?', 'Lawdy Miss Clawdy' (Lloyd Price's first record and first hit, and one of the earliest black R&B records to cross over into the white markets and so to help shape rock'n'roll), 'Ready Teddy' (a 1956 Little Richard hit), 'Confidential' (a hit by Sonny Knight—a song Dylan would revisit on the Basement Tapes in 1967, live in Helsinki on May 30, 1989 and in the first two of his unusual four-set gig at Toad's Place, New Haven, CT, on January 12, 1990), 'In the Still of the Night' (an R&B ballad by the Five Satins, also a hit the first time around in 1956, and often named as one of the most beautiful such records ever made) and 'Earth Angel' (a 2-million-seller by the Penguins from 1954). Clearly, one of Dylan's main musical enthusiasms at the time was for black doo-wop.

In June 1986, with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS, the night after he'd played Minneapolis, he performed 'Let the Good Times Roll' in East Troy, Wisconsin, introducing it thus: 'This is pretty old. I used to play this when I was twelve years old. And . . . this is a song that got me booed off my first stages. . . . It was a different band, but it sort of went the same way.'

Most recently, one further tape has emerged: a four-song tape stated to be from May 1959, recorded by another friend from Hibbing, RIC KANGAS, who appears in the film No Direction Home showing us the tape-recorder on which 'Bob Zimmerman', as he calls him, wanted to know how he sounded. One track mentioned and excerpted on the film, 'When I Got Troubles', is released complete on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: the Soundtrack, and the notes suggest that it is 'most likely the first original song recorded by Bob Dylan'—though this can't be true, granted that the No Direction Home film's credits claim/confirm that 'Little Richard', on the 1958 John Bucklen tape, was also composed by Dylan.

In any case, 'When I Got Troubles' is one of four songs on the Ric Kangas tape, the others being Kangas performing 'I Wish I Knew' with back-up by Dylan, plus Dylan performing 'Teen Love Serenade', aka 'I Got a New Girl', and 'The Frog Song', described as having a Clarence 'Frogman' Henry style vocal (meaning of the croaking voice on his first minor hit, the novelty song 'Ain't Got No Home' from 1956). A little bit of 'Teen Love Serenade' is also played on the film soundtrack, but—a neat juxtapositioning—underneath Dylan talking about his early girlfriends. On October 1, 2005, Ric Kangas put the original reel of tape containing these recordings up for sale on eBay with a starting price of $1.5 million. The auction ended with no bids.

(See also earliest blues & gospel recordings, Dylan's.)

[Dylan quote re John Bucklen, in Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, 1986, p.16. Hollywood Flames: 'Buzz Buzz Buzz', LA, 1957, Ebb 119, LA, 1957; CD-reissued Buzz Buzz Buzz, Specialty SPC-2166-4, nia. Robert & Johnny: 'We Belong Together', nia, Old Town Records, 1958; CD-reissued The Very Best of Robert & Johnny: We Belong Together, Collectable COL 6068, US, 2000 and Robert & Johnny—We Belong Together, Ace CDCHD384, UK, 2004. Shirley & Lee: 'Let the Good Times Roll', New Orleans, May 1956, Aladdin 45-3325, LA, 1956. Carl Perkins: 'Boppin' the Blues', Memphis, 1956, Sun 243, Memphis, 1956. Sonny Knight: 'Confidential', CD-reissued The Golden Age of American Rock 'n' Roll Volume 7, nia. The Five Satins: 'In the Still of the Night', New Haven, CT, 1956, Standard (& then Ember), US, 1956. The Penguins: 'Earth Angel', LA, Sep 1954, DooTone 348, LA, 1954. Clarence 'Frogman' Henry: 'Ain't Got No Home', New Orleans, Sep 1956, Argo 5259, Chicago, 1956.

Bob Dylan, Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers: 'Let the Good Times Roll', East Troy, WI, 27 Jun 1986.]

'Early Morning Rain' Song by the Canadian singer-songwriter GORDON LIGHTFOOT, which Dylan recorded for Self Portrait, on which it appeared as if it were one of the many oldies on that collection. But 'Early Morning Rain' was barely an oldie: its composer was 'discovered' by fellow-Canadian folkies IAN & SYLVIA, who had a near-hit single with the title track of their LP Early Morning Rain in 1965. It was then cut by JUDY COLLINS for her 5th Album, also 1965. Lightfoot signed to United Artists that year (his first US public appearance was at the 1965 Newport Folk Festival) and included 'Early Morning Rain' on his LP Lightfoot, 1966.

Bob Dylan performed 'Early Morning Rain' at four concerts in 1989, two in 1990 and two in 1991, including a glorious version at South Bend, Indiana, November 6, 1991, on which the band keeps up a distinctive circular rolling beat and Dylan marries its spiky, garage-band compulsion to a delicately expressive vocal.

[Ian & Sylvia: 'Early Morning Rain', nia, also issued on Early Morning Rain, Vanguard VSD-79175, NY, 1965. Judy Collins: 'Early Morning Rain', NY, nia, issued 5th Album, Elektra EKS 7300, NY, 1965. Gordon Lightfoot: 'Early Morning Rain', nia, on Lightfoot, United Artists, nia, Hollywood (UAS 6487, London), 1966.]

Eat the Document* [film, 1971] This was the film made by D.A. PENNEBAKER under Dylan's direction during his unsurpassable tour of Britain in May 1966, when he brought over the band for the first time. He turned 25 while he was there. It was a very different film from the previous year's black and white documentary, also filmed by Pennebaker. Then, the latter had been the auteur director; now he was Dylan's hired hand. HOWARD ALK was filming too, and the whole thing was supposed to be for an ABC-TV Special, for which Dylan had been paid up front. As with Renaldo & Clara a decade later, Dylan wasn't very interested in the concert footage, or even in what was going on in real life in between; he was mostly interested in set-up scenes full of visual jokes and surreal happenings, filmed in hotel rooms and the like, as in the shaky sequence of people pouring out of a wardrobe.

A burdensome amount of time is also spent with Dylan and ROBBIE ROBERTSON walking around sniggering at the unhipness of everyone they encounter. Robertson fulfils the same rôle here as BOB NEUWIRTH fulfilled in Don't Look Back the year before; he's the sidekick, the Robin to Dylan's Batman. One of the sequences used only very fleetingly indeed, but shot at length, shows Dylan and JOHN LENNON riding in the back of a limo, with Dylan so stoned that he's about to throw up and Lennon, nervous as a racehorse and compensating for his nerves and the moment's futility by keeping up a frenetic overly perky commentary. This largely omitted scene was transcribed and its dialogue first published by JOHN BAULDIE in the first issue of the British music magazine Mojo in 1993.

When it came to editing the film, Dylan struggled to make headway alone at first, but when he found that there was a great swathe of undeveloped footage shot by Alk in the middle of it all, he got Alk to come and help him edit it. They had no chance of finishing in time for the TV schedule, and in any case no chance of satisfying the TV executives with what they had to offer. Jones Alk remembers a screening of some hastily assembled early version of the film for the TV suits, at which she and ALBERT GROSSMAN's wife Sally had to go and sit in the screening theatre with the executives while Howard Alk and Dylan hid away in the projection room. No-one was happy and the film, though still shaped for television, has rarely been seen except in bootleg circulation in dire quality. (The bootleg DVD appeared in 2003, and included the Lennon-Dylan sequence.)

Despite the tiresome staged scenes and the excess of stoned hippie scenes, the film offers, of course, marvellous fragments of heart-stoppingly great performance footage, some backstage music too, and a now-incongruous glimpse back at the Dickensian Britain that Dylan, the original spider from Mars, had descended upon. There are also excellent examples, here, of Alk's flair as an editor, particularly in the way that he juxtaposes music and specific lines of lyric with conversation and images pulled from elsewhere, not least—and Alk's instinct for letting the disenfranchised speak plays to advantage here—when the blazing glory of the electric music is intercut with the vox-pop verdicts of young concert-goers who are passionately for and against this new Dylan.

D.A. Pennebaker is said to be planning to issue his own version of his own footage, to be titled Something Is Happening; but it isn't happening yet.

Eat the Document was premiéred at the New York Academy of Music and the Whitney Museum of American Art in 1971 and remains, another 35 years later, rarely seen in its own right. But if it can be regarded as in some ways a trial run for Renaldo & Clara (see entry Alk, Howard for more on this, and on the editing of the film), and as a film that didn't work, it must also be recognised as providing much of the best and most crucial archive footage in a film that does work, and has been very widely seen, MARTIN SCORSESE's No Direction Home.

Naturally, Bob Dylan's 2004 memoir Chronicles Volume One makes no mention of Eat the Document, Don't Look Back, Renaldo & Clara, Pennebaker or the Alks.

[Source for Pennebaker's changed status, his own interview given to Shelley Livson, NY, spring 1984, collected as '1966 and All That: D.A. Pennebaker, Filmmaker' in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds., All Across The Telegraph: The Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987. Further information from Jones Cullinan (then Jones Alk), phone call with this writer 1 Nov 2005.]

Ecclesiastes, Dylan's use of The Old Testament Book of Ecclesiastes is famously the one book in the Bible which gives space and a sympathetic airing to doubt. Ecclesiastes alone accommodates the idea of doubt not as a sin marking out the wicked and shameful, but as a problem that is bound to visit, probably recurrently, those of good will and a reflective temperament. It offers a forum for our inevitable feelings about the brevity of human life, and about whether, being so brief, it isn't also meaningless. This is where 'vanity of vanities; all is vanity' comes from (Ecclesiastes 1:2): 'Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity.' This becomes the basis of what is almost an incantation, a repeated theme, as here (1:14): 'I have seen all the works that are done under the sun; and behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit.'

'The Preacher' meditates aloud about exactly the kinds of contradiction and injustice in life that cause us to doubt either God's existence or his kindliness, and perhaps to lose hope for the future. As the Good News Bible notes: 'the fact that this book is in the Bible shows that biblical faith is broad enough to take into account such pessimism and doubt. Many have taken comfort in seeing themselves in the mirror of Ecclesiastes . . .'

When Dylan opens his great song 'Jokerman' (see separate entry) with a highly compressed, adroit balancing of allusions to both Christ's espousal of the power of faith and, by quotation, to Ecclesiastes' recognition of the legitimacy of doubt, he is exploring the themes of this book for by no means the first time. One of its themes is the difficult question of whether it is better to be alive, enduring and aware of the inevitable pain of the human lot, or to be dead and feeling nothing (the Preacher first looks at the question with pessimism, and later more hopefully): and Dylan addresses this dilemma in 1965's sleevenotes to Bringing It All Back Home and then with an explicit nod at the text of Ecclesiastes in a song contemporary with 'Jokerman', 1983's 'Tell Me', recorded at the Infidels sessions but released only on the 1991 box set Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3.

In the first he writes that it is better to be a live nobody than a dead hero: '. . . i would not want / t' be bach. mozart. tolstoy. joe hill. gertrude / stein or james dean / they are all dead'; but in the second he simply poses the question to the song's addressee: 'Which means more to you, a live dog or a dead lion?' This is a direct allusion to Ecclesiastes 9:4, a part of the text in which optimism prevails and the Preacher decides the issue the same way Dylan decided it back in 1965 when he wrote those sleevenotes: 'For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion.'

In 1965's 'It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)' Dylan refers to two more of the main themes explored in Ecclesiastes—the hopeless limits of our understanding: 'To understand you know too soon / There is no sense in trying'; and the always-unsatisfying way that the foolish and the wise so often get the same deal: 'Although the masters make the rules / For the wise men and the fools / I got nothing, Ma, to live up to.'

This compares directly with Ecclesiastes 2:15–16: '. . . As it happeneth to the fool so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity. For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool.'

In 1967's 'Tears of Rage', Dylan echoes what is almost the first preoccupation of Ecclesiastes, the shortness of the human lifespan and the impossibility of leaving anything that lasts (though this is not to suggest that one needs Ecclesiastes to prompt this line of thought): '. . . you know we're so alone / And life is brief', while in the contemporaneous Basement Tapes song 'Too Much of Nothing' (a title that in itself summarises the gloomy end of the Ecclesiastes meditative spectrum) Dylan worries away at other parts of the Preacher's text. The song's opaque second verse seems to follow a line of thought prompted by the beginning of Ecclesiastes 8, which advises people to be circumspect and at least appear obedient in front of a king, to be safe: and goes on immediately to the thought that no-one knows anything about anything much, and certainly not about when they will die. Here is Ecclesiastes 8:2 & 5–9 in the ploddingly unmemorable Good News version: 'Do what the king says. . . . As long as you obey his commands, you are safe, and a wise man knows how and when to do it. There is a right time and a right way to do everything, but we know so little! None of us knows what is going to happen, and there is no one to tell us. No one can keep himself from dying or put off the day of his death . . .'

Dylan's meditation boils this down to 'Too much of nothing / Can make a man abuse a king. / He can walk the streets and boast like most / But he wouldn't know a thing.' ('Curse not the king . . .', as Ecclesiastes says again in 10:20)—after which Dylan adds at once, echoing Ecclesiastes far more plainly: 'Now, it's all been done before, / It's all been written in the book.'

This again is a main theme of Ecclesiastes, connecting with the idea of life's brevity and the impossibility of leaving anything behind. It's all been done before and it all disappears. Everything will be forgotten: so much so that we forget that everything in our own times has been around before, time and again. 'There is no remembrance of former things; neither shall there be any remembrance of things that are to come with those that shall come after' (1:11).

Dylan's 'Now, it's all been done before, / It's all been written in the book' is in one way an awkward fit here, of course: especially since there's a close parallel with what he offers immediately after '. . . i would not want / t' be bach. mozart. tolstoy. joe hill. gertrude / stein or james dean / they are all dead' in those Bringing It All Back Home sleevenotes, which is: 'the / Great books've been written. the Great sayings / have all been said.' The noticeable similarity of these passages suggests that 'It's all been written in the book' means that what has gone before gets preserved, whereas the point argued in Ecclesiastes is that everything's been done before and never gets remembered. It's all been written in the book of human history but nobody reads the book; no-one even remembers that if they did read the book they'd find that 'it's all been done before'. Nonetheless, Dylan continues to nudge the Ecclesiastes text around.

And, that text encourages us to ask, if the individual's life is so short, and what s/he tries to leave behind must sink without trace, then what can be the point? A key part of this is famously summarised in the first chapter (1:9): 'The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun.'

In his Christian evangelical period, Dylan returns to these themes, usually drawing on more positive ways of looking at them—as does Ecclesiastes, in spite of all the doubts, in the course of its meditation—or else with every appearance of relishing the gloom they might induce. Hence we find 'That which hath been is now; and that which is to be hath already been' (3:15) transferred almost verbatim into the second of these lines from 'Pressing On', from the Saved album of 1980: 'What kind of sign they need when it all come from within, / When what's lost has been found, what's to come has already been?'; and in 'Ain't No Man Righteous, No Not One' the similarly near-verbatim 'God got the power, man has got his vanity . . . / Don't you know there's nothing new under the sun? / Well, there ain't no man righteous, no not one' while another song contemporaneous with 'Jokerman' (and 'Tell Me'), the rather less approachable 'I and I', manages to snatch some kind of solace from the jaws of gloom with its use of yet another near-verbatim Ecclesiastes quotation. That song, looking frantically on the bright side, declares: 'Took an untrodden path once, where the swift don't win the race. / It goes to the worthy, who can divide the word of truth', though in Ecclesiastes (9:11) the Preacher '. . . returned, and saw under the sun, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all.' (The non-Ecclesiastes reference, 'It goes to the worthy, who can divide the word of truth', which Dylan pairs with the Ecclesiastes-based 'the swift don't win the race', derives from Paul's Second Epistle to Timothy: 'Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth' (2:15).

When we return to where we started—with 'Jokerman'—we can recognise that not only its opening line but also its second verse is, among other things, another venture among these themes of Ecclesiastes. That second verse marks a return to the book's notions of life's brevity: 'How swiftly the sun sets in the sky'; how we leave nothing behind: 'You rise up and say goodbye to no-one'; how the master makes the rules for the wise men and the fools, and both face the same void: 'Fools rush in where angels fear to tread / Both of their futures so full of dread, you don't show one.'

When Dylan cites Ecclesiastes in 'Jokerman', then, he is returning to biblical territory he has drawn on many times, and to know something of this book's special function as a forum for airing inherent problems to do with human purpose is to hear more fully this 1980s song's greatness of resonance—and to recognise that Dylan's work continues to draw upon the wide, humane resource of the book of Ecclesiastes.

[Good News Bible: Today's English Version, London: Bible Societies / Collins / Fontana, 1976.]

Eliot, T.S. [1888 - 1965] Thomas Stearns Eliot, was born in St. Louis, Missouri, on September 26, 1888. An Anglo-American poet, dramatist and literary critic, was the single most important poet of the 20th century.

The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock (a dramatic monologue) threw away 'the canons of the poetical' and made nonsense of the distinction between 'seriousness' and 'levity' in art. In 'Mr. Eliot and Milton' (The Common Pursuit, 1952), the critic F.R. Leavis describes Eliot as 'a poet confronted with the task of inventing the new ways of using words that were necessary if there was to be a contemporary poetry . . . when current poetic conventions and idioms afforded no starting point'.

Folk-rock was Dylan's Prufrock. With the Dylan songs that inspired this form, he—like Eliot 50 years earlier—was answering the demands of the times for a new poetry. It follows, more generally, that Dylan's finely chiselled language owes something emphatic to the tutoring of Eliot's early poetry.

As Prufrock broke the rules laid down by tradition as to what the language of poetry should be, so folk-rock broke the rules of song: of rock/pop music, what its lyrics could deal with and the language it could use, and achieved similar results (even to the early hostility of academics to Eliot being echoed in much of the initial response to 'electric Dylan').

Dylan used 'popular' as opposed to 'serious' music, and married it to fresh language, including much slang, street patois and the double-meanings and double-imagery of cult terms—especially drug terms. Perhaps this was Beat poetry set to music (as against Beat poetry intoned in front of modern jazz) but the result was a solid body of work, 'poetry that freely expresses a modern sensibility, the . . . modes of experience of one fully alive in his own age.' That description (it is Leavis again, from New Bearings in English Poetry, 1932) was written about Eliot's early work, but is every bit as accurate as commentary on Highway 61 Revisited and Blonde on Blonde.

The other affiliations between Dylan and Eliot stem from this. There is the attempt to turn formlessness into form itself. The Waste Land (1922) does this openly; Dylan's attempts are usually checked by his allegiance to regular verses—a musical check on his lyrics. But though they may be regular, they are often less regular than most: in many songs some verses have more lines than others; early songs like 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall' and 'The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll' slide nimbly away from the need to make lines rhyme; and the structure and language of a song like 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' (often now claimed to prefigure rap) attempt to interpret the formlessness of the age. 'I accept chaos,' Dylan wrote on the album cover of Bringing It All Back Home: 'I am not sure whether it accepts me.' A different brave attempt at 'formless' art from mid-1960s Dylan is the novel Tarantula: an often witty work of prose poetry thronging with schoolboy-smart playfulness with T.S. Eliot quotes—along with allusions to almost everyone whose name was ever dropped in class in Hibbing High.

Allied with the formlessness is the uprooting, urbanizing process of the age, and Dylan shares with Eliot the appropriately tough use of urban imagery and the expression of urban disillusion. Eliot first developed this in poems like 'Preludes' (from the Prufrock collection): 'The morning comes to consciousness / Of faint stale smells of beer / From the sawdust-trampled street / With all its muddy feet that press / To early coffee-stands'.

Dylan begins 'Visions of Johanna' with: 'Ain't it just like the night / To play tricks when you're tryin' to be so quiet / We sit here stranded / Though we're all doin' our best to deny it . . . / In this room the heat-pipes just cough / The country music station plays soft / But there's nothing / Really nothing to turn off.'

Reading another Prufrock poem, 'Rhapsody on a Windy Night', you might feel that Dylan could have written some of this: 'Along the reaches of the street . . . / Every street lamp that I pass / Beats like a fatalistic drum, / And through the spaces of the dark / Midnight shakes the memory / As a madman shakes a dead geranium. / . . . The street-lamp said, 'Regard that woman . . . / You see the border of her dress / Is torn and stained with sand . . .' Certainly it leaves no doubt about Eliot's influence on Dylan. It's plainly a source of direct strength, carrying the tutor's message: chisel your language. Eliot's voice sounds here, for instance: 'The vagabond who's rapping at your door / Is standing in the clothes that you once wore: / Strike another match, go start anew; / And it's all over now, Baby Blue.'

That the influence has been direct is in any case confirmed by Dylan's allusions to Eliot's phrases. That oddly presented 'geranium', plus nearby 'drum', reappear in 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands'; 'Visions of Johanna' echoes The Waste Land's handful of dust: Louise holds a handful of rain. Eliot writes that 'In the room the women come and go / Talking of Michaelangelo'; Dylan's 'All Along the Watchtower' changes the tense: 'While all the women came and went.'

Allusion-making, including undeclared direct quotation, is a highly developed weapon in Eliot's armory, and has come to be a similarly powerful part of Dylan's own corpus. (See "Love and Theft".) Sometimes it seems a game: one that Eliot himself perfected. In the third section of The Waste Land, for instance, he writes: 'To Carthage then I came / Burning burning burning burning'—which, subtly enough for most of us, quotes from St. Augustine's Confessions: 'To Carthage then I came, where a cauldron of unholy loves sang all about mine ears . . .'. 'I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine', sings Dylan, on the same album as 'All Along the Watchtower'.

Matthew Zuckerman points out an Eliot reference that comes between 'Visions of Johanna' and 'I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine', in the Basement Tapes song 'Too Much of Nothing'. The song's chorus is 'Say hello to Valerie, say hello to Vivien / Send them all my salary on the waters of oblivion'; Vivien Haigh-Wood was Eliot's first wife, Valerie Fletcher his second. Zuckerman adds: 'Coincidence? Probably not . . . [and] "too much of nothing" is a fair précis of . . . [one theme of] The Wasteland'. These lines illustrate the point: 'What is that noise now? What is the wind doing? / Nothing again nothing. / You know nothing? Do you see nothing? Do you remember / "Nothing"?'

Peter C. Montgomery also finds a Dylan allusion or borrowing from Eliot's 'Sweeney Agonistes' (1932)—'But if you understand or if you don't / That's nothing to me and nothing to you'—in Dylan's sleevenote poetry Some Other Kinds of Songs: 'i hope you understand / but if you don't / it doesn't matter' and notes that the same Dylan work gives us 'holy hollowness . . . hollow holiness': a playing with Eliot's 'The Hollow Men' (1925).

Dylan's much later song 'Maybe Someday', from Knocked Out Loaded (1986), revisits Eliot's 'And the cities hostile and the towns unfriendly' ('Journey of the Magi', 1927) where the line becomes 'Through hostile cities and unfriendly towns'.

A more complex touching upon Eliot, in Dylan's 1980s song 'Jokerman'—in this case connecting with Eliot's 'at the still point, there the dance is', from 'Burnt Norton' (1935)—is argued by AIDAN DAY in his book Jokerman: Reading the Lyrics of Bob Dylan.

The clearest of Dylan's cross-references to Eliot occurs in the penultimate verse of 'Desolation Row' (a title, of course, that resembles The Waste Land). He does more than simply mention Eliot specifically. 'EZRA POUND and T.S. Eliot' are 'Fighting in the captain's tower . . . / Between the windows of the sea / Where lovely mermaids flow / And nobody has to think too much about / Desolation Row.' This deliberately parallels the ending of Prufrock, where 'We have lingered in the chambers of the sea / By sea-girls wreathed with seaweed red and brown / Till human voices wake us, and we drown.' Same imagery, same contrast, same argument.

In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan is dismissive of Pound but understatedly respectful of Eliot: 'I liked T.S. Eliot. He was worth reading.'

T.S. Eliot died in London on January 4, 1965.

[T.S. Eliot, The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock, published Poetry magazine, USA, Jun 1915; reprinted in Eliot, Prufrock and Other Observations, 1917. Other poems quoted above can be found in Collected Poems, 1909–35 and Collected Poems 1909–62.

Matthew Zuckerman: 'If There's an Original Thought Out There I Could Use It Right Now: The Folk Roots of Bob Dylan', Isis no.84, Bedworth, Warwickshire, UK, Apr–May 1999. Peter C. Montgomery: 'Dylan in Ol' Possum's Diamond Mine', 1993, in Bob Dylan's Words, ed. WISSOLIK & McGRATH, Greensburg, PA; Eadmer Press, 1994. Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, p.110.]

Elliott, Ramblin' Jack [1931 -] Elliott Adnopoz was a sucessful Brooklyn doctor's son, born there on August 1, 1931. He actually did run away out west and join the rodeo: a real Brooklyn cowboy.

Soon a disciple of WOODY GUTHRIE (in the early 1950s he lived in his house for several years, back in New York), as Ramblin' Jack Elliott he became the singer-guitarist of whom Guthrie famously remarked, 'He sounds more like me than I do.' Indeed in Chronicles Volume One Dylan implies that it was the fact that Elliott got there first as an imitation walking Woody that persuaded Dylan he'd better move beyond that ambition himself. He recounts how JON PANKAKE ('folk music purist enthusiast') gives him a good talking-to on the subject, and alerts Dylan to Elliott's existence and work in the first place, back in Minneapolis in 1959:

'The record he took out and played for me first was Jack Takes the Floor. . . . Damn, I'm thinking, this guy is really great. He sounds just like Woody Guthrie, only a leaner, meaner one. . . . I felt like I'd been cast into sudden hell.' He goes on to effuse more than a little about Elliott's talents, and concludes this: 'Elliott, who'd been born ten years before me, had actually traveled with Guthrie, learned his songs and style firsthand and had mastered it completely. Pankake was right. Elliott was far beyond me.'

(The songs on that 10-inch LP include both 'San Francisco Bay Blues' and 'Dink's Song', both of which Dylan was performing by 1961. Elliott was the first to popularise 'San Francisco Bay Blues' in folk revival circles. In Chronicles Dylan adds to his story that Pankake heard Dylan again later and told him 'that I used to be imitating Guthrie and now I was imitating Elliott . . .')

Elliott might have been a 'master', and a recording artist for the important British folk label Topic, but he mostly spent his London years busking on the street. There didn't seem to be a lot of money in being a folksinger (or in being Woody Guthrie). On the other hand Guthrie himself made a telling distinction between Elliott and Dylan—in a remark that Dylan himself must have taken as the greatest compliment on earth:

'PETE SEEGER's a singer of folk songs,' he said, 'Jack Elliott is a singer of folk songs. But Bobby Dylan is a folk singer. Oh, Christ, he's a folk singer all right.'

The young Dylan of 1961 was himself less respectful of Elliott than Chronicles suggests. IZZY YOUNG's journal for that October 20 transcribes these remarks, offered by Dylan when he dropped in on the Folklore Center to chat:

'I've been with Jack Elliott . . . Jack hasn't taught me any songs. Jack doesn't know that many songs. He's had his chances.'

In Don't Look Back, in London in 1965, when Bob Dylan is also becoming a very cool star and Elliott's old busking companion Derroll Adams certainly isn't, Dylan nonetheless recalls another record that was important for him, telling Adams: 'I got a record of yours and Jack's . . . The Rambling Boys'. He's referring to the joint album Rambling Boys made by Elliott and Adams in London in about 1956 and issued on another 10-inch LP on Topic Records in 1958—an album that includes the track 'Roll on Buddy': a song that picks up, a decade before Dylan uses it on 'Stuck Inside of Mobile With the Memphis Blues Again', the line from Bascom Lamar Lunsford's 1920s 'I Wish I Was a Mole in the Ground' about railroad men drinking your blood like wine. In Chronicles, Dylan says Adams 'played banjo like Bascom Lamar Lunsford' and that Derroll and Ramblin' Jack together 'sounded like horses galloping'.

Dylan and Elliott first met very early on in Dylan's time in New York City at the start of 1961: within two days of reaching Greenwich Village, according to the ANTHONY SCADUTO biography. And when Elliott saw Dylan performing in the Village, he liked him enormously—perhaps because he was imitating Jack at that point. He told Scaduto (with a brusque disregard for what we'd now call political correctness): 'I didn't know it was some of me, at first. I thought he was doing it Woody Guthrie style, in the Guthrie-CISCO HOUSTON school. I was tickled to see somebody doing it well 'cause I was really bored with all the other folk singers. There was not another son of a bitch in the country who could sing until Bob Dylan came along. Everybody else was singing like a damned faggot.'

It was soon after this that the Village crowd discovered that Elliott was, in truth, Mr. Adnopoz from Ocean Parkway, Brooklyn. DAVE VAN RONK told Scaduto: 'Bobby fell off his chair. He rolled under the table, laughing like a madman. . . . We all suspected that Bobby was Jewish, and that proved it. He'd be laying under the table and just recovering from his fit and every once in a while Barry [Kornfeld] or somebody would stick his head under the table and yell 'Adnopoz!' and that would start him off roaring again.'

At some point in the summer of 1963 in New York City, Dylan dropped in on Elliott's sessions for a new Vanguard album, and on 'Will the Circle Be Unbroken?' played harmonica behind Ramblin' Jack's guitar and vocals. When the album was released, in June 1964, under the title Jack Elliott, Dylan was credited under the rather more imaginative name of Tedham Porterhouse. The same month as this saw release, Jack Elliott was in the studio at a Dylan session—the great one-day stint that yielded Another Side of Bob Dylan—and sang behind him on a first tentative try-out of 'Mr. Tambourine Man'. (This halting version was first released on the Highway 61 Interactive CD Rom in 1995 and then again another ten years later on the 2-CD set the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: the Soundtrack.) Elliott said later: 'I listened to it once, and I never want to hear it again. It was real bad singing. Amazingly bad.' It's true.

In 1975, Dylan popped up again with Elliott at a gig by the latter back at the Village's Other End Club—at which they duetted on Guthrie's 'Pretty Boy Floyd' and the old Leroy Carr blues 'How Long?', and then Dylan débuted, solo and sweetly, a brilliant new song, 'Abandoned Love', later studio-recorded with musicians at the Desire sessions but not released until Biograph, 1985.

It's telling that they alighted on 'Pretty Boy Floyd'—and this is the earliest extant version we have of Dylan performing it: 14 years after discovering Guthrie, whose well-known song it is—because when, later still, in around April 1987, Dylan studio-recorded it solo for the Woody Guthrie and LEADBELLY tribute album Folkways: A Vision Shared, his recording was clearly modelled on Elliott's own two classic recordings of the song (versions cut in England in 1956 and in the US in 1960: the latter on the classic album Jack Elliott Sings the Songs of Woody Guthrie).

Ramblin' Jack was subsequently one of Dylan's guests on the first Rolling Thunder Revue tour (he was dropped from the second one, and it hurt) and so can be seen in Dylan's film Renaldo & Clara, 1978, an amiable but uncharismatic figure. By this time, too, he had made brief appearances inside two Dylan songs: one from the 1960s and one from the 1970s. In the sublime Blonde on Blonde outtake 'She's Your Lover Now' a very Dylanesque persona swirling in some sumptuous druggy maelstrom pleads with comic desperation: 'You don't have to be nice to me / But will you please tell that / To your friend in the cowboy hat / You know he keeps on sayin' everything twice to meeeee'; and in 'Tough Mama', on Planet Waves, 'Jack the cowboy went up north / He's buried in your past.' Perhaps too, Dylan returns to thinking of Ramblin' Jack inside a song on his 1997 album Time Out of Mind. Alluding once more to 'Roll on Buddy' he sings: 'Buddy you'll roll no more.'

However, Elliott is still alive and interest in him has recently revived, thanks partly to the film The Ballad of Ramblin' Jack, directed by his daughter Aiyana, which won the Special Jury Prize for Artistic Achievement at the Sundance Film Festival 2000. Included on the soundtrack album is the much-bootlegged but never before officially released duet that Jack and Dylan performed back on July 21, 1961 at the Riverside Church Saturday of Folk Music in New York City (bootlegged because broadcast by radio station WRVR-FM eight days later). The song they duetted on was called 'Acne', and of no intrinsic merit. It was a song Dylan returned to a few months later when he was taped performing it (with an unidentified second vocalist) in CYNTHIA GOODING's New York City apartment.

Elliott has also been writing his autobiography, with help from a Rick Steber. Ramblin' is published 2006 by Da Capo Press of Cambridge, Massachusetts.

[Ramblin' Jack Elliott: Jack Takes the Floor, Topic 10T15 (10-inch LP), London, 1958; 'Talking Miner's Blues' c/w 'Pretty Boy Floyd', London, c.1956, Topic TRC98 (78 rpm), London, c.1956; & 'Pretty Boy Floyd', NY, June 1960, Jack Elliott Sings the Songs of Woody Guthrie, Prestige PR13016, Bergenfeld, NJ, 1960/61. Ramblin' Jack Elliott & Derroll Adams: 'Roll on Buddy', London, c.1956, Rambling Boys, Topic 10T14 (10-inch LP), London, 1958; reissued Roll on Buddy, Topic 12T105 (12-inch LP), London, c.1964; CD-reissued on Ramblin' Jack, Topic TSCD477, London, 1996. Ramblin': The Autobiography of Ramblin' Jack Elliott, with Rick Steber, Cambridge, MA: Da Capo, 2006.

Ramblin' Jack Elliott & Bob Dylan: 'Acne', NY, 21 Jul 1961, The Ballad of Ramblin' Jack, Vanguard 79575-2, NY, 2000; 'Will the Circle Be Unbroken', on Jack Elliott, Vanguard VSD 79151, NY, 1964; 'Mr. Tambourine Man', NY, 9 Jun 1964, Highway 61 Interactive CD Rom, NY, Feb 1995; the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: the Soundtrack, Columbia/Legacy COL 520358 2, NY, 2005.

Bob Dylan: 'Abandoned Love', Other End, Greenwich Village, NY, 3 Jul 1975 and Desire sessions NY, 31 Jul 1975. 'Pretty Boy Floyd', LA, prob. Apr 1987, Folkways: A Vision Shared, Columbia OC 44034, NY (CBS 460905 1, London), 1988. Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.250–251, p.252. Quote noted down by Izzy Young, Folklore Center, NY, 20 Oct 1961, republished in Younger Than That Now: The Collected Interviews with Bob Dylan, ed. Jim Ellison, New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 2004. Anthony Scaduto, Bob Dylan: An Intimate Biography, 1972; Abacus UK paperback edn.: swiftness of Dylan meeting Elliott p.53+; Guthrie on Seeger, Elliott & Dylan, p.56; Elliott on Dylan, p.58; Van Ronk quote, p.67.]

'Emotionally Yours' [1985] See 'Spanish Harlem Incident' [1964].

Empire Burlesque* [1985] Dylan was truly floundering in this period (it was the year of his appearance on LIVE AID, at which he finally blew his automatic right to headline at any international gathering of superstars), and though this studio album has a cohesion lacking in those either side of it—Infidels and Knocked Out Loaded—it features undistinguished pop songs, most of which anyone could have written, and an overwrought production made worse by a horrible, supposedly modish re-mix by the graceless ARTHUR BAKER.

Here is the shameful spectacle of a man whose early work avoids adroitly every pop dissimulation in work of unsurpassed, pioneering clarity of individual vision and vocal richness, now mewling his thin vocal way through a thick murk of formulaic riffs, licks and echo-laden AOR noises devised with a desperate eye on rock-radio formats. Here is the artist whose mature intelligence revolutionised the love song in popular music, now reduced to lines like 'You to me were true / You to me were the best' and titles like 'Emotionally Yours'. Ugh. Even the cover photograph signals how adrift the artist of Empire Burlesque is: it shows Dylan the perplexed fashion-victim in Bruce Willis jacket. Early Bob Dylan would have found the whole thing contemptible.

[Recorded NY, Jul & LA, Dec 1984, Hollywood, Jan 1985 and NY, Feb–Mar 1985; released as Columbia FC 40110 (LP), 30 May 1985; in UK as CBS 86313, 8 Jun 1985.]

Engel, Dave [1945 -] David Donald Engel was born in Wisconsin Rapids, Wisconsin, on August 12, 1945. He was first interested in Dylan's work in 1964 and first proposed writing a study of Dylan's hometown in 1968. Nothing came of it until many years later. Meanwhile he became an English teacher at the University of Wisconsin and then Western Illinois University from 1968 to 1980, when he switched to becoming a journalist on the Wisconsin Rapids Daily Tribune—he has been there for 25 years now—while also writing a series of regional history books, including several in the series The Home Front: River City Memoirs in the 1990s, and Cranmoor: The Cranberry Eldorado, 2004 (all on Wisconsin history) and Calumet: Copper Country Metropolis in 2002 (on Michigan history). He has also co-edited, with Justin Isherwood, a poetry collection with a Dylan title: Ring them bells : a Mid-State Poetry Towers Collection (New Past Press, 2000).

While contributing various Dylan-history pieces to the now-defunct US fanzine ON THE TRACKS, Dave Engel's main contribution in this field, to which he brought his historian's skill as well as his depth of regional understanding, has been the magnificent Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues: Dylan in Minnesota, one of the four or five most valuable books on Bob Dylan ever published. Every subsequent biography has drawn heavily upon it, with differing degrees of acknowledgement. Engel was also consulted but unpaid by Dylan's office while the material for MARTIN SCORSESE's No Direction Home was being assembled.

Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues took four years to research and write, after a visit to Hibbing persuaded Engel that earlier Dylan biographers had 'got it all wrong'. The result is often hard to steer your way around because of its chosen pattern of short segments: the material about Dylan's ancestors, for example, is chopped into many different sections, interspersed with other material, rather than being set down as a sustained narrative in one place in the book. Nonetheless, though it therefore makes you work at its excavation, the book is filled with a most astonishing amount of gem-like detail, waiting more like diamonds than taconite for others to mine.

The tone of voice, laconic but shrewd, is a delight and well suits the material; the research itself phenomenal—not least in its pioneering, painstaking, detailed research into the world of the North Country's Jewish minority; and then there are the historic photographs, retrieving the past in two main layers. There are the pictures that document the old Duluth, the old Hibbing, the old Mesabi Iron Range way back when Hibbing was being built and re-built; and then there are the photos from the 1940s onwards, in which we can see the 40s sliding into the 50s, the world of men standing at a bar on Howard Street in their suits and black hats morphing into the quaint rock'n'roll world of Bob Dylan's adolescence—the world of all his friends, loitering around the driveways of their parents' homes, posing in bedrooms with guitars, sipping sodas.

This is a marvellous book, particularly as a history of Hibbing as well of Bob Dylan's early years: a Minnesota equivalent of Pleasantville rendered with tenderness but no sentimentality, and with vividness but no melodrama. This is also a book that has never been reprinted since its 1997 publication, straight to paperback, by the obscure regional publisher River City Memoirs-Mesabi, of Rudolph, Wisconsin. This is a book Bob Dylan should be grateful for, let alone the rest of us.

[Dave Engel, Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues: Dylan in Minnesota, Rudolph, WI: River City Memoirs-Mesabi, 1997. Dave Engel & Justin Isherwood, eds., Ring them bells: a Mid-State Poetry Towers collection, Friendship, WI: New Past Press, 2000. (Pleasantville, dir. & written Gary Ross, Larger Than Life / New Line, US, 1998.)]

Epstein, Howie [1955 - 2003] Howie Epstein was the odd one out within TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS, managing not be born in Gainesville, Florida, but in Milwaukee, on July 21, 1955. He was also the last to join the group, only replacing original bass player Ron Blair in 1982, in time to be part of the fifth album, Long After Dark, and leaving again 20 years later at the rest of the band's request 'because of his ongoing personal problems,' as their spokesman said at the time.

He not only played bass but mandolin and his harmony vocals with Petty became a distinguishing feature of the band. Outside of this highly successful unit he wrote songs and produced albums, most notably for JOHN PRINE and his own long-term partner, the singer Carlene Carter. He played on sessions for a number of others, including Dylan.

His work with Dylan began on December 6, 1984, in a Hollywood studio when he, MIKE CAMPBELL and BENMONT TENCH backed Dylan's attempts at 'New Danville Girl' and other unreleased material. Further sessions followed for Epstein that month and in early 1985. (See entry Campbell, Mike for details.) That fall they were reunited with Dylan within Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers, backing him at Farm Aid. Then came the group's tours with Dylan in 1986 and 1987.

Epstein's last work with Dylan was not in the company of any of the others in the Heartbreakers. It took place in the studios at New Bloomington, Indiana, on November 20, 1989, a few days after Dylan had completed his second year's Never-Ending Tour concerts. With BARRY GOLDBERG producing and on keyboards, and with Carlene Carter among the backing vocalists, Epstein played bass and sang backing vocals on the rather subdued Dylan cut of 'People Get Ready' made for the film Catchfire (aka Backtrack) and issued on the soundtrack album in January 1990.

In 2001, Howie Epstein and Carlene Carter were arrested in New Mexico after three grams of heroin were found in their car; late on the evening of February 23, 2003 Epstein died in hospital in Santa Fe after being found with a suspected overdose. He was 47. The statement from Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers included this: 'The world has lost a great talent and a kind and gentle soul.'

[Bob Dylan (with Howie Epstein et al.): 'People Get Ready', New Bloomington, IN, 20 Nov 1989, Backtrack soundtrack album, WTG 46042, US, Jan 1990. Catchfire, dir. Dennis Hopper & Alan Smithee, Mack-Taylor / Precision / Vestron Pictures, US, 1990. Band quotes & some other details online 5 Jun 2005 in 'Tom Petty News' at www.gonegator.com/news/tom_petty_news_022003.asp.]

Essential Bob Dylan, The* [2000] Released a mere five months after The Best of Bob Dylan Vol. 2, this compilation duplicates enormous chunks of it, plus huge chunks of the first Best of Bob Dylan from just three years earlier. In fact of the 30 tracks on this double-CD set, only four tracks are not on one or other of those so-called best-of com-pilations: and of the four, two are different versions of songs that were also on those compilations.

You could also complain that there's nothing from the first album, a disproportionate amount from Bringing It All Back Home, that the Basement Tapes are hardly best represented by 'Quinn the Eskimo', there's nothing from Street Legal, Shot of Love (isn't 'Every Grain of Sand' more essential than 'If Not for You'?), and nothing from the two solo acoustic albums of the early 1990s. And so on. Yet of course you could complain whatever was chosen, because of what would have to be omitted.

To add to the confusion over Dylan compilation albums all available at the same time, a 36-track version of this album, with the same title, was released in the UK, France and Australia in 2001 (and in Germany as The Ultimate Bob Dylan). The extra tracks included the unmessed-up version of 'Dignity'. On its UK re-release in 2005, this was the album that saw a significant sales increase immediately after the TV showing of the No Direction Home film.

[Released as 30-track 2-CD set, Columbia C2K 85168, US, 31 Oct 2000; 36-track 2-CD version Sony Music TV STVCD 116, UK (Columbia 5031332, France), 2001 (Columbia 50313320000, Australia, 2002; re-released UK in Sep 2005 as Columbia 503133 2.]

Estes, Sleepy John [1904 - 1977] John Adam Estes was born outside Ripley, Tennessee on January 25, 1904, grew up in Brownsville, lost the sight in his right eye in a baseball accident in adolescence, learnt guitar, joined the great mandolin player Yank Rachell and harp and jug player Hammie Nixon, acquired his distinctive monicker in rather brutal reference to the narcolepsy from which he suffered, went to Memphis with Rachell & Nixon, played on the streets in a jug band and began his prolific recording career in Memphis in 1929. He was recorded there by Victor on eight separate days between his début session that September 17 and May 30, 1930, yielding 15 still-extant sides, of which 12 were issued. Moving to Chicago with Hammie Nixon in 1931, it took him some time to get back into a studio, but he did so in July 1935 (twice), on two consecutive days in August 1937 and once in April 1938 (these three in New York City), once in June 1940 and once in September 1941 (back in Chicago).

After World War II he made just two more Chicago sides, for the tiny Ora-Nelle label in 1948 but soon afterwards returned to Brownsville, Tennessee, and took labouring work, though occasionally performing on the streets of Memphis as he had done nearly 30 years earlier. In April 1952 the great Sam Phillips recorded him at the Sun Studios in Memphis. HOWLIN' WOLF's career was beginning there; Sleepy John's appeared to be ending. He made three sides at his first Sun session, all of them unissued; later that month he made four sides; none was issued until years afterwards.

He was back in Brownsville, almost 60 years old and close to penury when he was 'rediscovered' in 1962, made new records and worked the folk revival circuit of clubs, festivals (including NEWPORT 1964) and an American Folk Blues Festival tour of Europe. As Dylan said, 'there was a bunch of us . . . who got to see all these people close up—people like SON HOUSE, REVEREND GARY DAVIS or Sleepy John Estes. Just to sit there and be up close and watch them play, you could study what they were doing, plus a bit of their lives rubbed off on you. Those vibes will carry into you forever, really, so it's like those people, they're still here to me. They're not ghosts of the past or anything, they're continually here.'

There's nothing peripheral about what Dylan has taken and remodelled from Sleepy John Estes. Who does this sound like? An artist of great originality, whose work combines traditional and self-penned material, who went through a 'protest' phase, is '. . . not a particularly accomplished guitarist' and whose 'broken, fragmented song' is 'held in tension by the contrast between the tendency to disintegration and the rhythmic impetus of his strumming.' Well, yes, it is Sleepy John Estes but it might so easily be Touring Bob Dylan. (The quotes are from Paul Oliver's 1969 book The Story of the Blues.)

To listen to a sweep of Estes' pre-war recordings is to have confirmed what Dylan himself hints at by his own prominent naming of Estes in his Bringing It All Back Home sleevenotes: namely that Estes is a seminal figure in Bob Dylan's blues education. (Dylan mentions him again in the mid-60s: to JOHN LENNON in the limo-ride filmed for, but not used in, Eat the Document.) As so often, Dylan tells us something true but says it in so flip and casual a way that we tend to disregard it. In this case, his notes to his first 'rock' album begin by declaring (quietly): 'i'm standing there watching the parade / feeling combination of sleepy john estes. jayne mansfield. humphrey bogart'—and sure enough, it transpires that those distinctively 'Dylanesque' clunking blues from 1965 owe much to Sleepy John Estes' pioneering work and very individual style, while the clear resemblance between Paul Oliver's description of Estes and our own picture of the older Bob Dylan's artistry suggests aspects of Sleepy John's influence beyond those Dylan displayed back in 1965 that have remained and grown within him.

The evidence is everywhere. The very title of Estes' first hit, 'The Girl I Love, She Got Long Curly Hair' (1929), indicates by its distinctive jerky rhythmic strut, an Estes trademark, just how songs like 'California', 'Outlaw Blues', 'From a Buick 6' and 'Sitting on a Barbed-Wire Fence' are built to the Estes blueprint. You can hear it straight away in the special way the delivery of the line is chopped up to incorporate those odd, crucial pauses. Estes: 'Now the, girl I love she got, long curly hair'; Dylan: 'Well this, woman I got she's, killin' me alive.' The half-correspondence of the words that begin those two lines merely adds to the certainty already felt that the one song has inspired the other.

Nine months after cutting 'The Girl I Love', which was to prove Estes' most popular disc, he recorded a song he called 'Milk Cow Blues'. It bears no resemblance to anyone else's song of that name (and doesn't mention milk cows): but it bears a very striking resemblance to 'The Girl I Love, She Got Long Curly Hair'. It has the same knowing clunkiness, that hip manipulation of chunky pauses on the backbeat—a sort of sure-footed clog-dancing: and it is the clear model for 'From a Buick 6'. The special rhythm is the same. The tune is the same. Dylan's lyric even starts out in tribute to the Estes prototype. Where Dylan's 1965 song begins 'I got this, graveyard woman you know she, keeps my kid / But my soulful mama you know she, keeps me hid', Estes opens this way: 'Now, asked sweet mama let me, be her kid / She says I, might get 'bove you like to, keep it hid.' And the first vinyl release of this Estes recording was in 1964.

The same Estes song, as it happens, offers some common-stock blues lines which have Dylan connections from elsewhere in his repertoire. The line after the opening couplet just quoted is one we find Dylan singing in 'Blood in My Eyes': 'Well she looked at me, she begin to smile', and the line that ends the Estes 'Milk Cow Blues' is 'Now it's a, slow consumption an' it's, killin' you by degrees'. Dylan's matching line, with matching pauses, tune and strut, is 'Well if I, go down dyin' you know she, bound to put a blanket on my bed.'

The very first track Estes recorded was his own version of BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON's 'Broke and Hungry', which he either misheard or re-wrote, as 'broken-hearted', and which was given a characteristically lengthy Estes title, 'Broken-Hearted, Ragged and Dirty Too'. This was the début recording that went unissued; he had another go just nine days later, and this time achieved release. The version Dylan performs on World Gone Wrong is far more similar to the Sleepy John Estes than to the 1940s Willie Brown version cited in Dylan's sleevenotes.

'Someday Baby Blues' is Sleepy John Estes' particularly heartfelt and individual variant of 'Sittin' on Top of the World', which has in turn been revised and revisited in several guises. CHUCK BERRY's 'Worried Life Blues' uses the Estes chorus but thoroughly different verses; the Allman Brothers' version of the MUDDY WATERS version, 'Trouble No More', does the opposite, reinstating an approximation of Estes' verses while abandoning his chorus. When Bob Dylan sang it live at Toad's Place, New Haven, Connecticut, in 1990, it was recognised as the same song as Muddy Waters', and duly appears in the various listings of his performances as 'Trouble No More'—yet really Dylan brings it all home to Sleepy John, reinstating his chorus and imbuing it with the customary Estesian pauses ('Someday baby, you ain't gonna worry, my mind, anymore'). The only vocal moment worth speaking of in Dylan's befogged performance is the fair imitation of Estes' voice he achieves on the penultimate delivery of that line.

The Estes voice, on his slower numbers, also possesses a painful, crawling quality, always threatening to break down, always wavering between esoteric possibilities. He pulls himself along his vocal line like a snail over pebbles. On the slow songs, even the awkward lengthiness of his titles enacts this tortuous slow motion, matching the delivery, a fine example being 'Who's Been Tellin' You Buddy Brown Blues'. This is the very attenuation Dylan uses so effectively in the unreleased Basement Tapes song 'I'm Not There (1956)'.

Estes' 'Drop Down Mama', another 'From a Buick 6' prototype, has one of those 'It Ain't Me Babe' openings: 'Go, 'way from my window quit scratchin', on my screen' and a refrain which you have only to hear Estes deliver to connect with Dylan's jerky 1965 blues again. 'Now I may look like I'm crazy, poor John do know right from wrong' is clearly the eccentric piece of scaffolding on which Dylan builds 'Well I might, look like Robert Ford but I, feel just like a Jesse James.'

It could be added that the mild, unobtrusive element of social commentary implicit in Dylan's early blues 'Down the Highway' is less in the spirit of his own 'protest songs' than of Estes'. At any rate these are wholly Estesian lines: 'And your streets are gettin' empty / And your highway's gettin' filled'—and you have only to listen to four or five consecutive pre-war Estes recordings to hear how these apparently undistinguished phrases prove distinctively to belong to him.

'Special Agent (Railroad Police Blues)' is another jerky blues, the vocal delivery an object lesson in the inspired eccentricity that sets the few aside from the many: the sort of vocal eccentricity that we may have found first in FATS DOMINO or BUDDY HOLLY or Howlin' Wolf, in rock'n'roll or R&B, and which pulls us into this music when we're very young because it speaks to us from a strange, magic kingdom alluringly unlike school. Anyone who ever felt that way can recognise the authentic pull of Sleepy John Estes, as Bob Dylan must have done. He probably heard this Estes record before any other: it was included on SAM CHARTERS' crucial The Country Blues LP issued back in 1959.

This track also offers a salutary reminder that there's nothing exclusively postmodern about the self-reflexive text. More than 50 years before Dylan played with 'I'll be back in a minute. . . . You can tell me, I'm back' and 'now I'm back on the track' on his fine Oh Mercy recording 'What Was It You Wanted?', Estes was ending 'Special Agent (Railroad Police Blues)' with this devilishly clever pay-off line: 'Now special agent, special agent, put me off close to some town / Special agent, special agent, put me off close to some town / Now I got to do some recording: an' I oughta be recordin' right now!'

John Estes went to his final sleep back home in Brownsville, Tennessee, on June 5, 1977.

[Sleepy John Estes: 'The Girl I Love, She Got Long Curly Hair', Memphis, 24 Sep 1929 & 'Milk Cow Blues', Memphis, 13 May 1930, both vinyl-issued on Sleepy John Estes 1929–1940, RBF RF-8, NY, 1964: the latter also on Sam Charters' 2-LP box set The Rural Blues, RBF RF-202, NY, 1964; 'Broken-Hearted, Ragged and Dirty Too', Memphis, 17 Sep 1929, unissued; 'Broken-Hearted, Ragged and Dirty Too', Memphis, 26 Sep 1929, RBF RF-8; 'Someday Baby Blues' & 'Who's Been Tellin' You Buddy Brown Blues', Chicago, 9 Jul 1935, The Blues of Sleepy John Estes: Vol. 1, Swaggie S-1219, Australia, 1967. 'Drop Down Mama', Chicago, 17 Jul 1935, issued ditto & on The Blues in Memphis, 1927–39, Origin Jazz Library OJL-21, Berkeley, c.1969; 'Special Agent (Railroad Police Blues)', NY, 22 Apr 1938, The Country Blues, RBF RF-1, NY, 1959; 'Little Laura Blues', Chicago, 24 Sep 1941, Treasury of Jazz No. 30 (EP), RCA Victor 75.752, Paris, 1963. A terrific selection of pre-war Estes material, including all the above, is Sleepy John Estes: I Ain't Gonna Be Worried No More: 1929–1941, Yazoo 2004, US, 1992.

Blind Lemon Jefferson: 'Broke and Hungry', Chicago, c.Nov 1926, Blind Lemon Jefferson, Volume Two, Milestone LP 2007, NY, 1968. Chuck Berry: 'Worried Life Blues', Chicago, 12 Feb 1960 (B-side of 'Bye Bye Johnny', same session), Chess 1754, Chicago, 1960. Allman Brothers: 'Trouble No More', NY, Sep 1969; The Allman Brothers Band, Capricorn ATCO SD-33-308, NY, 1969. Muddy Waters: 'Trouble No More', Chicago, Oct 1955, Chess 1612, Chicago, 1955. Bob Dylan: 'Trouble No More / Someday Baby Blues', live New Haven, CT, 12 Jan 1990.

Dylan quote re Estes & others 'continually present', interview San Diego, c.3 Oct 1993 by Gary Hill, Reuters, wired to US newspapers 13 Oct 1993; his Eat the Document outtake Estes mention transcribed by John Bauldie in Mojo no.1, London, 1993.]

Everly Brothers, the The Everly Brothers defined the rock'n'roll duet and the sound of adolescent angst. Their unmistakeable harmonies drew on 700 years of Scottish Borders' misery, transplanted via the Appalachians, to sing out late 1950s teenage confusion. Like ELVIS PRESLEY and CHUCK BERRY, the Everly Brothers blueprinted how things would be, and in later years were bitter at receiving less credit for this than rock'n'roll's solo giants. It typified their knack of snatching sourness from the jaws of sweetness.

Don, born in Brownie, Kentucky, in 1937, and Phil, born in Chicago in 1939, were duetting long before rock'n'roll, on parents Ike and Margaret's radio show on WKMA in Shenandoah, Ohio. They were seasoned professionals by the time they poured out their magic vocals onto a run of hits that married hillbilly harmonies and Nashville nouse, their full-chorded acoustic guitars embracing BO DIDDLEY's exotic rhythms to create the rock'n'roll end of country music's rich, commercial sounds.

They could not complain at their initial success. After one unsuccessful session for RCA, yielding the rare 1956 single 'Keep a Lovin' Me', they signed with New York label Cadence, later switching to the newly formed Warner Brothers Records. From 1957 to 1965 they had 28 hits in the British top 30, and comparable American success, first topping the US charts in 1957 (with 'Wake Up Little Susie'), and from then till some time in the earlyish 60s they were constantly having hits, it seemed. 'All I Have to Do Is Dream' was another US no.1, also topping the UK charts. 'Bye Bye Love', 'Bird Dog' and 'Problems' were US no.2s, and '('Til) I Kissed You' a UK no.2. Other hits included 'Let It Be Me', 'Take a Message to Mary', 'Like Strangers', 'Crying in the Rain' and the UK no.1 'Walk Right Back'. One of the great pop death-records, 'Ebony Eyes', was theirs too.

Many of their hits were written by another duo, Boudleaux and Felice Bryant, but the Bryants' claim that they schooled Don and Phil in their vocal parts was nonsense, and the brothers wrote plenty themselves. Both penned the phenomenally successful début single on Warner Brothers, 'Cathy's Clown', which was another US no.1 and achieved an almost unprecedented nine weeks at no.1 in Britain in 1960. Phil wrote 'When Will I Be Loved'; Don wrote 'Since You Broke My Heart', '('Til) I Kissed You' and 'So Sad (To Watch Good Love Go Bad)'.

They were very commercial and they were very good. At a time when most people found a sound by accident, they developed one deliberately and intelligently, bridging what gap there was between pop and modern country music. And at a time when pop's understanding of music was near-retarded, the Everlys were consistently alert and curious. They handled their own arrangements and they had taste.

They had the gravitas to cover other artists' crucial songs, including black ones, without apology, from LITTLE RICHARD's 'Lucille', given a keening slow-motion vocal fall, to blues classics like the immortal 'Trouble in Mind' and the cheerily inconsequential 'Step It Up and Go' (which Dylan recorded for Good As I Been to You, 1992) and Mickey & Sylvia's 'Love Is Strange'. Don, taken down Chicago's Maxwell Street as a young boy by his father, was ever after aware of gospel and blues. And in an era of pretty pop, the Everlys sought a tougher sound on records like 'The Price of Love' and their extraordinary revival of the standard 'Temptation', which pre-figured PHIL SPECTOR's 'wall of sound'. But like Spector's 'River Deep, Mountain High', the Everlys' 'Temptation' was (by their standards) a flop in the USA, and 'The Price of Love' a bigger one. Don never forgave the American public.

Then there were THE BEATLES, whose 'new' harmonies made the Everlys old-fashioned overnight. Made redundant before they were 30, Don and Phil felt (wrongly) that the Beatles had stolen from them without acknowledgement. Sidelined further by progressive rock, Don & Phil tried first to sound like SIMON & Garfunkel (indeed like anyone but themselves), then responded with more dignity with their influential 1968 album Roots, which, with THE BYRDS' Sweetheart of the Rodeo, catalysed the creation of 'country rock' in 1969, the year they're said to have turned down Dylan's 'Lay, Lady, Lay'.

Everyone had loved Don & Phil except Phil & Don. Under pressure, they couldn't stand themselves or each other. The Everly Brothers split up in public acrimony, their last performance together on July 14, 1973.

It emerged eventually that even at the very height of Dylan's artistic genius and hipness, the tour of 1966, he could still (off stage) bear in mind work of the Everly Brothers from that most sneered-at period of pop, 1960–62: the semi-documentary film of his tour, Eat the Document—not screened until 1971 (and then but briefly)—catches him in May 1966 performing the Everlys' 1960 hit 'When Will I Be Loved?' in his Glasgow hotel-room. He 'went public' on his affection for the Everlys by recording their 'Let It Be Me' and 'Take a Message to Mary' on his 1970 album Self Portrait (something very badly received by a hip public). The inclusion of Everly Brothers songs was more striking at the time than it is now, since in recent years, through rock'n'roll revivals galore, they have been acknowledged as crucial figures in the pre-Dylan era; but when Self Portrait came out, you weren't supposed to still like or even remember that old stuff: you were supposed to be progressive and despise the three-minute single. But Dylan's 'Let It Be Me' is a perfectionist's re-drafting of the Everlys' version, in effect; Dylan stays very faithful to their wistful and solid pop world. With 'Take a Message to Mary', Dylan does something more, somehow returning the song (in Bill Damon's phrase) 'back to the Code of the West'.

By then, Dylan had also written the Everlys a song, 'The Fugitive', which the Everlys never recorded. (It turns up in Dylan's catalogue as 'Wanted Man', and has been recorded by JOHNNY CASH, who brings to it all the animation of a totem pole.) Later, after the Everlys had reluctantly re-formed, they did record the lovely Dylan song 'Abandoned Love', a Desire sessions outtake—and they could have done this song justice, expansively and warmly; unfortunately, and uncharacteristically, a rigid rhythm and uncommitted vocals throw it away.

Harking back not to the Everly Brothers' version but to the well-known later black cover by Jerry Butler and Betty Everett, Dylan re-recorded 'Let It Be Me', with CLYDIE KING as vocal duettist, in 1981, and sang it in three 1981 concerts, this time implying that the 'you' the song addresses is Christ rather than woman. He has not revisited 'Take a Message to Mary'. Yet, by coincidence or not, he does re-meet the Everlys on the long instrumental intro to his great 'Not Dark Yet' on 1997's album Time Out of Mind. Nineteen seconds in, presaged by a sketch of itself a few seconds earlier, a falling guitar-line arrives, laid across the top of the rest, that is straight out of the distinctive musical introduction to the revisit-version of that great early Everlys song 'I Wonder If I Care as Much'—the version we find on their influential Roots album of 1968.

For the Everlys themselves, meanwhile, it had been a further trauma to discover that separately, no-one cared about either of them. On September 23, 1983, with Don grown fat but retaining in spades the charisma he must have been born with, they staged an historic and moving Reunion Concert at the Royal Albert Hall. This they seem doomed to repeat forever. In the 1990s, at the age of 60, spurred to a fat-free diet, Don lost a lot of weight, just as Phil was belatedly gaining it: a coincidence typical of their sibling disharmony.

They still sing exquisitely, and a small segment of their shows offer songs learnt from father Ike, whom they worshipped, and mine-worker Mose Rager: authentic old-time country material. Don plays loving, intense guitar, though sparingly in latterday performances. Singing lead, he lives in the spontaneity of the moment, his phrasing inspired, warm and free. He is an artist. But they hardly dare stray now from their teenage hits, first offered to us almost half a century ago.

See also Nashville c.1960, influence of, and country music, Dylan's early interest in.

[The Everly Brothers: 'Keep a Lovin' Me', Nashville, Nov 1955, Columbia 1956; 'Wake Up Little Susie', Nashville, 1957, Cadence 1337, NY (London American HLA 8498, London), 1957; 'All I Have to Do Is Dream', Nashville, 6 Mar 1958, Cadence 1348, NY (London American HLA 8618, London), 1958; 'Bye Bye Love', Nashville, Apr 1957, Cadence 1315 (London American HLA 8440), 1957; 'When Will I Be Loved?', Nashville, 18 Feb 1960, Cadence 1380 (London American HLA 9157), 1960. 'Let It Be Me', Nashville, 15 Dec 1959, Cadence 1376 (London American HLA 9039), 1960; 'Take a Message to Mary', Nashville, 2 Mar 1959, Cadence 1364 (London American HLA 8863), 1959; both LP-issued The Fabulous Style of the Everly Brothers, Cadence CLP 3040, NY, 1960. 'Cathy's Clown', 18 Mar 1960, Warner Bros. 5151, NY (Warner Bros. WB 1, London), 1960. 'Temptation', Nashville 1 Nov 1960, c/w 'Stick With Me Baby', Nashville, 27 Jul 1960, Warner Bros. 5220 (WB 42), 1961. 'Step It Up & Go', Nashville, fall 1961, Instant Party, Warner Bros. W (WS) 1430, 1962. 'Abandoned Love', London, 1984/5, Born Yesterday, Mercury CD 826 142-2 (LP MERH 80), Holland &

London, 1985; 'I Wonder If I Care as Much', summer 1968, Roots, Warner Bros. W1752, 1968. The Everly Brothers: Reunion Concert I, London, 23 Sep 1983, Impression IMDP1, 1984.

Bob Dylan: 'When Will I Be Loved', Glasgow, 18–19 May 1966, fragment in Eat the Document, 1971; 'Let It Be Me' (with Clydie King), LA, 1 May 1981 (issued in Europe only, as B-side of 'Heart of Mine', CBS A-1406, 1981). Jerry Butler & Betty Everett: 'Let It Be Me', Chicago, 1964, Vee-Jay 613, Chicago, 1964. Bill Damon, 'Herewith, a Second Look at Self Portrait' in Rolling Stone, 3 Sep 1970.]

Evers, Medgar [1925 - 1963] Medgar Wiley Evers, born July 2, 1925 in Decatur, Mississippi, became prominent in the civil rights movement of the early 1960s and was field secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Mississippi. He had served in the US Army in World War II, married in 1951, and moved to Jackson to set up an NAACP office there. He was murdered on the lawn of his bungalow in a respectable black suburb in Jackson, June 12, 1963, causing a national outcry.

Two rigged trials of Ku Klux Klan member Byron de la Beckwith in the 1960s ended in hung juries. On February 5, 1994, in Jackson, de la Beckwith, now aged 73, was at last found guilty of Evers' murder and sentenced to life imprisonment. A statue of Evers stands outside the Medgar Evers Public Library on Medgar Evers Boulevard in today's Jackson. The bungalow is now a small museum.

De la Beckwith was from Greenwood, Mississippi, the town where ROBERT JOHNSON was lethally poisoned in 1938. Greenwood had 11,000 people, half of them black, when Johnson played and died there. Byron de la Beckwith, one of the town's 5,500 whites, would have been a 17-year-old then. Noticeably, the man who killed Evers was not, as in Dylan's 'Only a Pawn in Their Game', poor white trash. Nevertheless it was apt that when Dylan performed this brave political song for a black audience of farm workers on July 6, 1963 (within four weeks of Evers' death), the venue was a rural patch just outside Greenwood, Mississippi.

[Mystery of Evers' middle name (always stated as just initial W.) solved by Eric Oliver, NAACP Library, 31 Oct 2005. 1994 information: 'American Survey', the Economist, London, 12 Feb 1994. For a fuller account see Maryanne Vollers' book Ghosts of Mississippi: The Murder of Medgar Evers, the Trials of Byron De La Beckwith, and the Haunting of the New South, 1995.]

'Every Grain of Sand', non-Blake elements On the demo version Dylan made of this song, issued in 1991 on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, the music seems uncertain of itself. FRED TACKETT's guitar work and Dylan's keyboards make for a muted turbulence that fails to support the regularity of the song's construction: and this produces not an expressive tension between the two (as, say, between ROBBIE ROBERTSON's guitar and Dylan's keyboards on 'Dirge') but an indeterminacy, while Dylan's voice strains unattractively in a key just out of reach. Far from carrying over into a suggestion of the hard struggle for faith, this merely sounds a failure of performance. And since JENNIFER WARNES' singing is so low in the mix as to be unjudgeable, we might say that the best vocal on the track belongs to the dog that barks in the middle. Its voice, unlike Dylan's here, has a rounded, bell-like tone, harmonically rich and in every way expressive, while the timing of its entrance is startling but immaculate. It strongly recalls, in tone and timing, the imitations of the bells achieved to such beguiling effect by the back-up singers on that religious potboiler of the 1950s 'The Three Bells (The Jimmy Brown Song)' by Les Compagnons de la Chanson. (The back-up singers on Dylan's recording of 'Copper Kettle' do much the same job.)

The religious potboiler that bubbles in the background of all versions of 'Every Grain of Sand', because it does touch on the words rather than the music, is 'I Believe', which Dylan will have known, if not from Frankie Laine, then certainly from ELVIS PRESLEY, whose 1957 recording was released on both Elvis' Christmas Album and alongside 'Peace in the Valley' (a song Dylan performed in concert in 1989) on the EP of that name. The short lyric of 'I Believe' lists things that seem ordered in the universe ('I believe for every drop of rain that falls, a flower grows') and in which the Master's hand can be discerned, including 'Every time I hear a new-born baby cry . . .' (where did these songwriters hang out: a maternity ward?) '. . . or touch a leaf, or see the sky / Then I know why, I, believe.'

The Shot of Love album version of 'Every Grain of Sand', recorded in May 1981, echoes another pop record also: it has the same intro as ROY ORBISON's great single 'Crawling Back' (from his otherwise fallow period at MGM, after the run of Monument hits), with exactly the same stately arpeggios. Since this is an obscure echo, however, the predominant effect of the arpeggio'd intro is to establish, by the hint of formal musique it carries, the ordered nature of the whole song. Then Dylan's voice comes in: direct, serious and without melodrama. It is a broad, steadfast voice, not straining but submitting to the discipline of the formal, careful structure of the song, its orderliness an enactment of that claimed by the title. We are served notice that here is a submission to order on every level of the song's being.

There is no distracting small-talk. We are at once into the narrator's confession of feeling prompted to confession (to his crawling back), and then 'onward' into the 'journey' of following this through. There is no evocation of turmoil or chaos here: the experience of turmoil undergone is logged objectively. The recounting of the journey is unemphatic about the narrator's personal anguish; though the faith and possible doubt experienced is necessarily of a personal nature, the song is concerned to emphasise the stages of the journey rather than the declamatory 'me! me! me!' of it: so much so that there is no other Dylan song so saturated in biblical text; all through, the personal sojourn scrupulously follows scriptural signposts.

Matthew 10:29–31, a passage that quotes Christ directly, is the founding text of the song's title theme: 'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear ye not therefore . . .' Or as Luke reports it: 'Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God? But even the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear ye not therefore . . .' (Luke 12:6–7).

But what does this mean? And what does Dylan make it mean in his song? Christ's message here is not nearly so wide, liberal and all-inclusive as it sounds. What follows at once is: 'Fear ye not therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows. Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven. Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace but a sword.' (Matthew 10:31–34; the equivalent passage of Luke, which omits the waving of the sword, is in 12:8–9.)

Far from throwing God's infinite care over every tiny creature in his universe, as the early part of his speech might imply, it's a severe and conditional vision: it mentions the sparrows only to devalue them in the comparison with men, and it excludes from God's care all but true Christian believers.

Christ's words 'the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear ye not therefore . . .' are reworked in a later address to the disciples, reported by Luke: 'But there shall not an hair of your head perish' (Luke 21:18), and this reassurance too occurs in a specific and exclusive context: that of Christ warning his disciples of the future destruction of the temple, accompanied by 'great signs . . . from heaven' (21:11), and of Jerusalem, prior to the Second Coming of Christ. He is telling them that as long as they keep their wits about them, they will be all right: that every genuine Christian shall be protected when desolation falls upon the Jewish state and everybody else.

Clearly there are occasions when Dylan takes up this narrowed meaning: for instance he takes up the very prophecy of Christ which contains the formulation 'there shall not an hair of your head perish', in the contemporaneous song 'Caribbean Wind'.

Moreover, though the context of the sparrows-and-numbered-hairs passage is not, like that of the later one, predicting the mass-destruction of all but the chosen few at the end of the world, Christ's words in the later prophecy as reported by Luke do make deliberate cross-reference to earlier rhetorics, thus binding the intent of the various passages firmly together. Telling the disciples that '. . . when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand', he cautions them: 'And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life and so that day come upon you unawares. For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape . . .' (emphases added).

That, then, is the scriptural basis for the title theme of 'Every Grain of Sand'. That Christ's narrow meaning as regards sparrows and numbered hairs has stimulated innumerable other, broader ideas drawing on the same metaphors, some of which may reverberate through Dylan's song, we can leave till a little later to consider. In following all the song's biblical signposts we had really reached only the end of the second verse. Dylan begins his third and final verse with 'I have gone from rags to riches in the sorrow of the night'. While the phrase 'rags to riches' is a secular commonplace, used less often as a material boast than as a metaphor for the transforming value of love—as in the song 'Rags to Riches', by Adler and Ross, recorded originally by Tony Bennett in 1953, covered in the UK by David Whitfield, an R&B hit by Billy Ward & the Dominoes in 1954, revived by Sunny & the Sunglows in 1963 and Lenny Welch in 1966, and a minor hit for Elvis Presley in 1971—and while the whole phrase 'rags to riches' is to be found nowhere in the Bible, nonetheless the Bible frequently applies the same metaphor to suggest the greater transforming power of God's love. Paul talks of 'the riches of his grace' in his Epistle to the Ephesians (1:7: compounded to 'the exceeding riches of his grace' a chapter later [2:7]).

This is surely Dylan's meaning here, and to complete his fusion of secular phrase with religious meaning (something he so often does with quiet panache) he invokes a passage aptly located in Isaiah: aptly because it catches Isaiah making his confession, and citing those metaphoric 'rags' while supplicating for the riches of being returned to God's favour:

'But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; and we all do fade as a leaf: and our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away.' (Isaiah 64:6.) Of course this also gives us the 'leaf' that Dylan uses earlier, while another of his songs, 'Ain't No Man Righteous, No Not One', gives a clear explanatory précis of this exact same biblical verse: 'Put your goodness next to God's and it comes out like a filthy rag.'

Being appalling misogynists, what the ancients really mean by 'an unclean thing' and 'a filthy rag' is a cloth used to absorb menstrual blood. This was too much for the early Victorians. Adam Clarke's Commentary names the term only in Latin (pannus menstruatus) and adds: 'If preachers knew properly the meaning of this word, would they make such liberal use of it in their public ministry? . . . How many in the congregation blush for the incautious man and his "filthy rags!"' The same passage of Isaiah is translated in an Old English manuscript Bible as 'And we ben made as unclene alle we: and as the cloth of the woman rooten blode flowing, all our rigtwisnesses.' In contrast, the New Inclusive Anglican Version probably gives the passage as 'But at the end of the day we are all sort of at the wrong time of the month really, OK?'

Confirming the 'rags to riches' theme, and the context of confession in which it arises here, as in 'Every Grain of Sand'—confession not to a God whose existence is doubted but one whose mercy has been withheld—the biblical verses that follow immediately are: '. . . thou hast hid thy face from us, and hast consumed us, because of our iniquities. But now, O Lord, thou art our Father. . . . Be not wroth very sore, O Lord, neither remember iniquity for ever: behold, see, we beseech thee, we are all thy people' (Isaiah 64:7–10). This passage comes almost at the end of the Book of Isaiah, the prophet who comes immediately before Jeremiah, and who is giving here a confession on behalf of his people. (Prophet, nabi, derives from naba, which means not only to foretell future events but also to pray and supplicate; and before they were termed prophets they were called seers, which was the translation of both haroeh, the seeing person, and chozeh, the person who has visions or supernatural revelations.)

The confession relates to the period of the Babylonian captivity (which God had permitted the Jews to suffer to punish them for their great wickedness), as the prophecy of Jeremiah was to do also; and it was because of Jeremiah's prophecy as to when this should end that Daniel understood himself to be making his confession in the final days of that captivity. In the sequencing of this part of the Old Testament, the books run as follows: Isaiah, Jeremiah, [Jeremiah's] Lamentations, Ezekiel and Daniel. Ezekiel, interposed between Jeremiah and Daniel, lived under the Babylonian captivity too, and prophesied in Mesopotamia at the same time that Jeremiah prophesied in Jerusalem. Daniel prophesied in Babylon itself. Hence Dylan parallels his modern, idiomatically casual usage of 'I got to confess' with its numinous scriptural meaning, re-inhabiting the person of Daniel, in the wonderful understatement of 'I been to Babylon, I got to confess' in 'Someone's Got a Hold of My Heart'.

In 'Every Grain of Sand' it follows from the 'rags to riches' that with 'in the sorrow of the night' Dylan may have in mind Psalm 6, verse 6, a most poetic Psalm of David and one which also shares the supplicatory intent of the passages alluded to from Daniel and Isaiah: '. . . all the night make I my bed to swim; I water my couch with my tears.' The context is given in the first three verses of this Psalm: 'O Lord, rebuke me not in thine anger, neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure. Have mercy upon me, O Lord; for I am weak: O Lord, heal me; for my bones are vexed. My soul is also sore vexed: but thou, O Lord, how long?'

It is hardly possible to read those lines without being conscious that they reverberate through many fragments of Dylan's work, even if we did not know of Dylan's admiration for 'some righteous king who wrote psalms beside moonlit streams' ('I and I', 1983). Surely the earlier 'fury of the moment', the present 'sorrow of the night' and the imminent 'violence of a summer's dream' are all stirred up by that marvellous 'in thy hot displeasure'.

Dylan's line 'I am hanging in the balance of [either] the reality of man [or] a perfect finished plan' can carry a weight of meaning, and a breadth of implication, which is informed by the whole complexity of the title theme. But the King James Bible offers one more scriptural quotation that holds to notions of God's guardianship over us and that might be said to hover over Dylan's lyric. This too comes from a Psalm of David:

'How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! how great is the sum of them! If I should count them, they are more in number than the sand' (Psalm 139:17–18), which occurs in the context of David's acknowledging that God is everywhere, and sees everything, and has guarded over him always, and that he is counted among the works of God, and that he cannot expect to understand all of his knowledge of God: '. . . the darkness and the light are both alike to thee. For thou hast possessed my reins: thou hast covered me in my mother's womb. I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made; and that my soul knoweth right well. . . . Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, and I cannot attain unto it' (Psalm 139:12–14 & 6). And that last is a conclusion Alexander Pope arrives at in his poem 'The Essay on Man', after he has contemplated the falling sparrow and God's regard. Which returns us to post-gospels extrapolations from this main theme of Dylan's song.

However narrowly Christ intended the significance of the Fatherly eye on the falling sparrow, a huge and broad sweep of ideas, including the liberal, the radical and the mystical, has been activated by the sheer poetry of possibility in Christ's words. Taken to embrace the idea that God cares for every sparrow, the implications are endless.

It has been possible to argue from this that the New Testament contradicts the speciesism of the Old (which appears to insist that the animal kingdom is ours to dispose of as we wish: 'dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth' [Genesis 1:26]—though this too is open to debate as to the real implications of the word 'dominion', not to mention modern scepticism about the propriety of basing ideas about the relation of people to animals on those of a primitive farming community).

It was possible for the Victorians to take from Christ's remarks a means of reconciling Darwin's disturbing ideas of evolution, of natural selection, with that of God's providence. It was possible for Shakespeare to extrapolate from Christ's words a different set of considerations: to have Hamlet take from them, after the agonies of his inner struggles as depicted throughout the play (after 'toiling in the danger and in the morals of despair', in fact), something closer to a peaceful acceptance not only of the idea of death's inevitability but to the prospect that his own death might be imminent. It is at this juncture that Hamlet can say: '. . . There is special providence in the fall of a sparrow. If it be now, 'tis not to come; if it be not to come, it will be now; if it be not now, yet it will come. The readiness is all. Since no man of aught he leaves knows, what is't to leave betimes [i.e. early]? Let be.'

Hamlet, writes the critic E.M.W. Tillyard, 'is painfully aware of the baffling human predicament between the angels and the beasts, between the glory of having been made in God's image and the incrimination of being descended from Adam'; or, as Maynard Mack puts it: 'When we first see him . . . he is clearly a very young man . . . suffering the first shock of growing up. He has taken the garden at face value . . . , supposing mankind to be only a little lower than the angels . . . now he sees everywhere the general taint, taking from life its meaning . . . Hamlet . . . [has] felt the heavy and the weary weight of all this unintelligible world; and . . . in his young man's egocentricity, he will set it right. Hence he misjudges Ophelia . . . he misjudges himself . . . he takes it upon himself to be his mother's conscience, though the ghost has warned . . . "Leave her to heaven . . ." Even with the king, Hamlet has sought to play at God'. Later, Hamlet comes to understand that 'There is a divinity that shapes our ends / Rough hew them how we will'. Thus he comes round to feeling that 'Are You Ready?' is the question.

'"Readiness" here means both submitting to providence and being in a state of preparation. It is not that death does not matter . . . but [that] readiness matters more. Shakespeare's tragic heroes do not renounce the world. [For the] dying Hamlet . . . such values are never denied, but at the end . . . they are no longer primary,' as Edward Hubler explains it. As Robert Ornstein lists them, the irresolvable questions remain these: 'Are we to assume from Hamlet's references to heaven, divinity and providence that he is now convinced of the great moral design of creation? Or do we see a Hamlet bowing before a universe which defies man's intellectual attempts at comprehension?'

This last question also seems to have preoccupied the exemplar of 18th century man, Alexander Pope, though you would not know it by taking the relevant lines from his 1733–34 poem 'The Essay on Man' out of context: '[He] . . . sees with equal eye, as God of all / A hero perish, or a sparrow fall.'

For early Victorian believers, these lines were to suggest a shocking coldness of equality, an irreligious equalising of noble mankind and lowly sparrow: yet this is exactly what makes such a notion of God's guardianship over everything in the universe seem warm and benign to some more modern sensibilities. Pope's lines actually point up the contrast between the blindness of God's creatures ('Heaven from all creatures hides the book of fate. . . . O blindness to the future! kindly giv'n') and the clarity of God's all-seeing vision, and his 'equal' may embrace the sense of the Latin word (aequus): 'propitious' or 'benign'.

In any case, Pope is, as he says at the poem's beginning, simply rummaging around among these ideas himself: 'Let us (since life can little more supply / Than just to look about us and to die) / Expatiate free o'er all this scene of man; / A mighty maze! but not without a plan.'

Without suggesting that Bob Dylan has been trying to echo Pope (any more than that his song attempts to carry every other resonance or idea sparked off by Christ's words), we can be reminded, by these last-quoted two lines, one after the other, of Dylan's two alternative endings for his song. In the album version and the version published in the songbooks this is 'I am hanging in the balance of the reality of man / Like every sparrow falling, like every grain of sand.' In both the earlier demo version and the later concert version of 1984, it is 'I am hanging in the balance of a perfect finished plan / Like every sparrow falling, like every grain of sand.'

Which returns us to the overall orderliness of the song. It is not the quality one first looks to Dylan to supply; traditionally, we are likely to value him more for his incomparable acid derangement, the universe of sizzling, surreal, chaotic wit that he creates in work like 'She's Your Lover Now', in which an apt strength is his famous ability to fit into irregular lines however many syllables he likes, another is his panache with madly dislocated rhymes ('sadness' with 'Charles Atlas', for instance). To 'Every Grain of Sand', Dylan brings a concentrated purposiveness that draws on another side of his multiform talent. Instead of dislocated rhymes, this song demands, and gets, exact ones, and in the most orderly pattern possible: which is, within each four-line cluster, the AABB pattern rather than the easier and more common ABCB, or even ABAB.

AABB is better at establishing orderliness because in hearing the rhyme close on the heels of itself, we are made more aware of it, of its regularity: its mechanism constantly reaffirms that regularity. Yet it takes a skilful, judicious touch to achieve this effect without it toppling over into mechanistic intrusion—without our experiencing the rhyme as a clumping heaviness we await with fastidious dread, like corny rhymes that loom threateningly over the listener well in advance of their falling on the ears. It takes a restraint and a lightness of touch that involves resisting making any of those rhymes 'clever', to gain the effect required, so that each rhyme sounds to the listener as if it falls pleasingly into place. Dylan does this with such skill that the skill is inaudible. His AABB pattern never varies, and except for the last rhyme, at song's end, each rhyme is an exact one: 'need/seed'; '-where/-pair'; '-take/break'; 'hand/sand'; '-year/cheer'; 'the way/decay'; 'flame/name'; '-stand/sand'; 'night/light'; 'space/face'; 'sea/me'.

For the special occasion of the final, signing-off rhyme, there is purpose in the last-minute variation, to the less precise pairing of 'man' with 'sand' (exactly paralleled in the alternative ending by 'plan' and 'sand'). This slight demurring from formal precision is the appropriate complement to the sense: the narrator does not quite achieve that all-ends-tied-up perfect neatness; he must sign off hanging in the balance, not neatly at rest.

The structural orderliness is present in many other ways. The three lines that contain the title of the song themselves make a pattern (like a sandwich), rather than offering a rigid repetition. That is, in the line at the centre of the song, we get the solo narrative journey of 'That every hair is numbered like every grain of sand', whereas with the first and last of the song's title lines, each offers a neatly balanced pairing, while at the same time the grammar of each pairing differs. The first is 'In every leaf . . . in every grain . . .' while the counterbalance in the last line is 'Like every sparrow . . . like every grain . . .'.

For the song to live and breathe, there has to be more to it than the classicism of order, however resourcefully the theme-serving structure achieves the detail of that order. The humane personal character that shines through the song, so that the individual's narrative superimposes itself upon both the scriptural blueprint and the formal construct—the living and breathing of the song—is achieved mostly on levels that fuse performance with poetry. Since it is a song, and not a poem, it may be fortuitous as to whether it works on the page too. There is one instance, as it happens, when Dylan's poetry, the expression of the individuality, works better on the page than on the recording. 'The sun beat down upon the steps of time to light the way' can be read, as it should be, as an uninterrupted line from start to finish: to do so is the most effective way to 'get' the idea the line proposes, and, as the long insistent burn of the uninterrupted line enacts its own meaning in its rhythm, to get too the sense of that sun's remorseless beating-down. In performance, the pause after 'steps' dislocates the phrase 'the steps of time', and in doing so makes less accessible the sense of the line. The sun doesn't beat down right across time here, it gets switched off half-way across.

Elsewhere, though, such effects are perfectly achieved in the performance. Look at the individual muscularity of what Dylan does with the sixth line in each of the three verses. These are, respectively, 'Like Cain, I now behold this chain of events that I must break', 'And every time I pass that way I always hear my name' and 'Sometimes I turn, there's someone there, other times it's only me.' Quite what the first-verse line means (what chain of events?) may be unclear, but the dexterity and confidence of control by which he achieves that brilliantly placed and far from facile internal rhyme—'Cain' and 'chain' are marvellously held apart, held in a far more effective tension than any greater closeness would effect, by the equally emphasised 'behold', while the slight pause between 'chain' and 'of events' enacts the pulling effect required—make this one of the finest lines in the song. The shorter middle-verse line and the longer last-verse line each distribute their syllables quite differently, the one acting out the weary glide of guilty repetition and the other the fitful turning back and forth. Yet it is what Dylan does with the endings of these three lines that shows him, as poet-performer, so wholly on top of his material. As each line is delivered, particularity of form acts out perfectly his particularity of meaning. When he reaches 'I must break', word, delivery and music all make that break; when, called by temptation every time, he reaches 'hear my name', we get the opposite of a break: we get a lingering; and in the same place in the third verse, where there is neither the compunction of an 'I must', nor the clarity of an 'always', but only the shifting uncertainty of a 'sometimes . . . other times', what he manages at line-end this time, on that doubtful 'only me', is something halfway between a break and a lingering: it hangs in the balance.

Meanwhile, behind this living, necessarily irregular individuality, the imagery of the song holds to its own systematic structure too. Not only are there the immediately adjacent matchings-up of, for example, 'rags to riches' and 'a summer's dream' to 'a wintry light', but more deep-seatedly the 'pool' of the first verse is matched by the 'sea' of the last, the 'reaching out somewhere' of the first matched by the 'hanging in the balance' of the last; 'newborn' discourses with both 'dyin'' and ‘ancient’; ‘footsteps’ echo ‘the steps of time’; and though the moon is unmentioned, perhaps its presence is implicit ‘in the sorrow of the night . . . in the chill of a wintry light, / In the bitter dance of loneliness fading into space’, so that as the cold moon fades into that ‘space’, this has its own pull upon ‘the motion of the sea’. Since the broad theme of the song is the problematic one of understanding where we stand in creation, it is right that with the single, dodgy exception of the ‘mirror’, all its imagery is that of birth and death; the earth and the heavens; time and space; motion and fixity; humans and the animal kingdom; conscience, temptation and crime; the onward journey of consciousness and the ebb and flow of the elements.

Most broadly of all, these ‘eternals’ interact with the repeated auguries of impermanence placed throughout the song: an interaction focussed so intensely by the title image of the grain of sand itself. This image, as WILLIAM BLAKE suggests, can be opened up from many angles. Crucially, the grain of sand is all that’s left of solid rock, that classic symbol of dependable permanence, when the motions of the sea are through with it; the grain of sand is all that’s left of nature’s fecundity and ‘the garden’, when these have become desert wastes; and while Dylan sings of ‘the steps of time’, the phrase echoing softly behind that is ‘the sands of time’. In all these ways, sand whispers of impermanence, its shifting quality at odds with the clear fixity of ‘a perfect finished plan’. It embodies ‘the memory of decay’.

The grain of sand is also the poetic embodiment of the idea of the fundamental tiny particle of matter: and now quantum physics shows, by its tracking and tracing of the tiniest such particles, new things about the universe: crucially that there really are no absolutes. Quantum physics can detect, and even explain, things coming into existence out of nothing. This is the end for nature as Newtonian machine, in which every particle of matter is locked into a pattern that has forever been predetermined. It is the beginning of genuine indeterminism, in which it’s possible to argue that not even God can know what is going to happen in the future. It is precisely the study of ‘every grain of sand’, in other words, that has killed off the credibility of any perfect finished plan. It’s interesting that in revising the song, Dylan draws back from that ‘perfect finished plan’ to the more circumspect ‘hanging in the balance of the reality of man’—and then sometimes in performance reverts once more to the earlier line: forever hanging in the balance of conflicting claims, because though the earlier line is too pat as philosophy, it’s better poetry.

Of course, not even quantum physics can abolish God that easily: it’s just that we do seem to have to keep changing our idea of what God is like. It’s been said that ‘anyone not shocked by quantum physics has not understood it’; and the new cosmology makes it imaginable that space and time may simply have flickered into existence by the laws of physics, not dependent upon a God to start it all off. Then again, God can still be thought of as out there, the great auteur-director, presiding (like Robert Altman) over the chaos of the set. Meanwhile the new cosmology also tends to re-offer us the old story. Coming after the traditional position, that God created the whole universe for the benefit of mankind, and after the scientific reductionism that followed—which held that nature, life and the human spirit were all created randomly by the blind, mechanical interactions of impersonal forces—now nature is looking like an elegant unity again, and one in which we (the very elements of our bodies fashioned in the stars) have an inescapable rôle. We’re brought back, perhaps, to that part of the Max Ehrmann prose-poem ‘Desiderata’, much derided for its hippiesque homilism though published in 1927 and widely loved and disseminated ever since, in which ‘You are a child of the universe, as much as the trees and stars. You have a right to be here.’ Seeing the Big Bang as the beginning of all space and time fits in with our old notions from the book of Genesis: of ‘Time moving in one direction, of a particular process unfolding,’ as theologian Rowan Williams says, that has ‘put back into our understanding of the universe elements of narrative. . . . This is a story which moves forward, which accumulates.’ It is possible, as for Brian Swimme, to find in all this ‘a God working with recalcitrant materials.’ Sometimes I turn, there’s someone there . . .

All this, then, above and beyond the resonant effect of the line ‘Sometimes I turn, there’s someone there, other times it’s only me’, insinuates doubt into the claimed orderliness of the song, giving it a dynamic complexity that keeps it alive.

We find a sub-text of tension too in ‘Every Grain of Sand’ from the very fact of Dylan’s offering a song of submission to the authority of ‘the Master’s hand’ to a secular, postmodernist, post-feminist audience. Yet the song and the performance are alive and open enough to have a wide appeal to non-believers. As PAUL NELSON wrote in a review of the Shot of Love album, in this song ‘he touches you, and the gates of heaven dissolve into a universality . . .’

This universality is one of meaning and feeling. Essentially, to say that every hair is numbered, and that every sparrow falling counts, is simply to say that what we take to be innumerability does not make for valuelessness. The uncountable still count. This addresses the very heart of the problem we know that we have, for example, in responding humanly to any vast human disaster in a faraway place. The impersonality of the sheer numbers of the starving, the suffering, the wronged: we know how the mega-figures of death disconnect our sense of connection. Yet we know too that if any one of us matters, the only humane logic possible is that everyone—every one—matters also.

The universality of feeling that complements this simple humanitarianism at, as it were, the heart of the song, is finally given flight in Dylan's lovely, inspired, humane harmonica solos: using the soft, rounded, different harmonica that he introduced on the Saved album, and which, typically, was widely resented at the time because it wasn't the right one! The first solo sketches out chunky, shuddering possibilities of frailty and resilience; the second, coming at the end of the song and fading into space, soars beyond it, spinning its disarming idiosyncracy around a beautiful melodic line and dancing with the freedom of acceptance, humility and grace.

Despite our preferring the modern intelligence and fractured sensibility—the non-submission to any traditional authority—of something like 'Visions of Johanna', so well does 'Every Grain of Sand' live and breathe, that when, on Biograph, the running-order gives us the full push-to-the-edge, follow-that! of a live 1966 'Visions of Johanna', and what has to follow it is 'Every Grain of Sand', the stately 1981 song holds its own. That's some achievement.

[Adam Clarke, Commentary on the Bible, 7 vols., London: Thomas Tegg, 1844 edn., is used because it represents the informed but traditional thinking of believers, not academic outsiders. Clarke (1762–1832) was a polymath and Methodist; his popular Commentary was informed by critical inquiry yet just predates the influence of the German scholarship that drove a wedge between the intellectual theological élite and churchgoers who accepted the Bible as the word of God. On Hamlet all quotations come from essays reprinted in the Signet Classic Shakespeare Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, London: New English Library 1963, except the Tillyard, which is cited in the Maynard Mack essay with no further attribution. Rowan Williams & Brian Swimme quoted from Part 1 of the series 'Soul' by Anthony Clare, BBC-TV, London, 1992. Paul Nelson: Shot of Love review, Rolling Stone no.354, NY, 15 Oct 1981.]

Ezekiel, Dylan's use of That great 1981 song 'Angelina' (see separate entry), with its 'angel with four faces', draws strongly upon Ezekiel, the Old Testament book that the writer of Revelation seems to have had continually in mind. But Dylan has been down this road before. Ezekiel is where we find the angels' 'wheels on fire' (though see also 'wheels of fire'). The vision of the four-faced cherabims on the fiery wheels of the divine chariot revisits Ezekiel in chapters 10 and 11. The phrase 'fall by the sword', which Dylan uses so freshly in 'your fall-by-the-sword love affair with Errol Flynn', in 'Foot of Pride' (also 1981), is part of God's admonition to Ezekiel in his vision—'and a third part shall fall by the sword round about thee' (Ezekiel 5:12), with the phrase itself repeated in 6:11 & 12, as well as elsewhere in the Bible. Another phrase from Ezekiel (31:16) is 'the trees of Eden', the phrase with which Dylan ends the first verse of 'Gates of Eden', while his lovely line 'in the valley of dry bone dreams', in 'Dignity', arises from the vision of the 'valley of dry bones' in Ezekiel 37.

Far from the Madding Crowd* [book & film] For relevance to a Dylan song, see Hinton, Nigel.

'Farewell Angelina' [1965] Most of us first encountered that rare and elusive Dylan song 'Farewell Angelina' on a record by JOAN BAEZ. She recorded it in New York City in 1965, and made it the title song of her sixth album, released by Vanguard the same year. With no available recording, it seemed, by Dylan himself, either this had to do (and it's perfectly pleasant, though in stressing a dreaminess rather than a dream-like quality, she brings it close to whimsy) or else it had to be regarded as, really, a poem—as words-on-the-page. And indeed it was available in that form, in the several official books of lyrics, including Lyrics 1962–1985.

F

But Dylan, it turned out, had indeed recorded it (in January 1965, at the Bringing It All Back Home sessions), though, remarkably, no tape had ever circulated until shortly before its sudden, surprise release on the official box set the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991.

'Farewell Angelina' seems to introduce surrealistic language with a bang, in a new way for Dylan, whereas by the time of Blonde on Blonde he has adjusted that language almost out of recognition. In this sense 'Farewell Angelina' stands alone. Where Blonde on Blonde works as a sort of contemporary technicolour surrealist movie, 'Farewell Angelina' seems like a black and white 1940s surrealist short—especially the lyric as we knew it for decades prior to 1991.

'Just a table standing empty by the edge of the sea': that is the line that encapsulates the song, its essential tone and its distinctive kind of image. A strange song: and the fact that there are still things in it that do seem characteristic of Dylan's other work does not make it, in overall effect, any the less strange—quite the opposite. The melody is typically Dylan: it has a similar expansive lightness and brightness to the near-contemporaneous 'Mr. Tambourine Man'. Some of the lines in the lyric add to this similarity: 'The triangle tingles and the trumpets play slow / . . . The sky is on fire, and I must go'; and 'In the space where the deuce and the ace once ran wild / Farewell Angelina, the sky is folding'. But 'Farewell Angelina' is emphatically and fundamentally visual: a series of pictures, sometimes switching suddenly on and off, sometimes sliding into each other: 'King Kong little elves / On the rooftops they dance / Valentino-type tangos / While the make-up man's hands / Shut the eyes of the dead, / Not to embarrass anyone: / Farewell Angelina, / The sky is embarrassed, / And I must be gone.'

Even that remarkable 'the sky is embarrassed' is an assertion we reach to visualise. We picture the sky, and picture it in relation to the narrative's other protagonists, throughout the song. This is all that is offered or required; if we receive all the visual glimpses, if we really can 'See the cross-eyed pirates / Sitting perched in the sun / Shooting tin cans / With a sawn-off shot-gun' then the song has worked.

That said, Dylan's own recording, as belatedly released, seems to capture an earlier draft of the song. Several of the respects in which it differs show a hesitancy about the words themselves and how to fit them into the melodic lines; and Dylan resorts to the same line twice in consecutive verses—'The sky is flooding over'. We lose several of the passages quoted above (the best passages): 'Just a table standing empty by the edge of the sea' is instead 'A table stands empty by the edge of the stream'; 'the music', rather than 'the trumpets', play slow; 'the night', rather than 'the sky', is on fire; the 'King Kong little elves' dance 'in' rather than 'on' the rooftops; we see the cross-eyed pirates 'sit' rather than 'sitting'; and 'the hero's clean hands', rather than the make-up man's, 'shut the eyes of the dead, not to embarrass anyone'—after which instead of the lovely Pathetic Fallacy of 'the sky is embarrassed', we get the first appearance of 'the sky is flooding over'. (There is also an extra verse, inserted between the published version's penultimate and last verses, and it is at the end of this extra verse that 'The sky is flooding over' again; by the time of the published version, this line has been dropped altogether.)

That 'hero's clean hands' prefigures Dylan's surprising formulation a few years later, in 'Lay Lady Lay', in which 'His clothes are dirty but his hands are clean'—which reverses the expected moral weighting. The Noble Workman has honourably dirty hands, and in the West of the cowboy (the terrain with a Nashville skyline), clean hands belong only to the no-good gamblin' man. In 'Farewell Angelina' there is no such location by genre, and 'clean hands' can simply suggest spotless honesty. But even in 'Lay Lady Lay' the image isn't deployed as a double-edged commentary, such as we have on the song 'John Wesley Harding': it is a plain statement of praise in both cases, with 'clean hands' taking its ethic not from the mid-west but from the Bible: from verses 2–3 of the 24th Psalm, which is a Psalm of David: 'Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? / Or who shall stand in his holy place? / He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart.'

The best line that Dylan's own early recording of 'Farewell Angelina' hasn't yet arrived at, 'the sky is embarrassed', may also have had a biblical prompting. Chapter 24, verse 23 of Isaiah envisages world's end as happening when 'the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed . . .'

Dylan has never performed 'Farewell Angelina' in concert. He did, however, feel drawn to the name Angelina again at the beginning of the 1980s, when he recorded the more simply titled but longer, richer and more complex 'Angelina' at the sessions for the Shot of Love album (see separate entry for details).

[Joan Baez: 'Farewell Angelina', NY, nia, issued Farewell Angelina, Vanguard VRS-9200 (stereo VSD-79200), NY, 1965; CD-reissued Vanguard VRM 79200-2, NY & London, 1995. (The album contained 3 other Dylan songs, plus, among other things, 2 songs he has covered since: 'Will Ye Go, Laddie, Go' and 'Satisfied Mind'.) The UK hit single was Joan Baez: 'Farewell Angelina', Fontana TF 639, London, 1965.]

Fariña, Mimi [1945 - 2001] Margarita Mimi Baez, younger sister of JOAN, was born in Palo Alto, California, on April 30, 1945. The family spent a year in Baghdad when Mimi was age six to seven, returning to Redlands, California, in 1952. Two years later, the two sisters saw PETE SEEGER in concert and resolved to become folksingers, which they duly did, discovering and moving into the Cambridge, Massachusetts, folk scene when the family moved east in 1958.

Both played guitar and sang. Mimi was the prettier of the two, and the less talented. She remained in Joan's shadow, and was with her when the two first met Bob Dylan, which was at Gerde's Folk City in Greenwich Village on April 10, 1961—by which time Joan was a star and Mimi's future husband RICHARD FARIÑA was married to that other pretty young folk singer, CAROLYN HESTER. It was towards Mimi, not Joan, that Dylan directed his playful, flirtatious charm. She was not quite 16 years old.

A year later, Mimi met Hester and Fariña in France, sitting with the two of them in the back seat of a car on a scenic ride around the countryside. Early the following month (May 1962) Hester left France for her home state of Texas after quarrelling with Fariña in Paris, and he immediately wrote a poem for Mimi. At the beginning of that September, when Hester rejoined her husband for a shared booking at the Edinburgh Festival, she found the 17-year-old Mimi was there too, and at Richard's invitation.

They married after Hester obtained a Mexican divorce from Fariña, and he set out to inveigle himself into her career just as he had done with Carolyn Hester's. They became Richard and Mimi Fariña, folk duo. They collaborated on the albums Celebrations for a Grey Day and Reflections in a Crystal Wind (both 1965).

When Dylan's album The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan came out in 1963, it was Mimi who had played it to Richard Fariña, stimulating his ambitions to break new ground in writing himself. Mimi's copy of the album had been sent to her by Joan, with a cryptic note attached: 'My new boyfriend.'

This was her attempt to shut the door firmly upon the previously open question as to which of the two Dylan preferred. In truth, he found Mimi the more personally attractive, Joan the more useful professionally. There is a photo of him and Mimi by the hotel pool at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL in July 1964, in which they seem at least as relaxed together as Bob and Joan ever do. Mimi is all of 19 at that point. On her 20th birthday, at the Café Espresso up in Bearsville, NY, the two had a violent row after Dylan launched into a couple of his famous 'truth attacks' on a friend of Richard's and on Joan; Mimi pulled Dylan's hair until he wept.

By her 21st birthday, she'd already been married three years. She and Richard had married on August 24, 1963, at the Baez Seniors' rented house in Portola Valley, California. Mimi turned 21 two days after the publication of Richard's novel; he had a book signing and pretended he'd forgotten her birthday until after the signing, when she found he'd co-organised a surprise party with the other Baez sister, Pauline (the oldest). During the party Richard hopped on the pillion seat of another guest's Harley Davison and died when it came off the road on a bend. Bob Dylan was in Denmark on his 1966 tour with the Hawks. Sixty days later, back in upstate New York, he too met with a motorcycle crash.

In 1967 Mimi and Joan recorded some duets together. One was Donovan's song 'Catch the Wind'. Mimi moved to San Francisco and married record producer Milan Melvin, but she retained the name Fariña and separated from Melvin after two years. She continued to perform, sometimes recording and touring with Joan, and from 1970 to 1972 with the rather more obscure singer-songwriter Tom Jans. Like Baez, she signed to A&M Records in 1971, and that year she and Jans released Take Heart. In 1973 she abandoned a solo album for the same label.

In 1974, she founded Bread and Roses, a charity formed to deliver free live music shows to hospitals, nursing homes and prisons, and it was on this non-profit organization that she concentrated in her last years, though she released an album titled Solo in 1985 (by which time her voice had a pleasing timbre, reminiscent of Carly Simon's), gave performances with Baez in the mid-1990s and, in a last tangential brush with Dylan, appeared on Baez's 1995 album Ring Them Bells. Nevertheless, she found this side of her pallid career a struggle. 'I suffered from comparing my voice to my sister's,' she said in February 1999. 'In the end, it was a great relief to stop singing.'

Mimi became and remained a conscientious literary and audio executor of Richard Fariña's works. She also became, in DAVID HAJDU's biography Positively 4th Street: The Life and Times of Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Mimi Baez Fariña and Richard Fariña, an equal figure with the others (and the most likeable of them as a human being). Three months after its publication, looked after by her last partner, the journalist Paul Liberatore, Mimi Fariña died of lung cancer at her home in Mill Valley, California, on July 18, 2001.

[Mimi Fariña: Solo, Rounder, US, 1985, CD-reissued Philo, US, 1993. Mimi & Richard Fariña: Celebrations for a Grey Day, NY, Sep 1964, Vanguard VRS-9174 (mono VSD-79174), US, 1965; Reflections in a Crystal Wind, Vanguard 79204, US, 1965. Mimi Fariña & Tom Jans: Take Heart, A&M SP 4310, US, 1971.

The main source here is David Hajdu, Positively 4th Street: The Life and Times of Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Mimi Baez Fariña and Richard Fariña, New York: Farrar, Strauss & Giroux, 2001; quoted note from Joan Baez from ditto, London: Bloomsbury, 2001, p.162. The Mimi quote re giving up singing is from the compilation of obituaries seen online 29 Dec 2005 at http://lists.village.virginia.edu/lists_archive/sixties-l/3377.html.]

Fariña, Richard [1937 - 1966] Richard George Fariña was born in Brooklyn, New York, on March 8, 1937, attended Brooklyn Technical High School and then took engineering at Cornell, switching to English Literature soon after arriving and befriending the writer Thomas Pynchon, whose classic 1970s novel Gravity's Rainbow was dedicated to Fariña's memory. While a student Fariña published short stories in literary journals but also in The Transatlantic Review and Mademoiselle. Suspended from Cornell, he eventually dropped out, to become a handsome hipster, folkie, novelist and pioneer of counter-cultural amorality: a self-congratulatory conman whose manipulation of those around him made Bob Dylan seem transparent in comparison.

For details of Fariña's marriages and folk-duo careers see the entries on Hester, Carolyn and Fariña, Mimi. (He met the former in 1960, marrying her 18 days later; he met the latter, JOAN BAEZ's younger sister, in 1962 and married her in August 1963, when she was 18.)

Aside from pushing his Svengaloid way into both these singers' careers, he also wrote songs and hung around with other male folksingers, most notably ERIC VON SCHMIDT and Bob Dylan, with both of whom he shared a giddy, brief skitter through the London folk scene at the beginning of 1963, during which, that January 15, the three recorded some of the album Dick Fariña and Eric Von Schmidt, on which Dylan sings backing vocals and plays harmonica (as detailed in the entry on Von Schmidt, Eric).

It is sometimes alleged, or at any rate implied, not least in DAVID HAJDU's biography Positively 4th Street: The Life and Times of Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Mimi Baez Fariña and Richard Fariña, that Fariña actually invented folk-rock and was writing inspired multi-layered songs of a complexity to rival Dylan's ahead of the latter, and that if only he had lived he would have been able to rise to similar heights of artistry and fame, and might have been equally crucial in affecting the consciousness of the age. The Hajdu book, published in 2001, has certainly been the stimulus to a renewal of interest in Fariña's work—his recordings span the period 1963–65—from which it is perfectly clear that his talent was not equipped to travel any further than it did. His best-known song, 'Pack Up Your Sorrows', was co-written with the little-known, oldest Baez sister, Pauline Marden.

His best work was his novel Been Down So Long It Seems Like Up to Me, a work of energetic comedy and ferocious contemporaneity now inevitably termed 'a cult classic', which was published two days before his death on the back of a shiny red Harley Davison Sportster in Carmel, California. Crassly hurtful of others to the last, he managed to get himself killed on his wife's 21st birthday, April 30, 1966.

[Richard Fariña, Been Down So Long It Seems Like Up to Me, New York: Random House, 1966. Mimi & Richard Fariña: Celebrations for a Grey Day (incl. 'Pack Up Your Sorrows') NY, Sep 1964, Vanguard VRS-9174 (mono VSD-79174), US, 1965; Reflections in a Crystal Wind, Vanguard 79204, US, 1965.

David Hajdu, Positively 4th Street: The Life and Times of Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Mimi Baez Fariña and Richard Fariña, New York: Farrar, Strauss & Giroux, 2001.]

Ferlinghetti, Lawrence [1919 -] Ferlinghetti, born in Yonkers, New York, on March 24, 1919, became one of the most influential figures of the Beat Generation. He was a publisher—and was arrested for publishing GINSBERG's Howl in 1955—as well as a poet: and not the usual self-taught poet—he studied at the University of North Carolina, Columbia University and the Sorbonne. He co-founded the City Lights Bookstore in San Francisco, where he moved in 1951 after working for Time in New York City. City Lights was an important rendezvous, talkshop and publishing house for experimental writers.

Unsurprisingly, then, he is the Beat poet whose work most noticeably includes constant allusions to others' texts and titles—a feature we recognise as characteristic in Dylan's 1960s poetry, in Tarantula and throughout his songs. Ferlinghetti's poem 'Autobiography' includes allusions to T.S. ELIOT, Matthew Arnold, Thomas Wolfe, ALLEN GINSBERG, WOODY GUTHRIE, Wordsworth, Thoreau and Melville.

Specific passages also prefigure Dylan: 'I got caught stealing pencils / from the Five and Ten Cent Store / the same month I made Eagle Scout' absolutely sets the tone for Dylan's 'My Life in a Stolen Moment'. 'Junkman's Obbligato' [sic] chimes similarly, updating Eliot's glamorously sordid city in very much a 'Dylanesque' way: 'Stagger befuddled into East River sunsets / Sleep in phone booths . . . / staggering blind after alleycats / under Brooklyn Bridge / blown statues in baggy pants / our tincan cries and garbage voices / trailing.' And you can't read, in 'The Long Street', the unmemorable lines 'where everything happens / sooner or later / if it happens at all' without hearing Bob Dylan's voice reciting a passage with that same rhythm and that same last line on the unreleased early version of 'Brownsville Girl', 'New Danville Girl' [Hollywood, December 1984]: 'Nothing happens on purpose / It's an accident / If it happens at all.' Another poem, 'Dog', with the recurrent line 'The dog trots freely in the street', might be the prompt for 'If Dogs Run Free'.

All these Ferlinghetti poems are from the group 'Oral Conversations' in A Coney Island of the Mind, 1958, which Dylan namechecks in the sleevenotes to Biograph—but Dylan also alludes to Ferlinghetti's collection Pictures from the Gone World in his interesting sleevenote prose poem for Planet Waves: 'Yeah the ole days Are gone forever And the new ones Aint fAR behind, the Laughter is fAding away, echos [sic] of a staR, of Energy Vampires in the Gone World going Wild!' (See also Planet Waves*, the disappearing sleevenotes.)

Dylan is known to have written Ferlinghetti a long, not overly successful prose-poem-style letter, postmarked April 28, 1964, after calling on him that February 20, finding him not at home, and leaving him a short note. Despite this apparent friendliness, the following year, when Ferlinghetti attended one of Dylan's early electric concerts (Berkeley, November 3, 1965), his attitude was described like this by RALPH GLEASON:

> 'I thought Larry was a tragic figure that weekend, a shaken and embittered man. You know, "What is that stringy kid doing up there with his electric guitar?" I mean, "I am a major poet and this kid has thirty-five hundred kids in this hall." And Larry has been mumbling to himself ever since.'

He appeared to have reached an acceptance of the electric guitars by the time of The Last Waltz concert in 1976, at which, already looking ancient, he performed his ersatz version of the Lord's Prayer.

His 40+ poetry books also include Endless Life: The Selected Poems, 1981. At the time of writing, Ferlinghetti is still alive, aged 86. He has outlived all his major contemporaries among THE BEATS.

[Lawrence Ferlinghetti: Pictures of the Gone World, San Francisco: City Lights, 1955; A Coney Island of the Mind, New York: New Directions, 1958; Endless Life: Selected Poems, New Directions, 1981. Bob Dylan: note and letter to Ferlinghetti, 20 Feb & 28 Apr 1964, both in the City Lights archive deposited with the Bancroft Library at UC Berkeley; first published in The Telegraph no.36, Romford, UK, summer 1990; letter seen online 02 Sep 2005 in the 'Words Fill My Head' section of www.bjorner.com (though here it is laid out like a poem and not as on Dylan's typed sheet). Ralph Gleason quoted in Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, 1986, Penguin edn. p.333.]

film dialogue in Dylan's lyrics The first critic to notice Dylan's sustained but stealthy sewing of Hollywood film dialogue into his lyrics (especially those of the mid-1980s), and to tease out some of the detail in print, was JOHN LINDLEY, in 1986; it lead to a flurry of further discoveries by Dylan-following insomniacs watching old films on late-night television. This was not hard. Filmic references are dotted throughout Dylan's writing from very early days.

In the mocking 'Talkin' John Birch Paranoid Blues' he says of George Lincoln Rockwell 'I know for a fact he hates commies cus he picketed the movie Exodus'. 'She got movies inside her head,' he sings in 'Hero Blues' (in one variant 'nail-movies'), while 'Motorpsycho Nitemare' offers a playful focus on the Hitchcock film Psycho and mentions La Dolce Vita. Perhaps he first specifies quoting from a film at the end of his unfailingly interesting '11 Outlined Epitaphs': 'there's a movie called / Shoot the Piano Player / the last line proclaimin' / "music, man, that's where it's at" / it is a religious line . . .' (Its original French title is Tirez sur le pianiste; the English-language title is often Shoot the Pianist. Years later, Dylan recalls this film, asking the playwright SAM SHEPARD if he had ever seen it. This is at their first meeting, prior to Shepard being subsumed into the Rolling Thunder Revue and the making of Dylan's own film Renaldo & Clara. Shepard says yes he has seen Shoot the Piano Player and asks if that's the kind of movie Dylan wants to make. Dylan replies, 'Something like that.')

We find unacknowledged fleeting quotation from film dialogue in his early work too. In the 1958 film of Tennessee Williams's play Cat on a Hot Tin Roof, Paul Newman says to Burl Ives: 'You don't know what love is. To you it's just another four-letter word.' 'Love Is Just a Four-Letter Word' is a pre-electric Dylan song. In Don Siegel's film of the same year, The Lineup, a drug trafficker says: 'When you live outside the law you have to eliminate dishonesty.' It's a very short step of elimination to Dylan's famous dictum from 'Absolutely Sweet Marie', 'To live outside the law you must be honest.' The Self Portrait instrumental title 'Woogie Boogie' is also a quote from film dialogue. In the Marx Brothers' 1941 film The Big Store, Chico, a piano teacher, tells his pupils: 'Keep practising while I'm away—but remember: NO woogie boogie!'

There is also the submerged presence of the singing-cowboy movies in Bob Dylan's consciousness. These were both a successful Hollywood genre and a part of the early history of commercial country music. The stars were Gene Autry, whose Tumbling Tumbleweeds, 1935, was one of the best of his 100+ films and provided a title song that has proved recurrently popular. (A majestic, spacey, superb version of 'Tumbling Tumbleweeds' is the opening track of Don EVERLY's flawed masterpiece Don Everly, 1971.) After Autry came Roy Rogers, and though Tex Ritter was never that big, he made 58 singing-cowboy films and became a star in the 1950s with the theme tune to High Noon. One of his film songs is 'Blood on the Saddle', a phrase Dylan alludes to ('blood on your saddle') in his 1970s song 'Idiot Wind', on Blood on the Tracks.

In the mid-1980s period covering the Infidels, Empire Burlesque and Knocked Out Loaded albums, this linkage with Hollywood spreads like a craze for a new game in Dylan's work. The title Empire Burlesque itself, of course, flags this preoccupation. It doesn't merely present itself as offering a 'burlesque' of the Hollywood 'empire', or allude to the chains of cinemas called Empires. It's a more detailed reference than that: there were movie-houses named Empire Burlesques. The Empire Burlesque in Newark, New Jersey, is mentioned in Philip Roth's The Anatomy Lesson (1983), notes David Hill in Telegraph 29 (Romford, Essex, spring 1988). In 'The Night Bob Came Round', Raymond Foye reports first-hand: '"What were you thinking of calling the album?" [ALLEN] GINSBERG asked at last. "Empire Burlesque", Dylan said. . . . "That was the name of a burlesque club I used to go to when I first came to New York, down on Delancey Street," Dylan volunteered. . . . How like him, I later thought, only volunteering information when it will mislead.'

Inside the album, quotations come thick and fast, and almost entirely from distinctive films of the 1940s and 1950s, or from undistinguished vehicles for distinguished stars of the same period. These are clearly Dylan favourites, and John Lindley quotes Dylan as saying: 'I can do a few other people's voices: Richard Widmark, Sidney Greenstreet, Peter Lorre. They really had distinctive voices in the early talkie films. Nowadays you go to a movie and you can't tell one voice from the other'; and in another note about the making of Dylan's own film Renaldo & Clara, Sam Shepard reports that in a kitsch gun museum in Connecticut or Vermont, the crew were 'trying to film a scene . . . with Dylan and [BOB] NEUWIRTH. Some kind of Maltese Falcon take-off.'

It's as easy to look at Dylan's use of movie dialogue film by film as song by song. As Lindley noted, The Maltese Falcon featured most of Dylan's Hollywood favourites and includes many fragments of dialogue magpied inside Dylan's songs. 'I don't mind a reasonable amount of trouble' is a Sam Spade line and becomes, verbatim, a line in the Empire Burlesque song 'Seeing the Real You at Last'. Spade growls 'I'll have some rotten nights after I've sent you over—but that'll pass.' In the same Dylan song this becomes 'Well I have had some rotten nights / Didn't think that they would pass.' Spade's partner says 'You don't have to look for me. I'll see you.' In 'When the Night Comes Falling from the Sky' Dylan sings 'Don't look for me, I'll see you.' The film gives us 'I don't care who loves who—maybe you love me and maybe I love you' and the song gives us 'It won't matter who loves who / You'll love me or I'll love you / When the night comes falling from the sky.' The film offers the exchange 'We wanna talk to you, Spade.' 'Well, go ahead and talk.' In 'Tight Connection to My Heart' Dylan offers 'You want to talk to me, / Go ahead and talk.'

Humphrey Bogart lines from several other films curl like his cigarette smoke into these Dylan lyrics too, though Dylan never attempts a Bogart delivery. Bogart's style makes numinous to the movie viewer lines that would otherwise have no special ring to them—which is what one can so often say of Dylan's delivery also. There are at least three snippets of Bogart movie dialogue in 'Tight Connection to My Heart' alone: two from Sirocco (1951) and one from Tokyo Joe (1949). The first of these comprises the line that Dylan uses as the starting-point of the song. Actress Marta Toren says 'I'm coming with you.' Bogart retorts: 'I've got to move fast: I can't with you around my neck.' Dylan sings 'Well I had to move fast / And I couldn't with you around my neck.' Later in the same verse Dylan sings 'I'll go along with the charade / Until I can think my way out.' This comes straight out of Bogart's mouth in Tokyo Joe. (This was recycled in a 'Star Trek' episode, 'The Squire of Gothos', in which Sulu asks: 'How far do we go along with this charade?' and Captain Kirk answers: 'Until we can think our way out.')

Further on in the Dylan lyric, we hear 'But I can't figure out if I'm too good for you / Or if you're too good for me', while Bogart says to Marta Toren, back in Sirocco, that 'I don't know whether I'm too good for you or you're too good for me.'

The song has another, more deeply buried filmic allusion. When Dylan sings 'Well they're not showing any light tonight / And there's no moon / There's just a hot-blooded singer / Singing "Memphis in June"', the figure who leaps to mind, not as hot-blooded singer but as composer of 'Memphis in June', is HOAGY CARMICHAEL, who himself launched that song in another movie, the 1945 George Raft film Johnny Angel.

In The Big Sleep (1946) Bogart mumbles that 'There's some people you don't forget, even if you've only seen them once.' Dylan sings this in the forgettable 'I'll Remember You' as 'There's some people that / You don't forget, / Even though you've only seen 'em / One time or two.' The film's closing exchange, which is between Bogart and Lauren Bacall, goes like this: 'What's wrong with you?' 'Nothing you can't fix.' Dylan intervenes more than usual with this one, making it, in 'Seeing the Real You at Last': 'At one time there was nothing wrong with me / That you could not fix.'

In the same studio-producer-director-and-writing team's To Have and Have Not, the first film to pair Bogart with Bacall, he tells her to 'stop that baby talk'. In 'Seeing the Real You at Last' Dylan sings that he's 'gonna quit this baby talk now', while the same song's opening line comes straight from the mouth of Bogart's co-star Edward G. Robinson in 1948's Key Largo, another John Huston film and again pairing Bogart with Bacall. Robinson says: 'Think this rain would cool things off, but it don't.' The Bob Dylan song begins with 'Well I thought that the rain would cool things down / But it looks like it don't.'

Indeed this song has so many film lines inside it that Dylan increases his hunting range into the 1960s—even into the 1980s—to find material. The Hustler (which The Observer called 'The supreme classic of that great American genre, the low-life movie') provides Dylan with these lines, almost verbatim: 'I got troubles, I think maybe you got troubles / I think we'd better leave each other alone', while the last two of the following four lines come out of the Clint Eastwood vehicle Bronco Billy (1980) and the first two, while they've not been identified, certainly sound as if we're back in one of Bogart's joints: 'When I met you baby / You didn't show no visible scars. / You could ride like Annie Oakley / You could shoot like Belle Starr.' In Bronco Billy, Eastwood, in the title rôle, asked what kind of woman he's looking for, replies: 'I'm looking for a woman who can ride like Annie Oakley and shoot like Belle Starr.' The pithiness of the simile is somewhat reduced by knowing that the real Belle Starr was in fact a hopeless shot. (For more on Belle Starr in films, see Guthrie, Woody.)

In Clint Eastwood's case, the compliment of lifting dialogue has been repaid. In his later film Pale Rider (1985) one of the characters says 'Well, I wish there was something I could do or say, to try and make you change your mind and stay': verbatim lines, of course, from Dylan's 1962 song 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right'.

At any rate, it's small wonder that John Lindley was moved to write of 'Seeing the Real You at Last' (an ironic title, in this context) that so much appears to come from film dialogue that he 'would not be surprised to discover in time that the entire song . . . is constructed of lines from this medium'—though actually, not all its lines derive from Hollywood. The song ends with a re-statement of the words of Jesus to Judas at the Last Supper (giving an extra frisson to the petulant and self-aggrandising bitterness of Dylan's stance throughout): 'Whatever you gonna do / Please do it fast,' writes Dylan; in John 13:27, '. . . Satan entered into him [Judas]. Then said Jesus unto him, That thou doest, do quickly.' (It is a moment Dylan had used before, in 'Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' and 'Man of Peace'.)

Yet we have not finished with Hollywood sources even for 'When the Night Comes Falling from the Sky'. Dylan sings, within it, the opaque 'I saw thousands who could have overcome the darkness, / For the love of a lousy buck, I've watched them die.' Is it, as the grammar insists, his love of a lousy buck that makes him watch them die where he might have intervened, or is it, as plain sense might more readily suggest, their love of a lousy buck that dooms them, the singer being mere witness to all this greed and come-uppance? In any case, in On the Waterfront Karl Malden as the streetwise priest says far more straightforwardly that what oils the wheels of society is 'the love of a lousy buck'. (This is also the film with the more widely quoted line 'I coulda bin a contender', which was perhaps in the back of Dylan's mind in 1975 when his lyrics for the chorus of 'Hurricane' include 'He coulda bin the champion of the world.') And while in Twelve Angry Men, one of the other jurors says to Henry Fonda, 'You thought you would gamble for support', in Dylan's song we get 'But you were gambling for support.'

Even that beautiful formulation of Dylan's in 'Tight Connection to My Heart' that 'What looks large from a distance / Close up ain't never that big' turns out, although its pithiness and concentrated impact is Dylan's, to be inspired by a film line. At the end of 1934's Now and Forever, Gary Cooper, about to be arrested, says of the cops: 'Close up they don't look as large as they do from a distance.'

Inevitably, a line from one of Dylan's favourite films, the classic western Shane, also reappears on Empire Burlesque. Shane says: 'I don't mind leaving, I'd just like it to be my idea.' And here it is in 'Never Gonna Be the Same Again' (not a claim this line can make): 'Don't worry, baby, I don't mind leaving / I'd just like it to be my idea.'

In 'Clean-Cut Kid'—written for the Infidels album but re-recorded for and released on Empire Burlesque—the source for a fragment of lyric seems to have been lifted from a vehicle for another Hollywood star whom Bob Dylan seems especially fond of, Elizabeth Taylor. In The Sandpiper (in which Taylor plays a bohemian artist living in a Monterey beach shack), headmaster Richard Burton says that her son should 'adjust' better. Taylor snaps: 'Adjust to what?' The Dylan song's opening rhetoric is 'Everybody's askin' why he couldn't adjust—/ Adjust to what? A dream that bust?'

To stray, temporarily, from Empire Burlesque, to round up filmic references from the surrounding albums, is to remember that a major song of the early 1980s, 'Caribbean Wind', deliberately alights in passing on another movie title, The Cruel Sea, and to look at another item that originated on Infidels. In 'Sweetheart Like You' Dylan asks ponderously, 'What's a sweetheart like you / Doin' in a dump like this?' You might think so undistinguished and recycled a line needs no hunt for any provenance, but it can't be helped: in All Through the Night (another Bogart film, and with Peter Lorre again too) he asks: 'What would a sweetheart like that Miss Hamilton dame be doing in a dump like this?'

There is a further flurry of dialogue raids on the album after Empire Burlesque too, Dylan's 1986 release Knocked Out Loaded. In Bend of the River (1952) someone says to James Stewart: 'I figure we're even. Maybe I'm one up on ya.' The opening verse of 'Driftin' Too Far from Shore' gives us 'I didn't know that you'd be leavin' / Or who you thought you were talkin' to. / I figure maybe we're even / Or maybe I'm one up on you.' Later in the same song we reach the curiously period touch of 'No gentleman likes makin' love to his servant / Specially when he's in his father's house.' This comes from yet another Bogart film, Sabrina (1954), in which actor Walter Hampden declares that 'No gentleman makes love to a servant in his mother's house.' Similarly, there are brief quotations from two more films in 'Maybe Someday', another Knocked Out Loaded song. 'Forgive me baby, for what I didn't do / For not breakin' down no bedroom door to get at you' comes across from Separate Tables (1958), in which Burt Lancaster says to his ex-wife, talking of her new lover: 'He didn't break any bedroom door down to get to you.' And the splendid 'Dylanesque' put-down 'I always liked San Francisco: I was there for a party once' turns out, more's the pity, to come straight from Out of the Past (indeed), a 1947 film in which Kirk Douglas asks: 'Do you know San Francisco?' and Robert Mitchum mumbles back: 'I've been there to a party once.'

On top of Knocked Out Loaded (or rather, quite a long way underneath it, which is saying something) 1986 gave us the single 'Band of the Hand', recorded with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS. This too looked back to Hollywood for a fragment of its lyric. In I Wake Up Screaming (1941) Laird Cregar says to the oleaginous Victor Mature: 'One day you'll be talking in your sleep, and when you do I wanna be around.' The song's last verse ends: 'I know your story is too painful to share. / One day, though, you'll be talkin' in your sleep / And when you do I wanna be there.' (It was a full circle of sorts that this wretchedly crude song was itself specially provided by Dylan as the title song for a film. His music had by then been used in many films but this was the first time he had specially recorded a song for a film in which he played no part himself.)

We encounter at least another couple of these small raids on movies within Dylan's 1989 release Oh Mercy, too. The title 'Man in the Long Black Coat' surely owes something to the Gregory Peck film title 'The Man in the Gray Flannel Suit' (1956), while the song's lines 'Somebody is out there / Beating on a dead horse', give a flashback to an equally momentary scene in Catch-22, when the hero Yossarian glimpses someone literally flogging a dead horse, as he stumbles through the Italian urban night seeing horror after phantasmagoric horror. In The African Queen—yet another 1950s Humphrey Bogart vehicle—there is the line 'Most of the time I know exactly what you're saying.' Dylan's song 'Most of the Time' adapts this, with a series of mock-defiant lines including 'Most of the time, I know exactly where it all went.' And at the closing moment of Oh Mercy's closing song, 'Shooting Star', he chooses to say 'Saw a shooting star tonight / Slip away / Tomorrow will be another day . . .', which neatly parallels the closing moment in Gone with the Wind, in which 'After all, tomorrow is another day' is both heroine Scarlett O'Hara's last remark and, in the book on which the film is based, its final sentence.

It might be revealing to investigate how many of these reprocessed movie lines had in fact already been reprocessed by film scriptwriters from the books on which many of the films were based (and indeed from other books they happened to admire or have to hand). It might turn out that via this process many of Dylan's film lines are actually from literary or theatrical works. We know, after all, that Cat on a Hot Tin Roof reworks the Tennessee Williams play, that The Maltese Falcon began as Dashiell Hammett's novel, The Big Sleep as Raymond Chandler's and To Have and Have Not as Hemingway's, and that in the last two cases, novelist William Faulkner worked on the film scripts. The African Queen was scripted by the writer James Agee, Separate Tables by the distinguished, unfashionable British playwright Terence Rattigan, based upon his own play. Sirocco was adapted from Le coup de grâce, a novel by Joseph Kessel first published in Paris in 1931, and The Cruel Sea was scripted by novelist Eric Ambler from the novel by Nicholas Monsarrat. Catch-22 is far more important as a novel than a movie, and The Man in the Gray Flannel Suit more so too (though in this case the author of this half-literary, half-pulp yet always beguiling novel, Sloan Wilson, confessed on his book jacket that its title, which is what Dylan echoes, was coined by his wife, Elise Pickhardt Wilson). And Gone with the Wind was a lengthily famous and best-selling novel before it was a mega-movie, though the movie has proved the more enduring. Given all this, surely at least some of those we recognise as movie lines in Dylan songs must actually have started their journey on the page, and could be found there, more or less verbatim.

Sometimes, though, the literary connection misleads, and a film connection is more at the heart of things. It's true that Truffaut's Tirez sur le Pianiste was based on a thriller by American writer David Goodis, Down There, but Goodis was primarily a screenplay writer. The same applies in many other cases. Out of the Past, scripted by Geoffrey Homes, was based upon his novel of the same name but Homes (a pseudonym for Daniel Mainwaring) was mainly a screenwriter. Key Largo was based upon Maxwell Anderson's play, but he too primarily wrote for movies. Shane was built from the novel by Jack Shaefer, but the same is true of him and of Steve Fisher (I Wake Up Screaming began as his novel), Budd Schulberg (On the Waterfront was scripted by him from his own novel) and Reginald Rose (who scripted Twelve Angry Men from his own play).

None of this alters the fact that the main and prominent conduit for these conversational titbits has been Hollywood and that it is the resonant, distinctive voices of movie stars who have set these phrases ringing in Bob Dylan's ears. Confirming this, it is one more noticeable feature of Dylan's mid-1980s songs that within them he mentions several stars by name.

In his early work, his approach is different. In 'Last Thoughts on Woody Guthrie' he says the sense of hope we all need 'ain't made in no Hollywood wheat germ'. Film luminaries are named inside his songs in the service of jokes—Brigitte Bardot, Anita Ekberg, Sophia Loren, Elizabeth Taylor and Richard Burton in 'I Shall Be Free', Tony Perkins in 'Motorpsycho Nitemare', Cecil B. de Mille in 'Tombstone Blues'.

In the mid-1960s prose-poems, the Bringing It All Back Home liner notes have throwaway mentions of 'jayne mansfield.humphrey bogart' sandwiched between 'SLEEPY JOHN ESTES' and the wonderful invention 'MORTIMER SNERD', and a list of people he doesn't want to be (because they are all dead) in which James Dean comes after 'bach. mozart. tolstoy. joe hill. gertrude stein'; and 'Alternatives to College' throws only Jerry Lewis into its huge babble of named characters. In '11 Outlined Epitaphs', in the rhapsodic list of people who are 'entrancin'' him, beginning with FRANCOIS VILLON and ending 17 names later, there is only one filmstar, Marlene Dietrich.

As shorthand descriptions, rather than as jokes, there are only two such names dropped into the first 15 years' worth of his recordings—right up to and including the Desire album: 'Bette Davis style' in 'Desolation Row' (1965) and 'He looked like Jimmy Cagney' in 'Joey' (1976).

In the 1980s, this suddenly changes. We get more than that in 1983 alone. 'Up pops Errol Flynn,' in John Lindley's happy phrase, in both the evangelical 'You Changed My Life' (1981) and in the extraordinary religious rant that is 'Foot of Pride' (1983), followed by Clark Gable in 'Don't Fall Apart on Me Tonight' (1983), Peter O'Toole in 'Clean-Cut Kid' (1983 and 1985) and then Gregory Peck, the insistent hero of the unreleased 'New Danville Girl' (1984) and the Knocked Out Loaded magnum opus 'Brownsville Girl' (1986): a song that, among the many things it does—see separate entry—also returns us full circle to the way Bob Dylan used Shoot the Pianist back in 1963. That is, it tells you about a film and then quotes from it. The film in this case is The Gunfighter (1950), from which Dylan manages to quote in consecutive songs. The title of the song that follows 'Brownsville Girl' on Knocked Out Loaded is 'Got My Mind Made Up' (co-written with Tom Petty). This is a line of dialogue spoken four times in The Gunfighter.

The same album quotes from another Gregory Peck western, 1958's The Big Country. In its minor way, the insertion of dialogue from this film is remarkable: for what he inserts it into is a song that isn't his own composition! The album's opening track, 'You Wanna Ramble', is a revival of an old R&B song by Junior Parker (the man who wrote and first recorded the ELVIS PRESLEY classic 'Mystery Train')—and in the middle of 'You Wanna Ramble', Dylan slips in his own addition, 'What happens tomorrow / Is on your head, not mine' . . . except that it isn't his own addition, it's taken from The Big Country, in which Burl Ives warns: 'What happens here tomorrow is on your head not mine.'

In the mid-1980s, one consequence of Dylan's continuing to be interested in scripture alongside his continued pursuit of movie dialogue is that he takes the extra step of trying to fuse the two. That is, we see in these songs several attempts to make a particular phrase, taken from film, serve also as scriptural allusion and as part of his work's religious themes.

Actually Dylan's first namecheck of Errol Flynn comes in an evangelical song, 'You Changed My Life' (1981)—in which Dylan makes this experiment with great audacity, choosing to sing, in the song's final verse, that he experienced his conversion to Christ not only as something sudden, and something elemental, but also with the heightened dramatic impact of Hollywood. It certainly makes for a surprising effect, though it's doubtful how far this escapes bathos and a damaging undercutting of the gravitas he wishes to retain, despite its audacity, when he sings: 'You came in like the wind, / Like Errol Flynn: / You changed my life.' Dylan's first co-option of dialogue from The Maltese Falcon is within an evangelical song too. In this much-utilised movie Sam Spade's last line is 'The stuff that dreams are made of.' (Itself a slight misquotation from Shakespeare's The Tempest.) In 'City of Gold', premièred in concert in San Francisco in 1980, Dylan makes this part of his armoury of preaching, as he sings 'There is a city of love / Far from this world / And the stuff dreams are made of.'

In 'Tight Connection to My Heart' this co-option may be apparent even in the reference to the singer being lulled to sleep 'In a town without pity / Where the water runs deep.' Dylan is certainly mindful here of the film title Town Without Pity (and no doubt remembers its overwrought title song, a hit for the overwrought Gene Pitney); but the film's theme has no relevance to Dylan's, and commentator BERT CARTWRIGHT argues that this same passage is 'mindful of' Jeremiah 20:16 and Lamentations 2:17, which (though only in the Revised Standard Version) refer to 'the cities which the Lord overthrew without pity' and to the cities 'demolished without pity'. Similarly, to return to the lines in 1986's 'Maybe Someday' adapted by Dylan from the Bogart film Sabrina —where the film's 'No gentleman makes love to a servant in his mother's house' becomes the song's 'No gentleman likes makin' love to his servant / Specially when he's in his father's house'—NIGEL HINTON comments in an article on Empire Burlesque and Knocked Out Loaded: 'Put a capital letter on "Father", of course, and there are all kinds of other resonances here. . . . He makes his lines ring with mysterious possibilities: where one level works perfectly but where, if you care to switch contexts, the whole thing works on another level too. . . . it needs only a slight sideways step to see that each line carries a moral/spiritual implication.'

In all of the above, regardless of any such scriptural sub-text, it's likely to strike us that these film script snatches, barely if at all modified by Dylan, are so unmemorable and unarresting as content yet are mostly so attractive, tersely energetic and imitable as conversational rhythms, and offer cadences of heightened moment: they are great movie lines, in fact, and understandably appealing to the contemporary American poet. In other cases, Dylan's sub-editing, his tightening-up, gives them their radiance. You might feel that they're easy building blocks for writer's-block sufferers, or for singer-songwriters with nothing special to say. Or you might feel that Dylan has made himself inward with, and then re-expressed creatively, yet another branch of American popular culture: one that may have been handed down from above, from the on-highs of Hollywood, but one that has inhabited the shared minds of millions of ordinary people.

[John Lindley: 'Movies Inside His Head: Empire Burlesque and The Maltese Falcon', The Telegraph no.25, Bury, UK, autumn/winter 1986. Readers' further sightings from other films were then published in Telegraph nos. 26, 27, 28, 29 (all Romford, UK) and spasmodically later.

Exodus, dir. Otto Preminger, written Dalton Trumbo, starring Paul Newman, Eva Marie Saint, Ralph Richardson, Peter Lawford, Lee J. Cobb, Sal Mineo, Felix Aylmer, Uncle Tom Cobley & all; UA/Carlyle/Alpha, US, 1960. Psycho, dir. Hitchcock & Saul Bass, written Joseph Stefano, starring Anthony Perkins & Janet Leigh; Shamle/Alfred Hitchcock, US, 1960. La Dolce Vita, dir. Federico Fellini, written Fellini, Tullio Pinelli, Ennio Flaiano & Brunello Rondi, starring Marcello Mastroianni, Anita Ekberg & Anouk Aimée; Riama/Pathé, Italy/France, 1960. Tirez sur le Pianiste, dir. Francois Truffaut, written Marcel Moussy & Truffaut; Films de la Pléiade, France, 1960. Sam Shepard, Rolling Thunder Logbook, London: Penguin edn., 1977, p.13.

Cat on a Hot Tin Roof, dir. & written Richard Brooks, starring Elizabeth Taylor; MGM/Avon, US, 1958. The Lineup, dir. Don Siegel, written Stirling Silliphant; Columbia, US, 1958. The Big Store, dir. Charles Reisner, written Sid Kuller, Hal Fimberg & Ray Golden; MGM, US, 1941. (For this last connection, thanks to Christer Svensson, letter to this writer from Molkom, Sweden, c.1982.)

Tex Ritter: 'Blood on the Saddle', Hollywood, 1 May 1945, CD-reissued High Noon, Bear Family BCD 15634, Vollersode, Germany, 1991, which also includes 'Jingle Jangle Jingle', 'Wichita', 'The Chisolm Trail' and 'Billy the Kid', all cut for Capitol 1942–57. Vol. 4 of Reprints from Sing Out!, NY, nia, also includes 'Blood on the Saddle'. Don Everly: 'Tumbling Tumbleweeds', Don Everly, Ode SP-77005, LA (A&M AMLS 2007, London), 1971.

Empire Burlesque in Philip Roth, The Anatomy Lesson, New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1983, noted by David Hill, The Telegraph no.29, Romford, UK, spring 1988. Raymond Foye: 'The Night Bob Came Round', Telegraph no.36, Romford, summer 1990. The Maltese Falcon, dir. & written John Huston, also starring Mary Astor; Warner, US, 1941. Sirocco, dir. Curtis Bernhardt, written A.I. Bezzerides & Hans Jacoby; Columbia/Santana, US, 1951. Tokyo Joe, dir. Stuart Heisler, written Cyril Hume & Bertram Millhauser; Columbia/Santana, US, 1949. 'Star Trek', 'The Squire of Gothos', nia, noted by Clinton Heylin, Telegraph 29, op. cit. Johnny Angel, dir. Edwin L. Marin, written Steve Fisher; RKO, US, 1945.

The Big Sleep, dir. Howard Hawks, written William Faulkner, Leigh Brackett & Jules Furthman, starring Bogart & Lauren Bacall; Warner, US, 1946. (Bogart is again a private eye, this time Philip Marlowe. Based on the novel The Big Sleep by Raymond Chandler, 1939.) To Have and Have Not, dir. Howard Hawks, written Jules Furthman & William Faulkner, also starring Walter Brennan & Hoagy Carmichael; Warner, US, 1945; based on the novel of the same name by Ernest Hemingway, 1937, but just as obviously an imitation of the movie Casablanca (dir. Michael Curtiz; Warner, US, 1942). Key Largo, dir. John Huston, written Richard Brooks & Huston; Warner, US, 1948. Bronco Billy, dir. Eastwood, written Dennis Hackin; Warner/Second Street, US, 1980. Pale Rider, dir. Eastwood, written Michael Butler & Dennis Shryack; Warner/Malpaso, US, 1985.

Twelve Angry Men, dir. Sidney Lumet, written Reginald Rose, also starring Lee J. Cobb & E.G. Marshall; Orion-Nova, US, 1957. Now and Forever, dir. Henry Hathaway, written Vincent Lawrence, starring Gary Cooper, Carole Lombard & Shirley Temple; Paramount, US, 1934. Shane, dir. George Stevens, written A.B. Guthrie Jr., starring Alan Ladd, Jack Palance & Brandon de Wilde; Paramount, US, 1953. The Sandpiper, dir. Vincente Minelli, written Dalton Trumbo; MGM/Filmways, US, 1965. The Cruel Sea, dir. Charles Frend, written Eric Ambler, starring Jack Hawkins; Ealing, UK, 1953. All Through the Night, dir. Vincent Sherman, written Leonard Spigelgass & Edwin Gilbert; Warner, US, 1942. Bend of the River (in the UK

Where the River Bends) dir. Anthony Mann, written Borden Chase, starring James Stewart & Rock Hudson; U-I, US, 1952. Sabrina (in the UK Sabrina Fair), dir. & written (& produced) Billy Wilder, starring Bogart, William Holden & Audrey Hepburn; Paramount, US, 1954. Separate Tables, dir. Delbert Mann, written Terence Rattigan, starring Burt Lancaster, Rita Hayworth, David Niven, Deborah Kerr, Wendy Hiller, Gladys Cooper, Felix Aylmer & Rod Taylor; UA/Hecht-Hill-Lancaster, US, 1958. Out of the Past (in the UK Build My Gallows High), dir. Jacques Tourneur, written Geoffrey Homes, starring Mitchum, Douglas & Jane Greer; RKO, US, 1947.

I Wake Up Screaming (alternative and UK title Hot Spot), dir. H. Bruce Humberstone, written Dwight Taylor, also starring Betty Grable; 20th Century Fox, US, 1941. Band of the Hand, dir. Paul Michael Glaser; RCA/Columbia/Tri-Star, US, 1986. Bob Dylan, with Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers: 'Band of the Hand (It's Hell Time Man!)', Sydney, 8–10 Feb 1986, MCA 52811 (12-inch MCA 23633), US, 1986; soundtrack album Band of the Hand, MCA 6167, US, 1986 (Dylan, Petty & the Heartbreakers appear on no other track).

The Man in the Gray Flannel Suit, dir. & written Nunnally Johnson; 20th Century Fox/Darryl F. Zanuck, US, 1956; based on novel of same name by Sloan Wilson, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1955. Catch-22, dir. Mike Nichols, written Buck Henry, starring Alan Arkin; Paramount/Filmways, US, 1970; based on novel of same name by Joseph Heller, 1961. The African Queen, dir. John Huston, written James Agee, starring Bogart & Katherine Hepburn; IFD/Romulus-Horizon, UK, 1951. Gone with the Wind, dir. Victor Fleming, George Cukor & Sam Wood, written Sidney Howard & others, starring Vivien Leigh, Clark Gable & Leslie Howard; MGM/Selznick International, US, 1939; based on novel of same name by Margaret Mitchell, 1936. Tennessee Williams (1911–1983), Cat on a Hot Tin Roof, the play, 1955. Terence Rattigan (1911–1977), Separate Tables, the play, 1952. Joseph Kessel, Le coup de grâce, the novel, Paris: Les Éditions de France, 1931. Nicholas Monsarrat (1910–1979), The Cruel Sea, the novel, 1951. Dashiell Hammett (1894–1961, creator of private eye character Sam Spade), The Maltese Falcon, the novel, 1930.

The Gunfighter, dir. Henry King, written William Bowers & William Sellers; 20th Century Fox, US, 1950. (The detection of the recurring line 'Got my mind made up' in this film is in Stephen Scobie, Alias Bob Dylan, Red Deer, Alberta: Red Deer College Press, 1991, p.189.) The Big Country, dir. William Wyler, written James R. Webb, starring Peck, Jean Simmons, Charlton Heston, Carroll Baker, Burl Ives & Charles Bickford; UA/Anthony/Worldwide, US, 1958. Town Without Pity, dir. Gottried Reinhardt, starring Kirk Douglas; UA/Mirisch/Osweg/Gloria, US/Switzerland/Germany, 1961. Gene Pitney: 'Town Without Pity', 1961, Musicor 1009, US (HMV POP952, UK), 1961.

Bob Dylan: 'New Danville Girl', LA, Dec 1984, unreleased; 'City of Gold', Fox Warfield (itself a palace from the golden age of cinema), San Francisco, 10 Nov 1980. Dylan quote re the Bible in Bill Flanagan, Written in My Soul, Chicago: Contemporary Books, 1986. Bert Cartwright: 'The Bible in the Lyrics of Bob Dylan: 1985–1990', Telegraph no.38, Romford, UK, spring 1991. Nigel Hinton: 'Into the Future, Knocked Out and Loaded', Telegraph no.25, Bury, UK, autumn/winter 1986, but quoted here from the version collected in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987.]

Finn, Julio [1936 -] See Arnold, Jerome.

first extant recordings, Dylan's See earliest extant recordings, Dylan's.

Flatt & Scruggs Lester Flatt [June 19, 1914–May 11, 1979] & Earl Scruggs [January 6, 1924–], bluegrass stars.

Four months before Dylan recorded Nashville Skyline in February 1969, Flatt & Scruggs issued an album called Nashville Airplane, using the same musicians, on the same label (Columbia) and featuring countrified versions of 'Like a Rolling Stone', 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35', 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight' and 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', plus an instrumental, 'Freida Florentine', which Dylan's 'Nashville Skyline Rag' proved similar to in character. Scruggs and Dylan later recorded 'Nashville Skyline Rag' together for the LP Earl Scruggs: His Family and Friends, 1971.

But Nashville Airplane was a follow-up to Flatt & Scruggs' Changin' Times, 1967, which alongside 'Where Have All the Flowers Gone?' and 'Ode to Billie Jo' offered Dylan's 'Down in the Flood', 'Mr. Tambourine Man', 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right', 'It Ain't Me Babe' and 'Blowin' in the Wind'.

All these might be explained by the fact of Dylan's producer BOB JOHNSTON becoming Flatt & Scruggs' producer as of September 1967—except that their first recording of a Dylan song (billed as by Lester Flatt, Earl Scruggs & the Foggy Mountain Boys) was in 1966: the rather good 'Mama You Been on My Mind', issued as a single.

In 1969—the year of Nashville Skyline, as it happens—Flatt & Scruggs split up, last performing together in public that February and then forming, respectively, Lester Flatt & the Nashville Grass, and the Earl Scruggs Revue. A main reason for the split was Lester Flatt's unhappiness at the way that, under pressure from Columbia Records, they had moved away from bluegrass towards an increasingly commercial kind of country music that flirted with the rock music of people like Bob Dylan. Indeed it's been said that for Flatt, 'Like a Rolling Stone' was the last straw. As Barry R. Willis puts it (with a nice spinsterliness): 'Flatt was very opposed to non-bluegrass music and associated those long-haired musicians with rock music and marijuana-smoking.' This answers the question as to why it was with Scruggs, not Flatt, that Dylan performed at the end of the 1960s.

[Flatt & Scruggs: 'Like a Rolling Stone', Nashville, 18 Jul 1968; 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35' & 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight', both Nashville, 9 Sep 1968; 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', 16 Sep; 'Freida Florentine', 17 Sep: Nashville Airplane, Columbia CS 9741, NY (CBS 63570, London), 1968. Changin' Times, Columbia 9596 (CBS 63251), 1967. Lester Flatt, Earl Scruggs & the Foggy Mountain Boys: 'Mama You Been on My Mind', Nashville, 16 May 1966, Columbia CO 43803, NY, 1966.

All these Flatt & Scruggs covers of Dylan material are CD-reissued on Flatt & Scruggs 1964–1969, Plus, Bear Family BCD 15879, Vollersode, Germany, 1995.

Earl Scruggs & Bob Dylan: 'Nashville Skyline Rag', Carmel, NY, Dec 1970; Earl Scruggs: His Family and Friends, Columbia KC 30584, NY (CBS 64777, London), 1971.

Barry R. Willis, quoted from the Scruggs biography seen online 9 Aug 2005 at www.flatt-and-scruggs.com/earlbio.html.]

folk and sophisticated culture, links between See song in the history of English Literature.

folk music, American, four main types American folk music is that day-to-day music created by the people and for the people. It gives form to the democratic ideal. It moves below the mainstream of culture, the flow of which is sustained and altered by small élites. In the 20th century, this music of the ordinary American people became radically less regionalized. The slump and dust-bowl times provided a focus on this inevitable shift. As the people moved from the farms and small communities, folk music moved to the media.

On the other hand, though the way of life from which folk music flowed naturally has essentially disappeared, the changes of environment forced upon millions of Americans by an ailing capitalist system have acted as stimuli to self-expression (however defensive that impulse must be) and so as a regenerative influence on the creativity of ordinary people. Urbanized life still provokes a means of invention of music and song undreamt of in Cole Porter's philosophy.

ALAN LOMAX wrote (in noting the effects of such environmental changes) that 'there are aesthetic needs that Hollywood and Tin Pan Alley do not yet know how to satisfy. Tomorrow the Holy Rollers, the hillbillies, the blues shouters, the gospel singers—the Leadbellies, the Guthries . . . who have formed our twentieth-century folk-music, will be replaced by other folk artists . . . [who] will give voice to the deep feelings and unspoken needs of their own time, as have all the folk-singers of the past.'

Future or past, folk music must flow naturally from peoples' lives. When such lives were eked out traditionally, in country communities, the primary material—to shelter in and to work with—was wood. This was the simple reason for the centrality of the acoustic guitar in folk music. Now that people buy their environments in units of electric and electronic technology, folk culture has new material to work with. Serious contemporary artists cannot ignore the technology that surrounds them and shapes their lives, and they have every reason to utilize it not only for their art but also in the interests of the clear duty to reach an audience. The black folk artists of 20th century America always understood this.

Disputing the validity of 'going electric' in folk music disregards the responsible resources of artistic work; and the attempts of the 'purists' to 'preserve' folk music from such moves can only, where successful, act to the detriment of folk music's potential for growth. This is not to argue that the issue at stake is one of trendiness versus the old-fashioned; nor to deny that the borderline between folk art and art proper (between the subculture and the mainstream) is likely to be blurred.

When American life was wholly localized and regional, there were four main types of American folk music (apart from the traditions preserved by foreign-language immigrants). These four were: YANKEE, SOUTHERN POOR WHITE, COWBOY and BLACK. All four figure strongly in Dylan's art, if in very different guises as that art matured.

folk music, American, black One of the four main types of American folk music, and Dylan's engagement with it is at least as strong and clear as with any of the other three. Black folk music is a vast subject, especially given that it's impossible to say where that folk music elides into the commercial pre-war blues. Throughout this book there are further entries that touch on aspects of this music and on Dylan's resourceful use of it. What follows is the crudest possible preliminary summary.

Black folk music in America began by reflecting the basic dream of release—yet it first impinged upon white America as a novel, engaging entertainment (which is as telling an introduction to the history of race relations on that continent as the attempt to wipe out the Amerindian: the 'Red Indian', as we used to say). The distinctive, animated dancing of slaves won the attention and applause of their owners. Then enforced initiation into the prosaic mysteries of the Protestant tradition gave rise to spirituals which reflected a double burden: chains plus original sin. These spirituals were first studied and collected by campaigners for the abolition of slavery, whose aim was to prove that the black man had a soul and should therefore be set free.

Since then, the influence of white and black folk music on each other has been substantial. The black, while preserving African modes of tune and rhythm, has adopted many Celtic musical conventions even while retaining habits of improvisation and adaptation and the endless repetition of short, sharp phrases. Owing to African influence, correspondingly, white folk music has become increasingly more polyphonic and polyrhythmic. The blues, which emerged in the 20th century, relied on newly found African-American dialects, 'spoken' through the guitar as well as the voice, latterly (but not always) in a 3-line, 12-bar verse pattern. A song such as the old 'Blowin' Down the Road' illustrates the common ground that developed both musically and socially between blacks and poor whites. This was the seminal folk song of the Depression and New Deal period. In form and origin a blues number, it became of expressive importance to millions of displaced whites. The Grapes of Wrath people understood the blues.

WOODY GUTHRIE's autobiography Bound for Glory (1943) certainly describes the experience of those times in a noticeably duo-racial way. The box-car ride of the opening and closing chapters is one in which blacks and whites are so jumbled together as to disarm any racial distinctions: they are all men who share the same nomadic discomforts; they are all looking unsuccessfully for a living; they are all outside the cop-protected communities: '"And remember—take an old 'bo's word for it, and stay th' hell out of the city limits of Tucson." "What kind of a damn town is this, anyhow?" "Tucson—she's a rich man's bitch, that's what she is, and nothin' else but."'

Both white and black are hungry, poor, 'a problem', the pawns of an economic game that demands unemployment for flexibility of labour (and thereby high profits) yet attacks, economically and socially, the people who have to provide its unemployment pool. This common ground reduces the difference between black and white perception. So much so that Guthrie's pen-and-ink sketches, included in his autobiography, feature people not easily classifiable by race—indeed his sketches of himself make him look, if anything, more black than white. In the text he cites only one instance of racial prejudice amongst the hobo community.

Dylan, then, inherited black folk traditions not entirely from the outside—not as a separate form but as ever-present influences on other hybrid forms. This inheritance shows clearly right from the start. As WILFRID MELLERS expressed it: 'In the first phase of his career . . . (his) musical materials were primitive: modal white blues, hillbilly, shaker songs and hymns, with an interfusion of (pentatonic) black holler, relating the young white outcast to the Negro's alienation.'

The strands for Dylan are pulled together by his 'Only a Pawn in Their Game', a song written after the murder of MEDGAR EVERS. The poor white is the pawn, and so is the black. Both are used by the Southern politicians to maintain a corrupt status quo not just by keeping blacks disenfranchised in every area of life but by saying to poor whites, in Dylan's summary, 'You got more than the blacks, don't complain'. Dylan bravely follows all this to its logical conclusion, arguing that even when the poor white joins the lynchmob 'it ain't him to blame: / he's only a pawn in their game'. And this is the song Dylan has the courage to sing to black workers outside Greenwood, Mississippi, in July 1963. (See Greenwood, MS, Dylan visit to.)

Dylan, however, comes closer to black folk culture than is suggested by this 'holding hands'. When Paul Oliver sums up succinctly what the blues encompasses (in his pioneering book Conversation with the Blues, 1965) he describes those strands of black folk music and culture that the blues draws together: 'The narrative and folk tales, the telling of "lies" or competitive tall tales, the healthily obscene "putting in the dozens", the long and witty "toasts" and the epigrammatic rhyming couplets which enliven the conversation of folk negro and Harlem hipster alike, have their reflections in the blues. They are evident in the earthy vulgarity, the unexpected and paradoxical images, the appeal of unlikely metaphors, the endless story that makes all blues one.' For all this, Dylan's work shows an affinity that is often blatant and forceful. He has absorbed its characteristics into his thinking and thereby his vocabulary.

Oliver also writes: 'Song, speech and music are frequently one in the blues . . . the piano, guitar, even harmonica is a complement to the voice. Though he may play instrumental solos, the most characteristic blues artist sings through both voice and instrument(s).' How striking is the pertinence of that passage to Dylan's work. Dylan plays piano, guitar and harmonica—three of the commonest blues instruments—plays instrumental solos on each and emphatically uses each as a complement to his voice. This is evident even in such a 'white' protest song as 'The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll' (about a black woman, though it never has to say so, as CHRISTOPHER RICKS points out in his unsurpassable commentary on this song), where, in the final refrain, the irregular strum of the guitar rises and falls, quickens and slows again, conveying the heartbeats of the narrator, while the harmonica phrases between the vocal lines act as graphs of his anger, shame and sympathy.

A huge instance in Dylan's work where this fusion shows vividly its creative force is in his wide-ranging, flexible, recurrent treatment of the classic Railroad Theme; see Railroads, a classic theme.

In his early songs explicitly 'about' contemporary America—the protest songs, in the main—one of the aims is, as Mellers suggests, to express the relation of the spirit of the young white outcast to that of the alienated black. In Dylan's later work his encompassing of black traditions serves more subtly to enhance the expression of many different perceptions. Musically, of course, this is often obvious. Beyond examples like that of 'Hattie Carroll', in which part of the impact comes from a blues-derived feeling for voice, words and instruments as complements, there are plenty of examples in Dylan's work of songs with the conventional 3-line, 12-bar verse structure, including, from his 1970s work, the outstanding 'Buckets of Rain', 'Meet Me in the Morning', 'New Pony' and 'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking', and the more recent 'Lonesome Day Blues'.

Others use similar structures to similar effect—like the still underrated 'Pledging My Time', from Blonde on Blonde: 'Well they sent for the ambulance, and one was sent / Somebody got lucky, but it was an accident . . .' In that verse the black influence is especially strong. It goes beyond the music—the coiled insistence of guitar, harmonica, drums and voice—and beyond that characteristic bending of 'ambulance' in the pronunciation: there is also the curiously ominous quality of those first two lines. They recall those legends of Beale Street in the Memphis of the 1930s, where Saturday night razor fights between blind-drunk blacks were so frequent that a fleet of ambulances waited like taxis at one end of the street. Killer ambulances, apparently, with drivers who made sure that if you weren't dead when they got to you, you were before they'd finished their night's work.

As these stories have blown up into myth, they provide an odd corollary to the stories about hospitals and doctors, and particularly surgeons, widely current in 19th century England and passed into upper and middle-class consciousness by terrifying children's nannies. The subject is aired in George Orwell's grim essay, 'How the Poor Die' (1946). Here too, then, black folk culture is in symbiosis with white.

Actually it was the railways that succeeded, without intending it, at disseminating black song across the land and into mainstream American consciousness. When the railroad came through the Appalachian mountains in the mid-19th century, it was built by blacks. They kept up their spirits by singing, and the white mountain men listened. The black song 'John Henry the Steel-Driving Man' became a white ballad. There were also strong black influences on Appalachian music-making. In his 1990 TV documentary 'Appalachian Journey', ALAN LOMAX argues that in the case of fiddle playing it is black fluidity that gets the white performer's left hand sliding up and down the strings while the right hand is playing the bow, and sets his middle body jigging as he plays. One consequence is that when, now, you see these old Appalachian fiddlers—and indeed the younger dancers in their home-community audiences—you recognise that the flat-foot shuffle they insist on derives, just as CHUCK BERRY's duck-walk surely does, from the flat-foot shuffle that is the fundamental of black dance.

Paul Gilroy proceeds more circumspectly than Alan Lomax to the pros and cons of emphasising black performance strengths. He quotes from Eduoard Glissant's book Caribbean Discourse: 'It is nothing new to declare that for us music, gesture, dance are forms of communication just as important as the gift of speech. This is how we first managed to emerge from the plantation: aesthetic form in our cultures must be shaped from these oral structures.' But while Gilroy is concerned to avoid what he calls 'the pernicious metaphysical dualism that identifies blacks with the body and whites with the mind' he also wants to give due weight to 'the traditions of performance which continue to characterise the production and reception of diaspora musics'. He notes too that 'The pre-eminence of music within the diverse black communities of the Atlantic diaspora is itself an important element in their essential connectedness.' Yet the ever-shifting 'complexity of black expressive culture alone supplies powerful reasons to resist the idea that an untouched, pristine Africanity resides inside these forms', though he also writes of the long shadow of our enduring traditions—the African ones and the ones forged from the slave experience which the black vernacular so powerfully and actively remembers.

Lomax, untroubled by such PC notions, has this to say about the overall black influence: 'A note of unconflicted happy eroticism rings out . . . all the little double- and triple-entendre rhymes of the ring games, of black minstrely, of ragtime, jazz, the blues, and rock—have gradually chiselled away at the starchy standards of nineteenth-century propriety. . . . Nowadays the language of song employs the explicit argot of the streets. In all this, the driving force has been the sexually more permissive African cultural tradition, in which fertility rather than continence is a central value.' (Lomax, The Land Where the Blues Began, 1993. He argues the same points specifically of the influence of black culture on dance, too.)

James Baldwin is also untroubled by dangers of racial stereotyping when considering the question of black influence on music and language. The British photographer and jazz critic VAL WILMER writes of attending a public meeting at which Baldwin spoke in the early 1960s: 'One student asked him how he could explain to unsympathetic whites that black people had earned the right to equal treatment through the history of their presence in America. Baldwin mused, "Ask them how America would sound without us. How would the language sound? How would the music sound?" Everyone laughed. It was just so obvious, but exactly the kind of explanation that was resisted so strongly in England.'

Back in the Appalachian mountains, it was, too, blacks who first used the fiddle as a rhythm instrument, and who first put the fiddle and the banjo together. Later, there were the mountain communities where blacks and whites were neighbours, and, in Lomax's phrase, 'swapped favors, and stole each other's music'.

[Wilfrid Mellers, 'Reactionary Progressives', New Statesman, London, 11 Jul 1969. A revised version of Christopher Ricks on 'The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll' appears in his book Dylan's Visions of Sin, 2003. George Orwell, 'How the Poor Die', Now magazine, London, Nov 1946; collected in Orwell: Shooting an Elephant and Other Essays, 1950; reissued in Collected Essays, Journalism & Letters, ed. Sonia Orwell & Ian Angus, 1968 (4 volumes). Alan Lomax, 'Appalachian Journey', Dibbs Productions, Channel 4 TV, London, 1990. Val Wilmer, Mama Said There'd Be Days Like This, 1989 and 1991.]

folk music, American, Cowboy One of the four main types of American folk music, the Cowboy music tradition was, like the Southern Poor White, a hybrid: it was basically an amalgam of Southern and Yankee brands of folk. In ALAN LOMAX's phrase, 'the cowboy singer was a Yankee balladeer with a southern accent'.

As with the hillbilly genre, Dylan uses the cowboy tradition in two ways. He uses the structures and conventions, and he uses the atmospheric essence. This essence is the lyric magic that first takes its being from the 'noble' struggle of hard-living men in a hostile work environment (and later, much more famously, from the communion of the individual with his own loneliness in the environment of the great western plains).

A traditional sample of the hard-struggle song is this: 'Our hearts were made of iron, our souls were cased with steel, / The hardships of that winter could never make us yield, / Our food, the dogs would snarl at it, our beds were in the snow, / We suffered worse than murderers up in Michigan-i-o.' That recalls, in Dylan's output, more than his delighted use of that last rhyming device in his early recorded version of 'Pretty Peggy-O' ('He died somewheres in Loos-i-ana-o'. We can easily envisage Dylan singing—say, on Self Portrait—the lines just quoted. Phrases like 'our food, the dogs would snarl at it' are well within what we've come to know as Dylan's scope. And to think back to 'Song to Woody' is to recognize a rhythmic effect similar to that achieved in the above—lines very close to verse four of 'Range of the Buffalo' in Lomax's Penguin Book of American Folk Songs and very close to those of what is (according to Charles Darling's The New American Songster: Traditional Ballads and Songs of North America, 1992) the progenitor of 'Buffalo Skinners'/'Range of the Buffalo', i.e. 'Canaday-I-O', an 1854 re-working by Ephraim Braley of Maine of a British song 'Canada I.O.'. The same genre gives us 'Diamond Joe', on Dylan's 1992 album Good as I Been to You. (That album's 'Canadee-i-o' is a quite different song.)

This same flavour is prominent again in Dylan's 'Ballad of Hollis Brown', even though there the sense of community is taken outside the song's characters and exists solely between the narrator and his subjects (and is only a one-way awareness, for the narrator's sympathy cannot reach their loneliness): 'Way out in the wilderness a cold coyote calls / Your eyes fix on the shotgun that's hangin' on the wall.' A very different song from the same Dylan album, 'When the Ship Comes In', draws just as firmly on the idea of the hard struggle of decent men to overcome adversity, though taking it out of the realm of gritty realism and into that of visionary moral parable. (See separate entry on this song.) Here Dylan has taken us a long way beyond the cowboy tradition on which the song is based; and in any case its basis is in the less recognisable of the two cowboy types. What needs to be considered now is Dylan's relation to the other type: that which corresponds to our image of the cowboy hero, that which is bathed in the romantic lyricism of saddle-sore silent men set against lonesome prairies and plains.

The traditional song 'I'm a-Ridin' Old Paint' well represents the genre: 'Now when I die don't bury me at all / Just saddle my pony, lead him out of the stall / Tie my bones in the saddle, turn our faces to the west / And we'll ride the prairie that we love best.'

The cowboy nurtured an internal restlessness into something bigger than himself. His home became the Big Wide West—and he always felt compelled to be 'movin' on'. And how easy it was for this spirit to pass from the 19th century cowboy to the 20th century professional hobo. Dylan takes this up, sometimes comically, more often with a plausible earnestness. (It's worth remembering that the mid-west begins in Minnesota, Dylan's home state. 'The Twin Cities', where Dylan lived after leaving home, mark the divide, St. Paul being 'the last city of the East' and Minneapolis the first of the mid-west.)

The comical example that springs to mind is from 'Country Pie', on Nashville Skyline: 'Saddle me up a big white goose! / Tie me on her and turn her loose! / Oh! me, oh! my / Love that Country Pie!'

Dylan's expressions of this compulsion to move on, to not get entangled, are numerous. On Self Portrait he relaxes (as he does more conspicuously and perhaps less wholeheartedly on 'Country Pie') and handles PAUL CLAYTON's 'Gotta Travel On' as the archetypal statement it is: he lets the words remain as simple as they are and puts the song across as music—music that rides on beautifully. In contrast, he gives voice to the same roving compulsion in the disarming aphorism that brings his 'Ballad of Frankie Lee and Judas Priest' to a close on John Wesley Harding: 'And don't go mistaking Paradise / For that home across the road.'

In Dylan's more concentrated and sustained expressions of this same theme, of this negative-positive moral, their plausibility derives from their being always addressed to a particular woman or specific entanglements of which the narrator understands the full worth. It is never, in Dylan's hands, a merely boastful theme—never a Papa Hemingway conceit, an I'm-too-hot-to-hold bravado. The opposite impulse, the desire to stay and be entangled, is always felt to be present, though it cannot (until Nashville Skyline) win. Later still, on 'You're Gonna Make Me Lonesome When You Go', from 1975's Blood on the Tracks, things have progressed further—to the point where it is the woman who has the gotta-travel-on urge, and the male narrator who must accept this philosophically.

Later still, on Street Legal, the 1978 album that prepares us for the Born Again Christian albums Slow Train Coming and Saved, Dylan takes a further step—to the point where he again feels he has to move on and abandon love: but this time it is in order to embrace Jesus instead of 'the road'; to find a specific salvation rather than a nebulous, wandering 'freedom'.

We have one moving-on theme in 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right', from the second Dylan album: 'I'm a-thinkin' and a-wond'rin', all the way down the road, / I once loved a woman—a child, I am told: / I gave her my heart but she wanted my soul / But don't think twice, it's all right.' The same integrity of spirit underlies the 1964 song 'It Ain't Me, Babe': 'You say you're looking for someone / Who'll pick you up each time you fall, / To gather flowers constantly / An' to come each time you call: / A lover for your life an' nothing more / But it ain't me, babe.'

There are many more instances of Dylan using the 'gotta travel on' spirit. Perhaps his most directly autobiographical statement of it comes in the hastily composed yet excellent 'Restless Farewell', with which he closes his third album, The Times They Are a-Changin'. Within the same collection, that word "restless" is taken up again in a song Dylan has revisited innumerable times since, the lovely 'One Too Many Mornings' (with its multiple negatives at the end of the first line—a direct inheritance from hillbilly traditions of grammatical construction): 'It's a restless, hungry feeling that don't mean no one no good / When ev'rything I'm sayin' you can say it just as good / You're right from your side and I am right from mine: / We're both just one too many mornings / An' a thousand miles / Behind.'

Often, then, this restlessness runs into what is for Dylan a search for the ideal, for nothing less than the perfect. It is only when we reach as far through his career as the Nashville Skyline album that we find this search largely discarded. Consciously, at last, an imperfect love can be accepted as salvation. The last song on the album brings this out most explicitly: 'Tonight I'll Be Staying Here With You'. As its title suggests, it's a deliberate announcement of the fall from restlessness. The habit of always moving on has been kicked and the impulse to stay has at last succeeded. The singer's 'should have left this town this morning', in the second verse, is a tip of the cowboy hat to the old traveling compunction now renounced, not to some particular journey's schedule, and the point of the title line is that it isn't just tonight; the narrator has come to rest. Not even the train whistle heard in the distance can lure him back to homeless sojourns now.

In 1964, when people first heard that line from 'It Ain't Me, Babe', 'A lover for your life and nothing more', it was radical: it rocked you back on your feet, because in pop songs there never had been anything more: to be 'a lover for your life' was the ultimate ideal. Five years of Dylan output later, 'Tonight I'll Be Staying Here with You' could make use of its own dramatic contrast to 'It Ain't Me, Babe'. It wasn't a step back, it was another step beyond. (It is in this same spirit of achievement that Dylan can reintroduce, on Self Portrait, that line 'I bless the day I found you' in 'Let It Be Me', so that despite its being an old pop song it too, under Dylan's auspices, shows the same progressive second step. It parallels 'Throw my ticket out the window'.)

Love doesn't always come Dylan's way on Nashville Skyline, but it does provide the focus of his desire. The second verse of the quiet 'I Threw It All Away'—the 'it' being love—echoes the cowboy ethos succinctly by using, as his image for the discarded love's value, the scenery the lonesome traveller has around him (though it acts also as sexual imagery): 'Once I had mountains in the palm of my hand / And rivers that ran through every day . . .' The choice made is bemoaned, but the choice propounded is again that between loving and moving on.

It may be said that there are much stronger influences in all this from more modern country music ('Country & Western', as it was once called in England) than from the older traditional material; but it is from the traditions that the modern amalgam derives, and in any case it is hardly possible to draw a line through some year in American history and say that behind the line stands virginal tradition, and in front the whore of Nashville. There is more in Dylan's country pie than cowboy classics revisited and more, equally, than the bland successors of HANK WILLIAMS can match.

As for a Dylan song that most clearly registers Williams himself—'One More Night', from Nashville Skyline—the tune of the verses is that of an old English popular song. Correspondingly, the lyric is not only consciously 'unoriginal' but actually recalls other lyrics: 'I will turn my head up high / To that dark an' rollin' sky / For tonight no light will shine on me. / I was so mistaken when I thought that she'd be true / I had no idea what a woman in love would do.' That couplet beginning 'I will turn my head up high' comes straight from 'Lonesome Prairie'—a traditional cowboy song.

See also heroes, special cowboy fondness for.

folk music, American, Southern Poor White
One of the four main types of American folk music, Southern Poor White folk music, hillbilly mountain music, the music of settlers, consisted of hybrids. Its songs fused Scots, Irish and English influences and yet expressed a new-world pioneer milieu. Songs like 'Come All You Virginia Girls', 'Old Blue', 'I Love My Love', 'Went Up on the Mountain' and 'Pretty Saro' reflected normal life all across the southern backwoods, and testified to the cultural bonds between poor whites as far west as Texas and Oklahoma.

It was a tradition linked fundamentally to Calvinist precepts: to the passionate belief in sin, the concern for individual salvation and the surety of a God on Our Side. Uncle John, from Oklahoma, in Grapes of Wrath, is in this sense the complete descendant of the pioneers who constructed the tradition.

With its vital mixing of ancient and fresh vocabulary and its truly pioneering grammatical freedom, this tradition offered what is the real core of folk song: a conserving process which is at the same time creative; and in his use today of that fundamental life-force, Dylan is the great white folk singer. He has drawn on this tradition in two ways: he has used its established characteristics for some of his song structures, and he has used its very lively inventiveness as a source of strength for his own.

His adaptation of the traditional Scottish song 'Pretty Peggy-O', on his first album, gives a Texas accent a central rhythmic purpose. The guitar-work and melodic structuring on 'Ballad of Hollis Brown' are straight from the Appalachians, where such forms and modes had evolved over almost 200 years. And a traditional song such as 'East Virginia' reflects the brooding about death which Dylan echoes throughout his first album (and sometimes in later work) and which is rooted as much in the orthodoxy of Calvinism as in black folk culture.

The Calvinist precepts are not, of course, taken up wholesale by Dylan: rather, he takes up the challenge, the encapsulating threat, of these ideas. In 'With God on Our Side', which appeared (on The Times They Are a-Changin') towards the end of his flirtation with the protest movement, it is the early part of the song, and not the later homilies on world wars and atom bombs, that is of real and lasting interest. It gives us Dylan assessing the inroads of pioneer religiosity on his own sensibility: 'O my name it means nothing / My age it means less. / The country I come from / Is called the Mid-West. / I was taught an' brought up there / The laws to abide / And that the land that I live in / Has God On Its Side.'

There is an extraordinary sweep of implicit experience in those first four lines. The sense of the narrator's context—his sense of history and therefore of identity—makes itself felt quietly, with a truly compelling delicacy, yielding very finely the narrator's sense of the intellectual and moral pressure of his upbringing in terms of 'folk education'. Dylan is stating his awareness that the country he comes from has its claims upon him, and upon his art, for both good and bad.

He nowhere draws more on his background familiarity with Calvinistic folk life than in his beautifully poised, pinched delivery on the early 'Quit Your Low Down Ways'—a definitive cameo, as he does it—or the much later 'Gotta Serve Somebody'.

Dylan also returns to Appalachian music on his 1970 album Self Portrait, to give us an odd but effectively atmospheric version of the traditional song 'Copper Kettle'. As with all the music he touches on this collection, he brings back to life the spirit of the age that the song is all about, and does it immeasurably better than those purists to whom his version (it has violins and women on it) is anathema. And as if to emphasize further his ability to do this sort of thing, the same album offers 'Belle Isle' (see separate entry), which may reach back even further into the traditional folk past, invoking those purely Celtic origins which are part of the founding ingredients of America's Southern Poor White music.

folk music, American, Yankee One of the four main types of American folk music. The Yankee, who first sang on packet ships and there revived the sea-shanties that had dropped out of circulation in the British Navy, adapted his songs to the newer environment when working in the forests that stretch from Maine to Dylan's home state of Minnesota. The nature of this life and work produced a tradition of song in which the workman was a hard and grimly realistic hero. A less 'reflective' Hemingway ideal.

The Yankee backwoodsman sang in a hard, monotonous, high-pitched, nasal voice; his songs used decorated melodies in gapped scale structures; and words mattered more than tunes. Those familiar with Dylan's early work will recognise aspects of it, both of style and content, in that description. Indeed, the close relation much of the early Dylan output keeps with this Yankee tradition is what makes that output difficult for newcomers to it to attune to—not only for those accustomed to, say, Gilbert & Sullivan (in which the words are nonsense and a-tune-you-can-hum is the main ingredient) but also for the pop-orientated. There is perhaps little more in the Yankee tradition that claims Dylan as its modern voice. Although a song such as his magnicent 'Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll' makes an ordinary worker into a kind of heroine, Dylan makes this happen as a device, not an end in itself: a device for strengthening an essentially political and social polemic. He does the same with MEDGAR EVERS and his killer in 'Only a Pawn in Their Game': the two men are just pawns in Dylan's 'game'.

Yet his tremendous 'North Country Blues' much more nearly exhibits a traditional Yankee perspective: it deals very consciously with a working community's suffering, treated through the story of one family's misfortunes, and that community's annihilation. The song provides a timely epitaph to the destruction of the folk culture such communities produced, while taking the dynamics of its construction from that kind of culture. When, on the later album Self Portrait, Dylan returns to a genuinely old Yankee song, 'Days of '49', he offers it quite rightly as a museum-piece even as he breathes new life into it.

Lasting, well-known traditional Yankee songs—many remaining quite close to their English antecedents—include 'The Erie Canal', 'The Bay of Mexico', 'The Foggy Dew', 'Weary of the Railway', 'Katy Cruel' and of course 'Yankee Doodle'.

Folkways Records See Asch, Moses.

Forryan, Robert [1945 -] Robert Forryan, born at Nuneaton, UK, on August 27, 1945, has listened to Dylan since 1964 and written about him since 1992. His work has appeared in Homer, the slut, Dignity, Freewheelin', Judas! and The Bridge (and in the VAN MORRISON fanzine Wavelength). Forryan's hard-to-find 'Songs from Another World', published in Homer, the slut no.11, is the best description of a 1966 Dylan acoustic set: truly attentive and accurate, its admirable stance born of clear understanding: a brave, fine attempt to really describe a specific, indescribable performance (London, May 27, 1966). Another piece of his is cited in the entry on ROY KELLY: a piece which, in praising Kelly's writing on Dylan fandom, manages to be a terrific piece on that subject too.

[Robert Forryan: 'Songs from Another World', Homer, the slut no.11, London, May 1994; 'Roy Kelly's Blues', republished Freewheelin' Quarterly, Huntingdon, UK, vol. 21, Oct 2001, pp.13–21.]

Foster, Stephen [1826 - 1864] Stephen Foster was born near Pittsburgh on the 4th of July 1826 and wrote his pseudo-black southerner songs from the North. He never saw the South till late on in his life, and perhaps didn't much care for black music. (Posterity's southern revenge is that an area of south Georgia swamp is now named after him.) Yet Foster created a series of massively influential as well as popular songs, all written while their black protagonists in the South were still slaves. His hits included 'Oh Susannah' (1848), 'Campdown Races' (the song from which the world picked up the phrase 'all of a doodah', 1850), 'The Old Folks at Home' (1851), 'My Old Kentucky Home' (1853), 'Jeannie with the Light Brown Hair' (1854) and 'Old Black Joe' (1860). ('The Old Folks at Home' is the one that begins 'Way down upon the Swanee river'. This river would be less famous if Foster had stuck to his first draft, which used the Pee Wee river instead.)

Though his work was hugely successful in his lifetime, Foster received very little financial reward until late on. When he did make money, he spent it and failed to support his wife and children. In 1860 he moved to New York, where his debts increased and he started drinking heavily. His wife left him for the second and last time, after which he churned out many mediocre songs just for drinking money. Out of this period, however, came 'Beautiful Dreamer', written just a few days before his death.

President Lincoln had emancipated the slaves the year before; the Civil War was still raging. Segregation laws were tried in Mississippi immediately after the war in 1865 and after the period of Reconstruction were reinstated in 1888. By 1900 the Supreme Court had approved segregation laws and 14 states possessed them.

Foster's legacy is bound up in the history of the minstrel shows that were so popular in the 19th century and have never quite been killed off since. The name of the 1960s pseudo-folk group the New Christy Minstrels, through which the world was brought the modest talent of Gene Clark, Kenny Rogers and Barry McGuire, refers back to the most famous of the 19th century minstrel companies, Edwin P. Christy's. This was American, but it became internationally popular, and as it did so it came to rely less on the distinctive African-American input responsible for its initial appeal, and to embrace far more European 'drawing-room song' material. However dodgily, the minstrel-show movement brought black music and song to the ears of Europe and made it fashionable (so much so that at the turn of the century the future British King Edward VII, then the Prince of Wales, took banjo lessons) and probably speeded up the rise in interest in genuine black music.

Such was the context in which Stephen Foster's songs became popular and influential. His work encouraged the black songwriter James Bland, who was ten years old when Foster died, and who went on to write 'Carry Me Back to Old Virginny', and in 1871, seven years after Foster's death, the Fisk University Jubilee Singers conquered Britain with a repertoire that first popularised at least three other songs that have since become classics: 'Nobody Knows the Trouble I've Seen', 'Swing Low Sweet Chariot' and 'Deep River'. These and the songs of Stephen Foster in turn set the scene for later widely popularised songs like 'Old Man River' and 'That Lucky Old Sun': songs that cross many boundaries and political eras and slide into the repertoires of people from Paul Robeson to JERRY LEE LEWIS, the Isley Brothers to Frankie Laine, and RAY CHARLES to Bob Dylan.

Scott Joplin's compositions were also deeply influenced by Foster's melodies, though Joplin was born four years after Foster's death, and in this way too, when Joplin's work spearheaded the turn-of-the-century ragtime craze, Foster's melodic legacy passed across to the BLIND BLAKEs and Peg Leg Howells who inhabited the early blues world.

Foster's politically least embarrassing songs were still being revived—in the country-pop market, on the whole—in the 1960s. 'Old Black Joe' was revived resplendently, 100 years after its first publication, by Jerry Lee Lewis, who did not, as did so many at the time, alter the title to the vaguer and supposedly more polite 'Poor Old Joe'. Marty Robbins (whose 'cowboy' hit 'El Paso' Bob Dylan clearly knew: 'Romance in Durango' is on one level a parodic tribute to it) cut Foster's 'Beautiful Dreamer' in 1963 and ROY ORBISON cut the same song in the early 1960s also. SAM COOKE (who was nobody's Uncle Tom) recorded 'Jeannie with the Light Brown Hair' in the same period, and years later, prompted by hearing Cooke's record on the radio, JOAN BAEZ cut a version of the song that she fused with 'Danny Boy', making the two songs one track on her mid-1970s album Diamonds and Rust.

'Hard Times', about the only Stephen Foster song now politically acceptable, was revived hideously in 1981 by academic-revivalist Old Time Country Music outfit the Red Clay Ramblers, who once provided the soundtrack for a SAM SHEPARD film but on 'Hard Times' sound as if they've never had any. The song was also recorded in the 1980s by three acts with Dylan connections: AARON NEVILLE, EMMYLOU HARRIS and Syd Straw (one-time wife of T-BONE BURNETT). In 1992, Dylan released his own solo acoustic version on Good as I Been to You.

'Hard Times' is interesting for being a song-within-a-song—a splendid 19th century example of the self-reflexive text, announcing and singing itself and even predicting its own future: 'There's a song that will linger forever in our ears / Oh Hard Times Come Again No More' (except that 'Oh' is a sort of 'Aaow', as Dylan pronounces it, half-howling the pain of it to himself), and ''Tis the song, the sigh of the weary: / Hard Times, Hard Times, Come Again No More.' As an imprecation this compares with BUDDY HOLLY's immaculate blues 'Mailman Bring Me No More Blues', which, had it first been recorded in the 1930s, might well have appeared on the label as 'Mailman Bring Me No More Blues Blues'.

Dylan's version of 'Hard Times', though it's been said that it doesn't fully exploit the nobility of Foster's melody, is a thrilling achievement. The voice breathes his affection for Foster's craft and his respect for its capacity to evoke, regardless of political correctness, a mythic Old South that still has the power to shiver the imagination and to smoke its way inside the landscape we know from those writers and blues singers who inhabited the real terrain. The chorus of 'Hard Times' conjures up a world that ROBERT JOHNSON struggled to leave behind, and that the early HOWLIN' WOLF lived: it puts us right inside one of those cabins in the spooky backwoods where ghostly mists are in the trees, animals howl fitfully in the night and oppression too can seem a creature that might be creeping under the door. And as with Johnson's 'Hellhound on My Trail' ('all around my door, all around my door . . .') and Howlin' Wolf's solo acoustic 'Ain't Goin' Down the Backroads (By Myself)', in Dylan's handling of the 'Hard Times' refrain the resonating wood that is the sound-box of the acoustic guitar is the perfect medium for putting us inside the woods of the lyrics. (The benign side of nature outside the cabin door is represented in JIMMIE RODGERS' song 'Miss the Mississippi and You', which Dylan recorded late the same year, in which 'mockingbirds are singing around the cabin door'.)

At the same time another world hovers in the words of the verses of 'Hard Times', contemporaneous with Foster's American backwoods but a very different place: the England of the great Charles Dickens, with its waiflike victims of industrialism, its tattered urban poor. The two writers were near-contemporaries, Dickens being 14 when Foster was born, and touring America as a triumphantly successful novelist in 1841, while Foster was an educated, literate 15-year-old in middle-class Pittsburgh. When Dickens' novel Hard Times was published, Foster was at the height of his powers, and by the time of Foster's death ten years later, Dickens had published all of his work except Our Mutual Friend and The Mystery of Edwin Drood. No specific relationship is suggested between Hard Times the novel and 'Hard Times' the song (though both were published the same year, 1854), but on the evidence of this song alone, Foster has clearly been influenced by Dickens' compassionate vision and his concomitant reforming zeal. 'Let us . . . all sup sorrow with the poor' is both a characteristic sample of its Dickens-inspired expression and the stated theme of the song. Foster brings it to odd but vivid half-life, or after-life, showing us the hungry poor as 'frail forms fainting at the door'.

Foster obviously had a bit of a thing about these frail forms, this Victorian Gothic ghostliness that happens to suit the world he never knew, of cabins in the woods and mist on the bayou. A favourite word of his is 'vapors'. Even in 'Jeannie' we meet this ingredient right at the start of the song, where he dreams of Jeannie 'Borne like a vapor on the summer air.' In 'Beautiful Dreamer', very similarly, 'over the streamlets, vapors are borne' (or possibly 'born'). Later in 'Jeannie', he hears melodies 'like joys gone by. . . . Sighing like the night wind and sobbing like the rain'. In 'Old Black Joe' it is the voices of the singer's long-dead friends he hears calling him, and he is left 'grieving for forms now departed long ago.' In 'My Old Kentucky Home' 'They sing no more by the glimmer of the moon / On the bench by the old cabin door / The day goes by like a shadow o'er the heart . . . / By'n'by hard times comes a-knockin' at the door.'

It would be easy to find in all this only the unacceptable face of its of-its-time sentimentality: but just as Dylan maximises the vividness of that 'all around my cabin door' in the refrain, because he's more interested in being alert to its imaginative pull than to its shortcomings as eternal-truth poetics, so too in the verses of 'Hard Times' Dylan brings out marvellously the song's lurid Dickensian darkness. How he lingers in fretful fascination (far more than on the word 'linger') over that mad, ghostly line 'There are frail forms fainting at the door', singing the nebulous, Victorian Gothic word 'forms' as if test-pushing against it, as if endeavouring by sheer concentration of will to make it materialise into something more human, less supernatural. And it is the most human of touches that he brings, in a moment of lovely articulation, to the pale maiden's 'sighin' all the day', enacting the sigh not on the word 'sighin'' itself but right across the four syllables he makes of 'all' in that phrase.

With its majestic incantatory length and the marvellous voice Dylan gives us, concentrated and sustained throughout, this is one of the finest performances on the two 1990s acoustic solo albums: one of Dylan's best lead vocals of the last 20 years. The compelling vision of Stephen Foster, compressing so much into this great song, can take some credit, giving Dylan a work he could approach with such respect.

In the freezing bathroom of a cheap Bowery hotel, Stephen Foster hit his head on the edge of a sink, went into a coma and died in hospital next day, January 13, 1864.

['Way Down Upon the Pee Wee River' from William Least Heat-Moon, Blue Highways, US, 1983 (London: Picador, 1984). Frankie Laine, 'That Lucky Old Sun', nia, 1949. Jerry Lee Lewis: 'Old Black Joe', Memphis, 1959–60, Sun 337, Memphis (London-American HLS 9131, London), 1960; CD-reissued on the 8-CD set Classic Jerry Lee Lewis, Bear Family BCD 15420-HH, Vollersode, Germany, c.1991. Marty Robbins: 'Beautiful Dreamer', Nashville, 7 Aug 1963; reissued Long Long Ago, Columbia CBS 40-88649, NY, 1984. Roy Orbison: 'Beautiful Dreamer', prob. Nashville, 1963; CD-reissued Roy Orbison: Best Loved Standards, Monument 463419 2, NY, 1992. Sam Cooke: 'Jeannie with the Light Brown Hair', NY, 9 Sep 1960; Swing Low, RCA Victor LSP2293, NY (RD 27222, London), 1961 (an album that also includes 'You Belong to Me', nia, the standard Dylan covered so beautifully at the same sessions as the Good as I Been to You tracks [Malibu, Jul–Aug 1992] and contributed to the soundtrack of Oliver Stone's movie Natural Born Killers, UNV Interscope ITSC-92460, US, 1994). Joan Baez: 'I Dream of Jeannie/Danny Boy', LA, 17–29 Jan 1975, Diamonds and Rust, A&M SP-3233, LA (AMLH 64527, London), 1975. Aaron Neville: 'Hard Times', nia. Emmylou Harris: 'Hard Times', May 1991, nia. Syd Straw: 'Hard Times', 1989, Surprise, Virgin America VUSLP6 (& CD 91266-2), 1989. Buddy Holly: 'Mailman Bring Me No More Blues', Clovis, NM, 8 Apr 1957, reissued on The Complete Buddy Holly, 6-LP box set, MCA CDSP 807, London, 1979. Robert Johnson: 'Hellhound on My Trail', Dallas, 20 Jun 1937, CD-reissued Robert Johnson: The Complete Recordings, Columbia Roots n' Blues Series CBS 467246, US, 1990s. Howlin' Wolf: 'Ain't Going Down That Dirt Road (By Myself)', Chicago, Nov 1968, unissued till the 3-CD The Chess Box, MCA CHD3-9332, US, 1992. Jimmie Rodgers: 'Miss the Mississippi and You', NY, 29 Aug 1932. Bob Dylan: 'Miss the Mississippi and You', Chicago 4–21 Jun 1992, unreleased.]

'4th Time Around' [1966], coarseness & innuendo '4th Time Around', a minor song on Blonde on Blonde, is more than just a parody of THE BEATLES' song from a few months earlier, 'Norwegian Wood', though there is certainly a strong parallel between that song's distinctive melody, sung by JOHN LENNON, and the melody Dylan uses. It says something about how these two were perceived that Dylan was suspected (not least by Lennon) of parodying, rather than copying, the Beatles. Years later, when GEORGE HARRISON was asked in an interview about the way that the Beatles and Dylan had influenced each other, he seemed to suggest that '4th Time Around' was about 'Norwegian Wood', and about how that song had been inspired by Dylan in the first place:

> 'To my mind, it was about how John and Paul, from listening to Bob's early stuff, had written "Norwegian Wood". Judging from the title, it seemed as though Bob had listened to that and wrote the same basic song again, calling it "4th Time Around". The title suggests that the same basic tune kept bouncing around over and over again.'

'4th Time Around' begins as a cold, mocking put-down of a woman and a relationship untouched by love. For extra sarcasm's sake, it is set against a backing of fawning, schmaltzy guitarwork. But the drumming hints from the start at something more urgent and compelling than cold mockery, so that by the time the lyric switches attention to a second, and love-tinged, relationship, the tone of the song has been switched over too.

The contrast between the two women is plain enough: 'She threw me outside' and 'You took me in'—but the perspective is not that simple. The vast majority of it focuses on the 'she' part, and so suggests the narrator's personal weakness and perhaps vulnerability; and in consequence this majority consists of language soaked in coarse sexual innuendo that brings out Dylan's skill in pursuing the suggestive.

The songs on the Basement Tapes, recorded the year after Blonde on Blonde, indulge in the suggestive to an unprecedented extent for Dylan, with lines like 'I bin hittin' it too hard / My stones won't take', 'that big dumb blonde with her wheel gorged', 'slap that drummer with a pipe that smells', and much of 'Please Mrs. Henry'. 1974's Planet Waves returned more heavy-handedly and so less comfortably to this coarseness. It is there in Dylan's sleevenotes: 'Back to the starting point! . . .

I dropped a double brandy and tried to recall the events . . . family outings with strangers—furious gals with garters and smeared lips on bar stools that stank from sweating pussy . . . space guys off duty with big dicks and duck tails all wired up and voting for Eisenhower . . .'; and it is there in the otherwise admirable 'Tough Mama', where Dylan lazily offers the awkward analogy 'Today on the countryside / It was hotter than a crotch'.

Dylan's technique for delivering sexual innuendo is more interesting in '4th Time Around'. It is almost like a parody of a schoolboy reading Shakespeare aloud in class; instead of the frequently required line overflow, there is a pause—encouraged, but not exaggeratedly, by the tune—at the end of odd lines in the lyric. Into each pause comes all the innuendo and ambiguity that Dylan can muster: 'I / Stood there and hummed / I tapped on her drum / I asked her how come / And she / Buttoned her boot / And straightened her suit / Then she said Don't Get Cute. / So I forced / My hands in my pockets and felt with my thumbs . . . / And after finding out I'd / Forgotten my shirt / I went back and knocked. / I waited in the hallway, as she went to get it / And I tried to make sense / Out of that picture of you in your wheelchair / That leaned up against / Her / Jamaican rum / And when she did come / I asked her for some.'

The pause Dylan creates at the end of 'And I tried to make sense' has a different purpose. (And after it, the lapse back for that pointed 'come' has an added force: it seems in every sense uncontrollable on the narrator's part.) With 'tried to make sense' the pause is to allow a change of mood to begin impinging. The tone is no longer jaundiced. From here on it is open and alert and more sensitive; for from the midst of the imagery appropriate to the narrator's sexual, loveless encounter, Dylan—and here is the touch of genius—produces a clear and striking counter-image: '. . . that picture of you in your wheelchair . . .' With that, he establishes the hint that here, in the offing, is something with a warmer potential, something for which it is worth the narrator's while to salvage his own sensibility. Yet having produced this counter-image, Dylan allows it to recede and settle at the back of the listener's mind. Only at the very end is it reintroduced, to fuse into one clear perspective all the different threads of feeling and of imagery which run through the song. It ends: 'And / When I was through / I filled up my shoe / And brought it to you; / And you, / You took me in / You loved me then / You didn't waste time / And I, / I never took much / I never asked for your crutch / Now don't ask for mine.'

That 'crutch' has all the complexity at work in a worthwhile pun. As we are presented with the mental cadence from 'wheelchair' down to that 'crutch' at the close, in the sweep of which the 'picture' is brought sharply to life, we have one of those fine, rare moments in poetry where although the technical device is seen functioning it does so with such supreme calculation and panache that its 'intrusion' enriches the finished work.

In form, the song is, like so many Dylan works, a dramatic monologue (see Browning, Robert for more on this), here broadened by there being two women, rather than the more usual one woman, portrayed in this extraordinary implicatory way.

Dylan performed '4th Time Around' in the solo half of his 1966 concerts, starting, as far as we know, at Hempstead, NY, on February 26 (twelve days after recording it for Blonde on Blonde) and keeping it in the repertoire every night. He next performed it as a one-off on the 1974 'comeback' tour, playing it only in Memphis, January 23. Likewise on the 1975 Rolling Thunder tour, he performed it only in Augusta, Maine (November 26), and he didn't play it at all on the 1976 tour.

When he revisited the song in concert in the 1990s the melody line he chose showed just how close to 'Norwegian Wood' the song really was. He gave an especially fine performance at the first of his two concerts in Portsmouth, England, on September 24, 2000.

See also Planet Waves*, the disappearing sleevenotes.

[The Beatles: 'Norwegian Wood', London, 21 Oct 1965, Rubber Soul, Parlophone PCS 3075, London (Capitol ST 2442, LA), 1965 (it is the track on which George Harrison first plays the sitar). Harrison interview quote originally for Guitar World, unspecified issue, posted on the official Beatles Ireland website and seen online there 4 Mar 2005 at www.iol.ie/~beatlesireland/harrison/interviews/georgeinterview3.htm.]

Fraser, Alan [1945 -] Alan Fraser was born in Dorset, UK, in 1945 and has been a Dylan fan since buying The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan in 1963 when a student in Manchester. An independent IT security consultant, he has provided information to Columbia Records and various Dylan fanzines, but his major contribution is the website www.searchingforagem.com: a huge, painstaking and scrupulous documenting, in mind-boggling detail, of officially released Dylan rarities and more. You can have no idea how much of this material there is until you turn to Fraser's excellent and lavishly illustrated website.

Freedom Singers, the The Freedom Singers comprised Rutha Mae Harris, Charles Neblett and Cordell Hull Reagon, plus Bernice Johnson, who later married Reagon, thereafter calling herself BERNICE JOHNSON REAGON. The two women were from Albany in southwest Georgia, where they had always sung in church; Cordell Reagon was from Nashville, where as field secretary of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee he had organised nonviolence training workshops and campaigned against segregation at the start of the 1960s.

The group was created in 1961 by the SNCC as the SNCC Freedom Singers, its mission to raise consciousness and campaigning funds. In an old red Buick station-wagon—at which bullets and other missiles were often fired—they traveled 50,000 miles through 40 states in nine months, bringing news and stories of the civil rights movement to the South and performing at colleges, universities and rallies and speaking in jails and at political meetings. The group's members were sometimes jailed themselves as they took part in registration drives, picketing and demonstrations. Their repertoire of 'freedom songs' mainly fitted political lyrics to traditional African-American choral music—hence 'Oh Mary, Oh Martha' became 'Oh Pritchett, Oh Kelley', directing itself at Albany's aggressively racist police chief, Laurie Pritchett, and mayor, Asa Kelley); other key songs were 'If You Miss Me at the Back of the Bus', 'We Shall Not Be Moved', 'Governor Wallace', 'Which Side Are You On?' (see separate entry) and the powerful 'Woke Up This Morning With My Mind on Freedom'. Sometimes they used acoustic rhythm-guitar backing but usually sang unaccompanied.

By 1963 they were appearing with many of the folk revival movement's stars, including Bob Dylan. He appeared with them, JOAN BAEZ and ODETTA on a no-longer extant 'Freedom Songs' television special in New York (on WNEW-TV; ROBERT SHELTON, acting as a consultant to the show, asked Dylan onto it) on an unknown date in the first half of 1963, and flew down to Mississippi to drop in on their voter-registration campaigning early that July, when they, PETE SEEGER and THEODORE BIKEL all performed for farm workers in a field outside GREENWOOD. Later that month, the Freedom Singers appeared, like Dylan, at the 1963 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL. At the end of the final evening, Baez, PETER, PAUL & MARY and the Freedom Singers sang 'Blowin' in the Wind' behind Dylan, followed by an ensemble 'We Shall Overcome': one of the many songs the group recorded for Folkways. A month later they, like Dylan and LEN CHANDLER, appeared at the historic March on Washington at which Martin Luther King delivered his 'I Have a Dream' speech.

The group disbanded soon after this, re-forming in 1964 as an all-male vocal quartet.

[The Freedom Singers are well-represented on the Various Artists 2-CD retrospective set Voices of the Civil Rights Movement: Black American Freedom Songs 1960–1966, Smithsonian Folkways SFW40084, Washington, D.C., 1997, which includes the songs cited above. Sources include Rita Neubauer journal extract, seen online 23 Jan 2006 at www.voicesofcivilrights.org/bus tour/journal_entry33.html and a Green Left Weekly online edn., seen ditto at www.greenleft.org.au/back/1992/65/65p21.htm. WNEW-TV information from Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., p.167.]

Freeman, Denny [1944 -] Dennis Edward Freeman was born in Orange County, Florida, on August 7, 1944 but spent his adolescence in Dallas, Texas, where in the 1950s he thrilled to rock'n'roll and R&B and caught the live acts of many Chicago and Louisiana blues artists. By the late 1960s he had added Cream and JIMI HENDRIX to his list of special favourites and when he moved to Austin, Texas, in 1970 after attending college, he began playing music in earnest himself. Though mainly a guitarist he has always played piano too, including on records by JENNIFER WARNES, James Cotton and JIMMIE VAUGHAN, and was pianist on Vaughan's first solo tour. (He had first heard 16-year-old Vaughan play in Dallas, and later heard 17-year-old STEVIE RAY VAUGHAN in Austin, and fell in with them. 'We became friends, roommates, bandmates. Stevie still owes me $30 rent,' Freeman says on his website.)

Denny Freeman's first band was the Corals; around 1973 he was in the short-lived Southern Feeling and in 1976, with the Vaughans, the Cobras (who staged a reunion in 1982 and were back again by 2000, making a new album). For most of the 1970s and 1980s he was with the Vaughans in various combinations, including in the Fabulous Thunderbirds, which was the house band at Antones in Austin when it opened in 1975. Freeman had played with Freddie King as early as 1970 but now he was pitched in with many of the heroes of his youth—on one 1975 club night he was up there playing with the great Hubert Sumlin, JOHN LEE HOOKER, Walter Horton and others. In another house band, in the 1980s, he played—sometimes guitar, sometimes piano—with Otis Rush, Junior Wells, Albert Collins, Buddy Guy and other blues big names.

In 1986 he made Blues Cruise, the first of five 'solo' albums, all largely instrumentals which, despite that first title, ranged across rock'n'roll, soul, jazz and R&B as well as the blues, and featured many musicians, among them the Texan singer-songwriter Angela Strehli, with whom he had often worked. The others were Out of the Blue (1987), Denny Freeman (1991), A Tone for My Sins (1997: this last title a pun that drew on his Catholic upbringing—something he mentions himself when, recalling that he and the Vaughans had been influenced by Dallas-based group the Nightcaps, he describes them as 'young Catholic boys playing blues. It was their version of "Thunderbird" that Stevie liked to play') and Twang Bang (2002). In 2000 he released the album Denny Freeman and the Cobras, and played in Japan and elsewhere in Taj Mahal's Phantom Blues Band.

Freeman had moved to LA in 1992, and remained there until late 2004, by which time he had also appeared on a Percy Sledge album for which he co-wrote one track, 'Love Come and Rescue Me'. He also co-wrote (with Debbie Harry and three others) the postmodernist lounge jazz track 'Boom Boom in the Zoom Zoom Room', on her 1999 'Blondie comeback album' No Exit.

In 2005 he had something else to do: he joined Bob Dylan's Never-Ending Tour band, rehearsing in Seattle as from that March 1, and débuting in concert with Dylan on the first night of the 82-date spring US leg of the tour, which opened with three consecutive nights in Seattle, starting on March 7. Denny Freeman, these days balding and solid and tending to sport dark glasses (giving him 'a sort of Jack Nicholson look', according to one first-night fan's review), has remained in the band since, playing second guitar. By the end of 2005 he had played 113 Dylan concerts in all.

[Denny Freeman: Blues Cruise, nia, US, 1986; Out of the Blue, nia, US, 1987 (both CD-reissued on 1 CD, Blues Cruise/Out of the Blue, Amazing, nia, US, 1992); Denny Freeman, nia, US, 1991; A Tone for My Sins, Dallas Blues 8904, US, 1997; Twang Bang, V-8 V8-001, US, 2002. Denny Freeman & the Cobras: Denny Freeman & the Cobras, Crosscut 11028, US, 2000. Main sources www.dennyfreeman.com, Bill Pagel's Bob Links (incl. Dennis Lind's 'Nicholson look' quote) at http://my.execpc.com/~billp61/030705r.html (both seen online 7 Jan 2006), and e-mail from Denny Freeman to this writer, 21 Jan 2006.]

Freeman, Eddie [1939 - 1962] In one of the 11 Outlined Epitaphs published in early 1964 on the sleeve of Dylan's third album, The Times They Are a-Changin', Dylan rhapsodises about a series of people whirling around in his head in the vivid tumult of his youthful New York City days. Most of those he lists, from the first, FRANCOIS VILLON, through to the last, PETE SEEGER, are well-enough known names. Only one figure is that of a person with no public face; Dylan's sad line 'the dead poems of Eddie Freeman' has always stood out.

Edward Bromwell Freeman, Jr. was born in Maryland on July 6, 1939 and grew up in Towson, Maryland. He died on November 27, 1962 in a plane crash in the Peruvian Andes en route to Lima. In his Yale Class of '62 obituary he was called 'Ed Freeman, our Class Poet'.

He had been a talented all-rounder, a sportsman despite being only five foot seven and a scholar who graduated from Yale magna cum laude and had also studied at the Sorbonne in Paris. He died at the end of a period of some months in Brazil 'researching television scripts' and had intended to enrol for graduate study at the University of Copenhagen, in the rather different climate of Denmark, and then to become a professional writer.

His friend and classmate Toby Berger, now a Professor of Electrical Engineering at Cornell, remembers him at Yale as a vibrant young man with a round face and straight, glaringly blonde hair, rushing around 'laden with notebooks full of poems', and recalls that he organised a poetry reading in the men's room of Sterling Library (Yale's main library), and urinals were flushing as students came and went throughout the reading. Freeman also wrote an avant garde play 'in which people kept switching identities and even sexes from one scene to the next', which was performed twice at Silliman College (a Yale residential college, and all male) in April or May of 1962.

At weekends Freeman 'frequently disappeared to Greenwich Village where he befriended a young Bob Dylan.' Berger remembers Ed coming back and saying that 'There's this guy in New York that everyone is wild for. He plays guitar and harmonica both at once, and sings his poetry!'

Berger believes that Ed's poetry influenced Dylan's own, and that the line 'I met a white man who walked a black dog' in 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall' was either a line, or the reversal of a line, from a Freeman poem from 1958–59.

Berger recalls meeting Dylan backstage between sets at a concert in Cambridge; the online obituary places this wrongly as 'in the late 1960s'; in fact it was in 1964, possibly at his early April concert at Symphony Hall, Boston. Berger brought the bound typescript of Freeman's play to give to Dylan but he took it only momentarily before handing it back and saying something along the lines of 'No, it's yours: it should stay with you'; they 'exchanged a few words about how hard it was to think of Ed as dead when he'd been so much alive such a short time before.'

Freeman was 23 at the time of his death. Thus quite a lot is compressed into that one quiet line of Dylan's, 'the dead poems of Eddie Freeman'.

[Sources www2.aya.yale.edu/classes/yc1962/obituaries/freeman.html, augmented & corrected by e-mail correspondence with Toby Berger, 28, 29 & 31 Oct 2005.]

Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, The* [1963] Dylan's second album, this was his first opportunity to show how fast he was to develop from one album to the next. The first sessions for this album were held in April 1962, just five months after the first album was recorded—but in the end nothing from the April sessions was included on the album.

All the songs were his own, though many were based on older folk melodies. He was better known in 1963 as a new songwriter of weird promise than as a performer, though this album not only brought together an impressive group of songs that have since become classics—'Blowin' in the Wind', 'Girl of the North Country', 'Masters of War' and 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall' were all on one side of the original LP, while the other includes 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right'—but also gained him an unstoppable cult following among people who preferred the harshness of Dylan's performances to the string-soaked or softer cover-versions other singers released.

See also Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, The:* withdrawn early version.

[Recorded NY, 9 Jul, 26 Oct, 14 Nov, 6 Dec 1962 & 24 Apr 1963; released as Columbia CL 1986 (mono) & CS 8786 (stereo), in the UK as CBS BPG 62193 (mono) & SBPG 62193 (stereo), 27 May 1963.]

Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, The*: withdrawn early version Test pressings and promo copies of Dylan's second album featured four tracks that were replaced before the album's commercial release. The withdrawn tracks were 'Solid Road' [more commonly called 'Rocks & Gravel'] and 'Talkin' John Birch Society Blues' (both still unreleased), 'Let Me Die in My Footsteps' (released, but with one verse edited out, on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, 1991) and 'Gamblin' Willie' [more commonly 'Ramblin' Gamblin' Willie'] (released complete on ditto). The tracks that replaced them on the standard version of the album were 'Girl of the North Country', 'Masters of War', 'Bob Dylan's Dream' and 'Talkin' World War III Blues'.

But there are many further permutations to the withdrawn release: copies where the stated tracklist does not match the tracks featured (both ways round), a Canadian version of the proper album that gave the wrong tracklist not just briefly but for many years, etc. etc. The rarest, most valuable collector's item is a correctly labeled (on sleeve and record label) stereo pressing of the withdrawn version.

The withdrawn Freewheelin' is listed here as being of special historical note, but there are always 'rare' and 'collector's item' versions of Dylan releases, and there is no scope in the present volume to detail others. The best source for such discographical minutiae, not of bootlegs but of errant and obscure officially released and misreleased records, is ALAN FRASER's vast and scrupulous website www.searchingforagem.com.

[Catalogue nos. for the withdrawn album are: Columbia CL 1986 (mono) and CS 8786 (stereo), April 1963.]

Freewheelin'* [fanzine] For most of its history the UK fanzine Freewheelin' was a privately circulated newsletter (to an extremely small list of subscribers), but one that gave significant amounts of support to other, bigger fanzines. Various columns reviewing books, videos and bootlegs and surveying newspaper sightings of Dylan were imported into Isis and others straight from Freewheelin'. It was, in the phrase he prefers, 'collated by' John R. Stokes. Latterly accessible online, it has also turned itself into a glossy full-colour quarterly, starting to call itself Freewheelin' Quarterly as from 'Volume 21', the October 2001 issue.

Fremerman, Elana [1970 -] Elana Jaime Fremerman, aka Elana James, who was born in Kansas City, Missouri, on October 21, 1970, has the distinction of being the shortest-serving member of Dylan's Never-Ending Tour Band. She guest-performed with him on the summer 2004 tour co-headlined by WILLIE NELSON, playing her wired-up 1962 Mittenwald violin on the first two songs of the concerts in Jackson, Tennessee, on August 20, Comstock Park, Michigan, on the 24th, Peoria on the 25th and Madison, Wisconsin, on the 27th. Then, seven months later, she joined the band, from March 7 to April 22, 2005 (after which that leg of the tour finished without her). Even within this brief period she was missing from the Boston concerts on April 15, 16 and 17.

Fremerman's mother is a professional violinist and her stepfather played in the Kansas City Symphony Orchestra. She learnt violin from the age of five, played on Kansas City streets for tips as a young teenager and went to college in New York to play viola and study classical music. After graduation, uncertain what she wanted, she went to India and studied North Indian dhrupad music, then worked in Nepal before returning to the US. After day jobs and playing in a band in Colorado she went back to New York where she placed an ad in the Village Voice for like-minded fans of 1930s-40s violinists, the upshot of which was eventually the Texas-based Hot Club of Cowtown, the band at the bottom of the bill on Dylan's summer 2004 tour, from which came her all-too-brief moments of professional connection with him.

Afterwards, she returned to Hot Club of Cowtown but almost immediately the band broke up (at the guitarist's behest, she says). Fremerman, who has since re-named herself Elana James, gave a phone interview from her Austin home to the Berkshire Eagle in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, in which she said: 'The past year was very strange. It had a lot of highs and lows. I have played with the upper edge of the industry and then I have also come home and played in tiny little hellholes for no money. I have spanned the gamut and what I have realized is that it doesn't really matter where I am playing: it is just important that I am playing and moving forward artistically.'

She can be heard on Dylan's recording of 'Tell Ol' Bill' (see Self Portrait), on the soundtrack of the 2005 film North Country.

[Dave Madeloni, phone interview Jan 15, 2006, Berkshire Eagle, Pittsfield, MA, 20 Jan 2006; seen online 23 Jan at www.berkshireeagle.com/fastsearch/ci_3420138. Birthdate & full name info from Elana by e-mail via her agent, the Nancy Fly Agency.]

French symbolist poets, the Along with the verse of EDGAR ALLAN POE, the poetry of CHARLES BAUDELAIRE was an important precursor of the symbolist movement, initiated by PAUL VERLAINE and Mallarmé, which used symbols to explore and evoke cross-currents and 'illogical' affinities, especially between the senses. (The relationship between drugs and this sense-mingling is discussed briefly in the entry on Baudelaire.)

Dylan gives Verlaine and RIMBAUD playful namechecks in the Blood on the Tracks song 'You're Gonna Make Me Lonesome When You Go', and elsewhere quotes Rimbaud's dictum 'I is another'.

In his 1986 biography No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, ROBERT SHELTON quotes DAVE VAN RONK on the subject of asking Dylan whether he was aware of the French symbolist poets:

> 'I did come on to Bob about Francois Villon. I also told him about Rimbaud and Apollinaire. I once asked Bobby: "Have you ever heard about Rimbaud?" He said: "Who?" I repeated: "Rimbaud—R-I-M-B-A-U-D. He's a French poet. You really ought to read him," I said. . . . Much later, I was up at his place. . . . On his shelf I discovered a book of translations of French symbolist poets that had obviously been thumbed through over a period of years! . . . I didn't mention Rimbaud to him again until I heard his "A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall". . . . I said to Bob: "You know, that song of yours is heavy in symbolism, don't you?" He said: "Huh?"'

[Robert Shelton: No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, Penguin edn., pp.99–100.]

Fried, Hans [1944 -] Hans Rolf Fried was born in London on May 31, 1944, the eldest son of the poet Erich Fried (translator into German of the work of Dylan Thomas and Sylvia Plath). A London-based long-time folk, blues and jazz expert, now working for the UK office of the Mechanical Copyright Protection Society—Performing Rights Society Alliance, he has two specific Dylan connections: see Graves, Robert and Madhouse on Castle Street, The.

Friedman, Kinky [1944 -] Richard F. Friedman was born in Chicago on Hallowe'en 1944 but moved to Texas as a child, where he developed an interest in chess and then music. He graduated from the University of Texas in Austin in 1966 and joined the Peace Corps, which sent him to Borneo. Unsurprisingly, he found this very different from Texas and became an admirer of its culture.

Back in the US, he formed the cod western swing band for which he became famous, Kinky Friedman & the Texas Jewboys, in the early 1970s and has always hovered between wanting to play good music and wanting to challenge anti-semitism and 'good taste' in equal measure in his ponderous, sub-'Springtime for Hitler' way. His first album was Sold American (1973), on which the musicians included Billy Swan, Tompall Glaser and DAVID MANSFIELD, followed by Kinky Friedman (1974), on which Waylon Jennings and WILLIE NELSON join him on 'They Ain't Makin' Jews Like Jesus Anymore'.

Friedman performed his signature song, 'Ride 'em Jewboy', at the one-off Rolling Thunder Revue concert on January 25, 1976 in Houston, which was a fundraiser for RUBIN HURRICANE CARTER; subsequently he was a guest performer on the second Rolling Thunder Revue proper, which kicked off that April 18, ran through till May 25 and incorporated the concert that yielded the 'Hard Rain' TV special from Fort Collins, Colorado, on May 23. When Friedman released his third album that November, Lasso from El Paso, the track 'Sold American', a live version recorded at Fort Collins, is credited as 'Recorded live with Bob Dylan and the Rolling Thunder Revue'. This was characteristic self-promotion; Dylan does not appear on this recording and wasn't on stage at the time. On the Revue shows, Friedman had also performed 'Rock and Roll Across the USA', 'Dear Abbie' and 'I'm Proud to Be an Asshole from El Paso'—which many were disappointed to find does not appear on the Lasso from El Paso album (because it was a pastiche of 'Okie from Muscogee' and Buck Owens withheld his consent). The album does, however, contain a version of Dylan's Desire outtakes song 'Catfish', which had not been released by Dylan at the time (it's on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, 1991); it also features an astonishing parade of musicians, among them Dr. John, RONNIE HAWKINS, ROGER McGUINN (on banjo), RINGO STARR (on vocals), RON WOOD, RICK DANKO, MICK RONSON, ROB STONER, STEVEN SOLES, GARY BURKE, T-BONE BURNETT, ERIC CLAPTON (on dobro), LEVON HELM (on guitar), RICHARD MANUEL (on drums) and HOWIE WYETH.

Since those days Friedman has continued to make music but has also become a prolific writer of humourous detective fiction, starring himself—and regularly also starring LARRY SLOMAN, whose own book about the Rolling Thunder Revue, On the Road with Bob Dylan: Rolling with the Thunder, foregrounds Friedman. This genial mutual back-scratching went further in 2002, when a new edition of Sloman's book was augmented by a new preface by Kinky Friedman. There are at least 20 of Friedman's private-eye novels, starting with Greenwich Killing Time in 1986.

Fifteen years after the 1976 Rolling Thunder Revue, Dylan and Friedman connected again—and if it was a brief reunion, at least they were on stage together—as Dylan played guitar behind Friedman as he reprised 'Sold American' on the September 15, 1991 CHABAD TELETHON shown live from Hollywood.

Today Friedman lives at the family summer camp, Echo Hill Ranch, in deepest Texas, where he also founded his most worthwhile project, the Utopia Animal Rescue Ranch. In 2005 he launched a supposed campaign to become state governor and is running a repeat campaign in 2006, on a predictably jocular programme. In middle age, he has finally acquired the extra weight to look plausible in those photos in which he poses, inevitably, with John B. Stetson hat, large cigar and scarily expansive grin. He remains one of those confident, happy souls who always finds himself more amusing than anyone else does.

[Kinky Friedman: Sold American, Vanguard VSD79333, US, 1973; Kinky Friedman, ABC ABCD-829, US, 1974; Lasso from El Paso, Epic EPC 34304, US (Epic SEPC 81640, UK), 1976. Greenwich Killing Time, New York: Beech Tree Books, 1986. Larry Sloman: On the Road with Bob Dylan: Rolling with the Thunder, New York: Bantam, 1978, republished (with new introduction by Friedman), New York: Three Rivers Press & London: Helter Skelter Publishing, 2002.]

Frizzell, Lefty [1928 - 1975] William Orville Frizzell, born March 31, 1928 in Corsicana, TX, became a highly influential honky-tonk singer of the 1950s, an idiosyncratic vocalist whose mark can be detected on the work of MERLE HAGGARD and people like Randy Travis, and who must count among those who had a subliminal influence on Dylan. He came out of the dance-halls of Texas, and 'If You've Got the Money I've Got the Time' made him a star in 1950. (This song was in ROY ORBISON's early repertoire, across the other side of Texas from BUDDY HOLLY's Lubbock homebase).

He had about 30 subsequent smaller hits, and within weeks of Holly cutting the great 'Mailman, Bring Me No More Blues' in 1957, Frizzell covered it (though his cover remained unissued until 1992).

He was one of the first to record a song much associated with THE BAND and performed by Dylan, 'Long Black Veil'. Frizzell reached no.6 in the US country charts with it in 1959. Dylan débuted it in concert in Wheeling, West Virginia, on April 28, 1997. He also performed Frizzell's song 'You're Too Late' in concert on January 29, 1999, at Daytona Beach, Florida.

Lefty Frizzell more or less drank himself to death at 47, suffering a fatal alcohol-triggered stroke on July 19, 1975, in Nashville.

[Lefty Frizzell: 'If You've Got the Money I've Got the Time', Dallas, TX, 25 Jul 1950; 1950; 'Mailman, Bring Me No More Blues', Nashville, 10 May 1957; 'Long Black Veil', Nashville, 3 Mar 1959; all issued on the 12-CD box set Lefty Frizzell: Life's Like Poetry, Bear Family BCD 15550, Vollersode, Germany, 1992.]

'Froggie Went a-Courtin'' [1992] Bob Dylan's recording of 'Froggie Went a-Courtin" is one of the stand-out tracks on his solo acoustic album of 1992 (his first since 1964), Good as I Been to You. Sung and played with real charm by Dylan, he keeps deftly away from both hammed-up comedy and song-archivist solemnity, enabling him to offer a version that is good-humoured and alert to the riches and full humanity of the song.

This is at base an ancient nursery rhyme/ballad, which also has a niche in the history of folksong recordings. The sleevenotes to HARRY SMITH's anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC begin by remarking that the most famous recording of the early 1900s was Uncle Josh's unaccompanied 'Frog Went a-Courtin''. But one collector, Theodore Raph, believes that the song itself can be traced back to Wedderburn's book of 1549, The Complaynt of Scotland, in which it appears as 'The Frog Cam to the Myl Dur', a song he suggests was chiefly sung by shepherds. Bruno Bettelheim, giving the publication date of The Complaynt of Scotland as the slightly earlier 1540, says that it includes mention of a pre-Grimms version of their fairy tale 'The Frog King', called 'The Well of the World's End'. Since 'the well' is also the frog's location at the beginning of the earliest known versions of the 'Frog Went a Courtin'' song, this may suggest some conjunction between that 13th century version of this 'animal groom' story and the 'Frog Went a Courtin'' song-group. But nursery rhyme experts Peter & Iona Opie and Harry Smith both note that the earliest listing is the title 'A moste Strange weddinge of the ffrogge and the mowse', listed by Her Majesty's Stationery Office in England on November 21, 1580, and it seems generally agreed that the earliest extant version of the song is in Ravenscroft's Melismata of 1611.

This version is called 'The Marriage of the Frogge and the Movse' and is a 13-verse text with tune, beginning: 'It was the Frogge in the well . . . / And the merrie Movse in the Mill' and including 'The Frogge would a woing ride . . . / Sword and buckler by his side.' In this version the frog and mouse are married by the rat, and the wedding supper ('three beanes in a pound of butter') is interrupted by the cat catching the mouse, a drake catching the frog and the rat escaping up the wall.

The song grew widespread as a nursery rhyme in the 18th century, and by the time we get to Kirkpatrick's Ballad Book (1824) it begins 'There lived a puddy in a well', it has become 'Sword and pistol by his side' and they have to get Uncle Rotten's consent. (A variant that connects with other things, 'Squire Frog's Visit', has the chorus 'Heighho! says Brittle / With a namby pamby / Mannikin pannikin / Heigh! says Anthony Brittle.' The line pairing the sword and the pistol occurs in other folksongs and game-chants. The poet and Blake scholar Kathleen Raine writes of her father that during his childhood in the north of England he had been 'initiated, unawares, into a tradition older than Christianity, surviving in the "guiser's play", handed down by the older to the younger boys in secrecy and by word of mouth. . . . "Here comes in King George, / King George is my name, / With sword and pistol by my side / I hope to win the game."' A 'guiser' is a mummer, usually one performed at Christmas or Hallowe'en. The same 'guiser's play' verses also include the line 'Round the world and back again', which Dylan implants into 'Handy Dandy' on his nursery-rhyme-studded album Under the Red Sky.)

The Opies suggest that the nursery rhyme is best known in the comparatively recent version called 'A Frog He Would a-Wooing Go', 'popularised first by Grimaldi and then by the comedian John Liston in the early nineteenth century'; it was first published with a tune in about 1809 under the title 'The Love-Sick Frog'. Its repeated chorus line 'Heighho! says Anthony Rowley' is not found before the 19th century. Earlier versions tend to have 'Humble-dum, humble-dum, tweedle tweedle wino', which, representing the humming of the wheel and the twiddling and winding of the thread, suggests that it may have started as a spinning song. 'Yes kind sir I sit and spin.'

As a song, always popular in America in both white and black folksong, it holds several Dylan connections. His version, substantially that in Cecil Sharp's Nursery Songs from the Appalachian Mountains (1921), is also included in the 1927 American Songbag collection by CARL SANDBURG, whom Dylan went to visit in 1964. 'Froggie Went a-Courtin" is also included in John A. Lomax and ALAN LOMAX's American Ballads & Folk Songs (1934) and in many others. (In 1926 the Texas Folklore Society alone knew of 40 versions, and the American Folklore Bibliography of 1939 listed 22 US variants.) One variant version is yet another song Dylan found on the 1952 Harry Smith anthology: the 1928 recording 'King Kong Kitchie Kitchie Ki-Me-O' by Chubby Parker & His Old Time Banjo ('vocal solo with 5-string banjo and whistling'). Parker was, in the blues and old country expert Tony Russell's phrase, 'up at the minstrel end of hillbilly' but his performance on this track has a pleasantly clean-cut, straightforward quality: a light touch and no ingratiation. It is not the version sung by Dylan, though it begins with the near-identical first line 'Frog went a-courtin' and he did ride', and does include 'With a sword and a pistol by his side', 'He rode till he came to Miss Mousie's door', 'He took Miss Mousie on his knee / And he said Miss Mousie will you marry me?'. However, it ends with the frog killing all comers (with his sword and his pistol) before honeymooning with his mousy wife.

The most authoritative study of the song in its American form is in Ozark Folk Songs Volume 1: British Ballads and Songs, by Vance Randolph, reissued 1982. Randolph was probably the last great southern folksong collector, and published huge amounts on the song and folklore of the Ozarks—and the very young Bob Dylan was acquainted with some of his work. In Minneapolis in 1959, reports biographer ROBERT SHELTON, Bob's friend SPIDER JOHN KOERNER had a room-mate called Harry Weber, 'a ballad scholar', who says: 'I did loan Bob a set of Randolph's Folk Songs of Arkansas [sic]. I wonder if he still has them.' As with 'Black Jack Davey', Dylan's friend TONY GLOVER is one of the people who has recorded 'Froggie Went a-Courtin" in more recent decades. So has DOC WATSON (collected on The Essential Doc Watson, 1974), Wally Whyton (50 Children's Songs), and ex-Steeleye Span member Tim Hart (The Drunken Sailor and Other Kids' Songs, 1983).

While Cecil Sharp printed the first American version of 'Froggie' taken from oral tradition, the first version into print taken from black oral tradition was in Thomas W. Talley's classic collection of Negro Folk Rhymes, published in 1922. On disc, 'Frog Went a Courting' was field-recorded for the Library of Congress in Frederica, Georgia in June 1935, performed by Drusilla Davis and an accompanying 'group of little girls'.

Of course, 'Froggie' might be said to be a deeply conservative song: nature is destiny and nature will out. The socialist experiment collapses because cats will be cats and ducks will be ducks. Yet its theme runs far deeper, and less judgmentally, than that. The basic story-line, summarised in typical style by Harry Smith as 'ZOOLOGIC MISCEGENY ACHIEVED IN MOUSE FROG NUPTUALS, RELATIVES APPROVE', seems to be one European version of an archetypal human myth-wish. Colombian Indians have a ritual/ceremony 'wedding' of a condor to a bull: they strap an enormous condor on the back of a bull and set them running. In the nursery rhyme 'Hoddley, poddley, puddle and fogs / Cats are to marry the poodle dogs / Cats in blue jackets, and dogs in red hats / What will become of the mice and rats?' and in the fairy tale 'Thumbelina' the toad wants the heroine to marry her son, and the field-mouse tries to make her marry the mole (though in the case of the pseudo-human Thumbelina, the archetype of 'zoologic miscegeny' shifts over into another, the 'animal groom' archetype—in which the human protagonist's sexual partner is first experienced as an animal). Bruno Bettelheim writes that this motif 'is so popular worldwide that probably no other fairy-tale theme has so many variations.' His analysis is that these are tales 'which—without any reference to repression which causes a negative attitude to sex—simply teach that for love, a radical change in previously held attitudes about sex is absolutely necessary. What must happen is expressed, as always in fairy tales, through a most impressive image: a beast is turned into a magnificent person. . . . Some fairy stories emphasise the long and difficult development which alone permits gaining control over what seems animalistic in us, while conversely other tales center on the shock of recognition when that which seemed animal suddenly reveals itself as the source of human happiness. . . . "The Frog King" belongs to the latter category.'

A little of this might be felt to reverberate through 'Froggie Went a-Courtin" (which may, as noted, share a common ancestry with that fairy-tale), in which we readily identify with the story, especially in the early parleying between prospective groom and bride and authoritative relative, so that on one level it doesn't matter whether they are given as animals or people, while on another we never quite forget the 'ugly' animal potency of the frog: so deeply has the image of the frog and the princess spoken to our psyches that it remains common currency between us all as subject matter for jokes—especially around the politics of gender—which surely confirms the gist of Bettelheim's analysis.

A different arc of psychological truth cuts through the song too. Behind the twinkling guitar that propels Dylan's version along like a rolling hoop, and via a melody line which parallels BLIND WILLIE McTELL's 'Hillbilly Willie's Blues' and at its centre also parallels ELVIS' 'Paralysed' (the deft lines of added detail like 'sword and pistol by his side' use the same tune as those like 'couldn't say a word for thinkin' of you' in 'Paralysed') we identify with the world in which the story's events unfold. We recognise the truth of the shadow falling over the initially ideal, the chain of events darkening as the wedding feast collapses from exquisite and generous communal celebration, on a tiny and delicate scale, first into the black comedy of the grotesque, monstrously overlarge and clumsy intrusion of Mrs. Cow (mere mention of whom suggests the accidental squashing of some of the smaller guests). This is followed by the intrusion of evil, in the symbolically loaded figure of the black snake, and finally the effectively wanton destruction of the main protagonists. This is a timeless human story. (It even has a certain biological accuracy, as with the wedding food 'fried mosquito'. Frogs' legs used to be an export from the port of Cochin, India, until conservationists succeeded in banning them. As an importer-exporter told travel writer Alexander Frater, this has been a blessing because 'you need a thriving frog population to keep the mosquitoes down.')

One way and another, therefore, 'Froggie Went a-Courtin'' is an extraordinary song, and one that proves—insists on—the indivisibility between adult and children's song. In this way, given the emphasis it enjoys by being the last song on Good as I Been to You, it is a fine postscript to the Dylan's previous album, Under the Red Sky. And like that collection, which bows out with 'Goodnight my love and may the Lord have mercy on us all', this one has a great sign-off, provided by 'Froggie Went a-Courtin''s' self-reflexive text of a last line: 'If you want any more you can sing it yourself.'

[Theodore Raph: The Songs We Sang: A Treasury of American Popular Music, New Jersey: A.S. Barnes, 1965. Bruno Bettelheim: The Uses of Enchantment, London: Thames & Hudson, 1976, footnote 111; later quotes also from The Uses of Enchantment.

'The Well of the World's End' is republished in Katherine M. Briggs, A Dictionary of British Folk Tales (4 vols), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1970. Peter & Iona Opie, The Oxford Dictionary of Nursery Rhymes, Oxford: OUP (rev'd edn.), 1951. Kathleen Raine, 'Farewell Happy Fields', 1973, collected in Autobiographies, London: Skoob Books, 1991. Carl Sandburg, An American Songbag, New York: Harcourt Brace, 1927. Tony Russell, conversation with this writer, 17 Sep 1996. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, New York: Beech Tree Books / William Morrow, 1986.

Tony Glover: 'Froggie Went a-Courtin'', nia. Doc Watson, nia, collected on The Essential Doc Watson, Vanguard VMLP5038, NY, 1974, now CD-reissued. Wally Whyton, nia, 50 Children's Songs, nia. Tim Hart, nia, The Drunken Sailor and Other Kids' Songs, Music for Pleasure nia, London, 1983. Blind Willie McTell: 'Hillbilly Willie's Blues', Chicago, 25 Apr 1935, on Various Artists: The East Coast States Vol. 2, Roots RL-326, Vienna, 1969–70. Elvis Presley: 'Paralysed', Hollywood, 2 Sep 1956 (composed by Otis Blackwell, later co-producer of the title track of Dylan's 1981 album Shot of Love); first issued Elvis Volume One (RCA Gold EP) RCA EPA-992, NY, 1956; re-released on CD box set The King of Rock'n'Roll—The Complete 50s Masters, BMG / RCA PD90689(5), 1992.

Alexander Frater, Chasing the Monsoon, London: Penguin, 1991.]

frying an egg on stage, the prospect of In Japan in 1986 Dylan reportedly said this: 'Somebody comes to see you for two hours or one and a half hours, whatever it is . . . I mean, they've come to see you. You could be doing anything up on that stage. You could be frying an egg or hammering a nail into a piece of wood.'

Instead of blitzing truculently through his 700th 'Tangled Up in Blue' or his 1,500th 'All Along the Watchtower', how infinitely more magical it would be if he did come on stage and proceed to fry an egg. All that Chaplinesque panache! The comic possibilities! The freshness of such a performance! It would be so much more revealing, so much greater an artistic nakedness, a revisit to Highway Surrealism at once dramatic and intimate.

Fuller, Blind Boy [1907 - 1941] Fulton Allen was probably born on July 10, 1907, and certainly at Wadesboro, North Carolina. He was not blind at birth but his eyesight began to fail by the age of 20 when, already married to a 14-year-old bride, he moved to the important tobacco-trade town of Winston-Salem. He was a coal-yard labourer until forced to give up this job, after which he resorted to musicianship. By 1928 he had gone wholly blind and had begun to apply himself seriously to the guitar, which he had not begun to play till around 1925. (He played a big, steel-bodied National guitar.) He and his wife moved to Durham in 1929, playing to workers coming off shift in all the tobacco towns up and down Highway 70 and around Winston-Salem; he remained in penury, though in the end he became the south-east's best-selling and most prolific recording artist of the 1930s, characterised not by originality of material but by an ear for a catchy song, a deft finger-picking style and straightforward vocals.

He recorded only between 1935 and 1940, beginning with a New York City solo session on July 23, 1935 that included an attractive re-write of 'Sittin' on Top of the World', named 'I'm Climbin' on Top of the Hill'; two days later he was accompanied by Blind GARY DAVIS and Bull City Red and their three-song session included a title THE BAND would later borrow, 'Rag, Mama, Rag'. Next day came a further solo session before he returned to North Carolina. In 1936 he went back to New York for a longer two-day solo session (which included a version of 'Mama Let Me Lay It on You'), and in 1937 he made the journey no less than four times for further multi-day sessions, the last of these in freezing mid-December. He returned once again in April 1938 but that October was able to record more conveniently in Columbia, South Carolina, with SONNY TERRY and Bull City Red; in July 1939 they reconvened in Memphis but were back in New York on March 5, 6 and 7 for sessions that began with a take of what has become one of Fuller's signature songs, 'Step It Up and Go' (with Bull City Red on washboard but Sonny Terry not playing).

His final, long session, again with these two accompanists, augmented by BROWNIE McGHEE on at least one track ('Precious Lord', one of several issued as by Brother George & His Sanctified Singers, a name often used for religious sides by McGhee & Red) took place in New York on June 19, 1940. Twelve numbers were recorded. A month later he was in hospital and on February 13, 1941 he died in considerable pain, back in Durham, from restriction of the urethra and a bladder infection. He was 33 years old.

Such was his influence and popularity that Brownie McGhee not only recorded as 'Blind Boy Fuller No. 2' but made a record titled 'Death of Blind Boy Fuller'. In the 1960s-70s Fuller became a subject of great interest to those blues researchers who liked the Piedmont school (and liked to debate whether there was such a thing), as opposed to those more insistent voices who dismissed Fuller, BLIND WILLIE McTELL and others from the southeast as 'lightweight' and would only countenance the heavier, fiercer blues of the Mississippi Delta. It was the detailed research by one of the Piedmont-style enthusiasts, Briton Bruce Bastin, that overturned the myth that Fuller had been blinded by a girlfriend (as still relayed in Paul Oliver's classic work The Story of the Blues as late as 1969). Fuller and McTell—that other great performer who followed the tobacco season trail in the south-eastern states—listened to each other's work. Fuller's 'Log Cabin Blues' of 1935 is virtually a cover of McTell's 1929 'Come on Around to My House Mama'.

'Midnight Special', the LEADBELLY song recorded by HARRY BELAFONTE with Bob Dylan as harmonica accompanist in the early 1960s, had been, in between times, a key item in Blind Boy Fuller's repertoire. In 1937 Fuller recorded 'Weeping Willow' (one of those songs that includes the lovely common-stock couplet 'I lay down last night, tried to take my rest / My mind got to ramblin' like the wild geese in the west'), which Dylan performed at the Supper Club in New York in 1993. Fuller's 'Stealing Bo-Hog' is one of the cluster of songs that pre-figures Dylan's opening line of 'It Ain't Me Babe' (and LITTLE RICHARD's 'Keep a-Knockin'') with its 'Say you get away from my window, don't knock at my door'; his 'Pistol Snapper Blues', from 1938, is one of those to invoke that character the monkey man, which Dylan pairs with 'Tweeter' in the title of a TRAVELING WILBURYS song; and Fuller's 'Piccolo Rag' (from the same 1938 session) is one of the many blues using 'great big legs' as a term of approbation—in Fuller's case 'Got great big legs and a little bitty feet'—which gets reprocessed by Dylan into the 'great big hind legs' on his 'New Pony', on 1978's Street Legal.

In 1992 Dylan recorded and released his own version of Fuller's 'Step It Up and Go' on the Good as I Been to You album. It was a song that had rapidly become as much a hillbilly property as a blues dance number: it was performed by nearly every bluesman south of Chicago in the 1940s and 50s and became a standard repertoire item—one of those test numbers, like 'Foggy Mountain Breakdown'—that every self-respecting hillbilly blues guitarist had to be able to play. To look at the history of this comparatively recent song is to encounter yet again the extraordinary commonality of American grass-roots music, to see how shared a musical heritage there so often was between, as Tony Russell's book has it, Blacks Whites and Blues.

At the beginning of the 1960s, THE EVERLY BROTHERS recorded 'Step It Up and Go', and to look at their slim interweaving within the story is to see a representative illustration of how this music passes to and fro. Their 'Step It Up and Go' isn't on the album Songs Our Daddy Taught Us, but Ike Everly would have been their source. Ike had been taught guitar by Arnold Schultz, a black musician who also taught the Monroe Brothers; in turn Ike taught the 14-year-old Merle Travis thumb-pick style—a style Travis developed and showcased on 'Step It Up and Go'.

The song was also in the repertoire of populist cowboy outfit the Maddox Brothers & Rose, the pre-rockabilly artist Harmonica Frank Floyd (a figure championed by GREIL MARCUS in Mystery Train) and JOHN HAMMOND JR., who includes it on his album Frogs for Snakes. It's of a type that crops up over and over again. The building blocks of the lyric are common-stock, in some cases shared with those in that other frisky classic of inconsequence, Tampa Red's 'It's Tight Like That', which, as remembered by Eugene Powell, for instance (a 1930s Bluebird recording artist and veteran blues musician interviewed in ALAN LOMAX's The Land Where the Blues Began), includes 'Had a little dog, his name was Ball | Gave him a little taste and he want it all', which Dylan puts in as the fourth stanza of 'Step It Up and Go': 'Got a little girl, her name is Ball | Give a little bit, she took it all'.

At the same time we find the melody of 'Step It Up and Go' used everywhere from the Kansas City jazz-tinged boogie pianist-singer Julia Lee's 1946 'Gimme Watcha Got' to ELVIS PRESLEY's 1958 New Orleans pastiche 'Hard Headed Woman'. Another Blind Boy Fuller song, 'You've Got Something There', and Blind Willie McTell's 'Warm It Up to Me' are more or less the same, as is the MEMPHIS JUG BAND's 'Bottle It Up and Go' (cut in 1932 and 1934) and Tommy McClennan's 1939 'Bottle It Up and Go', later recorded by JOHN LEE HOOKER as 'Bundle Up and Go', 'Shake It Up and Go' and 'Bottle Up and Go'. Under that last title it was also recorded in the late 1950s by Snooks Eaglin (at that time a street musician). Then there's 'Got the Bottle Up and Gone', a début-session track by Sonny Boy Williamson I from 1937, and 'Touch It Up and Go', a track by Fuller associate SONNY TERRY & Jordan Webb, cut in New York a year after Fuller's death.

'Step It Up and Go' must owe its predominance to having the most accessible and familiar title. Like so many figures of speech, indeed like so much of the poetry of the blues, 'step it up and go' crossed over to the world of dancing from the world of work. It was what people said to their mules and horses. They still do, though it's now more common as an exhortation to the tourist trade horses drawing carriages in New Orleans than in the fields, where tractors now do the ploughing.

Bob Dylan's version is unambitious, as befits someone who understands the tradition in which the song sits. Conscious that a bravura performance is for the young and brash, and that there's a hundred voices capable of matching up to what is a simple dance number, Dylan settles quite rightly for something egolessly unexceptional. This is intelligent good-time, on which his robust and clumsy guitar-work is countered by an alert, true-to-the-genre vocal. As John Wesley Harding (aka WES STACE) notes, 'He screws up the riff at the end . . . so he goes through the whole sequence again, just for the hell of it.' It's true.

[Blind Boy Fuller: 'Weeping Willow', NY, 14 Jul 1937, Blind Boy Fuller on Down—Vol. 1, Saydisc SDR143, Badminton, UK, c.1967; 'Stealing Bo-Hog', NY, 7 Sep 1937, & 'Pistol Snapper Blues', NY, 5 Apr 1938, Blind Boy Fuller with Sonny Terry and Bull City Red, Blues Classics BC-11, Berkeley, CA, 1966; 'You've Got Something There', Memphis, 12 Jul 1939, CD-reissued Blind Boy Fuller: East Coast Piedmont Style, Columbia Roots n' Blues 467923, NY, 1991 (insert notes by Bruce Bastin), a representative sample of Fuller's work, incl. 'Log Cabin Blues', NY, 26 Jul 1935 (a previously unreleased take) but excluding 'Step It Up and Go'.

Bob Dylan: 'Weeping Willow', NY, 17 Nov 1993, unreleased. Everly Brothers: 'Step It Up and Go', Nashville, autumn 1961, Instant Party, Warner Brothers W (WS) 1430, US, 1962; Songs Our Daddy Taught Us, Nashville, Aug 1958, Cadence CLP 3016, NY, 1958 (reissued as Folksongs by the Everly Brothers, Cadence CLP 3059 / CLP 23059, NY, 1962; CD-reissued on Ace CDCHM 75, UK, 1990). Merle Travis: 'Step It Up and Go', nia, Walking the Strings, Capitol nia. (Travis used the refrain of another Fuller song, 1935's 'Ain't It a Cryin' Shame?', in his 1946 radio broadcasts.) Maddox Brothers & Rose: 'Step It Up and Go', nia, Maddox Brothers and Rose 1946–1951 Vol. 2 (along with 'Dark as the Dungeon', nia), Arhoolie 5017, El Cerrito CA, 1976. Harmonica Frank: 'Step It Up and Go', The Great Original Recordings of Harmonica Frank Lloyd 1951–1958, Puritan 3003, Evanston, IL, 1973. John Hammond Jr: Frogs For Snakes, nia, Rounder nia, Somerville, MA, nia. Julia Lee & Her Boyfriends: 'Gimme Watcha Got', LA, Sep 1946, reissued Tonight's the Night, Charly CRB 1039, UK, 1982. Elvis Presley: 'Hard Headed Woman' (composed Claude Demetrius, whose 'Mean Woman Blues' also uses the same tune), Hollywood, 15 Jan 1958, King Creole, RCA LPM 1884, NY, 1958. Blind Willie McTell: 'Warm It Up to Me', NY, 14 Sep 1933.

Blind Willie McTell: 'Come on Around to My House Mama', Atlanta, 30 Oct 1929, King of the Georgia Blues Singers: Blind Willie McTell, Roots RL-324, Vienna, 1968.) The Memphis Jug Band (billed the first time around as Picaninny Jug Band, and then as by Charlie Burse with Memphis Jug Band): 'Bottle It Up and Go', Richmond, IN, 3 Aug 1932 & Chicago, 7 Nov 1934, both CD-reissued Memphis Jug Band Complete Recorded Works 1932–1934, RST Blues Documents BDCD-6002, Vienna, nia. Tommy McClennan: 'Bottle It Up and Go', Chicago, 22 Nov 1939, CD-reissued Travelin' Highway Man, Travelin' Man TM CD-06, nia. John Lee Hooker: 'Bundle Up and Go', Chicago, 10 Jun 1958, unissued, & Detroit, Apr 1959, The Country Blues of John Lee Hooker, Riverside LP 838, c.1960; 'Shake It Up and Go', Culver City, CA, c.1959, John Lee Hooker's Detroit, United Artists 3LP 127, US, 1973; 'Bottle Up and Go', Chicago, 1963, On Campus, VJ LP 1066, 1963, & NY, 23 Nov 1965, It Serves You Right to Suffer, Impulse LP 9103, nia. Snooks Eaglin: 'Bottle Up and Go', New Orleans, 1959, Country Boy in New Orleans, Arhoolie LP 2014, El Cerrito, CA, nia, CD-reissued Arhoolie CD348, El Cerrito, c.1990. Sonny Boy Williamson I: 'Got the Bottle Up and Gone', Aurora, IL, 5 May 1937, Sonny Boy Williamson, RCA 75.722 (Treasury of Jazz EP no.22), Paris, 1963, CD-reissued Sonny Boy Williamson Complete Recorded Works, Volume 1 (1937–1938), Document DOCD-5055, Vienna, nd.. Sonny Terry & Jordan Webb: 'Touch It Up and Go', NY, 23 Oct 1941.

Alan Lomax, The Land Where The Blues Began, London; Methuen edn., p. 374. John Wesley Harding: 'Good as He's Been to Us', Stereofile, US, Feb 1993.]

Fuller, Jesse [1896 - 1976] Jesse 'Lone Cat' Fuller, best-known as a one-man band, inventor of that agreeably shambolic instrument the fotdella, and composer of 'San Francisco Bay Blues', was born at Jonesboro, Georgia, on March 12, 1896. He was another one-off performer whom Dylan had met, cross-examined and seen perform before he even reached the Village (Fuller was temporarily on the Denver folk scene when Dylan dropped into it in 1959) and it was from him that Dylan took the first track on his first album, 'You're No Good' on Bob Dylan.

Fuller endured a cruel childhood to become an eccentric, token-exotica figure in Hollywood who had a shoe-shine stand close to one of the film lots, got taken up by the stars and landed small uncredited rôles in Douglas Fairbanks' 1924 film The Thief of Bagdad and the 1925 Pola Negri vehicle East of Suez, both silent films directed by the extraordinary Raoul Walsh (who lost an eye to a jackrabbit and directed films for over 50 years).

Fuller had arrived in California at the start of the 1920s but moved back to Georgia in the mid-1930s and was an industrial worker for decades. He first tried to earn a living from music in 1950, playing 12-string guitar, harmonica and kazoo, and making himself a one-man band by adding a hi-hat cymbal played with one foot while operating the fotdella (an upright bass with pedals) with the other. His repertoire covered everything from rags to hymns and from 19th century popular songs to the blues.

He moved back west and first recorded in about 1954, making a crucial slow-burner of an album, a 10-inch LP that was the first (possibly the only) release on the tiny Californian label World Song, issued in 1955. From it, RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT took, and was first to popularise in folk revival circles, 'San Francisco Bay Blues' itself: an immensely celebratory song that gave the city rather more than the city ever gave its composer.

Two 1958 Fuller LPs won critical plaudits—Jazz, Folksongs, Spirituals & Blues includes what critic Ken Smith called 'one of the best versions of "Stagolee" you'll ever hear'—and he performed successfully on TV and in Europe in 1960; yet he was back in California picking cauliflowers for a living in 1961 while Bob Dylan was first being recorded performing 'San Francisco Bay Blues' in New Jersey (in February or March 1961), Minneapolis (May) and at Gerde's Folk City in New York (sharing vocals with JIM KWESKIN on stage there that September). Dylan also included the song in his first concert, at Carnegie Chapter Hall that November 4, shortly before going into the studios and recording 'You're No Good'. This was not only the first track on the LP: it was also the first song recorded at the first day's session. Three days later, at the New York home of friends, he was recorded performing both these songs, and adjacently, in a 14-song set that begins with 'Hard Times in New York Town' and ends with 'This Land Is Your Land'.

Fuller's own first East Coast appearances were in 1962—by which time Dylan had issued 'You're No Good' on that début album and Fuller had made four and a half LPs of his own, though his very wide range of repertoire had him frowned on in some quarters during the strict revival period. The notes to Bob Dylan say that 'You're No Good' was 'learned from Jesse Fuller', and indeed it must have been learned in person, back in Denver, since Fuller didn't record the song himself until 1963. Dylan says in the Biograph notes in 1985 that his own song 'Baby I'm in the Mood for You' (recorded at the Freewheelin' session of July 9, 1962 but unreleased until on Biograph) was 'probably influenced by Jesse Fuller' too.

In 1988, after a quarter of a century's gap, Dylan played 'San Francisco Bay Blues' again, first at Berkeley, on what was the third concert of the Never-Ending Tour, then at Canandaigua, New York, two weeks later and then again at the Bridge School Benefit Concert, which took place in Fuller's adopted hometown of Oakland California, when Dylan opened his set with the song. In 1989, on stage at a GRATEFUL DEAD show in Los Angeles, Dylan played guitar on a performance of Jesse Fuller's 'The Monkey and the Engineer'.

All those years earlier, in his pre-Village days, Dylan may also have gained something very specific from the charmingly eccentric Fuller: something that has been a key part of his own equipment and image ever since. According to ROBERT SHELTON it was from Jesse Fuller that Dylan learnt how to use the harmonica holder around his neck. If true, this might be said to confirm usefully that Dylan didn't come across the crucial HARRY SMITH anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC until after his 1959 Denver visit: because in the sleevenotes to the Harry Smith compilation we find a clear, comical drawing to show how to use what we think of as a 'Dylan-style' harmonica holder.

Jesse Fuller remained a distinctive figure on the folk and blues festival circuit into the 1970s. He died, aged almost 80, on January 29, 1976 at home in Oakland.

[Jesse Fuller: 'San Francisco Bay Blues', El Cerrito, CA, c.1954, Working on the Railroad, World Song LP 1, 1955 (issued on Topic, UK, 1957); 'Stagolee', nia, Jazz, Folksongs, Spirituals & Blues, Good Time Jazz LP 12031, nia, CD-reissued on Original Blues Classics OBCCD 564, US, 1994; 'The Monkey & the Engineer', San Francisco, 12 Apr 1958, The Lone Cat, Good Time Jazz LP 12039, US, 1958, CD-reissued Original Blues Classics OBCCD 526, US, c.1992; 'You're No Good', San Francisco, 13 May 1963, San Francisco Bay Blues, Folk Lore LP 14006, 1963. The Thief of Bagdad, dir. Raoul Walsh, co-written by & starring Douglas Fairbanks; Douglas Fairbanks Pictures Corp, US, 1924. East of Suez, dir. Raoul Walsh, co-written Somerset Maugham; Famous Players / Lasky, US, 1925.

Bob Dylan: 'You're No Good', NY, 20 Nov 1961; 'San Francisco Bay Blues', Berkeley, CA, 10 Jun 1988, Canandaigua, NY, 24 Jun 1988 & Oakland, 4 Dec 1988; guitar on 'Monkey & the Engineer', Grateful Dead concert, LA, 12 Feb 1989.]

'gal shaped just like a frog' See Smith, Warren.

Gant, Sandy [19?? -] Sandy Gant was a pioneering early Dylan session-discography researcher whose work in this area began in the 1960s, long before there was any kind of Dylan fan network, any home computers or internet; nor were there any fax machines, nor cheap international phone calls. He was an early source of information for ROBERT SHELTON and many others, and photocopied pages of his listings of unreleased Dylan recordings passed between many hands in that first era of research. He lives in North America. He declined to provide any information for this book.

G

Garcia, Jerry [1942 - 1995] Jerome John Garcia was born in the city he later came to embody, San Francisco, on the first day of 1942. Although his reputation essentially rests on his having been a founder member, and the leader, of THE GRATEFUL DEAD, as of the groups that preceded it and morphed into it, he nevertheless pursued a very large number of other projects, even forming a parallel band in the 1970s, the Jerry Garcia Band, which itself had an active life and recorded prolifically. He was an extraordinary guitarist and a fine banjo player, and another performing project of his was the short-lived bluegrass band Old and in the Way, in which he played banjo, teamed with mandolinist DAVID GRISMAN, plus Peter Rowan and the great veteran fiddle player Vassar Clements (who died in August 2005). In 1975 they produced what was until recently the biggest selling bluegrass album in history, Old and in the Way. (Garcia and Grisman had first met in 1964 at a Bill Monroe concert in Pennsylvania.)

Jerry Garcia was also sufficiently interested in film to study it briefly in college in the early 1960s. In 1970 he worked on the soundtrack of Antonioni's Zabriskie Point, playing an improvised guitar piece known as 'Love Scene'. Later he co-directed The Grateful Dead Movie, which mixed animation with concert footage. He also played banjo in the 1978 re-make of Invasion of the Body Snatchers. In 1990 he and David Grisman got back together, formed an acoustic duo and (of course) recorded a number of albums.

Jerry Garcia died of a heart attack in a drug-rehabilitation clinic in California on August 9, 1995, aged 53. Dylan paid him just about the most fulsome tribute he's ever paid anyone (and he tends towards the fulsome on these occasions, perhaps surprisingly):

> 'There's no way to measure his greatness or magnitude as a person or as a player. I don't think any eulogizing will do him justice. He was that great, much more than a superb musician, with an uncanny ear and dexterity. He's the very spirit personified of whatever is Muddy River country at its core and screams up into the spheres. He really had no equal. To me he wasn't only a musician and friend, he was more like a big brother who taught and showed me more than he'll ever know. There's a lot of spaces and advances between THE CARTER FAMILY, BUDDY HOLLY and, say, Ornette Coleman, a lot of universes, but he filled them all without being a member of any school. His playing was moody, awesome, sophisticated, hypnotic and subtle. There's no way to convey the loss. It just digs down really deep.'

Dylan was among the many who attended the funeral service for Garcia at St. Stephen's Episcopal Church in Belvedere, California, on August 11, 1995.

[The 6-CD box set All Good Things: Jerry Garcia Studio Sessions, 2005, includes a 'Simple Twist of Fate', a 'Tangled Up in Blue' and a 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'; if bought direct from www.jerrygarcia.com a bonus 7th CD is included, which features a lengthy 'Visions of Johanna' (www.bobdylan.com says 16 minutes long, the Garcia site says 17).]

Garnier, Tony [1955/6 -] Tony Garnier was born in St. Paul, Minnesota, in 1955 or '56, the grandson of D'Jalma Thomas Garnier, the New Orleans bandleader, trumpet player, pianist and violinist rumoured to have taught Louis Armstrong at the New Orleans Boys Home for Colored Waifs.

Tony grew up mostly in California, attended university there but dropped out to join Asleep at the Wheel in 1971, which dithered between various places before basing itself firmly in Austin, Texas, in 1973. The band was successful on album and the road but Garnier quit in 1978, moved to New York City and tried to develop a career as a jazz musician. He was rescued from penury and depression by Robert Gordon, who phoned to ask him to join the Lounge Lizards, from which came work on movie soundtracks and TV jingle sessions. From here Garnier joined G.E. SMITH's band on the interminable TV show 'Saturday Night Live', which in turn led to Bob Dylan's Never-Ending Tour Band. By this time Tony had also played on albums by Roy Clark, Robert Gordon, Tom Waits, Marshall Crenshaw and others. Playing live for Dylan was something else again. He flew out to Europe to join the group at the beginning of June 1989, just a year after the tour had begun.

Garnier first arrived on stage with Dylan in Dublin that June 3, to replace original bass player KENNY AARONSON; but illness forced Aaronson to drop out again after June 8, so that Tony Garnier replaced him again on June 10 in the Hague and settled in as the band's regular bass player. By the time of that fall's run of concerts at the Beacon Theater in New York, he seemed confident of his position and amused by the whole experience he had found himself plunged into. Emerging onto the street outside the theatre one night just ahead of the evening's performance, he saw one Dylan aficionado holding her 14-month-old daughter in her arms. 'Ah look,' he said, smiling at her, 'they even bring him their babies to be blessed!'

Looking Cuban, placid, besuited and slightly pudgy, and standing on stage with his short legs planted well apart, as if braced for the unexceptional, Garnier was for most fans an unwelcome substitute for the model-thin, twitchy, punk contemporaneity of Aaronson, and his playing seemed unremarkable. Perhaps that has been the secret of his longevity with Dylan. Not only has he remained in the Never-Ending Tour Band ever since—that is to say, for over 16 years at the time of writing: far, far longer than anyone else except Bob—but he has long since become the longest-serving musician of Bob Dylan's entire career.

On stage, he's always the lieutenant, ready for anything, clocking everything with equanimity, passing on to other musicians his accurate interpretations of Dylan's often inscrutable nods and narrowings of the eyes, yet at the same time smiling at fans and giving every appearance of a contented man who still enjoys his work. By the end of 2005, quite apart from playing on the MTV Unplugged album, Time Out of Mind, "Love and Theft" and Masked & Anonymous, Tony Garnier had played at over 1,700 Bob Dylan concerts.

Geldof, Bob [1951 -] Robert Frederick Xenon Geldof was born on October 5, 1951 at Dún Laoghaire (pronounced Done Leery), in County Dublin, Ireland, the son of a cinema manageress who died before he 'was out of short trousers' and a hotel-manager father he only saw at weekends. He attended the same school as had the Irish Free State's first president Eamon De Valera—Blackrock College, Dublin—before going into 'freefall . . . in an endless round of useless jobs and self-abuse', spending 1972 in a London squat and then moving to Canada where he travelled and worked as a music journalist on a Vancouver weekly paper, the Georgia Straight.

On his return to Ireland he became the manager and then lead singer of the Nightlife Thugs, who began gigging in October 1975, changed their name to the Boomtown Rats, swiftly built a reputation in Ireland and in October 1976 moved to London. A successful first single, 'Lookin' After No. 1', released in 1977, was followed by 'Mary of the Fourth Form', 'She's So Modern' and 'Like Clockwork', all UK chart hits, and then by two no.1 UK singles, 1978's 'Rat Trap' and 1979's 'I Don't Like Mondays'. They had many further releases after this, but it says something about the group that 'I Don't Like Mondays' is now the only record of theirs anyone but an avid fan remembers. It is anthemic, catchy and very much of its time, or rather, slightly behind its time, being concurrent with the commercial height of British punk yet in sound and spirit closer to mid-1970s pub rock. In 1981 Geldof performed it solo at an Amnesty International benefit concert in London, which marked his first alignment with a cause of a charitable, campaigning and international character.

Geldof appeared in the 1982 Pink Floyd film The Wall, taking the lead rôle of Pink, which he managed creditably, but by 1984 his mind was on other things. He established the Band Aid Trust, co-ordinated the assemblage of UK pop stars who recorded the sanctimoniously vacuous fund-raising single 'Do They Know It's Christmas?' (surely subtitled 'Do they care?'), co-written with Midge Ure, and duly went on to organise the truly extraordinary two-continents mega-event that was LIVE AID—Geldof also sang on the chorus of the US equivalent to 'Do They Know It's Christmas?', the superstar-laden 'We Are the World'—and just as importantly, persuaded a large number of world leaders face-to-face, by sheer chutzpah and the force of his own impassioned eloquence, to significant action and to change in their aid policy rather than the usual lip-service. All this amounted to an unprecedented effort to alleviate first the 1984 famine in Ethiopia and then more generally hunger in Africa from 1985 onwards.

In the midst of this clamorous struggle against the system, Geldof was reduced to appalled rage to hear Bob Dylan, on the stage at Live Aid, ask whether some of the money being raised couldn't be diverted from the starving in Africa to give to American farmers. Afterwards, Geldof wrote that 'the biggest disappointment of the evening was Dylan. He sang three of his classics, including "Blowin' in the Wind", which ought to have been one of the greatest moments of the concert. Unfortunately, the performance was catastrophic. . . . Then he displayed a compete lack of understanding of the issues raised by Live Aid by saying, unforgivably, "It would be nice if some of this money went to the American farmers." . . . a crass, stupid and nationalistic thing to say. . . . Dylan left the stage and as he walked by his manager, he just looked up and said "Sorry".'

In 1986 Geldof was given a knighthood by the British, published his literate and energetic autobiography, Is That It?, which set a new standard of candour in rock literature, and married Paula Yates, beginning a new era in his life, largely of domestic pain and consequent tabloid celebrity, eventually leading Geldof to lend his aggressively articulate support not merely to campaigning for 'fathers' rights' in general but to Fathers for Justice, a particularly nasty activist movement he has called 'heroic'. It's not unreasonable to draw a parallel with Dylan's Live Aid wrongheadedness here; of course there are injustices when divorced fathers are unable to gain access to their children, but the more fundamental truth is that there remains an imbalance of power loaded in men's favour, and that it is women who carry an immensely greater burden of responsibility in caring for children and live on lower incomes as a result of those divorces.

By this point Geldof had produced, over a span of 18 years, four solo albums: Deep in the Heart of Nowhere, Vegetarians of Love, The Happy Club and, in 2001, Sex, Age & Death.

In 2005 Geldof was involved in the Live 8 campaign against globalisation, 20 years on from the achievement of Live Aid; and on December 27, 2005 it was announced that the new leader of the British Conservative Party, David Cameron, was launching 'a wide-ranging policy review on globalisation and global poverty' to which Bob Geldof had agreed to act as consultant. This was, in the words of the Guardian, 'another eyecatching repositioning of the Conservative party' but pleased noone. Those on the Left saw it as another step away from the side of the angels by Geldof; the traditionalists in the Tory party had no wish to be consulting a figure as disreputable, scruffy and foulmouthed as Sir Bob Geldof.

What everyone can agree on, including the man himself, is that whereas it's often been said of Bob Dylan, in Bob Geldof we have someone who really can't sing.

[Bob Geldof: Deep in the Heart of Nowhere, Mercury/Universal, 1986; Vegetarians of Love, Mercury/Universal, 1990; The Happy Club, 1992; Sex, Age & Death, Eagle Rock/Edsel, 2001. Bob Geldof, Is That It?, London: Sidgwick & Jackson, 1986; quotes from Penguin edn., 1986, pp.11, 12 & 390. The Wall, dir. Alan Parker; Goldcrest/MGM/Tin Blue, UK, 1982. Michael White, The Guardian, 28 Dec 2005. The Boomtown Rats: 'Lookin' After No. 1', Ensign ENY-4, UK, 1977; 'Mary of the Fourth Form' c/w 'Do the Rat', Ensign ENY-9, 1977; 'She's So Modern', Ensign ENY-13, 1978; 'Like Clockwork', Ensign ENY-14, 1978; 'Rat Trap', Ensign ENY-16, 1978; 'I Don't Like Mondays', Ensign ENY-30, 1978; The Boomtown Rats, Ensign ENVY-1, 1977; A Tonic for the Troops, Ensign ENVY-3, 1978.]

Genet, Jean [1910 - 1986] Jean Genet was born in Paris on December 19, 1910. This French playwright, novelist and poet became a convicted thief long before turning to writing in 1939, and was rescued from life imprisonment by being taken up by Sartre, Gide and Cocteau as from 1947. Sartre considered him important as the prototype of existentialist man: one who arrived at the distinction between good and evil by personal choice and decision.

Dylan's New Morning song 'Three Angels' echoes closely a short, striking passage from Genet's 1944 novel Our Lady of the Flowers (the original French-language title was the parallel Notre dame des fleurs): 'But neither of the two seemed to care whether Divine was absent or present. They heard the morning angelus, the rattle of a milk can. Three workmen went by on bicycles along the boulevard, their lamps lit, though it was day. A policeman on his way home . . . passed without looking at them.'

In WISSOLIK & McGRATH's Bob Dylan's Words, 1994, Dylan's use of the word 'flowerlady' in his novel Tarantula is cited as possibly also alluding to Our Lady of the Flowers. You might add his 'all of the flower ladies' in the Highway 61 Revisited song 'Queen Jane Approximately'.

At any rate, ROBERT SHELTON's Dylan biography, No Direction Home, 1986, quotes Dylan, interviewed by Shelton on a plane between Lincoln, Nebraska, and Denver, Colorado, in mid-March 1966, as saying: 'William Burroughs is a poet. I like all his old books and Jean Genet's old books.' Perhaps then, 'Absolutely Sweet Marie', recorded for Blonde on Blonde in the same period as this interview, offers those 'ruins of your balcony' in conscious reference to another Genet work, his 1957 play Le Balcon/The Balcony. (The Balcony is the name of the brothel in which the play is set.)

Dylan might be said to confirm some of the above in Chronicles Volume One, 2004, in which, discussing the orthodoxy of thought and behaviour that everyone was expected to follow in mainstream society at the end of the 1950s, he writes: 'Reality was not so simple and everybody had their own take on it. Jean Genet's play The Balcony was being performed in the Village and it portrayed the world as a mammoth cathouse where chaos rules the universe, where man is alone and abandoned in a meaningless cosmos. The play had a strong sense of focus, and . . . it could have been written one hundred years ago. The songs I'd write would be like that, too. They wouldn't conform to modern ideas.'

Genet died in Paris on April 15, 1986 but was buried in Larache, Morocco.

[Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, 1986, Penguin edn., p.353. Bob Dylan, Chronicles, p.89. Wissolik & McGrath, Bob Dylan's Words, Greensburg, PA: Eadmer Press, 1994.]

'George Jackson' c/w 'George Jackson' [1971] See Jackson, George.

Georgia Tom See Dorsey, Thomas A.

Gershwin, George [1898 - 1937] & Ira [1896 - 1983] Jacob and Israel Gershovitz were born in Brooklyn on September 26, 1898 and December 6, 1896. They became towering figures in the history of 20th century American music, with the younger of the two the more exalted, thanks especially to his inspired jazz-classical 'Rhapsody in Blue' of 1924. This was also the year their songwriting partnership began, with George as composer and Ira as lyricist, by providing the songs for the Fred and Adele Astaire show Lady, Be Good. They moved to Hollywood in 1931.

This is no place to appraise their work, either individually or as a team, for while there can be few who have not been drawn at least to 'Summertime', from Porgy and Bess, a song that has lent itself readily to a variety of treatments from rock'n'roll, R&B and pop artists since the mid-1950s, there will always be those for whom the name Gershwin is synonymous with exactly the kind of complacent sophistication and middle-class dinner-dance ennui that rock'n'roll, and then Bob Dylan, were born to abolish.

Yet on March 11, 1987, at the Gershwin Gala held at the Brooklyn Academy of Music in New York, to the puzzlement of most of the predictably affluent, ageing and conservative audience, a nervous and tuxedoed Bob Dylan appeared as one of the performers, armed with acoustic guitar and harmonica, and gave a sweet, touching and unparalleled rendition of a nicely obscure item from the Gershwins' repertoire, the 1929 song 'Soon', a number with a melody that wanders diffidently across jazzy minor chords and a lyric of dull sentimental doggerel ('Soon my dear you'll never be lonely / Soon you'll find I live for you only', and much more in like vein) spiked by one audacious rhyme—'who cares what time it is / . . . or what the climate is'.

Dylan told friends that he'd been thinking of performing 'Swanee', the early George Gershwin song popularised by Al Jolson, but had then found 'Soon' instead. He and friend Ted Perlman, domestic partner of sometime Dylan session singer Peggi Blu, worked on an arrangement for the song. Perlman told biographer HOWARD SOUNES that Dylan asked, while practising the song, 'Do I sound stupid?' He certainly did not. The event was televised on July 7, 1987 by the West German channel ZDF-TV, and on PBS in the US later that year. By the customary Sod's Law, since this was, on the night, a fine and in every sense unique performance, naturally the only bootleg recording of it in circulation is in wantonly poor quality.

George Gershwin slipped into a coma on July 9, 1937 and died of a brain tumour two days later, in Hollywood, at the age of 39; Ira outlived him by a further 46 years, collaborating on songs with many other people, including Kurt Weill and Jerome Kern, and establishing the Gershwin Archive at the Library of Congress. Ira died at home in Beverly Hills on August 17, 1983, aged 86.

[Howard Sounes, Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, New York: Grove Press, 2001, quoted from manuscript p.447.]

Gibson, Don [1928 - 2003] Donald Eugene Gibson was born in Shelby, North Carolina, on April 3, 1928. He was one of Chet Atkins' protégés at RCA Victor in Nashville and a regular on the Tennessee Barn Dance (on WNOX Radio, Knoxville). He first recorded in 1949 and 1952, wrote 'Sweet Dreams' in 1955, and in 1957 recorded 'Oh Lonesome Me', on which he and Atkins omitted the usual steel guitar and fiddle, to offer a new sound featuring only guitars, piano, drums, upright bass and (rather obtrusive) backing singers. This pioneered what became known as the Nashville Sound (and gave Gibson a no.1 hit).

A prolific and affecting songwriter as well as a singer, his best-known, most-covered song is 'I Can't Stop Lovin' You' (recorded by over 700 people, among them RAY CHARLES, whose version topped the charts and sold a million). 'Sea of Heartbreak' was among several countrified pop hits he had himself in the US and UK charts 1959–1963. Others included 'It's Too Soon to Know', 'Lonesome Number One', 'Oh Lonesome Me' (revived by NEIL YOUNG), 'Sweet Dreams' (first a success by Patsy Cline but revived exquisitely by Don EVERLY in 1971 on the brilliant solo album Don Everly), and '(I'd Be a) Legend in My Time'. In 1989, Dylan performed '(I'd Be a) Legend in My Time' at three concerts.

Don Gibson died November 17, 2003, aged 75.

[Don Gibson: 'Oh Lonesome Me' c/w 'I Can't Stop Lovin' You', Nashville, nia, RCA Victor 474-4133, 1957; 'Sea of Heartbreak', Nashville, nia, RCA Victor 47-7890, 1961; 'It's Too Soon to Know', Nashville, nia, RCA Victor 47-7010, 1957; 'Lonesome Number One', Nashville, nia, 47-7959, 1961. Don Everly: Don Everly, Ode SP-77005, LA (A&M AMLS 2007, London), 1971. Bob Dylan: '(I'd Be a) Legend in My Time', Columbia, MD, 19 Jul; Atlantic City, 20 Jul; & Saratoga Springs, NY, 26 Jul 1989.]

Ginsberg, Allen [1926 - 1997] Irwin Allen Ginsberg was born in Newark, New Jersey, on June 3, 1926. It's invidious to separate out THE BEATS: they felt like a community, they influenced each other, they sometimes worked together, and in the sleevenotes interview for Biograph in 1985 Dylan speaks warmly of how the whole movement was part of an alternative culture that 'all left the rest of everything in the dust' (see separate entry). Yet it would be invidious too simply to corral all the Beats together as if they were not individual artists at all, or as if their work were somehow all interchangeable and none of them attained a distinctive voice.

Allen Ginsberg, perhaps more than any other individual writer of the Beat Generation, opens up for Dylan, and for his whole generation, a bright, babbling, surreal, self-indulgent, sleazy, intensely alert modern world no predecessor had visited. Howl (1956) might not have been possible without WHITMAN, but Dylan's debt to Howl (and the later Kaddish) is far more direct than Ginsberg's to Leaves of Grass.

This is from Howl: 'who jumped in limousines with the Chinaman of Oklahoma on the / impulse of winter midnight streetlight smalltown rain, / . . . who went out whoring through Colorado in myriad stolen nightcars . . . / . . . who faded out in vast sordid movies, were shifted in dreams, woke on a sudden / Manhattan, and picked themselves up out of basements hungover / with heartless Tokay and horrors of Third Avenue iron dreams . . .'

There is not one line from this huge, sprawling poem that cannot claim to be the deranged, inspired midwife of the Dylan of the mid-1960s, the Dylan of 'the motor cycle black madonna two-wheel gypsy queen' and the rest. Dylan's achievement has included the remarkable fact of his being able to turn right round and become a major influence on Allen Ginsberg, as Ginsberg's beautifully expressive sleevenotes to Dylan's Desire album, and his endearingly woolly-mammoth presence in Dylan's Renaldo & Clara film, both testify.

Sometimes these mutual influences are hard to disentangle—particularly since the forceful inspiration of WILLIAM BLAKE helps to shape the writing of both Ginsberg and Dylan. Not least, the Blakeian influence on Ginsberg is so strong that in some cases what seems Blakeian in Dylan may actually have come via Ginsberg.

For instance, the line in Dylan's 'Ring Them Bells' that uses Christ's shepherd-and-his-sheep analogy—'And the mountains are filled with lost sheep'—is likely to remind you of the harmonium song that Ginsberg sings in Renaldo & Clara, with its echoey last line 'And all the hills echoéd': but this is Ginsberg directly quoting Blake: it is the echoey last line of 'Nurse's Song', from Songs of Innocence (1789).

Ginsberg has twice recorded this Blake poem, set to his own music, and on the second occasion he was accompanied by Dylan, whose gift of a Uher tape-recorder in 1965 encouraged Ginsberg to improvise one-chord music. 'I kept hearing musical fragments of Blake's "Grey Monk" moaning through my brain', he wrote in 'Explanation of First Blues'. His album Songs of Innocence and of Experience Tuned by Allen Ginsberg was recorded in 1968. His 1971 recordings of Blake songs 'Nurse's Song' (accompanied by Dylan on guitar, piano and organ), and 'The Tyger', remained unissued.

Like Blake, Ginsberg can write both carefully simple verse and what he calls his 'long line' poetry (much influenced by Walt Whitman also). Indeed he writes in his 1973 poem 'On Reading Dylan's Writings' that he has 'to break [his] long line down' to write like Bob Dylan.

Dylan first mentions Ginsberg in an early poem: a section of the 11 Outlined Epitaphs that made up Dylan's sleevenotes for his third album, The Times They Are a-Changin'. In some ways this prefigures that Biograph reminiscence. As Dylan memorialises his fond early influences, he delineates the way that poetry and music, painting and film—American and European—all rubbed shoulders in the process. Yet here it's noticeable that Ginsberg is the only big-name Beat writer in the list:

> 'with the sounds of Francois Villon / echoin' through my mad streets / as I stumble on lost cigars / of BERTOLT BRECHT / an' empty bottles / of Brendan Behan / the hypnotic words / of A.L. Lloyd / each one bendin' like its own song / an' the woven spell of PAUL CLAYTON / entrancin' me like China's plague / unescapable / drownin' in the lungs of Edith Piaf / and in the mystery of Marlene Dietrich / the dead poems of EDDIE FREEMAN / love songs of Allen Ginsberg / an' jail songs of RAY BREMSER / the narrow tunes of Modigliani / an' the singin' plains of Harry Jackson / the cries of Charles Aznavour / with melodies of Yevtushenko / through the quiet fire of Miles Davis / above the bells of William Blake / an' beat visions of JOHNNY CASH / an' the saintliness of PETE SEEGER'.

The two first meet in December 1963, introduced by AL ARONOWITZ. They get on well, talk poetry, and Dylan invites Ginsberg to a Chicago gig. He declines, partly because he's busy apartment hunting in New York but also out of pride. He says later: 'I thought he was just a folksinger, and I was also afraid I might become his slave or something, his mascot.' Ginsberg knew himself well.

Nevertheless he soon went with Dylan to another concert (Ginsberg's biographer specifies Princeton, and says the photos later used on the sleeve of Bringing It All Back Home were taken backstage here—but no Princeton concert has been logged in this period and it's generally believed that the photos were taken when Ginsberg was a fellow-guest with Dylan on the 'Les Crane Show' on US television in February 1965; the photos, of Ginsberg in top hat and tie, appear on the LP cover that March). At any rate, in 1964 Ginsberg attended the post-concert party after Dylan's Hallowe'en Concert at the Philharmonic Hall, NYC.

On May 8, 1965, he arrived in England to join Dylan again, partied with him and THE BEATLES and is to be seen loitering in the alley by the Savoy Hotel in the Strand, London, in the film footage that prefigures the modern pop video, with Dylan looking, and moving as, the embodiment of cool, while dropping the cards to the soundtrack of 'Subterranean Homesick Blues'; he can also be seen in a hotel suite in the film that begins with that 'video', D.A. PENNEBAKER's Don't Look Back. In June Ginsberg told British national newspaper the Daily Mail that he and Dylan were writing a film together (Dylan had told Les Crane that they aimed to make a film that summer).

At the end of the year Ginsberg was with Dylan again, this time in California, participating in the San Francisco press conference on the afternoon of December 3, asking Dylan: 'Do you ever think there will ever be a time when you'll be hung as a thief?', and pictured in the street with Dylan, ROBBIE ROBERTSON and poet Michael McClure. At Christmas Dylan gave him $600 to buy a professional-standard Uher tape recorder, and encouraged him to 'learn an instrument'. At around the same time JOAN BAEZ told Ginsberg and McClure that they should be 'Dylan's conscience' now that he was no longer involved in the civil rights movement.

Ginsberg gets a second name-check from Dylan on an unreleased moment during the Basement Tapes sessions in 1967, when THE BAND and Dylan turn Bill Haley's hit 'See You Later, Alligator' into 'See Ya Later, Allen Ginsberg'. Ginsberg also visited Dylan that August 19, saying later that he had brought Bob as a gift 'a box full of books of all kinds. All the modern poets I knew. Some ancient poets like Sir Thomas Wyatt, Campion, Dickinson, RIMBAUD, Lorca, Apollinaire, BLAKE, Whitman and so forth.'

Ginsberg was around when Dylan made his first post-accident appearance as a performer, at the Woody Guthrie Memorial Concerts in January 1968; he attended the party for the participants held at actor Robert Ryan's large apartment in the Dakota Building. That same year, Dylan was able to return to its author Ginsberg's old typescript of his Gates of Wrath: the first time he'd had a complete copy since the manuscript had been 'carried to London by lady friend early fifties' and had 'disappeared'.

If Ginsberg brought Dylan books of poetry—and indeed, as RALPH GLEASON puts it, had 'made Dylan and THE BEATLES respectable'—one of the ways that Dylan surely influenced Ginsberg was bringing the blues to his attention, by the extraordinary regenerative use of blues lyric poetry within his own work, which must have nudged Ginsberg towards this music—though in 1975 Ginsberg stresses a different route (again in 'Explanation of First Blues'): 'I had some kind of American Blues in my heart without knowing it—I could sing but didn't reckon it important poetically, until I met Krishna & remembered EZRA POUND's ken that poetry & music, song & chant (and dance) went together before the invention of the printing press and long after—forgotten by the same academies that forgot that the genre of American Black Blues & rags was as great a treasury of poetics as Bishop Percy's Reliques & Scottish Border Ballads & Elizabethan song books & Tom O'Bedlam folk treasuries.' At any rate, Ginsberg knew of BLIND BLAKE as well as William, and his [Ginsberg's] 'Tear Gas Rag', about an anti-Vietnam War demo in Colorado in 1972, is based on what he calls Blind Blake's 'Old Southern Rag'.

Dylan and Ginsberg first performed together on October 30, 1971, at a New York City television studio, where on a programme that also featured Peter Orlovsky and Gerard Malanga, Dylan played guitar behind Ginsberg's performances of seven items, including 'Nurse's Song', 'September on Jessore Road', 'A Dream', 'Mantra to Shiva' and 'John Sinclair'. This was shown on 'Freetime' on a PBS-TV station, WNET-TV, a few days later, with Dylan unbilled. Dylan also attended a Ginsberg poetry reading at this point, at New York University.

Ginsberg and Dylan first recorded together very soon after this (NY, November 1971). These were essentially Ginsberg sessions to which Dylan contributed. Ginsberg was the main voice, with Dylan on shared vocals, guitar, piano and organ on all tracks. On the 17th they cut 'Vomit Express', 'Going to San Diego' and 'Jimmy Berman Rag', and possibly 'Om My Soul Shalom', 'Nurse's Song', 'Many Loves', 'Prajnaparamitra Sutra' and 'A Dream' (though the last five may have been three days later). On the 20th they recorded two takes of 'September on Jessore Road' and 'The Tyger'.

'Vomit Express', 'Jimmy Berman Rag', 'September on Jessore Road' and 'Om My Soul Shalom' were co-written by Ginsberg and Dylan. 'Going to San Diego' and 'Prajnaparamitra Sutra' were Ginsberg compositions; 'Nurse's Song' and 'A Dream' were credited to Blake and Ginsberg. There was some interest in these tapes from Apple Records, according to ROBERT SHELTON, and the plan was to release them with Dylan billed as Egg O'Schmillson; but nothing came of this and Dylan wrote to Ginsberg in June 1973, saying: 'Don't worry, the energy has gone, save your songs for friends and go on and do something else.'

On February 13, 1982, in Santa Monica, however, the two of them got together again for a shorter session, this time with Dylan only playing bass, to lay down two Ginberg compositions, 'Do the Meditation' and two takes of 'Airplane Blues'. (For release details of all these, see below.)

In between these Ginsberg sessions, Dylan had recalled the poet's work when naming his 1974 album Planet Waves, echoing an anthology of Ginsberg's poetry published by City Lights in 1968 under the title Planet News; and when, in 1975, Ginsberg published his little book First Blues, Rags, Ballads & Harmonium Songs 1971–74, it was dedicated 'To Minstrel Guruji Bob Dylan', includes a photograph of the two together at KEROUAC's grave and includes a poem about Dylan written in 1972, 'Blue Gossip'. Other Ginsberg poems about Dylan include 'Postcard to D——', 1972, the aforementioned 'On Reading Dylan's Writing', 1973, and 'Bob Dylan (1941–)', 1986.

In addition, STEPHEN SCOBIE's Alias Bob Dylan Revisited, published in 2004, has a section drawing on Ginsberg's unpublished journals, which include fragments of verse written on Dylan-in-performance in 1975.

The two artists re-connected in person in the mid-1970s for the Rolling Thunder tours—Ginsberg is prominent in Renaldo & Clara, not least in the sequence where the two visit the Kerouac grave and the marvellous, long scene of Ginsberg inton-ing Kaddish to an audience of elderly ladies attending a mah-jongg championship—and Ginsberg worked hard with Dylan on the film's scenario; he also wrote warm, evocative sleevenotes for Dylan's 1976 album Desire. The following March they came together with others to take part (as background vocalists) in a LEONARD COHEN recording session in Los Angeles, the released result of which was their participation on the track 'Don't Go Home With Your Hard On' on the PHIL SPECTOR-produced Cohen album Death of a Ladies' Man. That October Ginsberg visited Dylan in Malibu and taped several interviews with him.

In 1985 Dylan called at Ginsberg's New York apartment to show him the lyrics to his forthcoming album, Empire Burlesque, and found to his delight that the legendary HARRY SMITH was there. (See the Smith entry for the end of this brief story.) Some might think Ginsberg shirked his responsibilities when he let Dylan run those lyrics past him without demurring at their quality.

The same year saw Dylan provide a blurb quote for the cover of Ginsberg's Collected Poems 1947–1980. This was provided as a favour for a friend, as a gesture of respect for a poet's work and at the time seemed to be a one-off (unhappily he would soon start endorsing far less deserving books: see book endorsements, unfortunate). Perhaps Dylan's blurb for Ginsberg held the attraction of offering him a modest writing exercise, as he tried out the language of conventional criticism: 'Ginsberg,' ran Dylan's wordbite, 'is both tragic and dynamic, a lyrical genius, con man extraordinaire, and probably the single greatest influence on the American poetical voice since Walt Whitman.' A splendidly unDylanesque composition: and fairly plausible stuff.

Allen Ginsberg died in his Lower East Side apartment in New York City at 2:39 am, Saturday, April 5, 1997, of a heart attack related to his terminal liver cancer, according to friend and archivist Bill Morgan. He was writing poems as late as the Thursday. On the evening after Ginsberg's death, Dylan was playing in concert at Moncton, New Brunswick, and after performing 'Desolation Row' told the audience that it was Ginsberg's 'favourite song: that was for Allen.'

[Ginsberg's 'Explanation of First Blues' is in his small book First Blues, Rags, Ballads & Harmonium Songs 1971–74, 1975. So is 'Tear Gas Rag'. His Songs of Innocence and of Experience Tuned by Allen Ginsberg, 1968, issued as Verve/Forecast FTS3083, USA, 1969, was reissued as Allen Ginsberg, MGM Archetypes M3F-4951, USA, 1974. Allen Ginsberg: 'September on Jessore Road' (edited version) released on a flexidisc given away with Sing Out! magazine vol.21, no.2, NY, 1972; 'Vomit Express' & 'Going to San Diego' on Ginsberg's LP First Blues, John Hammond Records W2X 37673, US 1973; 'Jimmy Berman Rag', on Disconnected—The Dial-a-Poem Poets Double, Giorno Poetry Systems, US, 1974. 'Vomit Express' re-issued Ginsberg's 4-CD box set Holy Soul Jelly Roll: Poems And Songs 1949–1993, Rhino Word Beat R2 71693, US, 1994; this also includes 'A Dream' & (a re-edited) 'September on Jessore Road', plus 2nd take of 'Airplane Blues'.

Blind Blake's 'Southern Rag' was recorded Chicago, c.Oct 1927; CD-reissued on Blind Blake: Foremost Fingerpicker, Yazoo 1068, 1984. Ginsberg & Dylan on the 'Les Crane Show', ABC-TV, 17 Feb 1965; Dylan's promo film for 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' was released within Don't Look Back, dir. D.A. PENNEBAKER, 1967; Daily Mail story in Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, 1986, Penguin edn., p. 301, the Ralph Gleason quote p.333, and the Dylan letter of June 1973 p.424. Dylan's San Francisco press conference, 3 Dec 1965, shown on KQED-TV. Gates of Wrath story, 'Interviews and a Poem: Allen Ginsberg', in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, ed. Michael Gray & John Bauldie, London: 1988 Futura edn., p.161–76, and poems list p.267–68.

The excellent Ginsberg: A Biography, by Barry Miles, New York: Simon & Schuster,1989, is drawn on in the above for the 'just a folksinger' quote & Princeton concert & photos suggestion (p.334), partying with the Beatles (p.369–70), Dylan to Les Crane re film (p.380), Dylan giving Uher gift as money, & Baez quote (p.381), date of Woodstock visit (p.391) and mah-jongg detail (p.460). Stephen Scobie: Alias Bob Dylan Revisited, Calgary, Canada: Red Deer College Press, 2004.

Leonard Cohen: Death of a Ladies' Man, LA, Mar 1977, Columbia PC 44286 (USA) & CBS 86042 (UK/West Germany), 1977.]

Gleason, Ralph J. [1917 - 1975] Ralph J. Gleason ('the "J" was for Joseph, although we often joked that it stood for "jazz"', said his son Toby) was an old-fashioned music enthusiast and journalist based in San Francisco, an influential American jazz and pop music critic in the 1950s who adjusted painfully to the decade that followed, but having done so, co-founded Rolling Stone magazine as an 'underground paper'. The name Rolling Stone came from Gleason; co-founder and editor Jann Wenner wanted to call it Electric Newspaper. There was little love lost between the two. (See Wenner, Jann and unloading heads.)

Gleason was born in New York City on March 1, 1917, attending Columbia University before moving to the West Coast in his early 30s. He began contributing to the San Francisco Chronicle in 1950, and there introduced the first regular coverage of jazz and popular music in US mainstream media. He interviewed, among others, HANK WILLIAMS, FATS DOMINO and ELVIS PRESLEY, helped bring about San Francisco's cultural flowering in the late 1950s and, as Joe Selvin notes: 'At a time when there were practically no books on the subject, he wrote the history of jazz on the back of album covers, writing literally hundreds of liner notes in the golden age of long-playing albums.' He was also a radical who spoke out in the McCarthy era, and later was named on Richard Nixon's Enemies List.

He became an earlyish supporter of, and copious commentator on, Dylan's work, having been an early champion of LENNY BRUCE and Miles Davis; later he was similarly enthusiastic about San Francisco's pioneering rock groups, and in 1966 wrote a paean to FRANK ZAPPA and the Mothers of Invention, 'Those Mothers Can Really Play', in the San Francisco Chronicle.

Gleason continued to contribute to Rolling Stone until his death in 1975. He was also an associate editor and critic on Down Beat, and his weekly columns in the New York Post were syndicated in the US and in Europe.

Gleason produced and hosted many TV documentaries, including a series of nearly 30 jazz and blues programs, 'Jazz Casual', featuring musicians from Dave Brubeck to B.B. King; a documentary on Duke Ellington; a series on the Monterey Jazz Festival; and several looks at San Francisco rock, notably A Night at the Family Dog, catching the Haight-Ashbury scene in one night's performances from the GRATEFUL DEAD, SANTANA and Jefferson Airplane (1970).

His books, compiled from articles and reviews, include Jam Session (1957), The San Francisco Scene (1968) and Celebrating the Duke, and Louis, Bessie, Billie, Bird, Carmen, Miles, Dizzy & Other Heroes (1975).

He was writing for the San Francisco Chronicle in 1963 when Dylan, then a rising star, performed at the Monterey Folk Festival. Gleason slated the concert, telling ROBERT SHELTON: 'It was an old Dylan concert and I didn't dig it. The talking blues stuff was poor imitation GUTHRIE. He looked wrong to me and I didn't like his voice. Although I didn't like "Hard Rain", I became haunted by it. Jesus, it was disturbing.' (PETE SEEGER, THEODORE BIKEL and others wrote a protest letter in response to this review, and Gleason recanted: 'I was deaf,' he wrote.)

From then on, Gleason's advocacy of Dylan never faltered. His was a useful voice, since he was of an older generation and could address its doubts from the inside, as here, in 1964: 'To the generations raised on solid Judeo-Christian principles, on the rock of moral values of our fathers, on the idea that cleanliness is next to Godliness, the deliberate sloppiness, the disdain for what we have thought of as perfect by Dylan's generation is shocking. But we are wrong. Look where our generation has gotten us . . . a hard core of reality connects the music of Dylan, the best of jazz, of contemporary poetry, painting, all the arts, in fact, with the social revolution that has resulted in CORE and SNCC, Dick Gregory, James Baldwin and the rest.'

An aeon later, after the unenthusiastic response to Self Portrait in 1970, it was Gleason, in Rolling Stone, who came out with the now almost notorious claim in response to hearing New Morning: 'We've got Bob Dylan back again!'

The Rex Foundation, a non-profit charity organization founded by the Grateful Dead and friends, established the Ralph J. Gleason Award in 1986, and 1989 saw the launching of the annual Ralph J. Gleason Music Book Awards, sponsored by Rolling Stone, BMI and New York University.

Gleason, who died aged 58, in Berkeley, California, on June 3, 1975, after suffering a massive heart attack, was a catalyst and an enthusiast—as his widow said in 2004: 'He was not a good writer. He wrote about interesting things.'

[Ralph J. Gleason: 1st two quotes taken from Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, p.170 & p.250; 3rd quote Rolling Stone no.70, San Francisco, 12 Nov 1970. A Night at the Family Dog, Sep 1970, is DVD-issued by RED Distribution, 2005. Joe Selvin & Mrs. Gleason quotes, Steven Rubio's Online Life, 23 Dec 2004, seen 16 Aug 2005 at http://begonias.typepad.com/srubio/2004/12/ralph_j_gleason.html. Toby Gleason, e-mail to this writer, 3 Oct 2005.]

Glover, Tony [1936 -] David Curtis Glover was born in Minneapolis on October 7, 1939. His change of name from Dave to Tony was a switch about on a par with that of the British poet who changed his name from William Roberts to, er, Michael Roberts.

A close and influential friend of Dylan from the Dinkytown Minneapolis period, his fine essay on Dylan's progress through to 1966 was written for and published in the booklet for the 1998 official release the Bootleg Series Vol. 4: Bob Dylan Live 1966. (These sleevenotes won him the 1999 Deems Taylor award.)

Glover started playing 'professionally' with SPIDER JOHN KOERNER and DAVE RAY. Koerner, Ray and Glover—that was the name of their outfit—made many albums, starting with Blues, Rags & Hollers, issued first on the small Audiophile label in June 1963 but picked up by Elektra, who signed them, bought the rights, reissued the LP that November (with four tracks missing) and then several further albums.

Glover wrote three books on how to play blues harmonica, starting with Blues Harp, 1965. After the end of Koerner, Ray and Glover he moved to Berkeley, wrote articles for Creem and Rolling Stone, moved back to the Twin Cities and became a local 'underground' DJ, moved to New York and sat in with the Doors at Carnegie Hall and with the Allman Brothers at the Fillmore East. His best article from earlier days than the Live 1966 essay is probably the very prescient 'A Wonderful New Group', written about THE BAND (one of the earliest pieces on their then-new incarnation) and published in November 1968. He might also be credited, with Creem, for 'discovering' PATTI SMITH.

In 1986 he wrote, produced and co-directed a video history of Koerner, Ray and Glover, which led to reunion gigs and eventually to their first new album in over 30 years, One Foot in the Groove, 1996. In 2002 he published (co-authored with Scott Dirks and Ward Gaines) the book Blues With a Feeling: The Little Walter Story.

He first met Dylan in mid-1960 on the Beat/folk scene in Dinkytown, near the University of Minnesota campus. 'We played at some parties here and there and traded a few harp riffs,' he wrote. After Dylan reached New York, he 'proudly sent back a flyer advertising him playing at Gerde's Folk City on a bill with JOHN LEE HOOKER.'

He was one of the few people Dylan kept in touch with after he went East. In 1963 Dylan described Glover as 'a friend to everything I am. Dave Glover, who I really love. Dave Glover, who feels and thinks and walks and talks just like I do.'

ROBERT SHELTON writes of him: 'Tony was tough and taciturn, yet gentle, cool as a bluesman, and passionate about his music and his friends. . . . His dark, laconic, James Dean-like manner made Bob feel Tony could be trusted. . . . Tony was one of the first to know that Bob was going somewhere. He liked Bob as much when he was a prophet without honor in Minneapolis as when he triumphed.'

Glover would prove that he 'could be trusted': in the early years he often recorded Dylan informally, and he is one of the very few people who never allowed his tapes to circulate among Dylan collectors (though just once he was tricked into it). Shelton says that Glover first taped Dylan in early 1961, when he was singing 'R&B-type Chuck Berry songs', and then again that May, when he was in his Guthrie phase. Dylan played Glover 'Song to Woody' and told him that JOAN BAEZ wanted to record it—and Tony tried to persuade Bob to keep it for himself, adding that he'd 'do a much better job on it'.

When Dylan returned to Minneapolis for the second time, in December 1961, and performed a large number of songs at his old friend BONNIE BEECHER's apartment (or possibly at DAVE WHITAKER's), this powerful informal session was recorded on two machines. The tape made on Beecher's art teacher's machine has long circulated, and in reasonable quality; the one Tony Glover recorded has not circulated, and is in better quality. Three songs taken from this 'master tape'—'Hard Times in New York Town', 'Dink's Song' and 'I Was Young When I Left Home'—have been issued officially; the first in 1991 on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, the others in 2005 on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack.

Shelton commissioned Dylan to write a piece for the 1963 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL program (edited by Shelton as Stacey Williams). The result, 'typed single-spaced on tired yellow sheets. . . . Roughly one hundred fifty lines of free verse', was Dylan's key piece 'To Dave Glover', in which he urged people to understand why he had to move on from the old, traditional material and the old accompanying mindset.

Nine days before Dylan's first appearance at that festival, an informal recording was made at Dave Whitaker's home in Minneapolis, on which Glover plays harmonica behind Dylan on 'West Memphis' and 'Death Letter Blues'. (Koerner was there too, playing guitar on an instrumental jam.)

Glover also remembers playing informally with Dylan and BOB NEUWIRTH in the Viking Hotel during the 1964 Newport Folk Festival; they sang some HANK WILLIAMS, but also tried 'Tell Me' from the ROLLING STONES' first album. (At the festival itself, Koerner, Ray and Glover were performers.) It wasn't long before Glover was sitting in on nearly all the sessions for Highway 61 Revisited (which, in May 1998, he describes in pleasing detail in his sleevenotes to the Live 1966 set).

In September 1992, when Dylan played the Orpheum Theater in Minneapolis, the support band was Ray and Glover. More recently, Tony Glover was one of the Back Porch Rockers, along with Dave Ray, Camile Baudoin and Reggie Scanlan (they issued a live album in 1999), but Dave Ray died on Thanksgiving 2002.

Glover is an interviewee in the SCORSESE film No Direction Home, remembering Dylan's first return to Minneapolis, only a couple of months after he'd left, as being the time Dylan's performing skills had improved out of all recognition; the evidence of the tapes suggests that when he returned in May 1961, he had improved a fair bit—but when he returned that December, that's when he'd made a quantum leap.

Dylan recalls Glover only briefly in Chronicles Volume One: but what he recalls is the time when 'Glover's playing was known and talked about around town, but nobody commented on mine'.

[1st Glover quotes from Live 1966 essay; other detail, www.island.net/~blues/tglover.htm. Koerner, Ray and Glover: Blues Rags and Hollers, Audiophile AP-78, 1963; One Foot in the Groove, Tim/Kerr T/K 96CD137, US, 1996. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, 1986, Penguin edn., Dylan quote on Glover p.80; description of Glover p.81; on Glover taping Dylan, p.82; on 'To Dave Glover', p.210; Glover 'discovering' Patti Smith, p.439. Tony Glover, Blues Harp, New York: Oak Publications, 1965; 'A Wonderful New Group', Eye no.7, Nov 1968, available online at http://theband.hiof.no/articles/eyes_7_november_1968.html. Glover, Dirks and Gaines, Blues With a Feeling: The Little Walter Story, New York: Routledge, 2002. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.257. Minnesota Birth Index 1935–2002, file no. 1929-MN-014872.]

Gods and Generals* [2003] See ''Cross the Green Mountain'.

Goffin, Gerry [1939 -] Gerry Goffin was born in Brooklyn on February 11, 1939. He began writing song lyrics at the age of eight but had to wait many years before finding a music-writing partner. After high school he enlisted in the US Marine Corps Reserve and was duly admitted to the Annapolis Naval Academy in Maryland, from which he resigned after a year, returning to New York and majoring in chemistry at Queens College, where he met CAROLE KING.

For a few golden years as from 1959, when they married and started to dream up songs together, they enjoyed huge success as the prolific writers of pop hits, working out of the famous Brill Building at 1819 Broadway, New York City, for Nevins-Kirchner-Colgem from 1960 onwards. (For details of their joint songs, see under King, Carole.) While in this golden age, Goffin also co-wrote with Barry Mann (whose usual partner was Cynthia Weill), as in the case of 'Who Put the Bomp?', which Goffin himself recorded, scoring a top 10 US hit.

Just as Goffin and King did not write together exclusively while married, so too their professional collaboration did not end with their divorce (they co-wrote Blood Sweat & Tears' 'Hi-De-Ho'), though Gerry Goffin seemed to come out of this less well equipped than Ms. King, both as a songwriter and a performer. He made a 1973 solo album, It Ain't Exactly Entertainment, which was not a success (while King enjoyed spectacular solo success with her album Tapestry, albeit including the Goffin-King song 'Smackwater Jack') and he wrote only the occasional hit in the 1970s—notably Gladys Knight's 'I've Got to Use My Imagination' and Rod Stewart's 'It's Not the Spotlight', both co-written with BARRY GOLDBERG (who recorded the latter himself, with some minor assistance from Bob Dylan, on a 1973 album, while on Dylan's 1984 European tour, musician GREGG SUTTON was given a solo slot in which he regularly sang the former). In the 1980s Goffin managed to co-write, with Michael Masser, 'Tonight I Celebrate My Love', recorded by both Perry Como and Roberta Flack, Crystal Gayle's 'A Long and Lasting Love' and Whitney Houston's 'Savin' All My Love For You', released on her début album in 1985 (an album that eventually sold 24 million copies) and a no.1 hit single.

In late 1995 or early 1996 Gerry Goffin was working on a new solo album, his first for aeons, when Bob Dylan dropped into the studios, brought along by their mutual friend Barry Goldberg. Dylan duly played guitar (along with Goldberg on keyboards and TIM DRUMMOND on bass, plus various others) on two tracks that made it onto Goffin's album. The tracks are 'Masquerade' (on which Dylan is listed as co-producer with Goffin, and as co-writer) and 'Tragedy of the Trade' (co-written by Goffin, Dylan and Goldberg). A posting on Amazon's website suggests that Dylan can also be heard on background vocals on the track 'A Woman Can Be Like a Gangster'. The album, Back Room Blood, was released in July 1996. You might assume the title refers to the fact that Goffin's main career has been as backroom boy—songwriter rather than singer—but the long, bitter, foaming, 'Hurricane'-style lyric of 'Tragedy of the Trade' includes the opaque couplet 'The world's been run with backroom blood / Long before the time of the flood'. A third co-written song, 'Coast to Coast Blues', is covered by Anders Osborne on his 1999 album Living Room—on which FREDDY KOELLA plays guitar—but it isn't included on Goffin's.

Back Room Blood is not a great album, and Goffin's voice sometimes sounds like a poor imitation of Dylan, but these co-written songs have certainly been under-attended to by Dylan aficionados, and the album that contains them has, overall, a kind of floundering agitation that's rather endearing.

[Gerry Goffin: It Ain't Exactly Entertainment, nia, 1973, CD-reissued Airmail nia, 2001; Back Room Blood, Genes 4132, US, 1996. Anders Osborne: Living Room, Shanachie 5375, Newton, NJ, 1999.]

Goldberg, Barry [1941 -] Barry Goldberg was born in 1941 in Chicago, and long ago claimed the motto 'Born and raised in Chicago, born and raised to play the blues'. Like his friend and musical compadre the late MICHAEL BLOOMFIELD he was a teenage prodigy—in Goldberg's case on keyboards—and was sitting in on live club dates by the greats of the Southside by the late 1950s, including MUDDY WATERS. Like Bloomfield too, he decided at the start of his career, at a time when many musicians were changing their names to duck out of any obvious declaration of Jewishness, that he would go out there as Goldberg and be damned. He had a rôle model: he was the nephew of Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg. 'It hurt me, not changing my name,' he told journalist Scott Benarde in 1998, but 'Bloomfield and I were really into our heritage and traditions and proud of our names and if people didn't like them it was tough shit. We were emphatic about keeping our real names. . . . I thought of my uncle Arthur using Goldberg and being proud of it. . . . He blazed through politics and the legal system and faced a lot of adversity. Every time he met with Lyndon Johnson, he went in there like a hero. When Kennedy needed advice, he would call my uncle. It made me feel proud.'

Goldberg and Bloomfield even made a 1969 album together titled Two Jews Blues (featuring the not especially Jewish Duane Allman on one track). For contractual reasons (the album was on Buddah, Bloomfield was contracted to Columbia), Bloomfield didn't appear on the cover, on which the credit in words went inanely to 'Barry Goldberg and Barry Goldberg' but in the illustration the second Jew depicted alongside Goldberg, who hadn't been consulted, was Jesus. When Bob Dylan saw the album, he said he 'thought I had an ego problem', Goldberg remembers. It didn't impair their long friendship, which had begun through Bloomfield and been forged in the flames of the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL appearance in 1965, when Dylan went electric and Barry Goldberg was the pianist.

Goldberg later developed into a songwriter and producer, but his first strength was as a distinctive player of his Hammond B-3 organ. Soon after Newport '65 he formed the Goldberg/Miller Blues Band with Steve Miller and made one eponymously titled album; his concurrent session work included playing live with JIMI HENDRIX (at New York's Café Au Go Go) and in the studio for Mitch Ryder (along with Bloomfield and AL KOOPER). He moved to the West Coast, and after being in Charlie Musselwhite's first band—Charlie Musselwhite's South Side Band—long enough to play on their 1967 Vanguard album Stand Back!, he and Bloomfield co-founded the Electric Flag—which recorded the soundtrack to the film The Trip (1967) and the album Long Time Comin' (1968) before Goldberg quit to form the Barry Goldberg Reunion (with guitarist Harvey Mandel and drummer Eddie Hoh), which made two albums, Barry Goldberg Reunion, aka There's No Hole in My Soul, and Blowin' My Mind. This outfit was described in retrospect by Billboard as a 'lost gem, one of the real sleepers of the psychedelic pop era'. Goldberg, 30 years on, said of this period and its youth culture: 'It was a chaotic, crazy time. We were like guinea pigs for chemists and drug dealers. Some people went too far. I came through in one piece with a brain and mind fairly intact.'

In 1968 Goldberg played electric piano on the Bloomfield-Kooper-Stills Supersession and in 1969 made the 'solo' album Barry Goldberg and Friends and the aforementioned Two Jews Blues (apparently with no apostrophe). More solo work followed: Streetman, 1970, Blasts from My Past, 1971, and then, with no commercial success from any of these records, his record deal was over. He was at a loss. He looked up Bob Dylan.

ROBERT SHELTON reports that 'for two days running they jammed for hours. Later, Goldberg went to Dylan's place at Woodstock, jamming there with DOUG SAHM. . . . Goldberg got an offer to do a single for RCA, but Dylan told him to hold off. The next day Dylan rang him and said: "I'm on the phone with JERRY WEXLER from Atlantic Records and I think we can work out a deal, but I'm gonna have to produce you; that's cool, isn't it?"'

It was August 1973 when they went into the Muscle Shoals studios in Sheffield, Alabama, for five days of sessions for this album, co-produced, in the end, by Dylan and Wexler. Dylan can be heard on background vocals on 'Stormy Weather', 'Silver Moon', 'Minstrel Show' and 'Big City Woman', and he supplies percussion—as does Wexler—on 'It's Not the Spotlight', the album's one song Goldberg had co-written with GERRY GOFFIN (who was by now often the lyricist for his compositions). Goldberg played guitar as well as keyboards on the album, and sang the lead vocals; he had a horn section and a number of other musicians (including Muscle Shoals regular, BARRY BECKETT). The album, one of the many muted projects Dylan busied himself with in 1973, was released that December under a new deal Goldberg had with Atco, the subsidiary label of Atlantic Records.

Their professional paths crossed again in March 1977 when Goldberg was on piano on the sessions for LEONARD COHEN's album Death of a Ladies' Man in Los Angeles, produced by PHIL SPECTOR, which Dylan and ALLEN GINSBERG dropped in on, contributing backing vocals to the track 'Don't Go Home With Your Hard-On'. Eight years later, Goldberg played piano behind Dylan on a session in Hollywood on June 16, 1985 that yielded nothing Dylan has ever released but did include circulated takes of that sweet song by Allen Toussaint, 'Freedom for the Stallion', which Dylan sings with delicacy and feeling.

In November 1989, in New Bloomington, Indiana, Goldberg was again on piano (and this time shared vocals too) among the crowd of musicians backing Dylan on the subdued recording he made of 'People Get Ready' for use on the soundtrack of the film Catchfire, directed by and starring Dennis Hopper (in which Dylan appears unbilled as a 'chainsaw artist'). And finally, so far, Dylan and Goldberg met up when they both worked on Gerry Goffin's 1996 album Back Room Blood, which includes many Goldberg-Goffin compositions.

Goldberg, meanwhile, has worked on a number of film scores, including that other Dennis Hopper film with the confusingly similar title Flashback (1990), and the 1989 film Pow Wow Highway and has produced albums for, among others, Percy Sledge. With his Chicago bluesman's hat on, he has more recently been music supervisor to the PBS 'Muddy Waters Tribute Concert' at the Kennedy Center, and part of the group now called Chicago Blues Reunion, whose other veterans are Nick Gravenites, Harvey Mandel, Tracy Nelson, Corky Siegel and that other Newport '65 man, drummer SAM LAY. In 2005 they issued an odd but compelling two-disc set, one a CD and the other a DVD, covering their reunion concert plus documentary extras and interviews about their own history on Chicago's North Side blues scene. Twisting Goldberg's old motto but slightly, it's called Buried Alive in the Blues.

[Barry Goldberg: Barry Goldberg and Friends, Cherry Red CR-5105, US, 1969; Streetman, nia, US, 1970; Blasts from My Past, Buddah BDS-5081, 1971; Barry Goldberg, Sheffield, AL, Aug 1973, Atco SD 7040, US, 1973; Barry Goldberg & Friends Live, Buddah BDS-5684, 1976. Goldberg & Bloomfield: Two Jews Blues, Buddah BDS-5029, 1969. Electric Flag: The Trip, Sidewalk ST-5908, US, 1967; Long Time Comin', Columbia 9597, US, 1968. Barry Goldberg Reunion: Barry Goldberg Reunion, Buddah 5012, nia; Blowin' My Mind, Epic 26199, nia. Various Artists soundtrack CD Backtrack, WTG 46042, US, 1990. Chicago Blues Reunion: Buried Alive in the Blues,

33rd Street (CD & DVD), US, 2005. Quotes from interview by Scott Benarde in 'Rock of Ages: Pop Stars Sing Out About Their Judaism', posted online Nov 16, 2000, seen 14 Jun 2005 at www.jewhoo.com/editor/columns/rockofages5.html; this has been incorporated into the book as by Scott R. Benarde, Stars of David: Rock'n'Roll's Jewish Stories, Lebanon, NH: University Press of New England, 2003. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., 1987, p.426.]

Goldberg, Steven [1941 -] Steven Goldberg was born in New York City on October 14, 1941. His article 'Bob Dylan and the Poetry of Salvation' was one of the earliest essays to sweep aside as unimportant both Dylan's earlier work of social and political protest and much of his radical mid-1960s work, and to argue instead that only with the John Wesley Harding album ('Dylan's supreme work') did he become an 'artist in the Zen sense'. This article, which appeared when Nashville Skyline was Dylan's newest LP and shortly before the release of Self Portrait, seemed attuned to the contemporaneous move toward the countryside, towards setting up communes and growing your own crops of drugs, and dropping out of America's hideous 'Great Society'. Goldberg singled out the then-unissued track 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' as signaling Dylan's change from politics to mysticism.

Goldberg's own incantatory, mystic prose flowed like this: he wrote that Dylan 'was searching for the courage to release his grasp on all the layers of distinctions that give us meaning, but, by virtue of their inevitably setting us apart from the life-flow, preclude our salvation. All such distinctions, from petty jealousies and arbitrary cultural values to the massive, but ultimately irrelevant, confusions engendered by psychological problems, all the endless repetitions that those without faith grasp in order to avoid their own existence—all of these had to be released.'

Sizeable chunks of this essay were drawn upon in the chapter 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune: Drugs and Mysticism' in MICHAEL GRAY's early study Song & Dance Man: The Art of Bob Dylan (1972), for which Dylan's office gave permission for the entire lyric of this unreleased song to be published.

Goldberg has published many books on popular social science and contemporary culture since his 1970 essay on Dylan and was until recently chairman of the Department of Sociology at City College, City University of New York. In his 2003 book Fads and Fallacies in the Social Sciences he republished the essay on Dylan—leading one reviewer, Berel Dov Lerner, to complain that the book 'could have been no less appropriately titled All Kinds of Stuff That I Wrote That Has Not Yet Been Republished in a Book.' This was churlish. Certainly the Dylan essay deserved to be republished—though this was not its first reappearance; it had been collected in CRAIG McGREGOR's round-up of Dylan writings in 1972 and again in 1990.

Goldberg also appears, though using the pseudonym S.J. Estes, as the compiler of the Dylan discography inside ROBERT SHELTON's long-gestated book No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan in 1986.

Steven Goldberg still lives and works in New York City.

[Steven Goldberg: 'Bob Dylan and the Poetry of Salvation', Saturday Review no.53, 30 May 1970, collected in Craig McGregor, ed., Bob Dylan: A Retrospective, 1972, reissued as Bob Dylan, the Early Years: A Retrospective, 1990; and extracted in Michael Gray, Song & Dance Man: The Art of Bob Dylan, 1972, revised & updated as Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, 1999. Steven Goldberg, When Wish Replaces Thought: Why So Much of What You Believe Is False, Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1992; Why Men Rule: A Theory of Male Dominance, Peru, IL: Open Court Books, 1993; Culture Clash: Law and Science in America, New York: New York University Press, 1994; Fads and Fallacies in the Social Sciences, Amherst, NY: Humanity Books, 2003. Berel Dov Lerner, review of this last, seen on http://mentalhelp.net, 12 Sep 2005. Further data from Steven Goldberg, phone call to this writer 27 Feb 2006.]

Goldstein, Harvey [1944 -] Harvey Goldstein was born on the 4th of July in New York City, and grew there up adept at guitar but keener on playing electric bass. At 19, rebelling against his conformist Jewish upbringing, he started using the stage name Harvey Brooks after he 'got into a Jew boy scenario', as he put it: he was attacked during a break at a gig in Michigan in the early 60s. 'I took that name to avoid conflicts. . . . I thought, "Just let me get a professional name without any connotations, the blandest name I can find." In those days you wanted to blend in. It was easier to blend in than fight your way in. . . . If I had to do it again, I wouldn't.'

Either way, his career took off in 1965. 'AL KOOPER called me and told me Dylan needed a bass player. I didn't even know who Dylan was.' He arrived at Columbia's New York Studio A next day, July 30, to find himself on the sessions for Highway 61 Revisited. Plunging straight in, he played that day on the album take of 'From a Buick 6', on the outtake version that somehow got issued on the Japanese LP instead, and on the 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?' single that was issued mislabelled as 'Positively 4th Street'. Two mistakes out of three in the issuing but not in the playing. The next session, on August 2, wrapped up 'Highway 61 Revisited', 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues', 'Queen Jane Approximately' and 'Ballad of a Thin Man'; and finally, on August 4 (it is now believed), 'Desolation Row'. Goldstein knew who Bob Dylan was by then. 'That session,' he says, 'created a career in pop music for me.' And, you might say, a niche in history.

It wasn't quite over then, either. On the early electric gigs that followed NEWPORT '65, starting at Forest Hills, New York, that August 28, Goldstein played live in Dylan's band along with Al Kooper, LEVON HELM and ROBBIE ROBERTSON. This unit didn't last, and after a Hollywood Bowl concert on September 3, Goldstein departed.

He went on to play sessions and concerts with a wide range of people, from Miles Davis (he's on Bitches Brew and Big Fun) to PHIL OCHS, from JUDY COLLINS to the Fabulous Thunderbirds, from Richie Havens to the Doors, from Eric Andersen and DAVID BLUE to Graham Bond, John Martyn and John Cale, and from the BLOOMFIELD-Kooper-Stills Supersession to the 1968 Mama Cass solo album Dream a Little Dream of Me.

He was also a member of the short-lived first and second line-ups of the Electric Flag, remaining in it long enough to take part in its sessions for the soundtrack of the film The Trip (1967), the first 'proper' album, Long Time Comin' (1968) and the next, Electric Flag—on which Goldstein played not only bass and guitar but saxophone, and was co-producer. He left, in time to play on the long Bitches Brew sessions, which stretched from August 1969 to March 1970. Soon after that, and in quite some contrast, he played bass once again for Bob Dylan, on New Morning.

In the 1990s Goldstein moved to Arizona, to live a slower, cleaner life, but in 2001 he was in sighted in the suitably named group Raisins in the Sun, along with Jules Shear, Paul Q. Kolderie, Chuck Prophet and Jim Dickinson. The subtle ffwd ('Calgary's news & entertainment weekly') described them as 'a great fuckband: a bunch of seasoned vets who can play the hell out of their instruments and write songs in their sleep—which I think they might have here. The record as a whole falls right between Hater and THE TRAVELING WILBURYS . . .'

[Electric Flag: The Trip, Sidewalk ST-5908, US, 1967; Long Time Comin', Columbia 9597, US, 1968; Electric Flag, Columbia 9714, US, 1968. Raisins in the Sun: Raisins in the Sun, Rounder, US, 2001. Goldstein quotes c/o interview by Scott Benarde in 'Rock of Ages: Pop Stars Sing Out About Their Judaism' posted online Nov 16, 2000, seen 14 Jun 2005 at www.jewhoo.com/editor/columns/rockofages4.html; this has been incorporated into the book as by Scott R. Benarde, Stars of David: Rock'n'Roll's Jewish Stories, Lebanon, NH: University Press of New England, 2003. ffwd review, 22 Mar 2001, seen online 14 Jun 2005 at www.ffwdweekly.com/Issues/2001/0322/cd2.htm.]

'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking' [2003 version] Dylan certainly changed 'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking' when he revisited his 1979 gospel song for the various-artists album Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan, in a version that re-writes the lyrics so that they bring in, by allusion, JIMMIE RODGERS, THE CARTER FAMILY and Oscar Wilde, and as a recording offers a duet between Dylan and MAVIS STAPLES.

This ferocious version, which seems to pace menacingly between the spiritual and secular worlds, begins with a drum beat reminiscent of 'Like a Rolling Stone' and offers one stanza sung by Dylan at his most phlegmishly dreadful, before stopping for a spoken routine played out by Mavis Staples and Bob that is a very funny, twisted update of a hokum routine on a recording by Rodgers and the Carter Family from 1931, titled 'The Carter Family and Jimmie Rodgers in Texas'—or, on one of the six labels that issued it at the time, 'The Carter Family Visits Jimmie Rodgers'. (It was recorded straight after the unsurprisingly similar 'Jimmie Rodgers Visits the Carter Family'; both had also been attempted unsuccessfully, at the previous day's session.) In the 1931 version, after Rodgers sings one stanza, the Carters arrive and say what a nice place Jimmie has in Texas, and he says yes, and that from his porch you can see all the way to Mexico; the 2003 'update' has Mavis saying what a nice place Bob has in California, and he says yes, and that from his porch you can see all the way to Hawaii. Both dialogues include proposing to 'knock over' a couple of chickens and eat them fried without delay.

(They do not attempt to duplicate the part where A.P. Carter, not so impressed, declares of Texas that he's 'seen further and seen less' than anywhere else he's ever been. And indeed the exchange captured here, scripted though it is, actually encapsulates the classic clash that lies at the heart of this 'meeting': Jimmie Rodgers is relaxed, delivers his lines pretty well and speaks for the mischievous world of the honky-tonk, innovation, bluegrass and pleasure; the Carters, stiff and prim as boards, adopt the stance of deeply conservative backwoods religion—folks who'd have been preachers if their kin could have afforded it. If there's any faint parallel to this in the Dylan-Staples version, it's a mirror image, in which Bob sounds like the tormented, mad, backsliding Calvinist and Mavis is the relaxed soulful mama encouraging him to sing away his blues. A small extra point of difference: the Dylan-Staples track really was recorded in California, whereas the Rodgers-Carter track was cut not in Texas but Louisville, Kentucky.)

After their wondrous dialogue (the best thing Dylan's done since "Love and Theft"), Mavis and Bob duet on several more stanzas, utterly rewritten from the Slow Train Coming lyrics, yet pulling in lines and phrases from other Carter Family records. As Christopher Rollason has it:

'The "welcome table" in stanza 2 was already laid in "River of Jordan", while in stanza 6 "There are storms on the ocean / Storms out on the mountain too . . . / Oh Lord / You know I have no friend without you" combines elements from "The Storms Are on the Ocean" . . . and "Can't Feel at Home"

. . . the latter number has the Carters singing: "Oh Lord, you know I have no friend like you".' (Rollason adds that all these tracks are on a Carter Family 5-CD box set issued in 2001.)

Dylan's re-written lyric ends by alluding to a rather different source, a reversal of the well-known couplet that ends Oscar Wilde's 'The Ballad of Reading Gaol'. Wilde, elaborating on the theme that 'each man kills the thing he loves', writes that 'The coward does it with a kiss, / The brave man with a sword!'; Dylan and Mavis end the song with this: 'A brave man will kill you with a sword / A coward with a kiss.'

[Bob Dylan & Mavis Staples: 'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking', Malibu, CA, 4 Mar 2002 (with Dylan's tour band plus Mavis & Yvonne Staples), Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan, Columbia/ Legacy CK 89015 (US) / Columbia COL 511126 2 (UK), 2003. Jimmie Rodgers & the Carter Family: 'The Carter Family and Jimmie Rodgers in Texas' (aka 'The Carter Family Visits Jimmie Rodgers'), Louisville, KY, 12 Jun 1931. The Carter Family: The Carter Family 1927–1934 (5-CD box set), JSP JSPCD7701, UK, 2001. Christopher Rollason: "'It is only he who can reduce me to tears": Review of the tribute CD Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan', Bob Dylan Critical Corner, www.geocities.com/Athens/Oracle/6752, 18 Aug 2003. Oscar Wilde: 'The Ballad of Reading Gaol', 1st published 1898.

NB. In 2006 came a DVD version of Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan; it excludes Mavis & Bob's 'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking' but offers instead footage of Dylan's burning performance of 'When He Returns' from Toronto, 20 Apr 1980; dir. Michael B. Borofsky; Burning Rose Video/ Image Entertainment ID2894RBDVD, US, 2006 (officially dated 2005).]

Good as I Been to You [1992] Dylan's return to a solo acoustic album, 28 years after the last. Much maligned as being vocally impoverished and incompetently self-produced, and bemoaned for its lack of Dylan compositions, this endlessly rewarding demonstration of the strengths of traditional folksong and pre-war acoustic blues, the two forms used in flexible alternation, sets up all manner of resonance and dialogue, shifting and circling and forming a richly persuasive whole that works both as an impassioned treasury of folksong and an intimate revelation of how firmly some specifics of Dylan's own early styles and songs were founded upon this material.

There are striking changes of genre and oeuvre between one song and another—perhaps most spectacularly the wonderful switch of worlds between 'Tomorrow Night', that brilliant re-creation of the American 1940s radio-romance poor-white-trash world (the world of Vernon and Gladys Presley and their little boy ELVIS in their shack in Tupelo, Mississippi, in act), and the insouciant self-confident grace of the articulate working-class in 18th century Ireland evoked by 'Arthur McBride'. Yet these dramatic contrasts jostle inside a cohesive whole: for the unity of the collection is as marked as its contrasts.

There is, to begin with, that striking cavalcade of individual names: Frankie, Albert, Jim Jones, Blackjack Davey, Little Maggie, Arthur McBride, Diamond Joe and Froggie in the song-titles alone, and a comparable catalogue in the last song's narrative. Going far beyond this, however, is the songs' thematic unity.

Of course, we might demur at the idea that all their thematic common ingredients were significantly in Dylan's mind in compiling the album. Stephen Scobie, reviewing it when it was almost new, wrote: 'I am about to argue that the songs on Good as I Been to You appear to be obsessed with the themes of infidelity and revenge—but if, say, you were to pick at random any 13 songs out of the folk and blues tradition, wouldn't there be a good chance that you would come up with a fair number . . . about unfaithful lovers and avenging spouses?' Yet what Dylan assembles here involves the continual re-exploring of the same sets of themes and correspondences of expression—themes that range far wider than personal infidelity and revenge.

'I ain't gonna tell you no story', he sings in the opening track; 'If you want any more you can sing it yourself', he sings in the last. In between, we have more talk about talk: in the second song, 'Come and listen for a moment lads and hear me tell my tale'; in the seventh, 'There's a song that will linger forever in our ears'; in the tenth, 'Now mark what followed and what did betide . . . / And so to conclude and to finish this speech'; and in the fourth 'Well it's [i.e. my story is] all of a fair and handsome girl.'

The heroine of 'Blackjack Davey' is a 'pretty little miss' in her tender years; so too the heroine of the next is a girl is 'all in her tender years'. At the end of her story is a matching exhortation to Jim Jones' 'Come and listen for a moment lads and hear me tell my tale'—'Come all ye fair and tender girls, wheresoever you may be.' In this song, and also in songs one and three, the heroine pursues her own true love (though all with differing results). In the same three songs there is a love-triangle and a betrayal, while in the sixth there is a posited triangle and in the 12th a betrayal.

In the first there is a shooting, a judge and a hanging; in the second there's a judge, a threatened hanging and a threatened shooting. In the tenth, a threatened execution; in the 11th, a threatened killing. In the first there is 'a .44', in the sixth a rifle and a 'six-shooter'. In the first there is jail, in the 11th the threat of the jailhouse, in the second men in irons, and in the 11th again, the chain-gang. Each of the first three songs features a folk-hero baddie, while 'Diamond Joe' centres around a notorious baddie (though not a folk-hero).

Three songs feature the sea; the second involves exile, the third a sort of exile and the sixth a posited exile. The second, third and tenth emphasise a rejection of ruling class values, while the harsh oppression of a colonial power comes into song two and ten, and in 'Hard Times' there is social injustice and oppression all around. The fourth includes a captain and the wearing of a military (naval) uniform; the tenth includes a sergeant and the wearing of a military (army) uniform. In 'Blackjack Davey' fine clothes are sacrificed; in the adjacent 'Canadee-i-o' fine clothes are gained; in 'Arthur McBride' 'fine clothes' are offered and declined; in 'You Gonna Quit Me' shoes and clothes are bought in vain. In the third song there are horses and an implied blanket ('wrapped up with Blackjack Davey'), and there are horses and blankets too in 'Diamond Joe'.

There are even neat, small conjunctions in the use of children's descriptive phrases, from the opening song's 'rooty-toot-toot', through another's 'rowdy-dow-dow' to the closing song's 'bumble-y-bee'.

Dylan has always had a taste for narrative ballads that offer tales of horses and daughters and hangings, exile and injustice. The songs on Good as I Been to You fit this pattern pretty well. In the end, what is so clear from this collection is not merely that it has the thematic unity of a concept album without any of the potential self-importance, but that while Bob Dylan hasn't written a single one of these songs, the album could hardly be more Dylanesque.

There is a sad decline in Dylan's vocal range, including a dropping away of his once unerring ability to place and control each syllable and each breath, each guitar note and each telling pause, with absolute precision and optimum vividness of communication.

Yet this album, imprecise, errant, at times blurred and furry, is a singular creation that gains as well as loses by Dylan's loss of the effortless certainty of youth. Dark, complex, surreal and fractured, it is like an inspired, lost work from some opium-thralled folk archivist throwing his own torrid genius into celebrating the myriad strengths of anonymously created song: song from before there was a music industry to kill off its mystery and its purpose. Stand-out tracks: 'Hard Times', 'Arthur McBride', 'You're Gonna Quit Me', 'Diamond Joe' and 'Froggie Went a-Courtin''. The fine outtake 'You Belong to Me' was used on the soundtrack of Oliver Stone's film Natural Born Killers.

[Recorded Malibu, CA, Jul-Aug 1992; released as Columbia CK 53200, 3 Nov 1992 (in UK, Columbia 472710 1/2 (LP/CD), Dec 1992. Stephen Scobie: 'As Good as Who's Been to Who?', On the Tracks no. 1, Grand Junction, CO, summer 1993.]

Gooding, Cynthia [1924 - 1988] Cynthia Day Gooding was born in Rochester, Minnesota, on August 12, 1924, and grew up there and in Lake Forrest, Illinois. She also attended school in Toronto, before spending some time in the late 1940s in Mexico City, where she learned that she had a voice and how to play the guitar. A 'name' folk revivalist singer by the end of the 1950s, she was not an especially good one—in one critic's phrase, 'almost a paradigm for inauthenticity' (an American Julie Felix, perhaps), but it might be more reasonable to see her work as typifying the 1950s 'mainstream folk' style of people like THEODORE BIKEL (with whom she recorded) and Burl Ives.

She first met Dylan in 1959 in Minneapolis, where she gave a concert and he buttonholed her at a party afterwards and made her listen to him play—for half an hour, according to SPIDER JOHN KOERNER's roommate Harry Weber: 'Cynthia was amazed. It was quite a sight, because she was somebody then.' Later, when Dylan was fresh to New York, Cynthia saw him perform at Gerde's Folk City and bumped into him all over the place, and wrote to Harry Weber, describing him: 'People listen . . . he talks and he laughs and just when they are about to catch him in a lie, he takes out his harmonica and blows them down.'

Cynthia was clearly keen on him. You can hear it in her voice and in the whole flirtatious stance she took with him when he was a guest on her radio show 'Folksinger's Choice' in early 1962. He was 20; she was 37. Probably recorded that January 13 at WBAI Radio in New York, it consisted of Ms. Gooding coaxing from Dylan an entertaining version of his fictional biography and much further chat, in between his singing no less than 11 pieces. Very interestingly, they run a gamut of influences right from the off, which is a version of HANK WILLIAMS' 'I Heard That Lonesome Whistle Blow', running through BUKKA WHITE's 'Fixin' to Die' to HOWLIN' WOLF's 1956 hit 'Smokestack Lightnin'', treated as if it were a pre-war blues from the 1920s—which in a way it was, and certainly granted Dylan's early love of electric post-war blues and R&B it's especially fascinating here to hear him transmute this into the acceptable sound of acoustic folk blues. Then comes WOODY GUTHRIE's 'Hard Traveling', Dylan's own early 'protest song', 'The Death of Emmett Till', his early song 'Standing on the Highway', the traditional 'Roll On, John', THE MEMPHIS JUG BAND's 'Stealin'', 'It Makes a Long Time Man Feel Bad'—which Dylan says here that he learnt from RALPH RINZLER (of THE GREENBRIAR BOYS), BIG JOE WILLIAMS' 'Baby Please Don't Go' and finally his own adroit reworking of 'Penny's Farm' (a track on the seminal HARRY SMITH collection) into the charming 'Hard Times in New York Town'. The programme was broadcast on March 11 that year—eight days before the release of his début album, which, on this show, he was already dismissing as no longer representative of him.

A second recording took place in Cynthia Gooding's apartment, probably that same March. This one comprises Dylan singing 'Ballad of Donald White', 'Wichita (Going to Louisiana)', 'Acne' (shared vocal with unknown other person), 'Rocks and Gravel' (with humming by an unknown other person), '(It Makes) A Long Time Man Feel Bad' and 'Ranger's Command'.

According to OLOF BJÖRNER, Dylan returned to Gooding's radio show that October, though no recording of such a performance seems to exist. Björner says Dylan performed with John Gibbons and that one song performed was 'TB Blues' which was also mentioned by Dylan a week later, when he appeared on the Billy Faier Show on the same station, WBAI.

Gooding's style of folk singing was never so challenged, never made to sound so enervated, as by the approach to folksong Bob Dylan embodied. Her Elektra producer, the prolific Jac Holzman, summed her up as a 'tall, beautiful, intelligent, multilingual Village folk singer'. It wasn't enough.

Cynthia Gooding died of ovarian cancer at Princeton Hospital, New Jersey, on February 10, 1988.

[Cynthia Gooding: The Queen of Hearts—English Folksongs, Elektra EKL 11 (mono 10-inch), US, 1953; Italian Folk Songs, Elektra EKL 17 (mono 10-inch), US, 1954; Faithful Lovers and Other Phenomena, Elektra EKL 107, 1956; Turkish and Spanish Folk Songs, EKLP 6, nia; Mexican Folk Songs, EKLP 8, nia; Queen of Hearts—Early English Folk Songs (mostly same as 1953 LP same title), EKL 131, 1958. Theodore Bikel and Cynthia Gooding: A Young Man and a Maid (Love Songs of Many Lands), Elektra EKL 109, 1956. Cynthia Gooding and Yves Tessier: French and Italian Folksongs, Elektra EKL 221, c.1962. Various Artists, Folk Festival, Elektra SMP-2, 1956, incl. 'Bella Regazza' & 'The Derby Ram' by Cynthia Gooding, and 'Coplas' by Cynthia Gooding & Theodore Bikel. The 1957 Various Artists LP Folk Pops 'n Jazz Sampler (what a title!), Elektra SMP-3, incl. her 'Lass of the Low Countrie'. Folk Sampler Five, Elektra SMP-5, 1959, incl. her 'Ankaranin Tasina Bak'. The Folk Scene, Elektra SMP-6, 1962, incl. 'Lowlands of Holland'.

Dylan on Cynthia Gooding radio show broadcast WBAI, 11 Mar 1962; unreleased except for 'Roll on John', issued There Is No Eye: Music for Photographs, recordings of musicians photographed by John Cohen, Smithsonian Folkways SFW CD 40091, Washington, D.C., Oct 2001. Olof Bjorner claim at www.bjorner.com/62.htm. Jac Holzman quote from his book Follow the Music: The Life and High Times of Elektra Records in the Great Years of American Pop Culture, Santa Monica, CA: FirstMedia Books, 1998, as quoted online at www.followthemusic.com/whobook.html.]

Goodman, Steve [1948 - 1984] Steve Goodman was born on Chicago's North Side on July 25, 1948, the son of a used car salesman, about whom Steve eventually wrote the song 'My Old Man'. He started learning guitar and writing songs as a young teenager and while at Lake Forest College and the University of Illinois he began to perform in a local club, soon dropping out of college (in 1969) to make music his career. In this he was never financially successful, though he survived early on by writing and singing advertising jingles. He returned to Chicago after a short stint trying his luck in Greenwich Village and in 1971 was recorded performing live on a local album, Gathering at the Earl of Old Town. A support spot to KRIS KRISTOFFERSON that April led to a record deal with Buddah and a first album, Steve Goodman, in 1971. Typically, as soon as Goodman had Kristofferson's attention, he insisted he go and hear another performer who deserved to be discovered too—his friend JOHN PRINE, whose song 'Donald and Lydia' Goodman would cover on his own début album.

That album also offers Goodman's signature song, 'City of New Orleans', which was a hit not for Goodman but for ARLO GUTHRIE—and then again, the year of Goodman's death, for WILLIE NELSON. Also on Steve Goodman's first album is the good-natured parody of a country song 'You Never Even Call Me By My Name' (which Prine had co-written but wouldn't take credit for); this too would become a hit, a couple of years later and for David Allen Coe.

All this tells the Goodman story: he wrote songs others had hits with, and he was, as writer and performer too, much admired by big-name fellow performers. He was a fine guitarist (he plays on all Prine's early albums, just as Prine plays on his) and it's said that when, in solo performances, he broke a guitar string, which was often, he would keep singing while getting a new string out of his pocket, fitting and tuning it, and would then resume his playing unfazed—yet he never broke through as a performer himself. In September 1972, with Arif Mardin as producer, Goodman went into Atlantic's studios in New York to make his second album, Somebody Else's Troubles, and a single, 'Election Year Rag', and for that single, and for the album's title track, Bob Dylan was a participant. Supposedly Goodman was frustrated at Dylan's turning up hours and hours late, and perhaps this is why he doesn't appear on the rest of the material, but he plays piano and sings harmony vocals on these two tracks (both penned by Goodman), along with DAVID BROMBERG on dobro and mandolin, and Prine, among others. The album also included the song that Goodman would come nearest to having a hit with, 'The Dutchman'—the one song he didn't write. When the album was issued, in early 1973, Dylan was credited as Robert Milkwood Thomas.

Though Buddah issued The Essential Steve Goodman in 1974 (which also featured 'Election Year Rag'), it was 1975 before Goodman made his next album, when a label switch gave him greater encouragement and saw an increase in his output. The 1975 album was Jessie's Jig & Other Favorites; then came Words We Can Dance To (1976), Say It in Private (1977) and High and Outside (1978), which included a duet with then-newcomer Nicolette Larson, and Hot Spot (1980). 'Chicago Shorty', as he was dubbed by friends, had also acted as a producer, notably of John Prine's 1978 album Bruised Orange, and formed his own label, Red Pajama Records, for which he duly recorded Artistic Hair and Affordable Art (both 1983) and his last album, Santa Ana Winds, which reached record stores the day after his death.

Goodman had been suffering from leukaemia all his adult life, and from Chicago made regular and frequent trips to New York for treatment. He moved to the West Coast (to Seal Beach, just below Long Beach, in Southern California) at the beginning of the 1980s, and received treatment in Seattle. The Artistic Hair album cover depicted him standing in front of a hairdressing salon of that name, his own head bald from the effects of chemotherapy. On August 31, 1984 he underwent a bone marrow transplant. Twenty days later he died of the liver and kidney failure brought on by his leukemia in hospital in Seattle. He was 36.

[Steve Goodman: 'Eight Ball', 'Chicago Bust Rag' & 'City of New Orleans', Chicago 1970–71, on Various Artists, Gathering at the Earl of Old Town, Dunwich 670, Chicago, 1971, CD-reissued Mountain Railroad, US, 1989; Steve Goodman, NY, 1971, Buddah BDS-5096, US, 1971–2; Somebody Else's Troubles, NY, Sep 1972, Buddah BDS-5121, US, 1973; 'Election Year Rag', Buddah BDA-326, 1973; Artistic Hair, Red Pajama 001, US, 1983; Affordable Art, Red Pajama 002, 1983; Santa Ana Winds, Red Pajama 003, 1984. Many posthumous recordings have been issued, and CD-reissues of the original LPs, some remastered and with extra tracks. There is also a video, Steve Goodman Live From Austin City Limits . . . And More!, including Prine, Guthrie & Kristofferson, nia, US, 2003.]

Gorgoni, Al [1939 -] Albert Gorgoni was born in Philadelphia on October 11, 1939 but moved to the Bronx at 14, took up the guitar and after early dinner-show gigs in Greenwich Village he played on his first demo session in 1959, falling in with the Brill Building crowd and playing on demos for all the pop songwriters of the period, including for GERRY GOFFIN and CAROLE KING, PHIL SPECTOR, Leiber & Stoller and PAUL SIMON. His rhythm guitar-work being youthfully vibrant he was soon asked to play on the real records too, duly playing on 'The Name Game' by Shirley Ellis, 'Sherry', 'Walk Like a Man' and 'Big Girls Don't Cry' by the Four Seasons, 'Leader of the Pack' by the Shangri-Las, 'Chapel of Love' by the Dixie Cups, 'Our Day Will Come' by Ruby & the Romantics and many others. From 1963 onwards, as the pop business changed, Gorgoni shifted into arranging, producing and songwriting (though this last was not his strong suit), while still playing on sessions of some note, among them VAN MORRISON's historic 1967 Bang sessions (including 'Brown-Eyed Girl'), the Monkees' 'I'm a Believer', '1-2-3' by Len Barry, 'At Seventeen' by Janis Ian (and three of her albums), Melanie's Leftover Wine, Simon & Garfunkel's 'The Sound of Silence' and, er, the Archies' 'Sugar Sugar'. He was also producer and/or arranger on the New Christy Minstrels' album The New Christy Minstrels and albums by B.J. Thomas and Astrud Gilberto and has played on albums by NEIL DIAMOND, CAROLE BAYER SAGER and the pioneering Blood, Sweat & Tears album Child Is Father to the Man. He has also recorded with Aretha Franklin, Laura Nyro, RICHARD & MIMI FARIÑA, JOAN BAEZ, Bobby Darin, Herbie Mann and Marvin Gaye & Tammi Terrell. All told, that's some track record.

Gorgoni has also written and played music for films and TV, but in the 1970s and since has more keenly worked on advertising jingles and other ad campaigns, including for Chevrolet and Frontier Airlines. The ad on which RAY CHARLES sings Gorgoni's 'It Couldn't Be Anything But Maxwell House' is one of those Bob Dylan deplored in the 1985 Biograph interview (before, of course, selling lingerie and Starbucks himself). Gorgoni's other clients have included the obesity-inducing triumvirate of McDonald's, Burger King and Colonel Sanders' Kentucky Fried Chicken. Naturally it would be churlish to suggest that this is amoral work and that Al Gorgoni is a fool if he eats at these places and a hypocrite if he doesn't.

Back in the much cleaner era of 1965, Gorgoni's career intersected with Dylan's directly. He was brought in to play on the sessions for Bringing It All Back Home that January, and is there on rhythm guitar on every track, and also the single of 'If You Goota Go, Go Now' released in Europe and the alternate take of the same song later released on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 (on which his credit misspells him Gorgone).

However, his real place in history comes from the fact that he was there at the first of the Highway 61 Revisited sessions and not at the second one. That is, he was there on June 15, playing rhythm guitar while Dylan was on piano and AL KOOPER, on guitar, was chastened to find in MIKE BLOOMFIELD a player so much his superior. FRANK OWENS was on the organ and along with drums and bass that day they worked on the fast version of 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry' and on 'Sitting on a Barbed Wire Fence' and then they began to work, without success, on 'Like a Rolling Stone'. By the end of the session, then, Al Gorgoni had played on outtakes of all three numbers and they too appear (though he goes uncredited) on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 (and in the case of several 'Like a Rolling Stone's on the Highway 61 Interactive CD-rom also).

Next day, though, Al Gorgoni was absent—and as a result, Dylan moved over from piano to rhythm guitar, which meant that PAUL GRIFFIN, who had replaced Frank Owens as keyboards player, moved over from organ to piano, and that is why the organ was free for Al Kooper to play, resulting in the classic recording of 'Like a Rolling Stone'. He wasn't on it, but in this crucial sense, Al Gorgoni was the key—and unlocked that revolutionary door.

[Main sources: www.gorgoni.net and e-mail exchange with this writer 26 Jan 2006. Up-to-date details on personnel at the June 1965 sessions from Derek Barker, researched for & given in 'So You Want to Be a Rock & Roll Star: The Story of "Like a Rolling Stone"', Isis no.120, UK, May 2005, plus phone calls to this writer, 26 Jan 2006.]

'Gotta Serve Somebody' [1979] Recorded at the Muscle Shoals studios in Sheffield, Alabama, on May 4, 1979, this is one of the standout tracks on Dylan's first Born Again album, Slow Train Coming, and its rather vengeful-sounding chorus—'It might be the devil or it might be the Lord / But you gotta serve somebody' has both an Old and a New Testament basis. Joshua 24:15, in a passage dealing with the need to put away other idols and choose to serve God instead, begins: 'And if it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom ye will serve'. Like Dylan's song, this urges that vacillation and moral shiftiness be renounced in favour of clear-sightedness about a clear and unavoidable choice. (As Deuteronomy 30:19 makes clear: '. . . I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore choose life . . .') This gotta-serve-somebody theme is taken up in Matthew 6:24: 'No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon.'

Yet the chorus of this blues-structured song also reformulates blues lyric poetry and echoes aspects of the older genre of the Negro Spiritual. There is a formulation which, beginning with 'Ashes to ashes and dust to dust', then adds any one of a number of permutations of a clear-cut, no-middle-way choice, presented as 'if A don't get you then Z must'; these include 'New York don't get me, Chicago must' and 'The police don't get you, now the undertaker must'. One of these, from Joe Evans, prefigures Dylan's 'Gotta Serve Somebody' chorus: 'Ashes to ashes and dust to dust / And if God don't have me you know the devil must.'

This is not the Dylan song's only debt. Both MEMPHIS SLIM's song 'Mother Earth' and Dylan's 'Gotta Serve Somebody' owe a modest indebtedness to the old Negro Spiritual 'Ev'rybody Got to Die', which runs like this: 'Rich and poor, great and small / Got to meet in Judgment Hall / Ev'rybody who is living / Ev'rybody got to die . . . / Young and old, short and tall / Got to meet in Judgment Hall / Ev'rybody got to die.'

But the debt of Dylan's song to Memphis Slim's is more than a modest one. This is from the 1966 version of his 'Mother Earth': 'You may own a half a city, even diamonds and pearls . . . / You may play at racehorses, you may own a racetrack / You may have enough money baby to buy anything you like / Don't care how great you are, don't care what you're worth / When it all end up you got to go back to Mother Earth.'

The core idea, the structure of the verses as you-may-be-rich-or-poor listings, the specific ways these are expressed—not just the 'you may own x or you may own y' and the occasional judicious use of that 'even z', but the effective device of quantum-leaping what 'rich' might mean, from 'you may play at racehorses' to 'you may own a racetrack', which Dylan matches with his rather less neat 'you might be somebody's landlord, you might even own banks'—and the insistent 'ain't no escaping' that is the message of the chorus: all these, duplicated in Dylan's lyric, are there in Memphis Slim's.

An echo of this same formulation lingers in secular form in another song, one the teenage Bob Dylan would have been familiar with, ELVIS PRESLEY's fourth single, 'Baby Let's Play House': 'You may go to college, you may go to school / You may drive a pink Cadillac but don't you be nobody's fool / . . . Come back baby, I wanna play house with you.' This was written by Arthur Gunter (his version was an R&B hit earlier in 1955), though it was Elvis himself who threw in the line 'You may own a pink Cadillac': the one which, as it happens, best fits the pattern of the 'Mother Earth'/'Gotta Serve Somebody' lyrics. And the line Elvis dropped to accommodate his Cadillac was 'You may have religion . . .' Dylan's core contribution is that he picks that religious ingredient up again and re-entwines it with the secular formulations of Memphis Slim.

'Gotta Serve Somebody' has become one of his 30 most performed songs, with well over 400 concert appearances in the first 25 years of its life. And back in February 1980, at the televised Grammy Awards, it was this song's chastising burn that Dylan chose to hurl at a a glitzy audience which, having so clearly chosen to serve mammon, was satisfactorily discomfited by its lyric. Whether Dylan the man, as against the artist, was entitled to preach that gospel is another matter. But one of the 'you-may-be-rich' listings in his song seems to allude more to his own life than to Memphis Slim's lyric. Those who remember pictures of the Dylans' white-elephant Malibu home, with its ostentatious dome of copper at the top, will get a flash of recognition here: 'You might be living in a mansion / You might live in a dome . . .' In the midst of all this lip-smacking, it's a quietly slipped-in but honourable self-rebuke.

[Bob Dylan: 'Gotta Serve Somebody', Grammy Awards, LA, 27 Feb 1980, televised CBS-TV. Joe Evans: 'New Huntsville Jail', NY, 20 May 1931; Early Country Music, Historical HLP-8002, Jersey City, NJ, late 1960s. 'Ev'rybody Got to Die' reprinted (with the minstrelisation of the text removed) from H.A. Chambers, ed., The Treasury of Negro Spirituals, London: Blandford Press, 1964. Memphis Slim: 'Mother Earth', Chicago, 1951, Premium 867, Chicago 1951; 'Mother Earth', NY, 1961, Memphis Slim: All Kinds of Blues, Original Blues Classics OBC 507, US, 1961 CD-reissued OBCCD 507, nia. Arthur Gunter: 'Baby Let's Play House', Nashville, 1954, Excello 2047, US, 1955. Elvis Presley: 'Baby Let's Play House', Memphis, 5 Feb 1955, Sun 217, Memphis, 1955 (HMV POP 305, UK, 1957).]

Gover, Robert [1929 -] Robert Gover is the author of a cult bohemian novel of the end of the 1950s, One Hundred Dollar Misunderstanding, about a white college boy, a 14-year-old black prostitute and their 'riotous, crazy weekend' together. The book is largely forgotten and has not perhaps stood up well, yet by its very datedness and embarrassment quotient it says plenty about what was regarded as daring subject matter in the period when Bob Dylan was coming to young adulthood. It is eloquent by default about how uptight Eisenhower's America was about things in general and race in particular.

In an interview by Studs Terkel in May 1963, Dylan not only mentions the book as one that articulates contemporary consciousness, one that 'actually comes out and states something that's actually true, that everybody thinks about', but also claims friendship with the author. His first words on the subject are: 'I've got a friend who wrote a book called One Hundred Dollar Misunderstanding. I don't know if it's around Chicago. . . . This guy Robert Gover wrote it.'

Gover was born in Philadelphia on November 2, 1929. His book was published in 1961 by Grove Press, that great Greenwich Village-based progressive publishing house which first published, in the same era, Henry Miller's Tropic of Cancer (1961), William Burroughs' Naked Lunch (1962) and the first American edition of Lawrence's Lady Chatterley (1959). One Hundred Dollar Misunderstanding was published in this milieu and was duly a mildly scandalous success, a cult item, championed by Gore Vidal and others. It was also published in Britain in 1961 by a similarly 'minority' publishing house, Neville Spearman, and went quickly into UK paperback the same year. Gover's novel went on through many printings and by the 1964 third printing of a US mass-market paperback edition, its cover was trailering a forthcoming Broadway musical. This never happened.

In 1965 its author began studying astrology and by the mid-1970s had begun to focus on 'stock market astrology'. He has published seven novels, a number of short stories and the non-fiction study Voodoo Contra, and belongs to, among other bodies, the International Federation of Business Astrologers. Now in his late 70s he lives in Rehoboth Beach, Delaware, and keeps working.

In 2005 he published Time and Money: The Economy and the Planets. He also confirmed that he and Dylan had indeed known each other:

> 'Dylan and I met in a bar in Greenwich Village back when his first album first appeared. We were introduced by a journalist who was interviewing me about my first novel. Dylan and I sneaked off to a Spanish restaurant to have dinner and talk. We got along like long lost brothers. During the dinner, Bobby wanted to let me hear a song he had written not long before, so pulled out his guitar and began playing and singing. The restaurant management threatened to throw us out if we didn't quiet down, so we finished our meal and then went to a club where Bobby asked to be allowed to play this song, even though he was not on the program that evening. He appeared on stage and delivered the song. I think it was called "The Masters of War" then.
>
> 'Just so happened his manager had stopped by the club in the meantime and was upset by this unpaid appearance, and gave Bobby a scolding afterwards. We then went out drinking and talking till the wee hours and met the next day for brunch and continued our intense conversations. I then had to leave New York on other business and later wrote him a note, but never heard back from him. . . . I don't know if he ever got the note.
>
> 'So our friendship was brief but very intense . . . our brief encounter was a highlight for me. Over the years I've listened to his music and been sustained through rough times by it.'

[Robert Gover: One Hundred Dollar Misunderstanding, New York: Grove Press, & London: Neville Spearman, 1961; New York: Ballantine Books, 1964; testimony re knowing Dylan, e-mail to the present writer 19 Sep 2005. Bob Dylan interview by Studs Terkel, Radio WFMT, Chicago, May 1963; most recently reprinted Granta no.90, London, summer 2005, pp.243–54.]

grandma and Walpole's cat When, on 'Going, Going, Gone', from Planet Waves, grandma is recollected as saying 'Boy, go follow your heart / I know you'll be fine at the end of the line / All that's gold doesn't shine', her old, simple wisdom is deftly stressed by Dylan having her speak that last truism, that neat opposite of 'all that glisters is not gold'—a line that, while often held to be from Shakespeare, in fact conflates two other formulations. The proverb, taken from the Latin and taking in grandma's point as well as the converse, is 'All is not gold that glitters / All that glitters is not gold'. Then an allusion to this by the poet Thomas Gray (1716–1771) gives us the apparently more elevated but in fact merely archaic 'glisters', and not quite as expected: 'Not all that tempts your wand'ring eyes / And heedless hearts, is lawful prize; / Nor all, that glisters, gold.' This comes not from the one poem for which Gray is still remembered, 'Elegy Written in a Country Church-Yard' (published 1751), but from the odd source 'Ode on the Death of a Favourite Cat, Drowned in a Tub of Gold Fishes' (1747). And it wasn't his own cat, it was Horace Walpole's.

Grateful Dead, the In the 1960s, the Grateful Dead were hardly unique in being heavily influenced by Dylan's work, though they were unique. They seized on his material as from 1966, when they took up 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue' and 'She Belongs to Me'. Yet their first album, The Grateful Dead, recorded in January 1967 and released that March, contained no Dylan songs and indeed few originals, the emphasis being on amphetamine-fast, ragged hippie versions of old blues material like 'Sittin' on Top of the World' and numbers by JESSE FULLER and Noah Lewis—material, apart from anything else, that Dylan would have known, and taken from the same folk revival period sources. And no wonder: JERRY GARCIA was an old folkie himself.

The band came into being from the starting point of an acoustic 1963 group, Mother McCree's Uptown Jug Champions, which comprised Garcia, Pigpen (Rod McKernan), John 'Marmaduke' Dawson (later in New Riders of the Purple Sage, which began as a Garcia Dead by-product), Bob Matthews (later a Dead recordings and equipment person) and BOB WEIR. They became the electric band the Warlocks, losing Dawson and Matthews and gaining Bill Kreutzmann (then called Bill Sommers) and, soon afterwards, PHIL LESH. This electric band played its début gig the same month Dylan 'went electric'—July 1965—and soon started dropping acid, tangling with Ken Kesey's Merry Pranksters and renaming themselves the Grateful Dead as their folk-rootsy rock'n'roll became elongated, experimental, stoned and strange, as they acquired an extended family—including second drummer Mickey Hart, lyricist ROBERT HUNTER and acid-manufacturer/sound-engineer/financial benefactor (this last only briefly) Owsley—and as the band became a formative part of the San Francisco psychedelic scene.

This first heyday saw two more studio albums before 1970's Live/Dead, which showed their strength as performers to a wide audience for the first time. Influenced by THE BAND, from whom they were so very different, they made Workingman's Dead and American Beauty in 1971 and then another live double-LP (their first gold album). By 1973, despite the drugs and Pigpen's death in March, and further personnel changes, they were organised enough to set up their own record companies, Grateful Dead Records and Round Records (the latter for less commercial projects). It was the beginning of a fiercely independent but highly competent business machinery that showed many other musicians and singer-songwriters that the record industry could be changed, subdued and made the servant of the music and of the lifestyle the artist required. The family was 150 strong by 1975 and ran, among much else, its own booking agency and its own travel company. They went on to be the exemplar of the permanent touring unit, retaining a 'people's park' consciousness even in the nasty new world of the 1980s. Instead of trying to prosecute bootleggers, they invented the idea of the special tapers' corner, which they provided at every venue (much to Dylan's shock-horror, it's said, the first time he encountered it).

Like a successful songwriter's catalogue, or like Bob Dylan himself, an outfit like the Dead that keeps on working and releases vast amounts of material eventually seems to acquire a momentum and a presence that becomes unstoppable, regardless of what's new or modish in the culture. Yet the underlying strength of the band necessarily remains its music, which has even survived the death of Jerry Garcia in 1995. Nevertheless, people will always disagree about whether the Grateful Dead is a sublime and visionary outfit playing the coolest bravest music in the universe (free form inside structure) or a bunch of self-indulgent white boys who couldn't play in sync for five minutes if they tried, playing to crowds too stoned to care.

These two once-counter-cultural institutions, Dylan and the Dead, first came together in person when Dylan stood side of stage at a five-hour Dead concert in a Jersey City stadium on July 18, 1972, generating false rumours that they were recording together then. They first appeared on the same bill at the SNACK Benefit in San Francisco on March 23, 1975—but while Dylan shared the stage with NEIL YOUNG, RICK DANKO, LEVON HELM, TIM DRUMMOND and Ben Keith, none of the Dead joined him; nor did he appear during their own set. However, when Dylan gave his thrilling run of twelve concerts at the Fox Warfield in San Francisco in November 1980, Jerry Garcia was among the guest guitarists there for one night each. He appeared in the middle of the November 16 concert, playing guitar on a run of four numbers, 'To Ramona', 'Ain't Gonna Go to Hell for Anybody', 'Girl of the North Country' and 'Slow Train'.

They were reunited on stage in 1986, when Dylan and the Dead staged two double-bill concerts: at Akron, Ohio, on July 2 (billed 'The Grateful Dead & Dylan') and at Washington, D.C., on July 7 (yep, 'Dylan & the Grateful Dead'). For Dylan, these were two dates among many on his own long tour with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS, but it was unusual for Petty and his band to be billed in such small print as they were for these Dylan/Dead nights. In each case, Dylan's own set was with Petty and band, but he also took the stage during the Dead's sets, at Akron to play guitar on 'Little Red Rooster'and then to take lead vocals (with backing vocals by Bob Weir) on 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right' and 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue', and in Washington to play guitar on 'Satisfaction' and sing on 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue' and 'Desolation Row'.

Next came their brief joint tour of July 1987 (set up by Dylan's manager, Elliot Roberts). Dylan's comments about the rehearsals for these dates, as given in Chronicles Volume One, make it sound as if the Dead knew Dylan's repertoire a lot better than he felt he did, and describe quite disturbingly how distanced he was made to see that he was from his own songs, having approached the rehearsal in the first place assuming that they'd be 'as easy as jumping rope'. This section of his memoir then describes Dylan escaping onto San Rafael's Front Street, stumbling upon an old jazz bar band, having a (rather vaguely explained) eureka moment and then returning to the doubtless unfazed Dead, now feeling that he 'couldn't wait to get started'. He goes on to describe breezing through the shows knowing he could perform 'any of these songs without them having to be restricted to the world of words.' Certainly the evidence of the album is that he hardly had any grip on that world at all. (See also Dylan and the Dead.)

The Dylan songs the Dead re-introduced him to were not all good ones. The wretched 'John Brown' was a mutton-headed, mawkish and crass anti-war song that Dylan himself didn't choose to try at the sessions for either The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan or The Times They Are a-Changin' (that is, at sessions stretching from April 1962 to October 1963), in spite of the prevalence of 'protest songs' on both albums, and by mid-1964 he had dropped the song from his concert repertoire. He disinterred it under the encouragement of the Dead, and after rehearsing it June 1987, they played it in 11 concerts that July. Dylan then re-introduced it on the Never-Ending Tour (1988 onwards) and eventually featured it on the abject MTV Unplugged album of 1995. He has continued to scrape away at it in concert since.

Another song of dubious quality from Dylan's repertoire and which he had never performed live before these Dylan & the Dead concerts was 'Joey', from the 1976 Desire album. It was débuted at the Foxboro concert on Independence Day 1987.

After these joint dates, Dylan wandered off into the fall 1987 tour of Israel and Europe with Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers, and then began the Never-Ending Tour—and surely that fall 1987 tour, with its deranged weirdness, random repertoire and dim lights (and its inclusion of 'Joey' on opening night and 'John Brown' at the second concert) showed Dylan at least as much influenced by the Dead as on the Never-Ending Tour: except that it was in the course of the latter that Dylan started performing, over and over again, some of the Dead's own dreariest songs: 'Alabama Getaway', 'Friend of the Devil' and 'West LA Fadeaway'—plus, less often, 'Touch of Gray' and 'Black Muddy River'. And that's not to mention the lamentable songs co-written by Dylan and Robert Hunter, 'Silvio'—not only a track on the wretched Down in the Groove but also performed live by Dylan a heart-sinking number of times: 592 by the end of 2003—and (though so far only on the album and never live), 'Ugliest Girl in the World'. And when 'Silvio' was recorded, at a session the same month as the Dylan & the Dead rehearsals, Jerry Garcia and Bob Weir both played guitar and sang backing vocals.

For their part, the Grateful Dead went back to music and business as usual—but increasingly they would use Dylan songs in nearly all their performances. Their album Postcards of the Hanging comprises ten such live renditions, cut over a period of almost two decades (plus a 'bonus track' from the Dylan & the Dead rehearsals, 'Man of Peace'), including an interesting 'When I Paint My Masterpiece'. Other Dead releases that include Dylan songs are: Dick's Picks, Vol. 9; Terrapin Station (Limited Edition); Fallout from the Phil Zone; Dick's Picks, Vol. 17; View from the Vault; Dick's Picks, Vol. 21; View from the Vault II; Nightfall of Diamonds; The Golden Road (1965–1973); View from the Vault III; Dick's Picks, Vol. 27; and View from the Vault IV. And taking one relatively recent year at random, 1993, in the course of 81 Grateful Dead concerts they performed (mostly a number of times each) 'Queen Jane Approximately', 'All Along the Watchtower', 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues', 'Desolation Row', 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door', 'Maggie's Farm' and 'When I Paint My Masterpiece'. (Five of the seven from the 1960s, and nothing later than 1973.)

Dylan and the Dead have come back together occasionally since that 1987 tour. Six days after the release of the Dylan & the Dead album—but over 18 months after the concerts themselves—Dylan joined the Dead on stage in Inglewood, CA (February 12, 1989), and played guitar on 'Iko Iko', 'Monkey and the Engineer', 'Alabama Getaway', 'Dire Wolf' and 'Cassidy', and offered guitar plus backing vocals on 'Stuck Inside of Mobile With the Memphis Blues Again', 'Not Fade Away' and 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door.' At a Dylan concert in San Francisco on May 5, 1992, Jerry Garcia came on stage to play guitar during 'Cat's in the Well' and 'Idiot Wind'. At a Dead concert at Madison Square Garden, New York City, on October 17, 1994, Dylan joined them to sing 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35' (with Garcia and Weir both on backing vocals). The following summer, Dylan played five concerts in enormous venues as the 'very special guest' of, i.e. the opening act for, the Grateful Dead. At the last of these, at a stadium in Washington, D.C., on June 25 (1995), Jerry Garcia played guitar on Dylan's encore numbers, 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry' and 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'. Six weeks and three days later, Garcia died of a heart attack. After this, the word 'Grateful' was dropped from the band's name so that after first touring as the Other Ones, they really did become just the Dead.

Four more years on and, perhaps still surprisingly, Dylan's Never-Ending Tour incorporated a 1999 fall Tour on which the opening act was Phil

Lesh & Friends. There were 19 of these concerts, and though Dylan never strayed on stage during Lesh's sets, Lesh made an occasional appearance during Dylan's. The year after, nevertheless, they tried the combination again—though never appearing on stage together—in a series of 32 summer concerts running from June 16 in Portland, Oregon, to July 30 in Stanhope, New Jersey . . . this time giving Lesh the headliner's position. Many Dylan supporters found this bizarre.

Into the 21st century and from July 29 till August 8, 2003, Dylan opened for the Dead at a series of eight 'Summer Getaway' concerts, once more appearing during the band's sets as well as his own. In the course of these Dead sets Dylan shared vocals with Bob Weir on 'Alabama Getaway', 'Goin' Down the Road Feelin' Bad', 'Around and Around', 'Big River', 'Johnny B. Goode' and 'Good Morning Schoolgirl', and also performed (in some cases with Weir on back-up vocals) 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue', 'West LA Fadeaway', 'Friend of the Devil', 'Gotta Serve Somebody', 'Like a Rolling Stone', 'Señor (Tales of Yankee Power)', 'Desolation Row', 'Ballad of a Thin Man', 'Oh Boy', 'Big Boss Man', 'Subterranean Homesick Blues', 'You Win Again', 'Tangled Up in Blue' and 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry'. This time, though, there was a soupçon of Dead participation in two of Dylan's sets too: Phil Lesh played bass and Mickey Hart tambourine on the last number ('Rainy Day Women') on August 5 in Noblesville, Indiana; and in Darien, New York, on August 8, the last of these double bills, Bob Weir played electric guitar on 'Highway 61 Revisited', 'Positively 4th Street', 'Honest With Me', 'Summer Days' and 'Rainy Day Women'.

Did the Grateful Dead re-awake Dylan's interest in traditional material—an interest he revealed in the early days of the Never-Ending Tour? Well, maybe, but the Dylan & the Dead tour rehearsals spend little time on such material, and infinitely more on Dylan's own back catalogue. Nor does he explore folk or old blues material when he goes back on the road after those dates with the Dead, later in 1987. Almost a year passes before he launches the Never-Ending Tour, with a stripped-down band much tighter than the Dead like to be; it's only here that he starts to revisit old ballads and old blues.

The impossibility of ascribing Dylan sources as between the Dead and the folk, blues and country music they themselves draw on is encountered again and again, necessarily. Look, for example, at some of his repertoire at the Bonnaroo 2004 Music Festival in Manchester, Tennessee, that June 9. He performed the traditional 'Samson and Delilah', popularised in the folk revival period by the REV. GARY DAVIS, plus HANK WILLIAMS' 'You Win Again' and MERLE HAGGARD's 'Sing Me Back Home'. You can point out that all these had been in the repertoire of the Grateful Dead—or you can say that Dylan knew all these songs by their original popularisers and composer-performers anyway. Another example: the Dead famously perform a near-endless version of another Rev. Gary Davis number, 'Death Don't Have No Mercy' (it's one of their standards); but aeons earlier, Dylan was recorded performing it himself, along with the further Davis song 'It's Hard to Be Blind', in Minnesota in May 1961. (See also blues, inequality of reward in.)

But did the Dead re-awaken Dylan's interest in playing live? Did they persuade him by example of the virtues of sticking at it, year in year out—of adopting, in other words, a Never-Ending Tour state of mind? Quite possibly. For better or worse.

[Grateful Dead: The Grateful Dead, LA (1 track SF), Jan 1967, Warner Bros. WS-1689, 1967; Postcards of the Hanging: The Grateful Dead Perform the Songs of Bob Dylan, Grateful Dead GDCD 1060, 2002. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, Dylan & the Dead rehearsals & tour comments pp.149–51. A handy source of information is Blair Jackson, Goin' Down the Road: A Grateful Dead Traveling Companion; New York: Harmony Books (paperback), 1992; so is Phil Lesh, Searching for the Sound: My Life with the Grateful Dead, New York: Little, Brown, 2005.]

Graves, Robert [1895 - 1985] Robert von Ranke Graves was born in Wimbledon, then a village outside London, on July 24, 1895. One of ten children, his father was Alfred Perceval Graves, a Gaelic scholar and a minor Irish poet. At Oxford University, to which he won a scholarship, he was rebuked about his English Literature essays in memorable terms: 'Mr. Graves,' he was told severely, 'it appears that you prefer some books to others.'

He enlisted in 1914, was seriously wounded, returned to Oxford, published some war poetry and a biography of his friend T.E. Lawrence (Lawrence of Arabia), and then in 1929 published the controversial memoir Goodbye to All That, which in part deals with the psychological repercussions of the horrors of World War I. It ends with his departure from the UK. He duly lived in Italy, France, the US and the Spanish island of Majorca.

Like T.S. ELIOT, he wrote critical books as well as poetry, though taking a very different stance, not least toward modernism. He also wrote 13 novels, most famously I, Claudius and Claudius the God (both 1934). In 1948 he published his major critical work The White Goddess, formulating his mythology of poetic inspiration, inspired by late 19th century studies of matriarchal societies and goddess cults; its sub-title is A Historical Grammar of Poetic Myth. Seven years later came his minor classic The Greek Myths.

By the 1950s his international reputation was assured; he became Oxford Professor of Poetry 1961–1966. He published, altogether, over 140 books before succumbing in his later years to 'silence and senility'.

Bob Dylan has often cited Graves, specifying The White Goddess as a significant influence upon his own work (which is to say, essentially on the development of his ideas about myth and poetic resources).

This is too large a subject to explore in detail here (it is scrutinised perhaps especially in WISSOLIK & McGRATH's Bob Dylan's Words, 1994) but, briefly, Graves' book is interested in motifs of apocalypse, and can therefore be suggested as a building block for Dylan's own subsequent similar interest. Significantly too, perhaps, the figure of the goddess herself, or Triple Goddess (mother, bride, hag), forms part of the so-called 'monomyth' of the hero figure's endeavours, and so can be said to impinge upon a number of Dylan songs—especially since it closely connects with the figure of the twin. It can be argued that the figure of the White Lady, in Dylan's 1970s film Renaldo & Clara, stands in some relation to that of the White Goddess elaborated by Graves, and that Dylan's work of prose poetry Tarantula, written in the mid-1960s but only published in the early 1970s, hints recurrently at a familiarity with Graves' ideas.

More particularly, it is within The White Goddess that Graves gives a translation of the 14th century apocalyptic Celtic poem 'Cad Goddeu', or 'Battle of the Trees' (part of the Romance of Taliesin), which, encountered now, cannot but recall 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall'. In a long incantation of line upon unrhymed line (it is a canto fable), we find these: 'I have been the string of a child's swaddling clout / I have been a sword in the hand / I have been a shield in the fight / . . . There shall be a black darkness / There shall be a shaking of the mountain / . . . I have slept in a hundred islands / I have dwelt in a hundred cities . . .'

Dylan the Welsh Hero-God, after whom Dylan Thomas was deliberately named (the word 'Dylan' meaning 'son of the sea-wave'), also figures in 'The Battle of the Trees'; he is a yellow-haired child. Bob Dylan's lengthy and mysterious 1980s song 'Angelina' comes to mind here too, with its 'Blood drying in my yellow hair as I go from shore to shore'.

According to RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT, in ANTHONY SCADUTO's Bob Dylan: An Intimate Biography, Bob Dylan actually met Graves, in England in 1962. The young whippersnapper was rude, and the meeting an embarrassing failure. If the story is true, and the date right, it must have been very soon indeed after Dylan saw HANS FRIED (son of the German poet Erich Fried) standing in Collet's record shop in London with a copy of The White Goddess under his arm—which led to these two young Graves enthusiasts repairing to a not-very-Greek restaurant called the Star, on Old Compton Street in Soho, and discussing Graves, life and the universe for close on three hours in the cold winter of 1962–63, just before Dylan's appearance in the BBC drama The Madhouse on Castle Street.

According to Dylan's own account in Chronicles Volume One, he first read The White Goddess when 'invoking the poetic muse was something I didn't know about yet.' He adds, with his usual imprecision about dates and chronology: 'In a few years' time I would meet Robert Graves himself in London. We went out for a brisk walk around Paddington Square. I wanted to ask him about some of the things in his book, but I couldn't remember much about it.'

Robert Graves died in Majorca on December 7, 1985.

[Sources include Cambridge Guide to Literature in English, ed. Ian Ousby, 1995 edn., p.387; the biography posted online by the Academy of American Poets, seen 22 Aug 2005 at www.poets.org/poet.php/prmPID/193 (including the phrase 'silence and senility'); Wissolik & McGrath's Bob Dylan's Words—A Critical Dictionary and Commentary, 1994, esp. pp.57–58, 67 & 218; and Hans Fried, phone conversation with the present writer 22 Aug 2005, re meeting with Dylan. Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.45. The rebuke to Graves about literary preferences quoted from memory, from reading decades ago, source forgotten: possibly F.R. Leavis, or even Evelyn Waugh.]

Gray, Michael [1946 -] Michael John Gray was born on August 25, 1946 in Bromborough, Cheshire, UK ('the wrong side of the River Mersey', as Liverpudlians like to say). He wrote the first full-length critical study of Dylan's work, the pioneering if rather Leavisite Song & Dance Man: The Art of Bob Dylan, published in the UK in November 1972 and in the US in January 1973. A Japanese hardback edition was published on his 27th birthday and the UK paperback the same year. There was no US paperback of that first edition. Nevertheless he dropped his day-job when offered the original US deal for the book, becoming a freelance writer.

A revised and updated second edition, its title reversed to become The Art of Bob Dylan: Song & Dance Man, was published in simultaneous hardback and paperback in the UK in 1981 and US 1982. After this he wrote the occasional piece for the fanzine The Telegraph, and in 1987 came All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, the first best-of selection from the magazine, co-edited by Gray and JOHN BAULDIE. By then Gray had also written the rather less useful Mother! The Frank Zappa Story, and in 1996 co-authored The Elvis Atlas: A Journey Through Elvis Presley's America. He continued to write on music, and on travel, mostly for UK national newspapers, including obituaries of rock'n'roll stars for The Guardian.

However, he spent most of the 1990s writing a third and final edition of his Dylan litcrit study, this time titled Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan. This is over 900 pages long and includes a 112-page study of Dylan's use of the blues (especially of pre-war blues lyric poetry), and was published in the UK two weeks before the end of the 20th century and in the US in March 2000. The book's two strengths are felt to lie in the critical assessments of individual songs and the depth of research into Dylan's sources.

Gray then began giving talks on Dylan's work ('Bob Dylan and the History of Rock'n'Roll' and 'Bob Dylan and the Poetry of the Blues'), and in 2001 was invited to deliver one at Hibbing Public Library, where he told a variegated audience of Dylan's hometown citizens that they were wrong to keep ignoring and minimising Dylan's achievement, especially since their town had been so formative an influence upon him.

Michael Gray is also the author of the present volume, and of the first full biography of BLIND WILLIE McTELL, the forthcoming Hand Me My Travelin' Shoes.

[Song & Dance Man: The Art of Bob Dylan, London, Hart-Davis, MacGibbon, 1972 and Abacus Books (paperback), 1973; New York: E.P. Dutton, 1973; Tokyo: Shobun-Sha, 1973. The Art of Bob Dylan: Song & Dance Man, London: Hamlyn, 1981; New York: St. Martin's Press, 1982. Mother! The Frank Zappa Story, London: Proteus, 1985. All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook (co-editor with John Bauldie), London: W.H. Allen, 1987 & Fontana Paperbacks 1988. The Elvis Atlas: A Journey Through Elvis Presley's America (co-author with Roger Osborne), New York: Henry Holt, 1996. Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, London: Cassell, 1999 (reprints Continuum, 2000–2005); New York: Continuum, 2000. Hand Me My Travelin' Shoes: In the Footsteps of Blind Willie McTell, London: Bloomsbury, 2007.]

Green, Al [1946 -] Al Greene [sic] was born on a farm outside Forrest City, Arkansas, on April 13, 1946 but grew up in Grand Rapids, Michigan, 'raised on the sound of SAM COOKE and the Soul Stirrers' (Cook added an 'e'; Greene took one away) and singing from an early age with the Greene Brothers Quartet, then the Creations and the Soul Mates, who in 1967 had a top 5 R&B hit, 'Back Up Train'. Touring through Texas he met up with producer and songwriter Willie Mitchell, who pointed Greene to Memphis and the Hi label in 1969, and a collaboration that stretched over the next eight years and included co-writer and drummer Al Jackson Jr. A string of hit singles resulted, achieved by crossbreeding Stax with Barry White, sometimes hitting big in the US pop as well as R&B charts, as with the double no.1 'Let's Stay Together' in 1972.

On October 18, 1974 Al Green was taking a shower when his girlfriend came in and threw either boiling water or, with a more southern touch, boiling grits all over him before running to an adjacent room and shooting herself dead. This was a factor in turning Green's thoughts to God, in whose service he duly became a minister, acquiring the Pentecostal Hale Road Full Gospel Tabernacle Church in Memphis while continuing to record. For some time, starting with The Belle Album in 1977, he concentrated on religious material, and spent most of the period from then until the end of the 1990s singing and recording and preaching on Sundays; but he reverted to secular songs on July 24, 1984 when, at a brief session at the suitably named Intergalactic Studio in New York City, he and Bob Dylan came together to record three numbers, none of which has been released, though two have circulated amongst Dylan collectors. Backed by Al Green's band, along with RON WOOD on guitar and a Steve Potts on drums, and perhaps with CAROLYN DENNIS singing too, the three tracks were 'Honey Wait', 'Mountain of Love' and the Donny Fritts & Troy Seals songs 'We Had It All'. A thick fog surrounds the facts about this session but it seems that Dylan takes the lead vocal on 'Honey Wait', which may be his own composition, and that Al Green takes lead vocal on the others.

It was an unlikely partnership, except that Dylan had always been interested in soul music, and Green, who parlayed an insinuatingly slinky, ineffably 1970s sound, was undeniably a consequential figure on the Memphis scene. If Bishop Tutu could sing soul, and used the band behind Ruby & the Romantics on 'Our Day Will Come', he would sound like Al Green.

Perhaps even prompted by the encounter with Dylan, Al Green returned to the secular world soon afterwards, reuniting with Willie Mitchell in 1986, recording a top 40 duet with Annie Lennox in 1988 ('Put a Little Love in Your Heart') and in 2003 he signed to Blue Note and released a well-received secular soul comeback album, I Can't Stop, followed in 2005 by Everything's OK.

[Al Green: 'Let's Stay Together', Hi 2202, US, 1972; The Belle Album, Hi nia, US, 1977, CD-reissued re-mastered Hi 160, UK, 2000; I Can't Stop, Blue Note, US, 2003; Everything's OK, US, 2005.]

Green, Keith [1953 - 1982] Keith Green, born in Brooklyn, New York, on October 21, 1953, grew up in a religious Jewish family, learnt to play ukulele and piano, wrote songs from the age of nine, obtained a record deal from Decca at the age of 11, appeared on 'The Jack Benny Show' and got dubbed 'a pre-pubescent dreamboat' by Time magazine, became the youngest-ever member of ASCAP (the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers), played Kurt Von Trapp in a Broadway production of The Sound of Music, got displaced as media Boy Heartthrob by Donny Osmond, ran away from home at 15, pursued drugs, sex and Eastern mysticism, married at 20 and then at 21, through the evangelistic efforts of Christian singer-songwriter Randy Stonehill, became a Born Again Christian. As it says on his widow's website, in 1975 '. . . he proudly told the world, "I'm a Jewish Christian."'

Green's songwriting and musicianship took off in this new ardent direction and in 1977 he and his wife Melody were living in the suburbs in the San Fernando Valley, where they became involved with the Vineyard Fellowship. Greens' official website seems to have written the Fellowship out of the story. At any rate, Keith was soon 'discipling 70 believers' making a solo album, For Him Who Has Ears to Hear, which Dylan is said to have liked, and which prefigured what is now known as Contemporary Christian Rock. In 1979 Green and Dylan met through the Vineyard Fellowship, but later that year Green and his family, plus about 20 followers, moved their ministry base to 140 acres around Lindale, in East Texas ('where many martyrs fell,' as Dylan has it), and established the suitably apocalyptic-sounding Last Days Ministries.

In or around March 1980 Dylan went into Mama Jo's, a North Hollywood studio, to play harmonica on Green's track 'Pledge My Head to Heaven', on which REGINA McCRARY's sisters Linda and Charity are backing singers and on which Green sounds like a buoyant young ELTON JOHN. This was duly released even more obscurely than For Him Who Has Ears, on Green's album So You Wanna Go Back to Egypt? in December 1980, on Pretty Good Records ('a Division of Last Days Ministries'). This LP contains a booklet with song lyrics, notes by Green and a back cover drawing of the musicians, including Dylan. A remix, with Dylan's previously prominent harmonica almost suppressed by an electric guitar, was issued on Green's posthumous album I Only Want to See You There in 1983; the original mix was then reissued on Keith Green: The Ministry Years Vol. 1: 1977–79 in 1987 (again an LP) and on CD two years later.

Green made two other albums in his own lifetime, No Compromise (1978) and Songs for the Shepherd (1982). Among his many songs 'You Put This Love in My Heart', 'Your Love Broke Through', 'O Lord You're Beautiful' and 'Grace by Which I Stand' are now said to be 'enduring classics that have been recorded by many of today's top artists.'

'In seven short years of knowing Jesus,' it says here, 'the Lord took Keith from concert crowds of 20 or less to stadiums of 12,000 people who came to hear only him. His recordings were chart topping [?] and when he began to give his recordings away for whatever people could afford, some misunderstood. His views were often controversial but never boring. Television and radio appearances became the norm. Still, Keith's heart was to please the Lord and build His kingdom, not his own.'

Green and two of his children—three-year-old Josiah David and two-year-old Bethany Grace—died when the heavily overloaded small plane leased to Last Days Ministries for his touring crashed just after sunset within a minute of take-off outside Lindale on July 28, 1982, also killing the Greens' friends the Smalleys and their six children, who were visiting, and the pilot. Melody Green now runs the ministry from Oceanside, California; the Texas site has been acquired by the Teen Mania Ministry. Only in America . . .

[Keith Green: For Him Who Has Ears to Hear, Sparrow, US, 1977; So You Wanna Go Back to Egypt?, Pretty Good PGR-1, US (Last Day Ministries BIRD 139, UK), Dec 1980; CD-reissued Sparrow PGD 5431, US, 1990; 'Pledge My Head to Heaven' (incl. Bob Dylan) re-mix reissued I Only Want to See You There, Sparrow SPR 1066, US, 1983; original mix reissued Keith Green: The Ministry Years Vol. 1: 1977–79, Sparrow SPD 1146, US, 1987 (LP) & Sparrow SPD 1558R, US (G2 7243 8515582 6, Holland), 1999; No Compromise, nia, CD-reissued Sparrow, 1990; Songs for the Shepherd, nia. Melody Green & David Hazard, No Compromise: The Life Story of Keith Green, Eugene, OR: Harvest House, 2000 (2nd edn.), available through the Last Days Ministries website, from which come all quotes above, seen online 3 Jan 2006 at www.lastdaysministries.org, except the 'prepubescent dreamboat', at www.cbn.com/cbnmusic/artists/green_keith.asp. Additional detail from Wikipedia & 'Searching for a Gem'.]

Greenbriar Boys, the The Greenbriar Boys were top of the bill and Dylan their support act at Gerde's Folk City when ROBERT SHELTON gave him that famous rave review in the New York Times in September 1961, helping to speed his being signed by JOHN HAMMOND to Columbia Records. As Dylan notes in Chronicles Volume One, 'It was unusual because I was the second act on the bill and The Greenbriar Boys were hardly mentioned.'

The Greenbriar Boys were a bluegrass group formed in 1958, their name taken from the song 'The Girl on the Greenbriar Shore'. They were semi-revivalists, much like THE NEW LOST CITY RAMBLERS, though with a more 'progressive' approach and less of an inclination towards replicating Old Timey records from the 1920s. (Bob Dylan once offered this jokey comparison: 'The Greenbriar Boys: the best country group in the city. The New Lost City Ramblers: the best city group in the country.')

With exceptional playing by JOHN HERALD on flat-pick guitar and sweet vocals, BOB YELLIN on banjo and RALPH RINZLER on mandolin, the Greenbriar Boys helped bridge the canyons between rural southern bluegrass and the early-1960s folk scene. (Buddy Pendleton also played violin with the Greenbriar Boys on some of their 1961 gigs.) They became the first touring bluegrass group comprised of north-easterners, but their repertoire was wider than that, and came from Library of Congress field recordings, minstrel shows, gospel, Nashville and even Tin Pan Alley.

With Yellin and Herald, ERIC WEISSBERG had also been, on violin, a founding member of the Greenbriar Boys (it was his mother who'd thought up their name), but he had defected to the Tarriers in 1959. He was replaced first by Paul Prestopino (who defected to the Chad Mitchell Trio) and then by Ralph Rinzler.

In 1962 the group accompanied JOAN BAEZ on two songs on her second LP ('Pal of Mine' and 'The Banks of the Ohio') and toured with her, signed to Vanguard Records and made their eponymously titled début album. Three further albums followed: Ragged but Right!, 1964, Dian & the Greenbriar Boys, 1965 (backing one Dian James, a singer in the Molly O'Day mountain singing tradition) and Better Late Than Never in 1966. But Rinzler left the group, replaced by bluegrass mandolinist and singer Frank Wakefield and fiddle player Jim Buchanan. Their arrangement of Mike Nesmith's 'Different Drum' became a hit by Linda Ronstadt in 1967, the year the Greenbriar Boys disbanded. In the 1980s there was a brief reunion for an appearance at the Philadelphia Folk Festival and a few concerts, including one at Carnegie Recital Hall.

Ralph Rinzler died in 1994; John Herald committed suicide in 2005. Bob Yellin, aged 70, is still around.

[Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, p.278. The Greenbriar Boys: Best of the Vanguard Years, CD, Vanguard, US, 2002, well complemented by Big Apple Bluegrass, Vanguard 2003. Dylan on Greenbriars cf. Ramblers, quoted Young Bob: John Cohen's Early Photographs of Bob Dylan, powerHouse Books, 2003, p.7. Additional information from Bob Yellin, phone call from this writer 2 Nov 2005.]

Greenwood, MS, Dylan's visit to Dylan went to Mississippi at the beginning of July 1963, at the height of the civil rights struggle. He went with THEODORE BIKEL and PETE SEEGER for a rally organised by the Student Non-violent Co-ordinating Committee. On July 6, three miles outside Greenwood, they and THE FREEDOM SINGERS performed to around 250 black farm-workers and 25 young whites and media people. Dylan, bravely, sang 'Only a Pawn in Their Game'. A tantalising fragment is included in D.A. PENNEBAKER's film Don't Look Back (Leacock-Pennebaker, US, 1967). The visit was reported in the small news item 'Northern Folk Singers Help Out at Negro Festival in Mississippi', New York Times, July 7, 1963, in which 'Only a Pawn in Their Game' was singled out and cited for its theme. Yet Dylan was identified as 'Bobby Dillon', a 'local singer'. The event is well documented in ROBERT SHELTON's 1986 biography of Dylan, No Direction Home.

Gregg, Bobby [1929/30 -] Robert J. Gregg was born in Philadelphia in either 1929 or 1930. By 1955 he was the only white musician playing with an obscure and struggling black group called Steve Gibson & the Red Caps (an offshoot of the Romaines). He plays as second drummer alongside Henry Tucker Green on their September 23, 1955 RCA session and recording 'Free Hearted', 'Always', 'How I Cry' and 'Bobbin' with them, and remained with them through a label switch to ABC-Paramount and on through further sessions till 1959 or 1960. He seems to have become a house drummer for Cameo-Parkway in the very early 1960s too, playing behind hit acts of theirs like the Orlons, Dee Dee Sharp and Bobby Rydell (as did bass player Joe Macho Jr., who would also later do Dylan sessions) and fronting his own outfit, Bobby Gregg and His Friends, on at least two 1962 instrumental singles on their subsidiary Cotton label: 'The Jam', which reached the US top 30 (and was later re-issued on Columbia) and, including the then-unknown guitar wizard Roy Buchanan, 'Potato Peeler', the first item ever to capture Buchanan's developed innovative guitar-work. In 1963, on a major label, Columbia's sister imprint Epic, Gregg released his own album, Let's Stomp and Wild Weekend, which rather sounds as if it should have been two LPs rather than one. He was producing records in this period too, sometimes working with the jazz original Sun Ra to make R&Bish pop singles. One was 'Marlene' and 'Do You Still Care for Me?' by Richard Popcorn Wylie, which Gregg produced, with Sun Ra on piano; Gregg played drums on one of the two tracks. He was still making singles under his own name, playing with Sun Ra's musicians, in this period too: 'Any Number Can Win', 'MacDougal Street' and 'It's Good to Me' were all released on Epic around 1964, and in 1965, on Veep, came 'Charly Ba-Ba'.

There was a connection between Gregg, these jazzers and producer TOM WILSON, and with or without a parallel link through AL KOOPER, this led to Gregg playing for Dylan—and at an absolutely crucial period.

Bobby Gregg became the drummer on both Dylan's 1965 albums (Bringing It All Back Home and Highway 61 Revisited), and in concert took over from LEVON HELM when Helm quit the Hawks and the pressure of playing with Dylan that November. Gregg played on the ten Dylan concerts from December 1 in Seattle through to the 19th in Santa Monica. It's remarkable that Dylan, Gregg and the rest of the Hawks were recording in a New York studio on November 30—and the following night they were playing a concert 3,000 miles away in Seattle.

Gregg's first Dylan work was unfortunate, though. In Dylan's absence, in December 1964, Gregg was among those brought in by Tom Wilson to overdub backings onto Dylan's début album track 'House of the Rising Sun' (this unhappy amalgam was released in 1995 on the Highway 61 Interactive CD-ROM, with packaging that implied that the whole recording had been made back in 1961) and onto three tracks from the Freewheelin' sessions, 'Mixed Up Confusion', 'Rocks and Gravel' and 'Corrina Corrina', all of which had to have their original backing tracks removed for the benefit of this futile exercise.

Bobby Gregg first worked with Dylan, and more positively, on the afternoon session of January 14, 1965, the first session with an electric group—and it yielded 'Love Minus Zero/No Limit', 'Subterranean Homesick Blues', 'She Belongs to Me' and 'Bob Dylan's 115th Dream'. He didn't take part in the evening session (which was drummerless, used the odd combo of JOHN HAMMOND JR., JOHN SEBASTIAN and the shadowy 'John Boone'—who was probably Steve Boone, Sebastian's bassist—along with Dylan and BRUCE LANGHORNE, and provided nothing for the album) but Gregg was back the next day, January 15, for the session that produced, in addition to several solo tracks, the electric numbers 'Maggie's Farm' and 'On the Road Again' used on the album, plus various takes of that radical yet playful song 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now', one version of which was issued as a European single later that year and another issued on Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991. Bringing It All Back Home was issued on March 22, 1965.

When Dylan stepped out at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL that July, he used none of the musicians from the album. By then, though, he had already begun recording Highway 61 Revisited, and for this, beginning with two mid-June sessions produced by Tom Wilson, many of the Bringing It All Back Home session-men were back, including Gregg. He, therefore, is the man who provides that opening snare-drum shot indelibly marked on the brains of at least one generation as signalling the start of 'Like a Rolling Stone'. Not surprisingly he kept the gig for the rest of the sessions and is the only drummer on this seminal album.

At that November 30 session, when Gregg was back in the studios with Dylan, Al Kooper and the Helm-less Hawks, it was to play on the early, exploratory proto-Blonde on Blonde session that produced a number of fast versions of 'Visions of Johanna' (one of which was released 40 years later on Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack), and a number of takes of 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?', the last of which was issued as the follow-up single to 'Positively 4th Street'. (Gregg, like Kooper, also recorded with Tom Rush that year, on his album Take a Little Walk with Me; later Gregg would play on the 1967 hit by Keith, '98.6', and work with PAUL SIMON, John Cale and others.)

Gregg's last Dylan session was late into the night of January 27, 1966, at which he played alongside Dylan, Kooper, ROBBIE ROBERTSON and RICK DANKO and which yielded the version of 'I'll Keep It With Mine' on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3. They also made unsuccessful attempts at 'Leopard-Skin Pill Box Hat' and 'One of Us Must Know (Sooner or Later)'. When Dylan and the still Helm-less Hawks went back out on the road to start the long, gruelling and transcendent 1966 tour, Gregg had been replaced, first by SANNY KONIKOFF and later by MICKEY JONES.

Gregg had to content himself with playing on that year's The Peter, Paul & Mary Album, which was still offering songs like 'Kisses Sweeter Than Wine', and on which quite clearly he'd been asked to play the drums as quietly as humanly possible. It must have been one of the most mortifying comedowns in human experience.

[Bobby Gregg & His Friends: 'The Jam Pt 1' c/w 'The Jam Pt 2', Cotton 1003, US, 1962 & Columbia 4825, US 1963? ('The Jam Pt 1' reissued on the compilation Cameo Parkway 1957–1967, ABKCO, 2005); 'Potato Peeler' c/w 'Sweet Georgia Brown', Cotton 1006, 1962; Let's Stomp and Wild Weekend, Epic BN-26051, US, 1963; 'Charly Ba-Ba' c/w 'Hullabaloo', Veep 1207, 1965. Steve Gibson & the Red Caps: 'Bless You' c/w 'I Miss You So', Rose 5534, US, 1959. Steve Gibson & the Original Redcaps: 'Where Are You' c/w 'San Antone Rose', Casa Blanca 5505 & Hunt 330, US, 1959. Red Caps and Sun Ra/Epic singles data mostly from, respectively, Marv Goldberg: 'The Red Caps', at http://home.att.net/~marvy42/Redcaps/redcaps.html and Ed Bland (arranger-bandleader on the cited sessions): 'Personal Recollections of Sun Ra 1956–1967', 24 Aug 2005, www.jazzinchicago.org/Internal/Articles/tabid/43/ctl/ArticleView/mid/522/articleId/410/PersonalRecollectionsofSunRa19561967.aspx, both seen online 21 Nov 2005.]

Griffin, Paul [1937 - 2000] Paul Griffin was born on August 6, 1937 in Harlem, where he studied the local organist's work at Paradise Baptist Church and then classical music, gaining a place at New York's High School of Music and Art, from which he graduated in 1953, and playing first viola in the All-City Orchestra. Nonetheless, he found himself having to work as a cutter in the garment district and delivering groceries for a supermarket before getting an usher's job at the legendary Apollo Theater in Harlem, where he was allowed to play piano now and then, and was 'discovered' by sax player King Curtis, for whom he toured and recorded.

In 1960 he began playing on sessions, playing in the Scepter Records house band but also working with producers like Bert Berns, for whom he eventually played on the historic VAN MORRISON Bang sessions. He became a top keyboards player whose work on organ and piano spanned a vast number of recordings, including albums and singles by Aretha Franklin, the Shirelles, the Isley Brothers (he's on 'Twist and Shout'), Cissy Houston, Solomon Burke, Garnett Mimms, Irma Franklin, Dionne Warwick and many more; he plays that organ part on Chuck Jackson's 'Any Day Now', yet also plays the piano on B.J. Thomas' 'Raindrops Keep Falling on My Head'. Later he played on Don McLean's 'American Pie' and for PAUL SIMON, PETER, PAUL & MARY, IAN & SYLVIA, Eric Andersen, Tom Rush, Carly Simon and John Denver. In the 1970s he began a long association with Steely Dan, which included co-writing 'The Fez' and scat singing on 'Peg' and lasted right through to Donald Fagen's 1993 solo album Kamkiriad.

Of infinitely greater importance is that Paul Griffin plays on Bringing It All Back Home, Highway 61 Revisited, Blonde on Blonde and Blood on the Tracks.

On Bringing It All Back Home, on piano, he played only on the session of January 14, 1965, the first session with an electric group—but it was the session that yielded 'Love Minus Zero/No Limit', 'Subterranean Homesick Blues', 'She Belongs to Me' and 'Bob Dylan's 115th Dream'. Griffin was more audible on Highway 61 Revisited. He was brought in on the second session, on June 16, 1965: the one that delivered 'Like a Rolling Stone'—on which he moved across from organ to piano, thus letting AL KOOPER onto the organ, with historic results. Then Griffin was brought back in for the late July to early August 1965 sessions, when BOB JOHNSTON took over from TOM WILSON as the producer. Griffin plays piano on the morning session on July 29, and may play on the next day's session too. More certainly he plays again on the session of August 2 and August 4. On the first of these, therefore, he's the pianist on the album track 'Tombstone Blues' (and on the alternate takes of this and three other tracks issued 40 years later on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack). Next day he plays on the album cut of 'From a Buick 6', the alternate take issued on the Japanese album, and on the version of 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?' issued mislabelled as 'Positively 4th Street' that September.

On the marvellously productive August 2 session, Griffin again plays piano throughout, and so appears on the album on 'Highway 61 Revisited', 'Ballad of a Thin Man', 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues' and 'Queen Jane Approximately', contributing particularly lovely piano-work on these latter two. It's one of the eternal depths of the album that Dylan's radical songs and challenging voice are pitched against the lyrical warmth of the piano on these tracks: piano-work that is never soft but exudes a touching romantic optimism. This Dylan masterpiece would not sound the same without Paul Griffin.

He returned to the studios for just one day during the recording of Blonde on Blonde: on January 25, 1966 in New York City, when he joined ROBBIE ROBERTSON, RICK DANKO, Al Kooper, BOBBY GREGG and WILLIAM E. LEE to play the cascading, gospel-meets-Liszt piano part on 'One of Us Must Know (Sooner or Later)': a part whose audible presence has varied enormously in the various different mixes on Columbia's many attempts at re-releasing Blonde on Blonde properly since the original 1966 vinyl issue. Music journalist Jonathan Singer wrote this about the piano part you're supposed to be able to hear:

> 'Griffin gives the song its tragic depth—and height. He picks his way sensitively through the verses; but at other times, he prowls beneath the words with judgement and an ominous gospel lick that he stokes until he has climbed to the verse's peak. At the chorus, Griffin unleashes a symphony; hammering his way up and down the keyboard, half GERSHWIN, half gospel, all heart. The follow-up, a killer left hand figure that links the chorus to the verse, releases none of the song's tension. Then, on the last chorus, not content to repeat the same brilliant part, Griffin's playing . . . so completely embodies the lyric, that he enters into some other dimension. For several seconds, on one of Dylan's best songs, Griffin makes Dylan seem almost earthbound.'

He returned to the studios with Dylan almost ten years later to participate more briefly in the recording of that other masterwork, Blood on the Tracks, this time playing organ. On the second New York session, on September 17, 1974, he plays on the outtake of 'You're a Big Girl Now' later released on Biograph (1985) and on the album versions of 'Shelter from the Storm' and 'You're Gonna Make Me Lonesome When You Go'.

Session-work dried up for Griffin from the early 1980s onwards, and though he made a living from jingles and teaching, he lived the last years of his life modestly in the Bronx, one of the unsung true heroes of music history.

Paul Griffin, who suffered latterly from diabetes, died of a heart attack at home in New York while awaiting a liver transplant, on June 14, 2000.

[Sources include 'Paul Griffin' by Jonathan Singer, Mar 4, 1999, pub'd New York Daily News Mar 1999, online at www.steelydan.com/griffin.html, 27 Jan 2006; ditto www.soulwalking.co.uk/Respect2.html and http://elvispelvis.com/paulgriffin.htm.]

Griffith, Nanci [1954 -] Nanci Caroline Griffith was born in Seguin, Texas, on July 6, 1954, the daughter of a publisher who sang in barbershop quartets and a mother who was a real estate agent and amateur actress. She taught herself to play guitar by watching a PBS television series and started writing songs because she found it easier than learning other people's. Her first paid gig was at age 14, in Austin, Texas, where she later studied education at the university and then taught small children before committing herself to a career in music in 1977.

Her folkie 1978 début album, There's a Light Beyond These Woods, on a local label, was followed in 1982 by Poet in My Window (on another local label), on which one track featured her father and his barbershop quartet. In 1985 came her third album, Once in a Very Blue Moon, on a label with national distribution, and with the backing musicians who would duly form her Blue Moon Orchestra, with which she played for over a decade. In 1986 came Last of the True Believers (and the re-release of her first two albums) and she moved to Nashville. Another label upgrade brought Lone Star State of Mind, released in 1987, which included an early cover version of the Julie Gold song 'From a Distance', a song from which many people never feel at a sufficient distance yet which gave Nanci Griffith her first career breakthrough, since when she has built strong followings with further albums and widespread touring. She is especially popular in Ireland.

After featuring big-name guests on 1989's album Storms, duetting with Phil EVERLY, recording 'The Wexford Carol' for the Chieftains' 1991 album The Bells of Dublin, in 1993 came an album entirely comprised of other singer-songwriters' material, Other Voices Other Rooms, the artistic coup of which was that on 'Boots of Spanish Leather', she persuaded its composer to overdub a harmonica part onto her recording. Dylan added his undistinguished part at his home studio in Malibu at some time in the summer of 1992; the album was released the following March.

It was the second small professional connection between them; the first had been at the beginning of the same year—when Griffith had been among the many big-name backing singers bellowing along with the super-sized band ranged behind Dylan on his suitably bemused performance of 'Like a Rolling Stone' at the 'Late Night with David Letterman' 10th Anniversary Show, recorded that January 18 and televised February 6.

In 1998 Nanci Griffith released a follow-up album, Other Voices, Too, and published a 'companion' book, Nanci Griffith's Other Voices: A Personal History of Folk Music, since when she has continued her demure career.

[Nanci Griffith (with Bob Dylan): 'Boots of Spanish Leather', Malibu 1992, Other Voices Other Rooms, Elektra CD-61464, US, 1993. Nanci Griffith, Nanci Griffith's Other Voices: A Personal History of Folk Music, New York: Three Rivers Press, 1998.]

Grisman, David [1945 -] David Grisman was born in Hackensack, New Jersey, on March 23, 1945, the son of a professional trombonist. He learnt piano, loved rock'n'roll, discovered folk music, and at 15 met RALPH RINZLER: 'and that turned everything around.' He grew up to be the defining bluegrass mandolin player of his generation, playing in the Even Dozen Jug Band in the early 1960s (with MARIA MULDAUR, then Maria D'Amato, and JOHN SEBASTIAN, among others), and with them made his first record, in 1963. He played on a Folkways session by Red Allen & Frank Wakefield the same year, and in 1965–66 was briefly in Frank Wakefield & the Kentuckians. In the late 1960s he joined the rock group Earth Opera with Peter Rowan, and in 1973 both joined with JERRY GARCIA, John Kahn and Vassar Clements to form the short-lived but ultra-successful Old and in the Way, whose eponymously titled album remained for decades afterwards the biggest-selling bluegrass album ever made. From 1974 to 1975 Grisman was also in the all-instrumentals group the Great American Music Band, and in 1975 formed the David Grisman Quintet, which has kept going, in between other projects, ever since. Grisman's early fusions with Django Reinhart-style jazz led to the creation of the 'newgrass' genre, and in 1977 he made the solo album Hot Dawg ('Dawg' being the nickname given him by Garcia in 1973), which featured his jazz-violinist hero Stephane Grappelli, and which was followed in 1981 by Stephane Grappelli and David Grisman Live.

During Dylan's fall 1980 tour, Grisman came on stage in Portland, Oregon, on December 4, playing mandolin on 'To Ramona'—though Dylan had hoped he'd play on the traditional 'Mary from the Wild Moor' earlier in the set. Introducing that song, Dylan told the audience:

> 'We're gonna play a real old song here that I used to play before I wrote any songs. People always want to hear old songs: well this is real old. Anyway it's like when—there's a musician friend of mine here tonight, David Grisman. I don't know if you ever heard of him. Well he's playing in town someplace else: you go see him if you get a chance to. He's playing tomorrow night. We wanted him to play on this song but can't seem to find him. Anybody know where he is? But it'll be too late by that time. He can't play on the next one. Anyway, this is called "Mary from the Wild Moor".'

Six songs later, ahead of 'To Ramona', he announced: 'David Grisman actually did show up! So he's gonna play with us on this song.' After it, Dylan added: 'You go see his band now! I can't remember where he's playing but he is playing.'

He still is.

[David Grisman: Hot Dawg, A&M Horizon SP-731, US, 1979. Grisman & Grappelli: Grappelli-Grisman Live Warner Bros BSK-3550, US, 1981. Even Dozen Jug Band: Jug Band Music and Rags, Elektra EKS-7246, US, 1963. Red Allen and the Kentuckians: Bluegrass Country, Country 704, US, 1965; Red Allen, Country 710, 1966. Earth Opera: Earth Opera Elektra EKS-74016, US, 1968; Great American Eagle Tragedy Elektra EKS-75010, 1969. Old and in the Way: Old and in the Way, Round RX-103, US, 1975. David Grisman Quintet: David Grisman Quintet, Kaleidoscope F-5, US, 1977.]

'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' [1981] 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' was recorded at the Shot of Love sessions of early May 1981 but issued initially only as the B-side of the 'Heart of Mine' single (and only in the US); it was later reissued on the Biograph box set in 1985 and subsequently built back into the Shot of Love album itself: the first instance of such a revision in Dylan's canon.

Written in 1980 and emerging in the later part of the Gospel Period, the song returns us towards the Dylanesque chaos of an earlier era, even though the fundamental structure of the song is a thoroughly conventional R&B/blues one, and even though the lyrics still keep the Bible close at hand. Christ is the bridegroom and the bride for whom he waits is the Church, representing the Christian faithful. The analogy is drawn by John the Baptist, who says in John 3:28–29: 'I am not the Christ, but that I am sent before him. He that hath the bride is the bridegroom: but the friend of the bridegroom, which standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly . . .' Yet what's appealing and interesting here is not the scriptural bewailing of people's fecklessness, nor the declamatory global sweep of Dylan's customary 'look! the apocalypse is coming!', as given in the choruses of the song, but the chaotic absurdity both of the visions glimpsed and of the poetry that makes them, along with the directed energy of the performance: the pacing, shuddering expressiveness of the vocal, breathing in hot pursuit of the listener across the switchback longs and shorts of the verses and the punching ups and downs of the chorus melody. The hooks on which are hung both the craziness of vision and the tour-de-force performance are the song's extremes of variation in line length and its deranged, rule-breaking rhymes. Set against the conventional regularity of the music, these two delirious elasticities contract and expand the possibilities of structure like a mad concertina banging about inside an old, familiar cardboard box.

The only solidly inevitable rhyme is, aptly, that of 'altar' with 'Gibraltar'. All the others are unpredictable, switching between 'da da da' and 'da da da' line endings ('to want me' and '*snob*bery', for instance), occasionally pushed to a 'da da da da', as in '*ob*ligated') and ranging restlessly between the orderliness of 'order' and 'border' and the purring blur of 'to haunt me' and 'to want me'; between ragged half rhymes like 'humiliated' and 'obligated'—pushing snatched raggedness to the limit in putting 'cement' with 'innocent' and 'nauseated' with 'deteriorated'—and the jokingly precise and splendid 'temperature' and 'furniture'; and between the simplicity of 'to leap it' and 'to keep it', the tiny sneakiness of 'sent to me' and 'meant to be' and the take-a-bow outrageousness of the last verse's last rhyme—the incomparable pairing of 'January' and 'Buenos Aires'.

Matching these elastic contortions, the variations in line length, over which Dylan's ever-resourceful delivery triumphs, careen between the nine syllables of one verse's first line and the 18 syllables of another's.

These technical crimes and jokes of accomplishment fit the visions of the lyric. If the opening verse vividly evokes the bizarre grogginess of waking up, half-knowing where you are—'Prayed in the ghetto with my face in the cement / Heard the last moan of a boxer, seen the massacre of the innocent / Felt around for the light switch . . .'—this surreal uncertainty, as to how things are and how they feel, is not dispelled but intensified by waking to daytime consciousness. 'Put your hand on my head, baby, do I have a temperature?' is such a great, funny line: itself enacting feverishness in its hypochondriacal fretting rhythm; expressing such distance from the person it addresses yet doing so with the intimacy of wholly conversational cadences. It is a masterly line of conversational speech, in which 'baby' is for once used inspiredly, clinching the tone of easy familiarity while suggesting that the speaker may not actually know who he's talking to, while playing to the hilt the absurdity of being so out of touch with how you feel that you need someone else to feel your head to tell you (an absurdity not reduced by our recognition that we have all been there too). In doing these many things, the line also expresses the cry for help out of this chaos: a chaos of alienation that the speaker of the line knows he embodies as diseasedly as does the world around him.

It is, of course, a world of contradiction, polarity, violence and catastrophe, seething with nebulous omens and hopeless ambiguity. As so often, the modern locating detail is in bed with the timeless or ancient scene: in this case 'Cities on fire' (which might be of biblical antiquity) and 'phones out of order'. The same verse reverberates with the contemporary hell of South and Central American war zones in which the CIA funds the murder squads. As in Guatemala in June 1980, around the time of the song's creation, 'They're killing nuns'; yet any suggestion that this is a world rational enough to let us hope that socio-political protest might be effective is at once undercut by the adding of 'and soldiers', which topsy-turvies any inferred what-could-be-worse-than-killing-nuns? rhetoric. Meanwhile the timelessness of 'Cities on fire' also prises away from that 'killing nuns' any limiting contemporariness it may have, so that we find underneath its layer of modernity reminders of far older religious wars—indeed wars so old that they were inevitably religious ones.

Psychic doom and physical brutality collide into fused imperatives. 'There's a wall between you and what you want and you got to leap it', Dylan sings, and as he sings it he puts up that wall between 'between you' and 'and what you want' with a pause, a vocal silence so solid you can hear that fevered head crash into it. The exhortation to act, ostensibly an affirmation of things decisive and positive, withers at once into the accompanying prediction of imminent failure. Even if you read the signs aright, and 'leap it' and 'take it', seizing the moment of 'tonight', what you gain still can't be held onto 'tomorrow'.

Under conditions like these, it comes as a surprise to the narrator—as something worth remarking on—when something works, when something happens as it could be expected to in an ordered world: 'Got the message this morning, the one that was sent to me', and Dylan follows this with the lovely lucidity of 'About the madness of becomin' what one was never meant to be.' It's typical of Dylan's intuitive intelligence that the song's only mention of 'madness' is here in its most rationally styled line.

Aside from the centrality of chaos, there is something else from a bygone Dylan era that reappears in 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar', albeit briefly: a specific area of poetic focus that was at one time wonderfully prevalent in his work, and which, until it reappeared, you might not have known you'd missed. It belonged to a particular period: that of his early post-hobo songs, as he reminded us when, at Radio City Music Hall in 1988, early on in the Never-Ending Tour, he revisited 'With God on Our Side' for the first time in decades, and sang again those small lines 'The words fill my head / And fall to the floor.' The early New York City songs were full of things bouncing off the walls and floors and ceilings: full of walls and floors and ceilings bouncing with noises, and air and light bouncing and splitting and pounding like noise; air like walls and walls like air. It was a way of seeing—a recognisable supra-realism of his, and it yielded much evocative poetry:

'The night aimed shadows / Through the crossbar windows, / And the wind punched hard / To make the wall-siding sing' ('Walls of Red Wing'); 'When all at once the silent air / Split open from her soundin voice' ('Joan Baez in Concert, Part 2'); 'And the silent night will shatter / From the sounds inside my mind' ('One Too Many Mornings'); 'The morning breeze like a bugle blew / Against the drums of dawn' ('Lay Down Your Weary Tune'); 'As her thoughts pounded hard / Like the pierce of an arrow' ('Eternal Circle'); '. . . midnight's broken toll' and '. . . while the walls were tightening' ('Chimes of Freedom'); 'Crimson flames tied through my ears' ('My Back Pages'); 'Though the night ran swirling and whirling' ('I Don't Believe You'); 'the breeze yawns food' ('Some Other Kinds of Songs'); 'the breath of its broken walls / being smothered' (11 Outlined Epitaphs); 'Beneath a bare lightbulb the plaster did pound' ('Ballad in Plain D'); and 'The wind howls like a hammer' ('Love Minus Zero/No Limit').

By the time of this last example, framed as a simple simile, it is also a more consciously BAUDELAIREan equivalent of earlier successes like 'your baby's eyes . . . are tuggin' at your sleeve' ('Ballad of Hollis Brown') and that special Dylan vividness with images of people's mouths: 'people cheered with bloodshot grins' ('Long Ago, Far Away') and 'but you're smilin' inside out' ('Denise').

Later, he doesn't usually stray this way, perhaps because on the whole it's a very New York City apartment block feeling: it belongs in an environment no longer at the centre of Dylan's consciousness. It is a minor pleasure, therefore, to find a fair example of this specific poetic focus revisiting Dylan in the midst of 1985's 'When the Night Comes Falling from the Sky'—'That icy wind that's howling in your eye'—and a greater pleasure to savour, in the version of 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' printed in Lyrics 1962–1985, the marvellous 'She was walking down the hallway while the walls deteriorated.'

This is so powerful because it has such, well, corrosive concreteness, at the same time as such a strong nightmare mood. It's one of Dylan's most filmic lines—in fact reminiscent of Roman Polanski's early film Repulsion (starring Catherine Deneuve as a maddened Belgian manicurist), in which, in a scene that prefigures Alien, as the heroine-victim runs down a long passageway the plaster erupts out of shape: hands of plaster burst from the living walls, thrusting out to grab at her as she runs.

Words like 'deteriorated' are notoriously hard to use without bathos: Dylan manages it perfectly here because he brings the word alive, allowing it to shake with its onomatopoeic aptness—the way it sounds so crumbly—by highlighting its sheer weirdness of meaning.

Of the two relatively important differences between the text of 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' as given in print and as we hear it on the studio recording, the first is that on the record we lose the whole of that 'deteriorated' line, along with its less happy mate, 'Felt around for the lightswitch, became nauseated'. We gain instead a couplet that starts with the improved line 'Felt around for the lightswitch, felt around for her face' (such plain speaking, such tactile contrast, so strong an evocation of groping) but Dylan follows the extra vividness of that with the unduly lumbering 'Been treated like a farm animal on a wild goose chase', which, against all odds, is less of a line than the one we lose to it.

The other significant difference between the two versions of the song, and by far the more damaging, consists in what has happened to the words of the choruses. The performed version's consistent 'East of the Jordan, west of the rock of Gibraltar' is so tinkered about with in print that in five choruses, the line is given in three ways: 'East of . . . hard as,' 'West of . . . east of', 'West of . . . west of', 'West of . . . east of' again, and 'West of . . . west of' again. The next line gets similarly silly revision, the consistent 'I see the turning of the page' of the recorded version replaced by 'I see the burning of the page', '. . . burning of the stage', '. . . burning of the cage', '. . . burning of the stage' again, and '. . . burning of the page' again. Even the 'Curtain risin' on a new age' is altered, in the third chorus, to 'Curtain risin' on a new stage'. Whatever switches between notions of text and performance ('page' and 'stage') may be embedded here, they remain fiddlesome alterations in which there's no pattern, but only a mess, making clear how little any of them mean.

After such wilful reductionism, it comes as a relief that the song's other changes are insignificant.

One, indeed, is surely only an error of transcription: the text gives 'Mistake your shyness for aloofness, your shyness for snobbery' but should read 'Mistake your shyness for aloofness, your silence for snobbery'. This is mistaken shyness indeed. Meanwhile if anything, the published text's 'I'd a-done anything for that woman if she didn't make me feel so obligated' seems truer than the studio version's 'I'd a-done anything for that woman if she'd only made me feel obligated': but not true enough to matter one way or the other to the success of this gloriously seething, restive song.

Dylan himself felt it sufficiently compelling to give it live performances well ahead of recording it in the studio, introducing it in concert on November 13, 1980 (with CARLOS SANTANA on lead guitar) and reprising it two nights later when he brought MIKE BLOOMFIELD on stage to blaze away on the song's second outing, in what proved the last drama of that great guitarist's life.

['The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar', LA, May 1981, Columbia 18-02510, US, 1981; & on Biograph, 1985 & Shot of Love CD reissues. 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' (live), San Francisco, 13 & 15 Nov 1980. Repulsion, dir. Roman Polanski; Compton/Tekli, UK, 1965.]

Gross, Michael [1952 -] Michael Gross was born on July 16, 1952 in New York City, where he continues to live and work. A slick, prolific journalist with a string of lucrative appointments on glossy magazines, he also turns out strongly commercial non-fiction books with enviable speed. These include Model: The Ugly Business of Beautiful Women (1995), a 'generational biography of the baby boom', My Generation (2000), and 740 Park: The Story of the World's Richest Apartment Building (2005). His next will be on 'another great institution of the American aristocracy, the Metropolitan Museum of Art.' But before he locked into all this Manhattan money, he 'produced' a book on Dylan, Bob Dylan: An Illustrated History, back in 1978 when Dylan books did not yet constitute an industry.

If 'produced' seems an odd word, it covered an odd arrangement: the title page declared that this was 'Produced by Michael Gross with a text by Robert Alexander'; yet poor Robert didn't get his name on the cover or the spine, the back-cover blurb attributes the 'sensitive, thorough text' to Gross himself and the whole thing was copyrighted by Gross. For most people, this didn't matter, because the striking feature of the book was its collection of photographs, some previously unseen and many rather beautiful.

Not to be confused with ALAN RINZLER's Bob Dylan: The Illustrated Record, Gross' book has not been republished and did not do much for this writer's subsequently Dylan-free career. Nor, of course, for Robert Alexander's.

[Michael Gross, Bob Dylan: An Illustrated History, New York: Grosset & Dunlap 1978; Model: The Ugly Business of Beautiful Women, New York: Morrow, 1995; My Generation, New York: Cliff Street Books/HarperCollins 2000; 740 Park: The Story of the World's Richest Apartment Building, New York: Broadway, 2005. Quotes from www.mgross.com; birthdate information e-mail to this writer 16 Sep 2005.]

Grossman, Albert [1926 - 1986] Albert B. Grossman was born in Chicago on May 21, 1926, the son of Russian Jewish immigrants who worked as tailors. He attended Lane Technical High School and graduated from Roosevelt University, Chicago with a degree in economics, though he's also said to have studied child psychology under the great Bruno Bettelheim (later the author of the pioneering work The Uses of Enchantment, a 1970s study of the inherent psychological wisdom of the fairytale). Perhaps this helped Grossman to psych people out, which he was extremely good at, in his later business dealings in the music industry.

After university he worked for the Chicago Housing Authority, leaving in the late 1950s in unclear circumstances—it's often suggested that he was fired for misconduct—to go into the club business. Seeing folk star Bob Gibson perform at the Off Beat Room in 1956 prompted Grossman's idea of a 'listening room' to showcase Gibson and other talent, as the folk revival movement grew. The result was the Gate of Horn in the basement of the Rice Hotel, where Jim (later ROGER) McGUINN got his early inspiration and kicked off his career as a 12-string guitarist. Grossman moved into managing some of the acts who appeared at his club, and in 1959, with Boston-based club owner George Wein, who had founded the Newport Jazz Festival, Albert started up the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL. 'The American public,' he told ROBERT SHELTON, 'is like Sleeping Beauty, waiting to be kissed awake by the prince of Folk Music.'

He was a pudgy man with derisive eyes, with a regular table at Gerde's Folk City from which he surveyed the scene in silence, and many people loathed him. In a milieu of New Left reformers and folkie idealists campaigning for a better world, Albert Grossman was a breadhead, seen to move serenely and with deadly purpose like a barracuda circling shoals of fish. Other people—among them Jones and HOWARD ALK—liked him, finding him loyal, flexible and tolerant, polite and considerate on a personal level and possessed of a dry sense of humour. Either way, he protected those whose careers he managed, building them up, gaining them far more of their dues and defending their interests more fiercely than the nicer, more amateurish managers in the Village. His clients included Bob Gibson and Hamilton Camp, ODETTA, PETER, PAUL & MARY, JOHN LEE HOOKER, IAN & SYLVIA, GORDON LIGHTFOOT, Richie Havens, Todd Rundgren, THE BAND, the Electric Flag, Janis Joplin and Bob Dylan. Sometimes he advertised that he was managing an act before they knew it themselves (as for instance in the 1965 Newport Folk Festival programme, when MIMI & RICHARD FARIÑA—and their manager—were surprised to find their names on Grossman's list of clients).

He moved in on Bob Dylan's career very early—secretly his manager by the time he encouraged IZZY YOUNG to lay out the money to hire Carnegie Chapter Hall for Dylan's launch there in November 1961, though not officially in place as manager until August 20, 1962—and who is to say that Dylan might not have taken a little longer to break through had Grossman not been wheeling and dealing for him? Nor can it be denied that he accommodated this most intelligent, difficult hustler of a client superbly—giving him space, not only figuratively but literally too, out at his house near Woodstock (where DANIEL KRAMER photographed him so memorably in early 1965), and never telling him, as others were quick to do, that he should stay where he was artistically, or stay sober, or play safe.

Grossman is to be seen in all his stealthy pomp, like the Cheshire cat without its grin, oozing in and out of the scenes of Don't Look Back as he guides Dylan through his 1965 British tour and out the other side into superstardom.

In 1969 he built the Bearsville Recording Studio near Woodstock, and in 1970 founded Bearsville Records. He had a pudgy finger in every possible pie, taking his percentage from venues and festivals his clients played, from their fees and royalties, from their music publishing, from the studios they recorded in, from the record labels that released their work, and sometimes from the houses they rented out of town.

By this time he was coming to the end of his association with Dylan. But he guarded Dylan's premium value to the end. At the Isle of Wight Music Festival in August 1969, by this time with his long hair in a ponytail (a rare sight on a man in his 40s), he was prowling around the hospitality tents ahead of Dylan's appearance. Asked if he'd heard the rumours that various members of THE BEATLES were going to join him on stage, he replied, sotto voce: 'Of course the Beatles would like to join Dylan on stage; I should like to fly to the moon.' Bob Dylan has never been given that level of guardianship since. The contracts between them were officially dissolved on July 17, 1970.

There are two interesting comments on Grossman in the SCORSESE film No Direction Home. One is Dylan's: 'He was kind of like a Colonel Tom Parker figure . . . you could smell him coming.' The other is JOHN COHEN's: 'I don't think Albert manipulated Bob, because Bob was weirder than Albert.'

Albert Grossman died of a heart attack while flying on Concorde to London on January 25, 1986. He is buried behind his own Bearsville Theater near Woodstock, New York. His widow Sally, née Bueler, an ex-New York City waitress whom he'd married in 1964, and who is the woman in red on the front cover of Bringing It All Back Home, continued to oversee his domain after his death. In 2004, reportedly, she began to sell off some of her late husband's holdings, including the theatre complex, the Bearsville restaurant and the studios.

[Albert Grossman to Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., 1987, p.88; Grossman on Dylan & the Beatles, remark to this writer, Isle of Wight, UK, 31 Aug 1969. Bruno Bettelheim, The Uses of Enchantment, London: Thames & Hudson, 1976.]

Guam [1975 - 1976] Guam was the band name informally given to the great assemblage of musicians Dylan took on the Rolling Thunder Revue tours of 1975 and 1976. Alternative names considered and/or given out in jest were the Budweiser Revue, Somebody & the Flaming Corks and MC & the Ushers. In 1975 Guam comprised: BOBBY NEUWIRTH, SCARLET RIVERA, T-BONE BURNETT, ROGER McGUINN, STEVE SOLES, MICK RONSON, DAVID MANSFIELD, ROB STONER, HOWIE WYETH and LUTHER RIX. For some reason JOAN BAEZ, RONNE BLAKLEY, RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT and ALLEN GINSBERG were generally not considered part of Guam.

In his Rolling Thunder Logbook, SAM SHEPARD tags Guam as 'Neuwirth's miraculous band of street thugs.' In 1976 the line-up was unchanged except that Luther Rix was replaced on congas by GARY BURKE.

[Sam Shepard, Rolling Thunder Logbook, London & New York: Penguin, 1978, p.54.]

guitars, Bob Dylan's, acoustic Bob Dylan may have presented himself as a hoboing young freewheeler with nothing but the clothes he stood up in, but apart from the cheap and nasty acoustic guitar he may have owned before his electric guitars back in Hibbing, MN, he has actually owned nothing but good quality acoustic instruments ever since he first went folkie, back in Dinkytown in 1959. There he swapped his electric for a 1949 Martin 00-17, and plays it on the Minnesota tape of May 1961, before giving it to early manager Kevin Krown, who kept it until his death in 1992. It's now at the Experience Music Project in Seattle.

Next came the 1945 J50 Gibson Dylan is holding on the cover of Bob Dylan, and which he plays on that album and at some of the sessions for Freewheelin', on which he also plays unspecified Martin guitars. This Gibson was 'lost in action' in late 1963, and was replaced by a 1930s 13-fret Gibson Nick Lucas Special, bought from Fretted Instruments store-owner Marc Silber (son of IRWIN SILBER), which became the acoustic guitar Dylan played on Another Side of Bob Dylan and Bringing It All Back Home and was his instrument of choice in concert from late 1963 right through till he arrived in Melbourne from Sydney in mid-April 1966 and found that its front had caved in (because Dylan had piled harmonicas on top of it in its case and then rammed it shut). The Gibson can also be seen in Don't Look Back. Its seller, Silber, remembered that later, he went to sell Dylan another guitar, up in Woodstock, probably in the early 1970s: 'a really nice late-60s Martin. He was a tough guy to do business with, though, because he didn't have any idea what the guitars were worth.'

In Melbourne, Dylan had borrowed another guitar while the Gibson was being repaired. Local musician Phillip T. Pascoe recalls that afterwards, 'The one he borrowed went on sale in a little guitar shop in Melbourne for $500. I went by that store after school every day for a couple of weeks and dreamed up ways of coming up with that kind of money (impossible when you're 18 years old). He had only played four concerts but that sucker had flatpick scratches all across the face. I'd watched him play it and man, he flatpicked from the elbow not the wrist.'

By the time the 1966 tour reached Britain, Dylan was playing an acoustic Fender King, which can be seen in the hotel-room scenes in Eat the Document when Dylan is playing 'What Kind of Friend is This?' and 'On a Rainy Afternoon'. These electric-look Fenders, introduced in 1963, never caught on and were discontinued in 1971.

After the motorcycle crash, Dylan used a Gibson Dove on John Wesley Harding, recorded in late 1967, and when he reappeared in public for the first time, at the WOODY GUTHRIE Memorial Concert in January 1968, he was playing a Martin 0-18. On Nashville Skyline he plays GEORGE HARRISON's Gibson J-200 (as seen on the album cover), as he did at that year's Isle of Wight Festival. On the JOHNNY CASH television show that May he plays a Martin Triple-0 18, and he stuck with Martins all through the early 1970s, including on the Nashville Self Portrait sessions, at the Concert for Bangla Desh in August 1971 (a D-28) and at the Friends of Chile Benefit Concert in May 1974 (a 1943 00-21). This last was also used for much of the 1974 'comeback' tour and for the New York September 1974 sessions for Blood on the Tracks, for the 'World of JOHN HAMMOND' TV performance filmed in September 1975 and sometimes on Rolling Thunder Revue concerts. (At the Minnesota Blood on the Tracks sessions in December 1974 he had used a Martin 00-42, a similar model.) On the Rolling Thunder Revue in general he used a number of vintage guitars, both Martins and Gibsons, but in 1978 he was given two Yamahas which he used occasionally on that year's World Tour and again later, also using Washburns in the same period. He retained a sunburst Washburn Monterey right through to the 1984 tour of Europe. It can be seen on the cover of the Real Live album. In 1986 and 1987, a black Washburn EA-26 alternated with various Martins.

In 1988 when he embarked upon the Never-Ending Tour, and displayed such a renewed interest in acoustic material, his main instrument was a Martin D-28, but in the mid-90s he returned to favouring Gibsons, and except for the fall tour leg of 2001, when he often played a special Martin HD-28 that looked like a photo negative image of a 'normal' black and white guitar, since around 1998 he has concentrated on playing a sunburst Gibson J-45.

On record, you'd have to say that throughout a career of what would seem a privileged profligacy of acoustic instruments, he has never achieved a better sound than he had right back at the beginning, on those first two albums.

[This entry relied entirely on Eyolf Østrem's 'Dylan's Guitars' ('relying heavily on input from Peter Stone Brown & Paul Hostetter'), & Joel Gilbert's 'Highway 61' guitars pages, seen online 15 Jan 2006 at www.dylanchords.com/professors/dylans_guitars.htm & at www.highway61revisited.com/guitars.htm.]

guitars, Bob Dylan's, electric In a recently emerged photograph taken by Dylan's mother in Hibbing, and dated via rickety provenance as being from September 1958, 17-year-old Bob is shown with his second electric guitar. Most more youthful rock'n'roll moments seem to have him on piano. We can say for certain from the photograph that this electric instrument is not a Fender (it's sometimes been said that he owned a Fender in Hibbing)—and we can say with less certainty but reasonable conviction that it isn't his first electric, a $39 turquoise Silvertone bought mail-order from Sears Roebuck, but must be his second, a new Supro Ozark (a guitar JIMI HENDRIX also had as a lad), bought at Mr. Hautala's store in Hibbing at a knock-down $60 because Bob and his friend John Bucklen each bought one at the same time: and September 1958 is too late for him to be just acquiring the Silvertone. This is the picture of a boy who's proud of having upgraded. In Minneapolis, Dylan swaps his electric—whether the same one or a successor we don't know—for an acoustic. From there he emerges into the world as an acoustic-playing folkie, and remains so until July 1965.

In Don't Look Back, though, when Dylan is on his last acoustic solo tour, earlier in '65, we see him standing in a street in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, twitching about in his Chelsea boots, delighting at a display of electric guitars in a music-shop window. 'Look at this guitar, man,' he says excitedly, 'this one right here! Do you believe that guitar?! They don't have those guitars in the States, man. They're incredible!'

He's retained that relish for rare guitars ever since. Norman Harris, a Reseda, California, specialist dealer, told Guitar Player magazine: 'Dylan has a lot of strange things—though he's not really into guitars—just because of what they look like.'

Dylan bought two favourites from Harris: a 1959 cherry-sunburst Stratocaster, commonly used in concerts over a number of years, and a yellow vintage Fender Telecaster bought for the 1974 tour, and which had been acquired from an ex-musician car-dealer who had played it on a tour with the Three Stooges after being given it by Leo Fender in person.

Then there's the flamboyant white guitar on which Dylan surprised us by playing unprecedented slide, on 'Shelter from the Storm', in the 1976 'Hard Rain' TV Special. This was an early-1960s Glenwood 98 National, one of three Nationals bought that spring from Don Vargas, of Woodland Hills, California (the others were a lap-slide and a jazz model). The Glenwood was sometimes brought on stage during the 1978 World Tour (and features in the backstage photo used on a November 1978 Rolling Stone front cover) but was never played again in concert after 1976. It also appears on the back of the Hard Rain LP, and guitar technician Larry Cragg is seen working on it in a photo in that jolly book Encounters with Bob Dylan: If You See Him Say Hello, compiled by Tracy Johnson in 2000. This is the guitar that Dylan named 'Rimbaud', though collectively in the business this model is known as 'the map' because its body shape resembles that of the USA.

On the whole, however, the electric guitars Dylan has used most consistently down the years have been classic, rather than weird, models. When he went electric at the 1965 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL he used a black and white 1962 Fender Stratocaster; on the 1966 tour he used a black and white 1958 Fender Telecaster; with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS in 1987 he used a 1959 sunburst Fender Strat—and in general, though there have been exceptions, including some Gibson Les Pauls, essentially ever since 1978, his guitar of choice has been the Fender Strat.

[Main sources: '1970s: Bob Dylan's Favourite Electric Guitars', author unstated but prob. John Bauldie, in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987 (but with corrections; that piece dated the Glenwood 98 as early 1950s; they weren't introduced till 1962); survey by Eyolf Østrem at www.dylanchords.com/professors/dylans_guitars.htm, seen online 15 Jan 2006; Derek Barker, guitars piece in Isis no.104, Aug–Sep 2002 & 'God Said to Abraham', ISIS: A Bob Dylan Anthology, London: Helter Skelter, 2001 & 2004 & conversations & e-mails with Derek Barker, Jan 2006; amendments to Hibbing guitars details thanks to Dave Engel, Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues: Dylan in Minnesota, Rudolph, WI: River City Memoirs—Mesabi, 1997, p.179.]

Guthrie, Arlo [1947 -] Arlo Guthrie, one of WOODY GUTHRIE's many children, was born at Coney Island, Brooklyn, on July 10, 1947 and grew up mostly in Queens with his mother Marjorie, his father having rarely been around while fit and having been moved to the Greystone Park New Jersey State Hospital when ill, when Arlo was eight years old. He first encountered Bob Dylan five years later, when Dylan was barely a grown-up himself but had arrived in New York at the start of 1961. The first meeting between Bob and Arlo has long possessed a mythic quality, but seems to be true:

'The story,' wrote Brian McCoy in the Miami News, 'goes like this: Shortly after arriving in New York . . . Dylan made a pilgrimage to the Guthrie home . . . looking for Arlo's famed father, Woody. He was greeted at the door by a baby-sitter who, not knowing what to make of the scruffy kid, called Arlo's mom at work. "Don't let him in," Mrs. Guthrie said. "Tell him to come back when I'll be home." The baby-sitter hung up the phone only to find Dylan showing Arlo a new way to play harmonica. "That happened," Guthrie said . . . in an interview from Taos, NM [in 1988].' Dylan gives his own account of the story in Chronicles Volume One in 2004, referring to Arlo's mother more familiarly as 'Margie' and forbearing to mention the harmonica lesson—saying rather that he 'stayed just long enough to warm up, said a quick goodbye and left' with his 'boots still waterlogged'.

Arlo had become a singer-songwriter himself by the time of his father's death in October 1967—and that year enjoyed the most prominent hit he would ever achieve, with what seemed at the time the oh-so-cool talking ramble of 'Alice's Restaurant Massacree', a tall stoned-hippie tale about avoiding the draft and being busted for littering, told with a relaxed if slightly nasal delivery, set to an acoustic guitar and a gentle rhythm-section shuffle, part of its joke being the way that it stretched itself counter-culturally over 18 minutes. His début album, Alice's Restaurant (1967) included his follow-up, the equally lengthy 'Motorcycle Song'.

Arlo performed his father's fiercesome 'Jesus Christ' at the two Memorial Concerts on January 20, 1968 (and stood in the ensemble with Dylan and everyone else to share vocals and play harmonica on 'This Land Is Your Land' at the end of one show and 'This Train Is Bound for Glory' at the end of the other); he appeared at Woodstock in the summer of 1969, singing an excited and affecting 'Coming Into Los Angeles', and enjoyed a hit single with STEVE GOODMAN's train song 'City of New Orleans' in 1972, after which he settled down to a more conventional folkie career.

In May 1974 Arlo Guthrie was on stage again with Bob Dylan, at the Friends of Chile Benefit Concert at Madison Square Garden's Felt Forum. Dylan sang backing vocal on Arlo's 'Deportees', and then after Dylan sang 'North Country Blues' he and Guthrie, plus PHIL OCHS, DAVE VAN RONK, Larry Estridge, Melanie and PETE SEEGER all battled their way through ‘Spanish Is the Loving Tongue’ and ‘Blowin’ in the Wind’.

In the late 1960s Arlo Guthrie had been one of those who, according to ROBERT SHELTON, strongly encouraged Dylan to go into films, aided by Harold Leventhal, who had been Woody’s agent and was associate producer of Arlo’s own film, a predictably vacuous and shallow Hollywood Alice’s Restaurant in which Joseph Boley played Woody and Sylvia Davis played Arlo’s mother. Despite being directed by Arthur Penn, who in 1966 had directed that great Marlon Brando film The Chase and in 1967 Bonnie & Clyde, Arlo’s embarrassing film must have more than nullified his ability to point Dylan at Hollywood, and it would be a further four years until Dylan entrusted himself to SAM PECKINPAH.

Since the mid-1970s Arlo Guthrie has continued to perform, not least, in recent years, with more than 25 different symphony orchestras; since 1983 he has run his own record label, and throughout a long career of performing and recording, has continued to be active in fundraising and campaigning in the fight against Huntington’s Chorea, the degenerative disease that killed his father. Like Dylan, he spends much of the year on the road. Weirdly, in 1996 he re-recorded the whole of the Alice’s Restaurant album, replicating it right down to the cover, on which the middle-aged, silver-haired, naked Guthrie sits at the same table, in the same pose, as had the young man of nearly 30 years previously. This too parallels something Dylan has sometimes talked of doing—not, of course, posing naked at a restaurant table but re-recording some of his old records . . . which would be interesting to hear but also, as in Arlo’s case, unnecessary.

On the subject of Dylan, Arlo told the Miami News: ‘he’s obviously somebody whose work I greatly admire’—and then summarised his impact shrewdly: ‘he . . . succeeded in doing something that had never been done: making our music serious. Before he was a generation’s hero, he was a folk singers’ hero.’

[Arlo Guthrie: Alice’s Restaurant, Reprise R-6267 (mono) / RS-6267, US, 1967; ‘City of New Orleans’, on Hobo’s Lullaby, Reprise MS-2060, US, 1972; Alice’s Restaurant—The Massacree Revisited, Rising Son RSR-0010, US, 1996. Alice’s Restaurant, dir. Arthur Penn; Florin, US, 1969. Friends of Chile Benefit Concert, NY, 9 May 1974. Brian McCoy, ‘Arlo Guthrie back in spotlight after album’, The Miami News, 6 Dec 1988, online 14 Dec 2005 at www.bobdylanroots.com/arlo.html. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., 1987, p.300. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.100.]

Guthrie, Woody [1912 - 1967] Guthrie travelled around with LEADBELLY, SONNY TERRY and CISCO HOUSTON during the Second World War. Their recordings include a Leadbelly song, ‘We Shall Be Free’, on which Dylan based his own ‘I Shall Be Free’ and ‘I Shall Be Free No. 10’. The tune is the same in all three songs, all of which belong to an older song cluster (see ‘I Shall Be Free’) and to the talking-blues genre. This genre is generally acknowledged to have originated (on record, at least) with the white artist Chris Bouchillon but when we attribute Dylan’s talking-blues style to Guthrie we tend to forget that black artists explored this form earlier than Guthrie did, and that Guthrie himself listened attentively to black music. (A particularly fine example is BLIND WILLIE McTELL’s ‘Travelin’ Blues’, recorded in Atlanta on October 30, 1929.)

Dylan’s early work includes a Guthrie Period, of course, and while one of the two self-composed songs on his first album is the direct address ‘Song to Woody’, the other, ‘Talkin’ New York’ also quotes from him, transcribing and reiterating his morality (‘Now a very great man once said / Some people rob you with a fountain pen’, which comes from Guthrie’s ‘Pretty Boy Floyd’): a morality that has remained crucial in Dylan’s work ever since. We meet it close to the surface again in the interestingly political 1980s song ‘Union Sundown’: a genuine protest song in the Guthrie tradition, and an honourable addition to it because it is observant about a reality that wasn’t there to be observed in the 1960s—a real and contemporary ‘state of the union’ survey, and with a title that carries among its many meanings one that echoes a far earlier Dylan sleevenote poem in its recognition that the Guthrie era of noble, simple pro-union sentiment is no longer an available option.

Guthrie Americanised the ancient ballad ‘Gypsy Davey’ (CHILD ballad no.200), abolishing its ‘milk-white steed’; his was a version Dylan was recorded performing at the home of Sid & Bob Gleason in East Orange, NJ, February-March 1961, and Dylan clearly knew it like the back of his lily-white hand when he was writing his own ‘Boots of Spanish Leather’.

Early Dylan can also use the tone of Guthrie’s autobiographical writing unaltered, can capture it exactly, in song. The chaotic scurrying around of cram-jam-packed humanity, which Guthrie describes so well in his tremendous autobiography Bound for Glory (1943), which Dylan is believed to have read in 1958–particularly in the sequence about the box car ride that opens and closes the book—is done precisely in this way: ‘Dogs a-barkin’, cats a-meowin’ / Women screamin’, fists a-flyin’, babies cryin’ / Cops a-comin’, me a-runnin’ / Maybe we just better call off the picnic.’ That is Woody Guthrie’s voice. It’s from Dylan’s 1962 song ‘Talking Bear Mountain Picnic Massacre Blues’.

Similarly, a line like ‘In the misty crystal glitter’ (from Guthrie’s song ‘Grand Coulee Dam’) clearly has its influence even on the Dylan of ‘Chimes of Freedom’—and you need only compare the writing and delivery of Guthrie’s ‘Talking About Songs’ (1944) with particular passages of Dylan’s ‘Last Thoughts on Woody Guthrie' (recorded in live recitative performance in 1963 and finally released on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 box set, 1991) to hear yet another side of Guthrie's voice: and it's surprising to find his influence still so strong at this point. Here's Woody Guthrie: 'I hate a song that makes you think that you're just / born to lose—bound to lose—no good to nobody, no / good fer nuthin' because yer either too old or too young / or too fat or too slim or too ugly or too this or too that: / songs that run you down or songs that poke fun at ya on / account of yr bad luck or yer [pause] hard travelin' . . . / I am out to sing songs that will prove to you that this is / your world, that if it has hit you pretty hard and / knocked you down for a dozen loops, no matter how hard it's run you / down or rolled you over, no matter what color, what size / y'are, how y're built . . .' and here's Bob Dylan's ambiguously titled 'Last Thoughts on Woody Guthrie': 'When yer head gets twisted and yer mind grows numb / When you think you're too old, too young, too smart or too dumb. . . . You need something to make it known / That it's you and no one else that owns / That spot that yer standing, that space that you're sitting / That the world aint got you beat / That it ain't got you licked / It can't get you crazy no matter how many times you might get kicked . . .'

Even Dylan's 1960s drawings and paintings owe a lot to the quirky pen-and-ink sketches in Guthrie's Bound for Glory. Look at the sketches published in Writings and Drawings by Bob Dylan in 1972 (a book dedicated to 'the magnificent Woodie [sic] Guthrie and Robert Johnson . . .') and the paintings on the covers of Dylan's album Self Portrait and THE BAND's first album Music from Big Pink.

Guthrie's work was not always from that mythical terrain, the pure oral-tradition land of the folk. He seems to have based his rather awful poem 'Belle Starr' (in American Folksong, 1947) on the equally awful film Belle Starr (directed Irving Cummings, 20th Century Fox, 1941)—a poem that PETE SEEGER and RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT had no more sense than to put a tune to and record (The Bad Men [sic], Columbia L2L-1011, nia) and to publish in Sing Out! vol.15, no.5, November 1965.

Dylan also recorded some of Guthrie's children's songs in early 1961, and kept them in his repertoire while he was conquering New York. These included 'Car Car' (East Orange, NJ, February-March 1961, BONNIE BEECHER's Minneapolis apartment that May, and at the Gaslight, NY, Sep 1961) and 'Howdido' (Beecher's, May 1961). Who knows why? You have never met a child (or adult) who enjoys listening to Guthrie (or Dylan) singing these dreary songs, with their plodding, morose jollity. And since Guthrie spent as little time as possible with his own children, it's no wonder he misjudged his audience. (His son ARLO GUTHRIE and other relatives have apparently 'revived' these songs on a spooky 1990s album that mixes old Woody Guthrie vocal tracks with new recordings.)

In 1987 Dylan said that the first thing that struck him about Guthrie was his sound: not words but his sound—and interestingly, he added that he thought it quite close to THE CARTER FAMILY's sound. Then Dylan uses the phrase 'links in a chain' to describe how people pass on what has gone before to those who come after; this comes in answer to questions about Guthrie's influence upon him.

Dylan's first public appearance after the motorcycle crash of 1966 was at the January 1968 Woody Guthrie Memorial Concert at Carnegie Hall. At the afternoon show he and The Band performed vibrant, fresh versions of Guthrie's 'I Ain't Got No Home', 'Dear Mrs. Roosevelt' and 'Grand Coulee Dam', and, with the ensemble of other performers, joined in 'This Land Is Your Land'. At the evening show Dylan and The Band performed the same three songs and, ensemble, joined in 'This Train Is Bound for Glory'. And in 1987, for the album A Vision Shared: A Tribute to Woody Guthrie and Leadbelly, Dylan contributed a new recording of 'Pretty Boy Floyd'.

Nowhere in song does Dylan throw us back to Guthrie—to song titles he's written or performed, and to phrases associated with his work—more than within the multiple allusions, the deep soundings of meaning and memory that boom and rumble beneath the surface of the 1997 album Time Out of Mind.

In prose, Dylan has fully seized the opportunity, in Chronicles Volume One, 2004, to give Guthrie and his impact and influence a truly fulsome amount of careful yet warm attention. Woody is there on pages 9, 63, 83, 98–100, 227, 229, 243, 250, 251, 257, 270 and 283. Being 'knocked out' by Woody is on pages 243–46. Visiting his Coney Island house is on pages 99–100. His repertoire is discussed on pages 247, 248 and 252. Songs and records by Woody are considered on pages 49, 53–54, 63, 98, 243–44, 246–47 and 279. Bound for Glory is cited on page 245. As ever, Dylan's observations are as shrewd as they are romantic, as thoughtful as respectful. And the early period in which Dylan more or less tried to become Guthrie, and is tackled on the subject by JON PANKAKE, is candidly discussed.

The great folklorist ALAN LOMAX wrote of Guthrie that 'he inherited the folk tradition of the last American frontier (western Oklahoma) and during his incessant wandering across the US he has recomposed this tradition into contemporary folky ballads about the lives of the American working class. . . . No modern American poet or folk singer has made a more significant contribution to our culture.' Well, except one.

[Woody Guthrie: The Library of Congress Recordings is a 3-CD set, Rounder Reissue Series 1041–1043, 1993, comprising '3 hours of songs and conversations' incl. 22 monologues. For other recording details see www.woodyguthrie.org. Leadbelly: 'We Shall Be Free', NY, May 1944 (with Woody Guthrie & Sonny Terry); Leadbelly Sings Folk Songs, Folkways FA 2488, 1962, CD-reissued as FA 2488, 1995.

Dylan 1987 remarks re Guthrie: Questions from Robert Noakes, aka Rab Noakes, 1970s singer-songwriter turned Scotland-based radio producer; recorded answers sent by Dylan's office on a 9′ 27″ tape, 8 Jul 1987; parts broadcast in 4-program series Woody Guthrie, BBC Radio, and in A Vision Shared: A Tribute to Woody Guthrie and Leadbelly, CBS-TV, 1987. (The whole tape of Dylan's answers is in circulation.)

Dylan & The Band: 'I Ain't Got No Home', 'Dear Mrs. Roosevelt', 'Grand Coulee Dam' & 'This Train Is Bound for Glory' issued Tribute to Woody Guthrie Vol. 1, Columbia KC31171, 1972; 'This Land Is Your Land' issued Tribute to Woody Guthrie Vol. 2, Warner Bros. K46144, 1972. Bob Dylan: 'Pretty Boy Floyd', prob. LA, Apr 1987; Folkways: A Vision Shared—A Tribute to Woody Guthrie & Leadbelly, Columbia OC 44034, 24 Aug 1988.

The standard biography is Woody Guthrie: A Life by Joe Klein (New York: Random House, 1980) but the more recent Ramblin' Man: The Life and Times of Woody Guthrie by Ed Cray, 2005, is also absorbing. There is too a collection of other Guthrie writing, Born to Win, edited by ROBERT SHELTON (1965). But above all towers the autobiography, Bound for Glory: a great book, written when its author was 30. Dylan's copy was the 1st edition paperback, 1949.]

Haggard, Merle [1937 -] Merle Ronald Haggard was born on April 6, 1937 in Bakersfield, California, the son of Okie refugees from the Dust Bowl of the 1930s. He had a luridly dysfunctional childhood of truancy, general delinquency and crime—he was sentenced to 15 years in San Quentin at the age of 20—but he learnt to play outstanding guitar and after being released from prison in 1960 and subsequently pardoned, he became, encouraged first by LEFTY FRIZZELL and later by JOHNNY CASH, a big-name singer and songwriter in 1970s country music, looking wiry, dark and handsome, like a sort of Nashville Warren Beatty.

Granted his history, it was not surprising that he matched the lugubrious sentimentality of mainstream country with a notably tough and abrasive electric guitar sound, and at the end of the 1960s was a founding member of the so-called Outlaw Country movement. 1970's 'Okie from Muskogee' suggested a right-wing agenda but Haggard saw his own stance as merely blue-collar, and he declined to endorse the notorious Governor Wallace when invited to do so. Early songs that spread into the mainstream include 'Mama Tried' (covered memorably by THE EVERLY BROTHERS on their pioneering country rock album of 1968, Roots, and later by THE GRATEFUL DEAD) and 'Sing Me Back Home', both characteristic of Haggard's subject matter in dealing with crimes and regret, and the yearning of the hardened and the doomed for an idealised, irretrievable past. Between his 1965 début album, Strangers, and Chicago Wind 40 years later, he issued no less than 73 other newly recorded albums (some as by Merle Haggard and the Strangers), including, in 1969, the double album Same Train, A Different Time: Merle Haggard Sings the Great Songs of JIMMIE RODGERS.

In 2005, he shared most of a spring tour with Bob Dylan, beginning in Seattle on March 7 and ending in New York City with five nights at the Beacon Theater, the last of them on April 30. The opening act was Amos Lee, then Haggard and his band, and then Dylan. (Reno and Las Vegas, on March 18 and 19, and Mount Pleasant, Michigan, on April 11, were Dylan-only concerts.) Altogether, there were 36 Haggard-Dylan double bills. They never shared the stage, but Dylan did sing Haggard's 'Sing Me Back Home' in nine of his own concerts. (He had sung it once before, at his exceptional Bonnaroo Music Festival performance in Manchester, Tennessee, on June 11, 2004.)

Haggard's official website greets you with the branding 'Haggard: Poet of the Common Man'. The common man, of course, retires; like the common woman, the performer generally doesn't, and Merle, almost 70 and now grey-haired and—well, yes, haggard—keeps on keeping on.

[Merle Haggard: Strangers, Hollywood, 1965, Capitol, nia, US, 1965; Sing Me Back Home & Mama Tried, Capitol, 1968; Same Train, A Different Time: Merle Haggard Sings the Great Songs of Jimmie Rodgers, 1969; Okie from Muscogee—Live, 1969. Chicago Wind, EMI-Capitol CD 2005, US, 2005.]

H

Hajdu, David [1955 -] David Anthony Hajdu was born in Phillipsburg, New Jersey, on March 8, 1955 and was introduced to the first Dylan album by a much older brother when the album was new (and when Hajdu was aged seven). He became Music Critic for the Hollywood Reporter 1985–90, Senior and then General Editor of Entertainment Weekly 1990–99 and has been Music Critic of The New Republic since 2003. He is also a contributor to the New Yorker, New York Review of Books, Atlantic Monthly, New York Times, Rolling Stone and Vanity Fair. His first book, Lush Life, was a biography of jazz musician Billy Strayhorn; his latest book is The Ten-Cent Plague: The Great Comic-Book Scare and How It Changed Popular Culture.

Hajdu first wrote on Dylan when reviewing him at the Beacon Theatre, NYC, in 1989 but his significant contribution to Dylan scrutiny is his book Positively 4th Street: The Lives and Times of JOAN BAEZ, BOB DYLAN, MIMI BAEZ FARIÑA and RICHARD FARIÑA, a fascinating, detailed account of the early career years of Dylan and key people around him. Instead of an account that sets the determinedly individualistic young Dylan up against the old hands of the folk revival movement and the purist guardians of traditional song, Hajdu's book hones in on four young, relatively privileged suburbanites—young lions using the folk revival / New Left world as their playground, and flitting back and forth not just between Greenwich Village and Boston but from East Coast to West and from the US to Europe.

If Hajdu has an axe to grind, it's the elevation of Richard Fariña to the status of both folk-rock inventor and brilliant novelist robbed of recognition only by tragic early death: but there's no glorification of Fariña as a person, any more than of the book's other spoiled, self-regarding protagonists—nor any crass attempt to suggest that such characteristics can't go hand in hand with fine work. Hajdu is scrupulously fair to all four, and he handles both copious amounts of generous personal detail—his research has been deep and thorough—and the broad drama of social change going on while these young lives fizz across the foreground.

Even at his most journalistic (and he is, after all, a writer for slick American mainstream journals) he's acute and economical, as for instance here: 'In folk circles . . . [amid] down-home characters groaning in and out of tune, Joan Baez seemed like the spirit of a child-queen, floating in off the moors.' More skilfully and valuably, he summarises beautifully what was at stake, ideologically, in the struggle between the folkies and mainstream America at the specific historical moment that Dylan, with his usual good timing, managed to catch with his arrival in New York:

> '. . . folk put a premium on naturalness and authenticity during a boom in man-made materials, especially plastics. . . . A music that gloried in the unique and the weird, folk challenged conformity and celebrated regionalism during the rise of mass media, national brands, and interstate travel. . . . A music historical by nature, it conjured distant times, often in archaic language, celebrating the past rather than the "new" and "improved". . . . It was small in scale . . . when American society, with its new supermarkets, V8 engines, and suburban sprawl, appeared to be physically ballooning. Folk music was down to earth when jet travel and space exploration were emerging; while FRANK SINATRA was flying to the moon, PETE SEEGER was waist deep in the Big Muddy.'

[David Hajdu: Positively 4th Street: The Lives and Times of Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Mimi Baez Fariña and Richard Fariña, New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2001; quotation from pp.19 & 32–33.]

Hall, Bobbye [19?? -] Bobbye Jean Hall Porter was born in Detroit and by 17 was playing percussion on Motown Records; when the company moved to Los Angeles, she followed. She is one of the few women to succeed as a session player in what must be one of the most male-dominated professions in the world. She has played on a number of significant albums including TRACY CHAPMAN's Crossroads, Marvin Gaye's Let's Get It On, JONI MITCHELL's great For the Roses and Hejira, MARIA MULDAUR's Waitress in a Donut Shop, Randy Newman's Good Old Boys and albums by Greg Allman, the Allman Brothers Band, PAUL BUTTERFIELD, Lowell Fulson, JERRY GARCIA, Jefferson Starship, CAROLE KING, AL KOOPER, Lynyrd Skynyrd, Dave Mason, TOM PETTY, Poco, James Taylor, the Temptations, Sarah Vaughan, Mary Wells, STEVIE WONDER and many others. In 1977 she made her own album, Body Language for Lovers (with Dorothy Ashby, Chuck Rainey, Andy Belling and other jazz-funk people) and later the obscurely titled No. 29.

Bobbye Hall was the only female musician (as against backing singer) on Dylan's big 1978 World Tour, right through from the rehearsals in late 1977 in Santa Monica and throughout the tour itself, beginning in Japan in February and ending in mid-December in Florida. She therefore appears, of course, on the live album At Budokan, but she also plays percussion, congas and tambourine on all the April to May 1978 studio sessions back in Santa Monica which give us the Street Legal album of that year. She is sometimes listed as having played on the far earlier album Dylan, released by Columbia from outtakes recorded right at the beginning of the 1970s, which is hard to confirm or disprove—but it doesn't help that she is also listed as having played on Bob Dylan, his first and most definitely solo album, recorded in 1961. She has re-connected with Dylan professionally only once since the heady year of 1978, but not due to any cooling of enthusiasm on his part. As late as that November 28 in Jackson, Mississippi, he was introducing her to the audience as: 'On the conga drums, from Detroit, the most amazing Miss Bobbye Hall!' Her reappearance was at one Los Angeles studio session for the Shot of Love album on March 31, 1981, when she played on a number of unused takes of 'Caribbean Wind'.

[Bobbye Hall: Body Language for Lovers, 20th Century T534, US, 1977; No. 29, nia, 1989?]

Hammond, John [1910 - 1987] John Henry Hammond was born into a branch of the Vanderbilt family in New York City on December 15, 1910, attended Yale and the Juilliard school of music. He gave up classical music in order to pursue his enthusiasm for jazz (which he discovered in the city's clubs as an adolescent) and black popular music. He wrote music criticism and journalism for Down Beat and the British papers Melody Maker and The Gramophone, wrote widely on race relations in the US and even became a vice-president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. His family money financed his further career as an impresario: he owned a theatre at which he presented black acts, and he pioneered integrated touring and recording sessions. (As PETE SEEGER once said, 'Jazz became integrated 10 years before baseball largely because of John Hammond.')

His career as a promoter of talent and as a record producer stretched from the 1930s to the 1980s and the list of greats he discovered or brought into the studio was phenomenal. He worked in executive positions for several labels, though most notably for Columbia Records, for whom he produced artists from Bessie Smith to Bob Dylan. He discovered and/or brought studio opportunities to Count Basie, Charlie Christian, Lionel Hampton, Billie Holiday, Meade Lux Lewis, Teddy Wilson and Lester Young and many other jazz artists, and in 1938 and 1939 Hammond financed and promoted the now-famous 'From Spirituals to Swing' concerts at Carnegie Hall—bringing a wide range of black music to Manhattan's swankiest venue—and featuring many of the above, plus Benny Goodman, BIG BILL BROONZY and SONNY TERRY. He wanted to include ROBERT JOHNSON at the first of these concerts and sent for him, not knowing that Johnson had been murdered shortly beforehand.

Hammond served in the US Army in World War II, returning to the musical fray as soon as possible. But when swing gave way to bebop, Hammond, who didn't understand the latter, switched his attention more towards blues and pop. Just as many of the earlier jazz names he had espoused were unknowns when he latched onto them, so too he followed only his own instincts in the postwar era, in which he signed, among others, the important Nigerian drummer Babatunde Olatunji (Hammond produced his ground-breaking first album, Drums of Passion, released in 1959 and still selling today), Big Joe Turner, Pete Seeger, Aretha Franklin, MICHAEL BLOOMFIELD, LEONARD COHEN and BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN, and had a significant hand in opening the careers of George Benson and STEVIE RAY VAUGHAN (his last signing).

Hammond had the decency and belief to produce the 1965 album by the fragile but giant figure SON HOUSE that yielded at least one invaluable addition to his canon, the exquisite 'Pearline', and in 1962 it was also Hammond who, returning his attention to one of House's pupils, compiled and released on Columbia the hugely influential LP of Robert Johnson's work Robert Johnson, King of the Delta Blues Singers.

In 1961 Hammond signed Bob Dylan to Columbia, and then produced his first and second albums. After the poor sales of the first album, Dylan was known around the Columbia building as 'Hammond's folly'. On September 10, 1975, it was in Hammond's presence at the recording of the tribute TV show 'The World of John Hammond' that Dylan delivered the first public performances of 'Hurricane', 'Oh Sister' and 'Simple Twist of Fate', from his then-forthcoming album Desire.

No-one except DAVE VAN RONK receives a more respectful write-up in Dylan's 2004 memoir Chronicles Volume One than John Hammond. Dylan appreciates not only the man's straightforwardness and seriousness of purpose, his depth of knowledge and his insight into the very young Dylan's potential, but also makes the specific point that when Hammond gave him a pre-release copy of King of the Delta Blues Singers this had ramifications for his own development as a writer: 'If I hadn't heard the Robert Johnson record when I did, there probably would have been hundreds of lines of mine that would have been shut down—that I wouldn't have felt free enough or upraised enough to write.'

Returning to the more general, Dylan says of Hammond that men like him 'came from an older world, a more ancient order. . . . They knew where they belonged and they had guts to back up whatever their beliefs were. You didn't want to let them down.'

John Hammond died, from complications following several strokes, on July 10, 1987, at the age of 76.

[Seeger quote seen online 5 Jan 2006 at www.rockhall.com/hof/inductee.asp?id=117. Bob Dylan: 'Hurricane' (1st take, uncirculated), 'Oh Sister', 'Simple Twist of Fate' & 'Hurricane', WTTW-TV, NY, 10 Sep 1975, broadcast 'The World of John Hammond', PBS-TV, 13 Dec 1975; Dylan quotes, Chronicles Volume One, pp.287–88 & 288–89.]

Hammond, John Jr. [1942 -] John Paul Hammond was born in New York City on November 13, 1942, the good-looking son of JOHN HAMMOND, the legendary record producer, with whom he did not grow up, though they remained in contact. He attended private school and then Antioch College, Ohio, but after seeing JIMMY REED at the Apollo Theater in New York he dropped out of college to become a blues singer and guitarist. But though he sometimes suggested to his father people he thought he ought to check out, he didn't seem to impress his father unduly as a performer himself, and signed to Vanguard in 1962. After Dylan signed to Columbia some months earlier, John is supposed to have been the first to tell Hammond Sr. that Dylan's real name was Zimmerman. A dedicated, rather solemn archivist of the blues, who more often imitated than created from it (see prewar blues, Dylan's use of, an introduction), he was always around the Village in Dylan's folkie period, and was perhaps a friend of Dylan's early on.

Along with BRUCE LANGHORNE, JOHN SEBASTIAN and the mysterious bassist 'John Boone', Hammond played on a Dylan session in New York on the evening of January 14, 1965 in the midst of the Bringing It All Back Home sessions, but it provided nothing used on the album; it did, however, provide the below-par version of 'I'll Keep It With Mine' released 20 years later on the Biograph box set.

John Hammond Jr. also claimed to have 'discovered' the Hawks in Toronto in 1964, and it was perhaps through him that Dylan picked up on them. Certainly some of them were featured on his 1965 album So Many Roads. This was so early, from the pre-nascent BAND point of view, that not only was ROBBIE ROBERTSON billed as Jaime R. Robertson but LEVON HELM was billed as Mark Levon Helm and GARTH HUDSON as Eric Hudson. (Charlie Musselwhite was billed as C.D. Musselwhite.) But as ROBERT SHELTON points out, 'Mary Martin, [ALBERT] GROSSMAN's executive secretary, had heard THE HAWKS on visits to Toronto and was ecstatic, possibly earlier than Hammond.'

It is rumoured that at some time after Hammond 'went electric', there was a giddy five-day residency at the Gaslight when both ERIC CLAPTON and JIMI HENDRIX played in Hammond's band. (It is more likely that this is a twisting of the known fact that in 1966 Hendrix was a sideman for many people who played at the Café Au Go Go, and that Clapton, already a star in Britain, was never involved.) In 2001, John Hammond Jr.'s album Wicked Grin entirely comprised Tom Waits songs, and featured Waits as producer, guitarist and backing vocalist. In 2004, Dylan wrote about Hammond fondly in Chronicles Volume One, and in doing so not only shone a light onto their early friendship but also exonerated Hammond from any lingering notion that he ever pulled any nepotistic strings in furthering his own career. Dylan wrote of going to sign his Columbia deal in fall 1961:

> 'I gazed around Mr. Hammond's office and saw a picture of a friend of mine, John Hammond Jr. John, or Jeep as we knew him on MacDougal Street, was about my age, a blues guitar player and singer. Later he'd become an acclaimed artist in his own right. When I met him he had just gotten back from college, and I think he had only been playing guitar for a short time. Sometimes we'd go over to his house, which was on MacDougal Street below Houston, where he'd grown up, and we listened to a lot of records out of an amazing record collection . . . mostly blues 78s and grassroots rock and roll. I never made the connection that he was the son of the legendary John Hammond until I saw the photograph and only then did I put it together. I don't think anybody knew who Jeep's father was. He never talked about it.'

Now based in northern New Jersey, Hammond continues to perform, and continues not to write songs of his own.

[John Hammond Jr.: So Many Roads, Vanguard VSD-79178, NY, 1965; CD-reissued Vanguard 79178, US, 1993; re-packaged with many extra tracks (mostly previously issued on other records, & not all including any Hawks) as So Many Roads: The Complete Sessions, Vanguard VMD 79178, US, 2001. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.280. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., 1987, pp.315–16.]

'Handy Dandy' [1990] In 'Handy Dandy', one of the best tracks on Under the Red Sky, Dylan takes some of the inherently magical language deployed in a nursery rhyme riddle, to which the solution is merely 'an egg', and allows it freer rein on its mystical level. The riddle goes like this: 'In marble walls as white as milk / Lined with a skin as soft as silk / Within a fountain crystal clear / A golden apple doth appear. / No doors there are to this stronghold, / Yet thieves break in and steal the gold.'

Re-occupied by the lyric of 'Handy Dandy', the numinous charge of this language is retained and extended in Dylan's 'He got that clear crystal fountain / He got that soft silky skin / He got that fortress on the mountain / With no doors, no windows so no thieves can break in.'

He does a great thing here. It's the same side to Dylan's genius that we encounter when, time and again, he takes a phrase from the Bible, cuts to its core and colloquialises it. (In fact there is a biblical connection here: the nursery rhyme itself echoes a passage from Christ's Sermon on the Mount, as Dylan would certainly have known. In Matthew 6:19–22, Christ's words are given as these: 'Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.' This is reiterated more briefly in Luke 12.) Paring the nursery rhyme down from six lines to four, Dylan strips away the old Classical Greekery—the marble walls, the golden apple—and transforms what's left from florid or portentous Victorian formalism into a poetry that combines mystic potency with the rhythms and cadence of street-talk. So the vicarishly 19th century versifying tone of 'Within a fountain crystal clear' is turned around (literally, with the last three words) into the street-smart pretend-inarticulacy of 'He got that clear crystal fountain'; the purring poesy of 'Lined with a skin as soft as silk' is clipped to the conversational 'He got that soft silky skin'; and the conclusion 'No doors there are to this stronghold, / Yet thieves break in and steal the gold', with its over-supervising 'Yet' and its earthbound explanation for the break-in, is doubly transformed by Dylan. The stronghold/fortress soars into the mountains, magnifying the scale of the scene and intensifying our sense of the isolation of this unspecified 'He'. At the same time—by abolishing the 'gold', by making the break-in feared instead of fact, by increasing the check-list of security provisions and by the effect of that nervy rhythm in describing them ('he got that . . . he got that . . . he got that . . .', which had been street-easy before, now echoes as nervily as 'no doors, no windows . . . no thieves')—by all these touches, Dylan gives his conclusion a modern sensibility, evoking the paranoia at the heart of the re-written scenario, and without one supervisory word pointing up its lonely madness: 'He got that clear crystal fountain / He got that soft silky skin / He got that fortress on the mountain / With no doors, no windows so no thieves can break in.' While dismantling the riddle of the rhyme, Dylan has given it the mystery of art.

In the same song, he picks up 'a basket of flowers' from another nursery rhyme (quoted in discussing the album's title-song, 'Under the Red Sky': see separate entry) and he snatches a stick from another riddle, one of the nursery rhyme riddles beginning 'Riddle me riddle me ree': in this case 'Riddle me, riddle me ree / A little man in a tree / A stick in his hand / A stone in his throat' / (If you read me this riddle / I'll give you a groat).

The great nursery rhyme experts Iona and Peter Opie say that a number of riddles have been based on the imagery of 'a stick in his hand, a stone in his throat', the solution being either (as here) a cherry or the hawthorn berry. Dylan drops this in passing, as the marvellously dodgy hero 'Handy Dandy' is chatting someone up with '. . . a stick in his hand and a pocket full of money.' It's one of those admirable, quiet, intelligent achievements of Dylan's: he slips in this obscure, innocuous quotation; he re-writes it in such a way as to satisfy us by its twisted echo of the original—both catalogue 'a stick in his hand' and a something else, and both mention money; and he puts his quotation and his re-write in the service of inventive depiction. Handy Dandy, an utterly authentic Dylan character, as Paris, Texas as the narrator of 'Clothes Line Saga', as laconic as HOAGY CARMICHAEL, strolls through this wonderful, good-natured song both enigmatically and cinematically. As he finishes his drink, gets up from the table and says 'OK boys I'll see you tomorrow', we realise that there's a final parallel between the riddle-me-ree verse and what Dylan has done with it: the central figure in each demands to be explained. Dylan's is the better riddle.

The listener's 'Who is this?' goes unanswered, but dissatisfaction is counter-balanced by the sheer pleasure offered by this pay-off line: a fourfold pleasure, coming from savouring the image evoked, the words chosen, the demands these make so gleefully upon the singer's skill in timing their delivery and Dylan's absolute success in meeting those demands. All these points, about the pictures you get from the song and about the pleasures of the words and of their high-wire delivery, are met also in this one confidently invented, supremely free-form line: 'Sitting with a girl named Nancy in a garden feelin' kind of lazy'.

The song's rhythms writhe so enjoyably: the overall framework proceeds at so stately a pace, made the more ocean-linerish by the richness of sound of Dylan's voice and AL KOOPER's organwork; yet within this Dylan moves so restlessly, so variegatedly, as he surveys his chameleonic hero: one who seems a different person in every brief encounter, so that 'he', 'you', 'she' and 'Nancy' seem to multiply, giving us refracted passing glimpses of people and conversation, all sunlit for a moment and then gone again, all with their own daubs of obdurate disorder, vulnerability, darkness and hope.

Each fragment possesses a different rhythm of speech, to which Dylan's singing is superbly alert. Ray Davies or JOHN SEBASTIAN might have devised the line lauded earlier, the luxuriantly unfurling 'Handy Dandy, sitting with a girl named Nancy in a garden feeling kind of lazy' (either might be the unconscious influence behind it). No-one but Bob Dylan could paint this onto the same canvas as so many other cadences and contrasting modes of speech.

There's the intimate, inquisitorial brevity of the conversation which begins with the nursery rhyme about what little boys and little girls are made of (slugs and snails and puppy-dog tails . . . sugar and spice and all things nice . . .), adultising it into darker colloquialisms about inner being: 'You'll say "What are you made of?" / He'll say "Can you repeat what you say?" / You'll say "What are you afraid of?" / He'll say "Nuthin': neither 'live nor dead."' As we 'overhear' this drifting across to us on beguiling waves of music, we are not so charmed that we don't pick up the prevarication and bragging on our hero's part.

It is, furthermore, a moment at which Dylan uses a nursery rhyme from within a fairytale—and uses it brilliantly, to paint in the right psychic backdrop against which to pick out that hollow bragging. The rhyme, the one that begins 'Fee, fie, fo, fum / I smell the blood of an Englishman', is of course spoken by the giant in the fairytale 'Jack and the Beanstalk'. The giant's next line is the one Dylan so niftily puts into the mouth of Handy Dandy: 'Be he 'live or be he dead / I'll grind his bones to make my bread.' It too proves a hollow boast, of course: the giant loses in the fight with brave little everyman Jack. Dylan echoes that 'Be he 'live or be he dead' so closely in Handy Dandy's 'Nuthin': neither 'live nor dead' that he repeats the slight awkwardness of diction noticeable in the giant's remark, such that in each case you can't quite decide whether it's an overtly foreshortened ''live' or a more slippery half-swallowed 'alive'.

There is a further strength and harmony in Dylan's use of 'Jack and the Beanstalk', a tale Dylan alluded to in such a different way in 1964's 'I Shall Be Free No. 10' (and again, in passing, in the phrase 'swap that cow' in Tarantula). It contributes to a main theme of the album in being another powerful parable about the need to journey towards maturity, like the fairytale 'The Goose Girl' and the nursery rhyme 'My Mother Said', which Dylan draws on in his 'blind horse' image on the album's title song. Like them, 'Jack and the Beanstalk' deals with the child's dilemma caught between its early need for parental love and guidance ('instruction', in the terminology of the book of Proverbs) and the eventual desirability of trusting oneself and moving towards independence: Jack plays his hunch, charged with the task of taking his cow to market to get a good price; his mother ridicules his folly in swapping the cow for a supposedly magical bean; Jack faces the consequences, and in the end beats the giant. ('What looks large from a distance, close up ain't never that big', as Dylan sings elsewhere.) Jack proves wiser than his mother, arguably through faith, centred upon faith in himself. It's a fairytale Bruno Bettelheim scrutinises in detail along these lines in his pioneering book The Uses of Enchantment, and a classic example of the humane inner importance of the genre.

To return to Dylan's distinctive dexterity with rhythms and modes of speech, there's the switch from the calm and patience with which he spreads the child's comfort-food over the 11 syllables of 'Handy Dandy, just like sugar and candy' to the apparent clipped brevity of the line that follows—apparent because this line too is 11 syllables—in which the grown-up's comfort-food is cynically provided instead: 'Handy Dandy: pour 'im another brandy'. And there's the joyous, acrobatic horde of syllables that comes streaming past us at some point in every verse. As well as lazing around with Nancy (a 24-syllable line, since Dylan makes the word 'la-zy' into a lazy 'la-za-a-ay'), there's also the technical wizardry of the line in which we get a quick-fire narrative list of what the hero does, ending with the slow drawl of his remark: 'He finishes his drink, he gets up from the table, he says "OK boys, I'll see ya tamarro-o-ow"' (26 syllables as Dylan delivers it). Best of all, there is the playful self-reflexive joke of the singer having to hurry to fit in the preposterously long 'He'll say "Darlin' tell me the truth: how much time I got?" She'll say "You got all the time in the world, honey."' Imagine anyone but Bob Dylan achieving the necessary timing and phrasing here. Not possible.

For all this audacity, all its refreshing sunlit glimpses—for all its authenticity as a Bob Dylan song—it's one people don't altogether embrace. The chorus is to blame. No-one likes a line such as 'Handy Dandy, just like sugar and candy' (partly because of its tiresome tautology). It's there because it's part of the song's traditional baggage, and Dylan leaves it in because he's feelin' kind of lazy.

'Handy Dandy' is a game and a rhyme. The game is one in which a small object is juggled from hand to hand and then the rhyme is said as you're challenged to guess which hand it's in. The rhyme is one of those which, like 'Humpty Dumpty', has a Scandinavian equivalent and is of a type that has close equivalents all over north Europe. In some cases what seems a nonsense rhyme in one language ('Jeck og Jill' in Danish) makes sense in another. Some may result from long oral traditions, others from direct translations. This one is so old that it was already known before the creator of 'Piers Plowman', William Langland, wrote of 'his handidandi' in 1362. Variants include 'Handy dandy, riddledy ro / Which hand will you have, high or low?'; 'Handy pandy, Sugary candy / Which will you have?' and 'Handy-dandy, Jack-a-dandy / Which good hand will you have?'

(There is also a rhyme, not associated with the game, that Pope and Carey alluded to when attacking the syrupy poetry of their contemporary Ambrose Philips: 'Handy spandy, Jack-a-Dandy / Loves plum cake and sugar candy / He bought some at a grocer's shop / And out he came, hop, hop, hop, hop.' A variant begins 'Namby pamby Jack-a-Dandy', and 'Namby pamby' was Pope and Carey's nickname for Philips. Not that these antecedents improve Dylan's chorus one jot, jot, jot.)

The same rhyme was quoted by George Chapman (now best known for his great translation of Homer) in his play The Blinde Begger of Alexandria in 1598: 'handy dandy prickly prandy, which hand will you haue?', and is referred to in this crucial speech in King Lear, by Lear himself: 'Handy dandy, prickly prandy. . . . What, art mad? A man may see how this world goes without eyes . . .'—or, as someone once put it, 'you don't need a weatherman to know which way the wind blows'—'Look with thine ears: see how yond justice rails upon yond simple thief. Hark, in thine ear: change places, and, handy-dandy, which is the justice, which is the thief?' (Another 'Dylanesque' question, this.)

Lear's speech here is part of the scene described by Hugh Haughton in The Chatto Book of Nonsense Poetry as having 'as vivid a place in the history of nonsense as in that of madness. The dialogue is shot through with queer, garbled, oracular language, and shifts back and forth between reason and madness, pathos and absurdity. It's not only the most vivid representation of the fool in literature, but in its vision of violent social upheaval and broken authority suggests that through the language of madness and adopted madness the characters make touch with truths and feelings outside the pale of their normal language. What they say in their terrible crisis makes sense . . . but it takes a route that zigzags giddily across the border with nonsense . . .'

Stripped of the Shakespearean tragedy's pain, more Edward Lear than King Lear, Dylan's 'Handy Dandy' too gives us broken sound-bites that make no sense yet make perfect sense, and glimpses of characters who challenge each other with crazy truths, as it takes us on a route that zigzags giddily across the border with nonsense. The discomforting banality of its chorus aside, it is a sustained, successful work in which well-hewn writing interlocks with a bravura vocal performance, making for a warm, humourous—often black-humourous—hymn of celebration to human quirkiness and flexibility.

[Iona & Peter Opie: for details of their work & sources, see endnotes to nursery rhyme, Dylan's use of, an introduction. Bruno Bettelheim, The Uses of Enchantment, London: Thames & Hudson, 1976. Hugh Haughton, ed., The Chatto Book of Nonsense Poetry, London: Chatto & Windus, 1988. It was Andrew Muir, in Homer, the slut no.2, London, Jan 1991, who first linked the passage from Haughton to Under the Red Sky.]

'Hard Times' [1992] See Foster, Stephen.

Hard Rain* [album, 1976] Dylan's 19th album and his second live one, this once seemed a generally poor selection from two concerts that were far from his best. After Dylan and the 1967 Greatest Hits collection, this seemed, at the time, Dylan's least essential album. His voice even sounded oddly anonymous at first. Hindsight shows that this album introduces the ragged, postmodern Bob Dylan, right from the grungy instrumental ground-pawing ahead of the start of the first number. Moreover the running order now seems surprisingly well thought out. It represents, too, the late phase of the historic Rolling Thunder Revue tour and captures the distinctive, bare-wired sound of Dylan's existential gypsy band. Stand-out track is 'Idiot Wind', which, as Dylan grows ever more engaged, bursts open and pours out its brilliant venom. Some tracks are the same performances as on the 'Hard Rain' TV Special, filmed in concert at Colorado State University, Fort Collins, CO, on May 23, 1976, but 'You're a Big Girl Now', though recorded at that concert, is on this album but not in the TV film, and four album tracks were from an earlier concert.

[Recorded Fort Worth, TX, 16 May and Fort Collins, CO, 23 May 1976; released as LP Columbia PC 34349, 10 Sep 1976.]

'Hard Rain' [TV Special, 1976] Dylan's first made-for-TV filmed concert, filmed outdoors in the rain at Colorado State University, Fort Collins, CO, on May 23, 1976, this is a riveting, essential item and captures an extremely charismatic, energised Dylan, sounding harshly robust and looking uncannily like Jesus Christ—but more beautiful. The crowd is interesting to look at too, though it wasn't an aesthetically pleasing era. By the late 1980s young people coming to the film afresh tended to remark on the awfulness of 1970s clothes and all that hair.

Some song performances are the same as on the Hard Rain album, though six song performances in the film are not on the album, while 'You're a Big Girl Now', recorded at the concert and issued on the album, is not included in the film (and four album tracks were from an earlier concert).

Stand-out moments include an utterly transformed 'I Pity the Poor Immigrant', a fiery 'Idiot Wind' and a numinious 'Deportees'—the best duet JOAN BAEZ ever managed with Dylan.

This was the second attempt at making such a concert film, the first being a month earlier, when two Rolling Thunder concerts on the same day, April 22, 1976, were filmed in the Starlight Ballroom of the Bellevue Biltmore Hotel in Clearwater, Florida.

The later film was first shown on NBC-TV in September 1976 (the same week the album was released). Filmed and edited by HOWARD ALK, this was magnificent television, using the small screen imaginatively: not least by the recurrent, almost mesmeric device of keeping the camera close up on Dylan's unattended vocal microphone so as to make into visual drama the flair and split-second timing with which he would re-appear behind it. While Renaldo & Clara teased the audience with fragmentary concert footage from 1975's first Rolling Thunder Revue, strung out across a four-hour film, Hard Rain offers a very straightforward, gritty sampler of 1976's second Rolling Thunder Revue. This cries out for DVD release.

Not to be confused with the Hard Rain that is available on DVD, a wretchedly poor 1998 thriller directed by Mikael Salomon and starring Morgan Freeman.

[Hard Rain, dir. Howard Alk, NBC-TV, NY, aired 14 Sep 1976.]

Harding, John Wesley [1965 -] See Stace, Wes.

Hare, David [1947 -] See 'Keats v. Dylan'.

Harris, Emmylou [1947 -] Emmylou Harris was born in Birmingham, Alabama, on April 2, 1947, and being a military pilot's daughter, grew up moving around—in North Carolina and between Virginia and Washington, D.C. She won a scholarship in Dramatic Studies at the University of North Carolina but after local folkie performances in a duo with one Mike Williams, she moved to New York. An early marriage and record deal soon failed, and she returned to Washington, D.C., to raise her young daughter alone. In 1971 she met Gram Parsons, with whom she went to LA to work on his début solo album, GP—which wasn't, of course, solo at all, since for many people its highlights were the duets with Harris. The album was released shortly before Parsons' death from a drugs overdose, but not before they had assembled the Fallen Angels band and gone out on the road, starting disastrously but pulling itself together and during four nights in Houston including guest spots from Linda Ronstadt and NEIL YOUNG. The tour ended in New York City, playing live at Max's Kansas City and a Long Island radio station, WLIR.

In June 1973, Parsons and Emmylou Harris reunited for a country rock tour and then recorded the Grievous Angel album. Parsons' life was in chaos and his drug taking reckless, and he was declared dead half an hour into September 19, 1973 at the aptly name Hi-Desert Memorial Hospital in Yucca Valley, California. He was 26.

The work Harris and Parsons created together, outtakes and all, has been issued and reissued many times since GP and Grievous Angel, beginning with that fine 1976 album of scraps Sleepless Nights, billed as by Gram Parsons/Flying Burrito Brothers but including three duets by Parsons and Harris and sleevenotes by Harris too.

Their duets soar high above the ordinary, unencumbered by weary professional tricks; shimmering and numinous, full of integrity and space, held in a thrilling tension between abrasion and sweetness, they are the embodiment of duets between beauty and pain. For many, they remain Emmylou's most glorious moment, however much a subsequent three-decade piling up of achievement and success may clamour for plaudits.

Early on she had also sung on the JOHN SEBASTIAN album Tarzana Kid, Little Feat's Feats Don't Fail Me Now and Linda Ronstadt's Heart Like a Wheel (all 1974), Pure Prairie League's Two Lane Highway, Bonnie Raitt's Homeplate, Ronstadt's Prisoner in Disguise, Guy Clark's Old #1 and DAVID BROMBERG's Midnight on the Water (all 1975), but it was from her work with Parsons that she gained a major-label deal with Reprise, and a début album, Pieces of the Sky, 1975, which included both a small hit single and her own strong composition memorialising Gram Parsons, 'Boulder to Birmingham'. Elite Hotel followed that December, the album for which her Hot Band was formed and which yielded two no.1 hits, 'Together Again' and 'Sweet Dreams', launching a long career in which she has enjoyed a special niche in country and country-rock, touring and recording prolifically. Notable albums have included Quarter Moon in a Ten Cent Town, the acoustic bluegrass of 1980's Roses in the Snow and the DANIEL LANOIS-produced rock of Wrecking Ball in 1994, on which Neil Young plays and sings, and on which Emmylou covered Dylan's 'Every Grain of Sand'.

She first connected with Bob Dylan himself in 1975, early on in her own solo career, when she was brought in on the New York sessions for Desire. Early on, the studio was full of people milling about wondering whether they'd be used, and then, when they'd done their best to play along with Dylan's wayward one-off song run-throughs, wondering whether they had been used. Harris' first day in this melée seems to have been July 28, 1975, when she had to jostle for space with at least 20 other people (including ERIC CLAPTON and Kokomo, a British jazz-rock group fronted by sax player Mel Collins). She was, as she told interviewer NIGEL WILLIAMSON years later, 'astonished' at the way Dylan was working. 'I'd never heard the songs before, and we did most of them in one or two takes. I just watched his mouth and watched was he was saying. That's where all that humming on the record comes from.'

She was unhappy with how this made her sound, and asked Dylan if she could 'fix' her vocals, but Dylan pressed ahead with the tracks they had. The first day she was there (which was the second session), they recorded the album version of 'Romance in Durango' and the take of 'Catfish' issued on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, and made various attempts at other songs. The next day, July 29, yielded nothing; July 30 produced not only 'Golden Loom' (on Bootleg) and 'Rita May' (issued as the B-side of a single that November and on the Japanese-initiated Masterpieces compilation) but the Desire tracks 'Oh Sister', 'One More Cup of Coffee', 'Black Diamond Bay', 'Mozambique' and 'Joey'. Harris was not present on July 31 for 'Sara' and 'Isis' and the outtake 'Abandoned Love' issued on Biograph in 1985, nor at the hasty re-recording, with amended lyrics, of 'Hurricane' on October 24th.

Harris' main contributions were on 'Oh Sister' and 'Mozambique'. 'Oh Sister' features Harris particularly strongly, but both are in effect duets and add their own shades to the unique colouring of the album; and the way that Emmylou had to plunge in and try to read Dylan moment by moment to know what to sing at all, though a hard task at the time, and well survived, actually adds to the shaking chemistry of their duets, and in the case of 'Oh Sister' this out-on-a-limb quality tugs pleasingly against the exceptional conventionality and old-fashioned-values message the song evinces.

She and Dylan next connected nearly 17 years later, and far more trivially, if in more extravagant circumstances, when Harris was among the many big-name backing singers and over-excited all-star band ranged behind Dylan on his comically guarded 'Like a Rolling Stone' at the 'Late Night with David Letterman 10th Anniversary Show', recorded on January 18 and televised February 6, 1992.

In May 1994 Dylan was in the studios in Memphis recording a short but interesting session with his Never-Ending Tour band of the time, one item being a couple of different takes of the JIMMIE RODGERS song 'My Blue-Eyed Jane'. A short snatch of one take was thrown into the Highway 61 Interactive CD-ROM in 1995, but when the complete second take circulated in 1996, shared vocals by Emmylou Harris had been overdubbed in the interim. A third version, with Dylan's vocal re-recorded and Harris' removed, was then released on the Various Artists album The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers—A Tribute.

In October 1988, when Emmylou Harris released her compilation album Duets, she included 'Mozambique' from the Desire album. This has now become a very collectable item because a dispute with Dylan's management forced its withdrawal. Duets was reissued on vinyl in 1990 and on CD in 1993, minus the Dylan track.

All the collaborations between Harris and Dylan seem to have been subject to difficulty and disappointing excisions, and interviews Harris gave soon after the Desire collaboration appeared to suggest that she had never held too high an opinion of him. Yet one story tells a different truth. In the US Bible Belt, people throw around the acronym WWJD?—meaning that when you're uncertain how to behave, just ask 'What Would Jesus Do?' Emmylou Harris told interviewer Nigel Williamson that country singer-songwriter Gillian Welch had given her a bracelet engraved 'WWDD'. She asked what that meant, to be told it stood for 'What Would Dylan Do?'—not in life but in song-craft. Harris endorsed this message with enthusiasm: 'When you're writing a song, just ask yourself that question,' she said.

[Emmylou Harris: Pieces of the Sky, Reprise MS-2213, US, 1975; Elite Hotel, Reprise MS-2236, 1976; Quarter Moon in a Ten Cent Town, Warner Bros BSK-3141, US, 1978; Roses in the Snow, Warner Bros BSK-3422, US, 1980; Duets, Reprise 25791-1, US, 1988 (withdrawn); Duets, Warner Bros 25791, 1990 & CD, nia, 1993. Wrecking Ball, Elektra 61854, 1995. Gram Parsons & Emmylou Harris: GP, Reprise MS 2123, 1973; Grievous Angel, Reprise MS 2171, US, 1974; Sleepless Nights, A&M SP-4578, US, 1976; Gram Parsons & the Fallen Angels: Live 1973, Sierra GP 1973 & More Gram Parsons & the Fallen Angels Live 1973, Sierra GP/EP 104, both US 1982 (the latter an EP). Sources include the basic www.divastation.com/emmylou_harris/eharris_bio.html, the invaluable http://ebni.com/byrds/memgrp5.html, the online discography www.luma-electronic.cz/lp/h/Harris/emmylou1.htm, all online 8 Dec 2005, & that excellent small book, Nigel Williamson's The Rough Guide to Bob Dylan, London: Rough Guides 2004, pp.222 & iv.]

Harrison, George [1943 - 2001] George Harold Harrison was born in Wavertree, Liverpool, UK, on February 25, 1943. He grew up on Merseyside, joined the Quarrymen, who turned into THE BEATLES, and was their lead guitarist. For teeny fans of the pop group, George was 'the quiet one', very much in the background behind the main pin-ups and main songwriting team of JOHN LENNON and PAUL McCARTNEY; but for fans of musicianship and people who recognised a decent human being when they encountered one, George was a crucial Beatle, and the songs he contributed to the group's repertoire, never less than interesting, were sometimes milestones in their development and often important and much-loved. 'Here Comes the Sun' and 'Something' became instant classics, and the latter was the A-side of the penultimate Beatles single. Harrison had introduced the sitar to Beatles music, and so to western pop, and became the one Beatle deeply engaged by Indian culture, its music and its religious mysticism. Meditation, learnt in the late 1960s, anchored the rest of his life.

When the Beatles broke up in 1970, George was, to many people's surprise, the one who stepped most effectively into the solo artist's rôle. His triple-LP All Things Must Pass (co-produced by PHIL SPECTOR) was a rich and mature piece of quintessential 1960s work and yielded the single 'My Sweet Lord'. Both topped the UK charts. George Harrison was 27.

The next year, prompted by Ravi Shankar, Harrison organised the fundraising Concert for Bangla Desh, which sold out Madison Square Garden, New York, and yielded a best-selling triple-LP and a film, raising millions of dollars for UNICEF so that Bangladeshi refugees from Pakistan could be helped and protected. It was the first time that musicians had collaborated on a large scale in the name of a humanitarian cause, and thus it set the precedent that can be seen to have led to LIVE AID and Live8.

In 1974 Harrison formed the record company Dark Horse, and in 1978 began an important contribution in another cultural area, the British film industry, by forming Handmade Films, which backed and produced the Monty Python movies and more. After years of issuing no albums of his own in the 1980s, his hit album Cloud Nine in 1987, co-produced with JEFF LYNNE, gave him a top 3 single on both sides of the Atlantic ('Got My Mind Set on You'). Soon afterwards, he instigated the TRAVELING WILBURYS when he used Dylan's garage studio for a project of his own that turned into the Wilburys instead.

None of this 1980s work represented any kind of musical peak for Harrison, but he had always enjoyed his collaborations with Bob Dylan, and had offered the latter a dependable, solid partnership, calmly treating Dylan as a worthy musician and being content to put his own far more virtuoso playing skills encouragingly in the other's service.

Harrison and Dylan first met during the famous encounter at the Del Monico Hotel in August 1964 (see the entry on Harrison's acquaintance AL ARONOWITZ) and later encountered each other during Dylan's London visits of 1965 and 1966. By 1968 the two were getting together informally, and this resulted in a co-composition. As George told it:

'I was at Bob's house and we were trying to write a tune. And I remember saying, "How did you write all those amazing words?" And he shrugged and said, "Well, how about all those chords you use?" So I started playing and said it was just all these funny chords people showed me when I was a kid. Then I played two major sevenths in a row to demonstrate, and I suddenly thought, Ah, this sounds like a tune here. Then we finished the song together. It was called "I'd Have You Anytime," and it [became] the first track on All Things Must Pass.' A version was recorded at Dylan's Woodstock, NY, house in November 1968, with Dylan on guitar and Harrison on lead vocals; at the same session they shared vocals on two other numbers, one of which was another co-written song, 'Nowhere to Go', often known as 'Every Time Somebody Comes to Town'.

The Beatles attended Dylan's 1969 Isle of Wight Festival of Music appearance and got together privately while on the island but musically the next collaboration between Dylan and Harrison was in the studios in New York City on May 1, 1970 (running into the early hours of May 2). This was Dylan's first time in the studio since the Self Portrait sessions early that March, and before that album's release, but he was clearly trying out material that would later be re-recorded for New Morning. (Indeed both Harrison and AL KOOPER believed that the album version of 'Went to See the Gypsy' comes from this May 1–2 session, though the aural evidence is against it.)

What's not in dispute is that this session features Dylan and Harrison on guitars, Dylan on vocals, plus CHARLIE DANIELS on guitar, RUSS KUNKEL on drums and producer BOB JOHNSTON on piano, and that to hear it is to hear Bob and George working together. 'Working on a Guru' is another co-composition, 'If Not for You' is tried out (one take has been issued on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3) and other tracks that have circulated include hopeless attempts at 'Da Doo Ron Ron' and 'Yesterday', other pop hits including 'Cupid' and 'All I Have to Do Is Dream' but also lovely revisits to 'Song to Woody' and 'I Don't Believe You (She Acts Like We Never Have Met)' sung in Bob's best Nashville '69 voice, and much more. Some tracks, including the first attempts at 'Sign on the Window', remain uncirculated. From here Harrison picked up 'If Not for You' and released his own version on All Things Must Pass the same year. Dylan's August 12 recording of it was issued on New Morning.

At the Concert for Bangla Desh (actually two concerts: an afternoon and an evening performance) Dylan's performances—reaching their zenith with the glorious vocal, so high, melodious, penetrating and inspired, on the evening concert's 'Just Like a Woman'—feature Harrison on guitar, LEON RUSSELL on bass and RINGO STARR on tambourine. George's spoken introduction, 'I'd like to bring on a friend of us all, Mr. Bob Dylan', and the roar that greets this, form one of the warmest moments from a marvellous event. (And with the release of the audio on CD and the video on DVD, we now have extra material taken from that afternoon concert—the CD gives us that show's performances of 'Love Minus Zero/No Limit' and 'Mr. Tambourine Man'; the DVD gives us 'Love Minus Zero' and adds in Dylan and Harrison singing 'If Not for You', harmonising and strumming acoustic guitars, from the previous day's rehearsal, and the ROBERT JOHNSON song 'Come on in My Kitchen' by Leon Russell, ERIC CLAPTON and Harrison, from a soundtrack.)

In another lifetime, the twilight zone of Dylan's 1987 UK tour with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS, George Harrison turned up on the last of their four nights at London's vile Wembley Arena, but was only allowed to come on stage for the penultimate encore number, the long-since exhausted 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35', on which he shared vocals and played guitar. Less than six months later, in early April 1988, George brought 'Handle With Care' to Dylan's garage studio in Malibu, and the Traveling Wilburys were born. Further tracks that ended up on Traveling Wilburys, Volume 1 were recorded at DAVE STEWART's home studio in LA that May—tracks taken away and overdubbed in England by Lynne and Harrison. Soon afterwards, in June 1988, Dylan released his own deeply unsuccessful Down in the Groove album, and began the Never-Ending Tour. That October, the Wilburys album was released. Harrison, aka Nelson Wilbury, had written 'Handle With Care' (on which he shared lead vocals with ROY ORBISON), 'Heading for the Light' and 'End of the Line'; Dylan (Lucky Wilbury) had written 'Dirty World', 'Congratulations' and 'Tweeter and the Monkey Man.'

Two months later, Orbison was dead. Harrison did not appear with Dylan at the tribute concert held in LA on February 24, 1990, but within a month they had come together at a recording studio in that city where Dylan was recording tracks for his album Under the Red Sky. Harrison played the unobtrusively perfect slide guitar on the title track. A month on from this session and after a phone-call from Bob to George, asking when they were going to do another Wilburys record, the surviving members reassembled at their 'Wilbury Mountain Studio' in Bel Air, where they recorded the tracks for The Traveling Wilburys: Volume III (the second album), plus 'Runaway', issued as B-side to the 'She's My Baby' single, and 'Nobody's Child', the latter for the Romanian Angel Appeal fund. Bob was now Boo Wilbury and George Harrison now Spike.

In October 1992 Harrison was one of those who participated in what was billed as 'Columbia Records Celebrates the Music of Bob Dylan', aka the 30th Anniversary Concert for Dylan at Madison Square Garden, New York City—21 years after being there together for the Concert for Bangla Desh. This time Harrison was among the small group of compadres sharing vocals on Dylan's 'My Back Pages' performance, as well as being in the ensemble for 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door', the penultimate number; earlier in the evening, in his own solo spot, he had gone for 'Absolutely Sweet Marie'.

George Harrison's life had been in jeopardy when he was stabbed by an intruder in his home in England in 1999. He survived, but died in Los Angeles on November 29, 2001, from complications arising from cancer of the throat.

Bob Dylan was unable to perform at the subsequent Concert for George, in 2002, but attempted a sweet version of 'Something' at his own concert in New York City on November 13, 2002. He also paid Harrison this tribute:

> 'George was a giant, a great, great soul, with all of the humanity, all of the wit and humor, all the wisdom, the spirituality, the common sense of a man and compassion for people. The world is a profoundly emptier place without him.'

[Harrison quote, www.iol.ie/~beatlesireland/harrison/interviews/georgeinterview3.htm. Both All Things Must Pass and Concert for Bangla Desh have been reissued remastered and with extra material; both have received lavish praise. All Things Must Pass, EMI, UK, 2001; The Concert for Bangla Desh, now called The Concert for Bangladesh (and with George Harrison on the cover instead of a starving child), 2-CD set, Sony BMG

82876729862, 2005; DVD on Apple/Warner Music Vision/Rhino R2 97048, US (R2 0349-70480-2, Europe), 2005; DVD De-Luxe limited edition (retaining child on cover) on Weasel Disc 970481, US (Apple/Warner Music Vision/Rhino 0349-70481-2, Europe, 2005. (Both sets have the extra footage, but the limited edition set also has postcards, a mini concert poster, hand-written lyrics, a 60-page booklet and a sticker. 'Limited edition' in Europe means limited to 100,000 copies!)]

Harvey, Todd [1965 -] Todd Dunham Harvey was born in Ohio on January 15, 1965, the day Dylan finished recording Bringing It All Back Home at a session that yielded 'Maggie's Farm', 'On the Road Again', 'It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)', 'Gates of Eden', 'Mr. Tambourine Man' and 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue'.

Todd Harvey first took an interest in Dylan's work when, aged 14 in 1979, he encountered the album The Times They Are a-Changin'. However, apart from contributing a few concert reviews to the BobLinks website, and a paper on the song 'Man of Constant Sorrow' delivered at the 'Bob Dylan's Performance Artistry' colloquium in Caen, France, March 10–12, 2005 (sponsored, interestingly, by the US Embassy in Paris), Harvey's work on Dylan has been confined to one book: the small but invaluable The Formative Dylan: Transmissions and Stylistic Influences, 1961–1963, published in 2001.

A scholarly examination and analysis of 70 of the earliest songs Dylan recorded (actually 69 songs plus the poem 'Last Thoughts on Woody Guthrie'), as known about at the time, it begins by discussing Dylan's knowledge of traditional music and literature and describes his stylistic influences and his developing aesthetics in this early period. The songs are listed and looked at alphabetically, in each case giving details on its historical and stylistic background, how Dylan arrived at its composition, a technical analysis of its musical components, and performance data. There is also a series of appendices, including references, set and session lists, a chronology of the songs studied and a table of data on over 275 versions of the 70 songs.

However, it isn't as dry as that sounds, and it is informed by a sharp intelligence and great fondness for Dylan's artistry. It offers much useful fresh thought and observation, and, crucially, when it was first published it offered significant new information, especially about Dylan's 1963 Newport Folk Festival song performances: information Harvey gained from his unique and unhindered access to the Library of Congress' archives, and which he had the knowledge and alertness to understand and evaluate fully.

Todd Harvey has also been a lecturer in music at Ohio State University and is now a Folklife Specialist at the American Folklife Center within the Library of Congress.

[Todd Harvey, The Formative Dylan: Transmissions and Stylistic Influences, 1961–1963, Lanham, MD: The Scarecrow Press, 2001 (7th volume in this publisher's American Folk Music and Musicians series).]

Havis, Regina See McCrary, Regina.

Hawkins, Ronnie [1935 -] Ronald Hawkins was born in Huntsville, Arkansas, on January 10, 1935—'two days after ELVIS PRESLEY', as he likes to say, though any other resemblance is hard to suggest, since Elvis became God and Hawkins became a third-rate, derivative perpetual rockabilly who couldn't make it in the US and on the wise recommendation of CONWAY TWITTY moved to Canada, where audiences had less opportunity to be fussy. Starting out in Hamilton, Ontario, at a club called the Grange, Hawkins formed a working bar band that toured and recorded under various names, the first of which was, quaintly, the Ronnie Hawkins Quartet. On record, starting as he meant to continue, by covering songs of other people, his first single, 'Hey BO DIDDLEY', was released (in Canada only) in 1958. A deal with US label Roulette in 1959 did not underwrite any return to the US, and in 1964 Hawkins took permanent Canadian residency.

He may not be significant as a musical figure himself, but he is a key figure in the history of Bob Dylan's music in that he assembled THE HAWKS, starting with fellow Arkansas boy LEVON HELM and duly adding the rest (all Canadians). Hawkins both recorded with them and led them around the gruelling small-club and honky-tonk circuits of Canada, fusing them into the unit that Dylan picked up, galvanised and made history with. (The details of which records by Ronnie Hawkins & the Hawks involve which members of what became THE BAND is traced in the endnotes to this entry.)

He's a key witness as to how much of a musical leap The Band made between leaving him and Toronto behind and emerging with their own albums after working with Dylan. Talking especially of the second album, he says: 'I was so surprised that Robbie wrote that stuff, because they were a rhythm'n'blues act. They played rhythm'n'blues great. And they didn't like country music. . . . I wanted to play that to people and they wouldn't play it. And then when their albums came out, man, I was shocked, because they were definitely country roots. So different.' And songwriting before they entered Dylan's orbit?: 'Nothing! I couldn't even get Robbie to sing or nothing!'

Hawkins says he first met 'Robert' through ALBERT GROSSMAN and through the Hawks: 'I didn't know too much about Bobby. I just knew he was one of those folk-singers that was supposed to be a hero. I'd never seen him and I'd never paid too much attention to any of his songs. Then ROBBIE ROBERTSON and them came down and said boy, he writes a lot of good stuff. So I started listening a little bit, you know? And so in Toronto, when they decided to go with Bob, the band was playing up there and Bob came up to, I think it was the Friars Tavern—and they rehearsed some songs. That was when they were gettin' ready to go on the road.'

Hawkins says that at this point he had already put another band together, because 'they had a chance to better themselves, and anytime somebody has a chance to better themselves, you just wish 'em well and hope they can make it. You've done all you can do. And I wouldn't travel in those days much. I was up there in the Coq D'Or Tavern in Toronto, because my kids were kids then. I wouldn't travel till they got grown up.'

A decade later, Hawkins was thrilled to be called in on the Rolling Thunder Revue and the Renaldo & Clara film (while the entourage was passing through Canada) in which he played the part of 'Bob Dylan'; but he was bemused by Dylan's approach to life and filming. Having always kept his wife and personal life very private, suddenly it was up on the screen, and Hawkins couldn't fathom that: 'Bob is so intelligent, y'know—and he's mysterious. He's hard to figure out. I can figure out people pretty quick, because I've been in the business so long, and I can judge an audience and all that. But Bob is like a—what's the word?—a schizophreniac. [Hawkins knows more than he makes out: one of his children, Ronnie Jr., was diagnosed with schizophrenia in his teens; the Hawkinses campaign and fundraise for the Schizophrenia Society of Ontario.] I'm not sure he's like that, but he has different personalities for different things. . . . It was kinda like the story of his life. He had his wife and he had his girlfriend, JOAN BAEZ—and they were both there. He lived with one of 'em and then he lived with the other one, and then he lived with both of them, and they were both there! I said, "Bob, howja ever did this, boy? It's amazing!" I told Bob, I said, "I don't know how you ever got this job done." But he managed to handle it somehow!'

And then there was the film's construction: 'Ha! There was no rehearsing, y'know. Bob was directing and producing and doing everything. I did three or four little skits, and he'd just call me up, three or four o'clock in the morning, and say "Come on, let's do somethin'". . . . All ad-libbed. All of it.'

Hawkins is prominent in a neat scene where MICK RONSON tries to stop him getting into the dressing-room; in a scene where he tries to seduce a young girl as the 'Moonlight Sonata' plays in the background; and the scene where he arrives in town at a hotel and is accosted by a local TV interviewer. 'She actually thought I was Bob Dylan. She knew nothing about Bob; she was just doin' her TV thing. So when I came in with the hat and a lot of people around me, she thought "Wow, must be Bob!" . . . And I think that's where Bob got the idea for me being Bob Dylan, because I'm answering questions, and when I saw that she didn't know any better, I started answering Bob's questions for him—just for fun, y'know. And he was laughing. He was standing alongside and he said "Go ahead, go ahead!" So I'm goin' ahead. It was somethin'! So she's askin' me all these questions about all the songs I'd written: "Blowin' in the Wind" and all that . . .'

And the end result? 'When I was down in California . . . Bob invited us down and . . . we watched about eight hours of film. And he had everybody in it: all the freaks, the greeks, the cripples, everything.' He never saw the four-hour finished film:

> 'Where did it play? It must be the art theaters or something. But it's going to have to be a classic, because no matter how bad the film stuff was, he had so many people on there that nobody else could have gotten on the film. I mean he had everybody. I think that film was mostly just about the 60s. I think you'd have to know that era. He had eskimos in there, and some of the old punch-drunk boxers; he had lots of different people in that booger. Bad photography, bad everything; but: he's got the people.'

Hawkins' involvement was only while the Revue rolled through Canada, but he was also around for The Band's Farewell Concert, and hence for The Last Waltz. Again, he was thrilled to sample the high life:

> 'I was out there for a month, before it was recorded. . . . I stayed out there at the Shangri-La. The Shangri-La was the studio that the Band and Dylan owned, y'know. And it was reverse shangri-la. That's the place I said you come in at 19 and you leave at 300–in about six months. So anyway, they were trying to get that together: and all these heroes of the world came in. And I had never seen a lot of them, y'know. I'd played in the bars of Ontario: I didn't know that much about what was going on, except that Rolling Thunder Revue. . . . This was my chance—I got to see all the heroes, and their lifestyles. Boy, it was fast! Ha! Fast pace! It was one hell of a party.'

Since that party, Hawkins has continued to make records, ventured into other movies, including the magnificent disaster of Michael Cimino's Heaven's Gate (1980), but has connected up with Dylan professionally only a couple of times. On the first occasion, when Dylan had temporarily stopped having 'one hell of a party' and was declaring 'I Ain't Going to Go to Hell for Anybody', his second gospel tour of 1980 hit Toronto and there in the midst of his fiery April 20 concert (which was filmed and recorded, though it remains officially unreleased), hearing that Hawkins was in the audience, Dylan said this from the stage just before a transcendently howling version of 'When He Returns': 'Well, I'm very happy to say we have Ronnie Hawkins here tonight. Yeah. I don't know where he is, I know he's here somewhere. Ronnie and I go back a long ways—in fact Ronnie's, I hear he's gonna be doing movies now, I think. Was it a movie a year now? Is that right, Ronnie? Well, remember, you know, actually I gave Ronnie his first part in the movies. That's right. Ronnie was in a little movie we made called Renaldo & Clara, about—a few years back; and Ronnie played the part of Bob Dylan. Interesting movie. Anyway, I guess there's no place to go but up now, hey Ron?'

Ten years later, when the Never-Ending Tour hit the same city, Hawkins came on stage in the middle of Dylan's set and took the lead vocal on 'One More Night', after an appropriate flourish of an intro from Dylan, who said this: 'A hero of mine—Ronnie Hawkins! Where is he? He said he would come up and sing a song: called "One More Night". It would be awfully nice if he would come up! If he doesn't want to come up, that's OK too! All right—Oh, here he comes now!' Hawkins, with his customary numbing jocularity, took the stage yelling 'Keep the women back! Keep the women back!'

Finally (so far) at 'the Absolutely Unofficial Blue Jeans Bash (for Arkansas)' in Washington, D.C., on January 17, 1993, Ronnie Hawkins was one of those on guitar alongside Dylan. He played behind Dylan on 'To Be Alone With You' and then they both played behind Stephen Stills on 'Key to the Highway' and the Cate Brothers on 'I Shall Be Released' and '(I Don't Want to) Hang Up My Rock'n'-Roll Shoes'. A fragment of 'To Be Alone With You' was televised on CBC-TV in Canada two nights later as part of a news item on Hawkins, and a fragment of 'I Shall Be Released' a further two nights on as part of a feature on The Band.

Things probably hadn't changed between them. 'You know what Bob is,' says Hawkins, 'he's mysterious. He's always been mysterious.' As he'd readily admit, what's equally true is that Ronnie Hawkins has never been mysterious.

[Ronnie Hawkins Quartet (incl. Levon Helm): 'Hey Bo Diddley' c/w 'Love Me Like You Can', Toronto, summer 1958, Quality 1827, Canada, 1958. Ronnie Hawkins & the Hawks (but only incl. Helm): 'Forty Days' c/w 'One of These Days', NY, 13 & 15 Apr 1959, Apex 76499, Canada (Roulette R4154, US), 1959; 'Mary Lou' c/w 'Need Your Lovin', NY, 29 Apr 1959, Apex 76561 (Roulette R4177, US; Columbia DB4345, UK), 1959; 'Southern Love' c/w 'Love Me Like You Can', NY, 26 Oct 1959, Apex 76623 (Roulette R4209, Columbia DB4412), 1960; 'Lonely Hours' c/w 'Clara', NY, Nov 1959, Roulette R4249, Canada (Roulette R4228, US; Columbia DB4442, UK), 1960. Ronnie Hawkins: 'Ballad of Caryl Chessman', NY, 22 Feb 1960 c/w 'Death of Floyd Collins', NY, 26 May 1959, Roulette R4231, Canada & US, 1960. Ronnie Hawkins & the Hawks (incl. Helm only): 'Ruby Baby', NY, 13 Apr 1959, c/w 'Hayride', NY, 26 Oct 1959, Roulette R4249, 1960. Ronnie Hawkins (w Helm, & Robertson on A-side only): 'Summertime' c/w 'Mister and Mississippi', Nashville, 28 Apr 1960, Roulette R4267, 1960; 'Cold Cold Heart' c/w 'Nobody's Lonesome for Me' (both w Helm only), Roulette R4311, 1961. Ronnie Hawkins & the Hawks (w Helm, Robertson & Danko): 'Come Love' c/w 'I Feel Good', NY, 13 & 18 Sep 1961, Roulette R4400, 1961. Ronnie Hawkins & the Hawks (with Helm, Robertson, Danko & Manuel): 'Bo Diddley' c/w 'Who Do You Love', NY, Jan 1963, Roulette R4483 (Columbia DB7036, UK), 1963. Ronnie Hawkins & the Hawks (with all 5): 'High Blood Pressure' c/w 'There's a Screw Loose', NY, 3 May 1964, Roulette R4502, 1964. Heaven's Gate, dir. & written Michael Cimino; Partisan Productions/UA, US, 1980. All Hawkins quotes from interview by this writer, St. Johns, Newfoundland, fall 1985, collected as '1976 & Other Times: Ronnie Hawkins, Rock'n'Roller' in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987.]

Hawks, the See Band, The.

Hayward, Richie [1946 -] Richard Hayward was born on February 6, 1946 at Clear Lake, Iowa, where, four days before Richie's 13th birthday, BUDDY HOLLY, RITCHIE VALENS and the Big Bopper played their final gig, before getting into the plane that flew off towards Fargo, North Dakota, crashing and killing them in the snow en route. Undeterred, Hayward played his first gig as a drummer in a local hall soon afterwards.

In the mid-1960s, by now a ferociously accomplished drummer, Hayward co-founded a group with Lowell George, and after its disbandment and a brief gap, co-founded another with him, Little Feat. Hayward remained with it until it collapsed after the June 1979 death of Lowell George; but he was back with the group when it reformed in 1988. Meanwhile Hayward has also performed and recorded with everyone from Joan Armatrading to WARREN ZEVON.

In 2004 he became a short-lived member of Dylan's Never-Ending Tour band, playing drums and percussion in a supporting rôle to GEORGE RECILE (who was having problems with one arm). Hayward played from the Tulsa, Oklahoma, concert of February 28 (not playing on the opening number or the encore songs this first night) through till the end of the April 4 concert in Washington, D.C.

Hearts of Fire* [film, 1987] In great contrast to those end-of-1965 press conferences, in which Dylan radiated good humour, unguarded spontaneity and optimism, when he consented to attend the press conference at the National Film Theatre in London to announce the making of Hearts of Fire in 1986, at a time of dull floundering around in his artistic life, he sat alongside his director and co-stars emanating boredom and a deeply cynical, self-lacerating dispiritedness. He broke out of it momentarily when journalist Philip Norman was brave enough to press him on why he wasn't writing songs instead of proposing to waste his time on the set of a movie that was obviously going to be awful. Warming to this theme, Norman invited Dylan to imagine how bored he was going to be in the making of it, and Dylan came out of his already-bored-shitless shell just long enough to murmur: 'Oh, I don't know—maybe you'll be around': a put-down to compete against any from his own past. But this was six seconds' worth of life and spirit in an hour of stultifying disaffection. The rest of the event just proved Philip Norman right. As did the film.

Before Dylan made Masked & Anonymous, this was the ELVIS movie in his limited list of celluloid credits. Though the style of the two films is very different—Masked & Anonymous determinedly unrealist and Hearts of Fire doggedly conventional—Dylan plays the same character in each: a has-been rock star who sings a bit and eventually knocks someone to the ground in a fight he's reluctant to enter but naturally wins. The director, RICHARD MARQUAND, had come to the film straight from the triumph of his powerful and successful thriller, Jagged Edge (1985), so a more than competent film might have been expected. But its co-stars were hopeless, and powerless to escape the yawning pit of tepid goo that was the storyline and script.

Hearts of Fire was written initially by Scott Richardson but rewritten by Joe Eszterhas because the studio regarded Richardson as too inexperienced to be writing a film for Dylan. Dylan is rumoured to have threatened legal action to retain the original Scott Richardson script, but to no avail.

'Fiona', as singer-actress Fiona Flanagan was calling herself at the time (which betrays no small misjudgement itself: it's one thing to launch yourself on the world as Madonna, or even Fabian, but Fiona?), embodied everything that was wrong with 1980s MTV showbiz, inflating a minor singing talent with pointless fiestiness, and mistaking declamatory postures for dramatic life. Rupert Everett, in parallel, embodied everything that was wrong with etiolated British acting. Set against these two, Dylan's performance, though erring on the soporific side, wasn't as bad as often suggested. The dyed blond hair didn't help, but he could still move with charismatic cool, wielding a mean pool cue and a sharp eyebrow.

Richie Havens and Ian Dury had small parts; RON WOOD appeared as himself. As did Bob Dylan—except of course that Bob Dylan has lots of selves, and this film only captured one of the less interesting. Far more beguiling were the interviews he gave to Christopher Sykes of BBC-TV while on the set of Hearts of Fire and shown in edited form in the 'Omnibus' arts series in September 1987. These showed a different Dylan, direct and playful, and well able to hold his own against the boredom Philip Norman had predicted. Whether he could sit through his own film is another matter.

[Hearts of Fire, dir. Richard Marquand, written Joe Eszterhas & Scott Richardson; Lorimar/Warner Bros., US/UK, 1987. Bob Dylan, press conferences San Francisco, 3 Dec 1965, telecast KQED-TV, US, 1965; LA, 16 Dec 12 1965 & London, 17 Aug 1986, excerpts broadcast Capital Radio and TV-AM, London, 18 Aug 1986; interviewed by Christopher Sykes, Bristol UK & Toronto, Sep-Oct 1986; telecast 'Omnibus', BBC-TV, UK, 18 Sep 1987.]

Helm, Levon [1940 -] Mark Lavon Helm was born on May 26, 1940 in the tiny town of Marvell, Arkansas, 20 miles west of the Mississippi River and 75 miles southwest of Memphis. He learnt to play guitar as a child but switched to drums after being taken to see that time-warp outfit, the F.S. Walcott Rabbits Foot Minstrel Show (slightly rechristened the 'W.S. Walcott Medicine Show' on a song written by Canadian BAND member ROBBIE ROBERTSON on the group's third album, Stage Fright).

Levon Helm was well placed to absorb country and blues music, R&B and early rock'n'roll, and after gigging locally with his sister on washtub he formed a high-school group, the Jungle Bush Beaters. Moving to Memphis he managed to sit in with CONWAY TWITTY and then got 'discovered' by RONNIE HAWKINS (another Arkansas good ole boy).

Helm joined the Hawks and they moved up into Canada, making Toronto their base. In 1959, signed to Roulette, Hawkins & the Hawks had two immediate hits with the derivative 'Forty Days' and its follow-up, 'Mary Lou'. From there the other members of what would eventually become The Band were brought into the group—Robbie Robertson (then known as Jaime) as guitarist, RICHARD MANUEL as pianist, RICK DANKO as bass player and GARTH HUDSON on organ.

Quitting Hawkins eventually (each side has its own version of how this came to pass) the group went out as Levon & the Hawks, then briefly as the Canadian Squires, and then as Levon & the Hawks again.

They met up with Bob Dylan in 1965 and Levon was the drummer on the early electric gigs that followed the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL electric début—starting at Forest Hills, New York, that August 28. The rest of Dylan's band at this point were Robbie Robertson on guitar, AL KOOPER on organ and HARVEY BROOKS (aka Goldstein) on bass. This unit lasted only a short time, and after a Hollywood Bowl concert on September 3, Dylan got together with Helm, Robertson, Danko, Hudson and Manuel to rehearse in Woodstock, New York, for further live gigs.

On October 5 they went into the studio with Dylan for the first time, followed by more live concerts and a second studio stint on November 30 (from which comes the single 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?')—but Levon wasn't with them for this session (though he's credited as drummer on the session in the sleevenotes to Bootleg Series Vol. 7). He'd quit, playing his last Dylan concert of the tour in Washington, D.C., on November 28. He couldn't stand all the booing that Dylan's electric performances were bringing down upon their heads. He went home to Arkansas, worked on oil rigs in the Gulf and felt like giving up, but played some dates around Memphis with the Cate Brothers Band. By December 4, at Dylan's Berkeley concert, the rest of the Hawks were still in there, but Levon had been replaced by BOBBY GREGG. The whole of the amazing 1966 tour took place without Levon Helm.

He returned to the fold only for the last part of the informal Basement Tapes sessions. Those sessions began without him in June 1967 at Dylan's house in Woodstock and continued over that summer and autumn, partly at Dylan's house but mostly at 'Big Pink', the group's house at nearby West Saugerties—in the basement. A total of 145 tracks plus seven further fragments were recorded, with the band members spreading themselves out into multi-instrumentalism, so that when Levon Helm rejoined them he was sometimes drumming but on other occasions played mandolin and bass. But he had only come back among them in October. Exactly when he arrived, what he missed and what he played on are impossible to say reliably.

When Dylan made his first public appearance for 20 months in January 1968 at the WOODY GUTHRIE Memorial Concerts, the Hawks (or the Crackers) played behind him, and Levon Helm was on stage with them for the first time in over two years. The group went on to become The Band, and it was Levon's lead vocal carving into us on 'The Weight', 'Rag Mama Rag', 'The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down', 'Up on Cripple Creek', 'Jemima Surrender' and later on 'Strawberry Wine', 'All La Glory', 'W.S. Walcott Medicine Show' and, on the rock'n'roll revival album Moondog Matinee, 'Ain't Got No Home', 'Mystery Train', 'Promised Land' and 'I'm Ready'.

The Band accompanied Dylan again at his Isle of Wight Festival appearance on August 31, 1969. In turn, at their 1971 New Year's Eve concert in New York City, Dylan came on in the early hours of January 1, 1972 and as well as singing 'Down in the Flood', 'When I Paint My Masterpiece' and 'Like a Rolling Stone', he also played guitar behind Levon Helm as Helm sang on 'Don't Ya Tell Henry'. (These performances were finally released in 2001 among the many extra tracks on a 2-CD reissue of The Band's Rock of Ages album.)

In 1974 The Band rejoined Dylan for his Come-Back Tour of North America, from which came Before the Flood, which followed their working together one more time in the studio, on Dylan's Planet Waves. In 1975 a SNACK Benefit gig in San Francisco featured Dylan, NEIL YOUNG, Rick Danko and Levon. And then came the end of The Band, with the concert at the Winterland Palace in San Francisco on November 25, 1976, filmed by MARTIN SCORSESE as The Last Waltz, and one last album, Islands.

Levon would make his feelings clear about the last years of The Band, and about the Scorsese-Robertson partnership, in many a subsequent interview and then in his 1993 autobiography This Wheel's on Fire (which carried this endorsement by Dylan: 'Torrid and timeless . . . wisdom and humor roaring off every page . . . you've got to read this').

After The Band split up, Helm made a series of solo albums, all calling on a huge cast of friends in the studio, beginning with Levon Helm and the RCO All Stars in 1977. Dylan sang 'Your Cheatin' Heart' as a guest at a Levon Helm & Rick Danko gig in New York City on February 16, 1983; Dylan & Helm performed 'Nadine' during Helm's Lone Star Café gig in NYC on May 29, 1988, and the two were reunited again on the ensemble finale song ('Only the Lonely') at the ROY ORBISON tribute concert in LA on February 24, 1990.

By this time The Band had reformed in a partial sort of way, with Earl Cate of the Cate Brothers and without Robbie Robertson (in 1983), but after Richard Manuel's suicide in 1986 the trio that was left took years more before they made a new Band album, Jericho, recorded in 1993 at the studio Helm now owned in Woodstock. It included a version of Dylan's 'Blind Willie McTell'; when Dylan subsequently took to performing it in concert, he followed their way of doing it rather than his own.

Ahead of making Jericho, a rather enfeebled version of The Band appeared at Dylan's so-called 30th Anniversary Concert in New York City in 1992, and on January 17, 1993 Levon (and Garth and Danko) played live with Dylan once again, at President Bill Clinton's inauguration party, the so-called 'Absolutely Unofficial Blue Jeans Bash (For Arkansas)'. More albums billed as by The Band followed—including High on the Hog, in 1996, which included Helm singing the Dylan-HELENA SPRINGS song 'Love You Too Much'—but in the late 1990s Helm formed a new blues-based band of his own, Levon Helm & the Barn Burners (featuring his daughter Amy).

He and Dylan came to one more conjunction of sorts in 2003, when the Dixie Hummingbirds' recording of Dylan's 'City of Gold' was included on the Masked & Anonymous soundtrack. It came from their album Diamond Jubilation, on which Levon and Garth Hudson both played, as indeed did Dylan tour-band members LARRY CAMPBELL, TONY GARNIER and George Recile, and which Campbell produced.

Helm has also appeared in (and sometimes narrated) a number of TV profiles of other artists (including 'ELVIS '56', 1987, 'Legends: The Who', 1997, and 'JOHNNY CASH: Half a Mile a Day', 2000) but has also put in plenty of time as a movie actor. His 13 rôles to date have included playing Loretta

Lynn's father very creditably in the 1980 bio-pic Coal Miner's Daughter and a Bible salesman in Feeling Minnesota, 1996. (For Levon's rant about The Last Waltz, see Scorsese, Martin.)

Levon Helm may not be the intellectual of the group and he may not be a prolific songwriter—on the original Band albums he co-wrote only 'Jemima Surrender', 'Strawberry Wine' and 'Life Is a Carnival'—but his vocals were a crucial part of the classic sound of The Band, a sound that influenced so much music, and he has always been a superb rock'n'roll drummer.

[The SNACK Benefit Concert, San Francisco, 23 Mar 1975. Levon Helm: 'Don't Ya Tell Henry', NY, 1 Jan 1972, Rock of Ages (2-CD set reissue with bonus tracks), Capitol 72435-30181-2-2, US 2001; Levon Helm and the RCO All Stars, ABC AA-1017, NY, 1977, CD-reissued Edsel EDCD 494, 1996. The Band: High on the Hog, Rhino/Pyramid 72404, US (Transatlantic TRA CD 228, UK), 1996. Levon Helm: This Wheel's on Fire: Levon Helm and the Story of The Band (written with Stephen Davis), New York: Wm Morrow, 1993 & Chicago: A Capella Books, 2000. Dixie Hummingbirds: 'City of Gold', nia, Diamond Jubilation, Treasure TR0302, US 2003, & on Masked & Anonymous, Sony 90536 (ltd. edn. album with bonus CD: Sony 90618), NY, 2003. For full Helm discography see http://theband.hiof.no/albums/helm_index.html.]

Helstrom, Echo [1942 -] Marvel Echo Star Helstrom Shivers was born in Duluth, Minnesota, in 1942, by far the youngest child of mechanic, painter and welder Matt Helstrom and his wife Martha. Her brother (also named Matt) was 14 years older than her, and her sister (also named Martha) 15 years older. She was, as she said herself, 'from the other side of the tracks' from the middle-class Robert Zimmerman; and this was part of her fascination for him: 'he was rich folk and we were poor folk,' as she told ROBERT SHELTON. There was another difference too: 'he was Jewish and we were German, Swedish, Russian, and Irish, all mixed together.' In fact, Echo's mother was born in Ohio and her father in Minnesota, but all four of her grandparents were from Finland.

In the 2005 film No Direction Home Dylan says that before Echo there had been another girl, with, for him, an equally resonant name, 'Gloria Story'; but until he volunteered it, no such name had ever been mentioned in his biography, whereas Echo has long and famously been his 'Girl of the North Country'. It's sometimes been guessed—in the dark, either way—that Bonnie Beecher, aka JAHANARA ROMNEY, was the 'real' girl whose hair 'rolled and flowed all down her breast', but Echo has the better claim: she's the one from Hibbing rather than Minneapolis, and she came first.

She had taken accordion lessons, played the harmonium the Helstroms had at home and sang in the school choir. Like Dylan, though, she was into rock'n'roll and like him listened to R&B on the late-night radio station that beamed all the way up from Shreveport, Louisiana. They 'went steady' in 1957–58, when they were 16. In the 1958 High School Yearbook Bob wrote against Echo's name: 'Let me tell you that your beauty is second to none. . . . Love to the most beautiful girl in school.' On May 2, 1958, they went to the Junior Prom together, in the school's Boys Gymnasium, and both danced badly.

The Helstrom household was a wooden shack three miles southwest of Hibbing on Highway 73, to which Bob would often hitchhike out after school. Matt Helstrom didn't approve of his daughter's young man any more than the Zimmermans approved of Echo, but when he wasn't around, Bob would play Mr. Helstrom's three guitars, or listen to his JIMMIE RODGERS records, and sing her songs out on their porch. In Chronicles, Dylan describes Echo's father as 'The kind of guy that's always thinking that somebody's out to take advantage of him', whereas her mother 'was the kindest woman—Mother Earth.' Martha Helstrom (a name Shelton never gives, always calling her, irritatingly, 'Mrs. Helstrom') liked Bob, looked on the relationship with equanimity, and felt that Bob 'seemed much more humble than his family. Both Echo and Bob seemed so sorry for the working people.' Bob's brother, DAVID ZIMMERMAN, told Shelton: 'Bobby always went with the daughters of miners, farmers, and workers. . . . He just found them a lot more interesting.'

In 1968, working as a film-company secretary in Minneapolis to support a child from a failed marriage (cold rain can give you the Shivers), Echo looked back to the events that must have seemed lightyears ago. Without trying to claim more than her due in Dylan's story, she told Shelton that they had both felt outsiders together, both misfits in conventional, old-fashioned, narrow-minded Hibbing. 'We weren't like the other people at school in any way. I just couldn't stand being like the other girls. I had to be different.' Bob was going to be a pop star and Echo was going to be a movie star. Mrs. Helstrom remembered a time when they were going to get married and have a child. 'They planned to call their child Bob, whether it was a boy or a girl. You know how teenagers are.'

They were drifting apart by mid-1958, with Bob making it ever clearer that he was going with other girls, and they broke up in early summer. She saw him around, but after he left for New York the next time she saw him was at the Hibbing High School Class of '59 tenth reunion in 1969. Bob and SARA DYLAN turned up unexpectedly, and so did Echo. They spoke briefly; Echo was among the old friends who asked for, and received, an autograph. He signed it before he recognised her, then said 'Hey! It's you!' and said to his wife, 'This is Echo!', and signed her programme 'To Echo, Yours Truly, Bob Dylan'. That same year saw the release, on Nashville Skyline, of the re-recorded 'Girl of the North Country'.

They must either have met up or spoken on the phone again, after almost another decade's gap, some time in the late 1970s: Echo told biographer HOWARD SOUNES that it was 20 years after their schooldays relationship that Bob confessed to her new intimate detail about it.

Soon after talking to Shelton in 1968 (for a book that didn't emerge till 1986) and more than 30 years before talking to Sounes, she had also talked—some might feel excessively—to TOBY THOMPSON, the gawky young author of the first book to explore the subject of Hibbing in relation to Bob Dylan, Positively Main Street: An Unorthodox View of Bob Dylan, published in 1971. He had reached Echo first in October 1968, very soon after Shelton; she was still in her basement apartment in Minneapolis, and gave him the new information that once, when she'd been listening to one of Bob's Hibbing bands practising, when she'd deciphered his voice from within the over-amplified whole, he 'was howling over and over again, "I gotta girl and her name is Echo!" making up verses as he went along. I guess that was the first song I'd ever heard him sing that wasn't written by somebody else. And it was about me!'

It's always seemed likely that a song from aeons later, 'Hazel' on Planet Waves, was also, on one level, about Echo. The album is full of warm memorialising about the Minnesota years—'the phantoms of my youth', 'twilight on the frozen lake'—and to hear 'Hazel'—'dirty blonde hair / I wouldn't be ashamed to be seen with you anywhere'—is to feel a hunch that the song's tender tale recollects fragments of feeling from the days when Echo and Bob were riding around, coming together from different sides of the tracks, united in wanting to get out of Hibbing—'you're going somewhere / And so am I'. In 2004, in Chronicles Volume One, Dylan says that the last time he saw his 'old hometown girlfriend', 'she was heading West. Everybody said she looked like Brigitte Bardot, and she did.' And he memorialises her again: 'my Becky Thatcher', he calls her.

Now there's a group, from Portland, Oregon, who call themselves Echo Helstrom. But the real one is still around, and so does she.

[Quotes from Echo, her mother & David Zimmerman from Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin, 1987 edn., pp.46–52 & 53, except quote from Toby Thompson, Positively Main Street: An Unorthodox View of Bob Dylan, London: New English Library edn., March 1972 reprint, p.63. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.59–60. Echo's full name from the Minnesota Births Index; Junior Prom date & gym location from Dave Engel, Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues: Dylan in Minnesota, Rudolph, WI: River City Memoirs—Mesabi, 1997, p.178.]

Hendrix, Jimi [1942 - 1970] James Marshall Hendrix was born in Seattle, Washington, on November 27, 1942, taught himself guitar as a schoolboy, grew up listening to electric blues guitarists and in 1961 enlisted in the US Paratroopers. While serving he played in clubs and met bassist Billy Cox (whom he would call upon years later when he needed an old friend). Back in civilian life he was briefly in a group called the Flames and then toured as an unremarkable guitarist behind one of his heroes, B.B. King, and subsequently behind SAM COOKE, LITTLE RICHARD and Ike & Tina Turner. Moving to New York City he played behind the Isley Brothers, King Curtis and others, became lead guitarist for the indifferent but amiable Curtis Knight and finally came to the attention of Chas Chandler, the ex-ANIMALS bassist, who bought him out of a series of unfavourable contracts and brought him to England in 1966, rescuing 'Jimmy James' from routine work and routine indifference and allowing Jimi Hendrix to set London ablaze.

In Harlem, as the Only Ones' guitarist John Perry writes in his excellent small book Electric Ladyland, Jimi's friends 'didn't share his interests in the Greenwich Village scene, the new English guitar rock or Bob Dylan, and thought him far too flaky to succeed'; but the swinging London of 1966 recognised his guitar genius at once, and his physical beauty, and he was the talk of the town within a week. Driven by an incorrigible appetite for getting high and getting what were then called dolly birds, he was nonetheless ambitious: quietly so in ordinary life and ferociously so with a guitar in his hands. Jeff Beck, Pete Townshend and ERIC CLAPTON held a hasty meeting to decide how to cope; they chose, wisely, to surrender with relatively good grace. It's said that when Hendrix got on stage with super-cool, super-hot Cream, Clapton blocked off his amp and Jimi had to plug into JACK BRUCE's. It was Clapton's last finger in the dam. The torrent of Hendrix's opening notes settled the matter.

Hendrix also had a sharp if spacey wit. Asked about this Cream-conquering incident in advance, when it was in his mind's eye, Hendrix said: 'I can't wait to find out if he is as good as he really thinks I am.'

Yet Hendrix was not an arrogant man; no-one was more approachable by his fans or (often the same thing) other musicians. And when the Jimi Hendrix Experience was signed up for a series of low-fee college dates before 'Hey Joe' was released, and he found himself a national star by the time those dates came around, instead of blowing them out, Jimi fulfilled them all—even when, as with his £70 booking at the University of York on February 18, 1967, the van broke down and the group couldn't reach the hall till midnight. There, standing calmly in the group dressing-room, looking immaculate and relaxed, Hendrix talked warmly about his 'total admiration' for Bob Dylan—and then went on stage to include in his set an amp-assaulting, torridly original version of 'Like a Rolling Stone' that almost matched for vituperative power those Dylan and the Hawks had given in Britain eight months earlier and which displayed with a showman's bravado that supernatural non-delay between the brain's conception and the fingers' immediate and fluent execution.

No-one knew then that within a year, a new Dylan album would arrive, an album in stark contrast to that electric whirlwind—or that Hendrix would find a song within the stripped-down acoustics of John Wesley Harding and take it right back into that whirlwind: take it over so completely that ever since Dylan's return to touring afterwards, in 1974, he has been playing 'All Along the Watchtower' entirely in the spirit of the Jimi Hendrix interpretation.

That's the crucial conjunction between the two. Everything else is peripheral: that Dylan saw Hendrix play somewhere in the Village in 1965, and 'knew Jimi slightly before he became a big star . . . [when] he was basically a blues player . . . he was young and he was the real thing'; that they met, apparently, only once and briefly after Jimi was a star; that the John Wesley Harding track Hendrix had first picked out had been 'I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine'; that he did record a marvellous 'The Drifter's Escape' too, though this was hidden inside one of the innumerable cheap first-wave posthumous releases; that when Dylan eventually débuted this song in concert, in 1992, this too was taken at a Hendrixian pace; and that when, that same year, Dylan opened his Australian tour on March 18 in Perth, he included an attempt at 'Dolly Dagger', and when he closed his summer tour of European festivals that July in Juan-les-Pins, his set opened with a one-off performance of 'Hey Joe'.

Dylan's tribute, then, has essentially been musical—and it isn't Jimi Hendrix's fault if Bob's fans have heard altogether too many revisits to 'All Along the Watchtower' down the years (by the end of 2003 Dylan had performed it in concert 1,393 times, and never once à la John Wesley Harding)—but he has also paid tribute in words:

'It can't be expected that a performer get under the song. . . . it's hard enough for me to do it sometimes. . . . He sang them exactly the way they were intended to be sung. . . . the way I would've done them if I was him.' (Though of course it wasn't how Hendrix sang but how he played that was the point.) And: 'Jimi was a great artist. I wish he would've lived. . . . It's not a wonder to me that he recorded my songs but rather that he recorded so few of them—because they were all his.'

As John Perry points out: 'Jimi Hendrix's recording career lasted less than four years. Had Bob Dylan's career been equally foreshortened it would have ended with 1965's Highway 61 Revisited. No Blonde on Blonde, no John Wesley Harding. No Blood on the Tracks.'

Jimi Hendrix died alone in London, at the height of his powers and still young and beautiful, choked by his own vomit, on September 18, 1970. He was 27 years old.

[Jimi Hendrix: Electric Ladyland, Track 613009, UK, 1968; 'The Drifter's Escape', Loose Ends, Polydor 2310301, UK, 1973. Bob Dylan: 'Hey Joe', Juan-les-Pins, France, 12 Jul 1992. John Perry, Electric Ladyland, New York: Continuum 33⅓ series, 2004; this contains a detailed analysis of how Hendrix built his 'Watchtower' from Dylan's. All Hendrix & Dylan quotes from ditto, except Hendrix re 'total admiration' for Dylan, conversation with this writer, York, UK, early hours of 19 Feb 1967.]

Herald, John [1939 - 2005] John Herald was born in Greenwich Village, NYC, on September 6, 1939. He discovered he could sing when PETE SEEGER visited a summer camp he was staying at and urged everyone to sing in chorus. Herald heard his own high voice soaring out above the rest. He attended the University of Wisconsin and there met ERIC WEISSBERG and Marshall Brickman, whom he'd heard perform together in the Village. He took up guitar and they started playing bluegrass together, and turned into THE GREENBRIAR BOYS. Signed to Vanguard Records, the group was headlining at Gerde's Folk City when Dylan was the support act—and received a rave review from ROBERT SHELTON in the New York Times: a review that barely mentioned Herald & co.

Herald said they were asked if it was OK to have Dylan on the bill. 'By this time Bob was a friend of mine, so I said fine. I wish he would return the favor now . . . [but] I liked Dylan quite a bit, so that's how it happened.' He also said: 'Dylan was one of those few people that happened to like traditional music as much as me. . . . We were both night owls and enjoyed café society, our girlfriends were also best friends, so he was one of the maybe ten scuffing partners that I had.'

Herald also seems to be the lone witness to a little-known phase of Dylan's early Greenwich Village days: Dylan as fiddle player. 'I actually first encountered him by seeing him when he was playing fiddle . . . he was noodling around on the fiddle, and it kind of surprised me because there weren't many fiddle players around. . . . Maybe he could have been a great fiddle player if he practised . . . but back then there was a lot of experimenting going on.'

In March 1963 Herald accompanied Dylan and SUZE ROTOLO when Dylan took an early acetate of The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan to play to Bob Fass at WBAI-FM radio station in New York City. Herald and Rotolo sat in on the Fass interview.

In 1972, after a few years in Woodstock, NY—to which he later returned to live, becoming a great amateur mycologist—he moved for a couple of years to California, where a reconstituted Greenbriar Boys briefly included JERRY GARCIA. Shortly before the move, Herald had made a solo album on which appeared HOWIE WYETH, ROB STONER, BOB NEUWIRTH and STEVE SOLES among the many musicians helping out. It was the first time these four had all met; later they came together again for Dylan's Rolling Thunder Revue. Herald moved to Philadelphia in 1976, formed a new bluegrass band, but then moved back to Woodstock the following year and there formed an electric bluegrass band that became the Woodstock Mountain Revue and included Artie and HAPPY TRAUM.

John Herald is associated with the song 'High Muddy Water' (a phrase Dylan incorporates into his Time Out of Mind song 'Tryin' to Get to Heaven'). Dylan once said, perhaps with more enthusiasm than clarity, that John Herald was 'the country STEVIE WONDER'. In the late 1990s Dylan paid a private visit to Herald in Woodstock, where they played songs together and to each other.

John Herald killed himself at his home, aged 65, on July 18, 2005.

Herdman, John John Macmillan Herdman is a Scottish novelist, short story writer and literary critic who has written rarely but well on Dylan's work. He was born in Edinburgh on July 20, 1941. He first took notice of Dylan's recordings in 1964; his first published work on Dylan was the article 'Attitudes to Bob Dylan', published in the journal Akros in 1976. For JOHN BAULDIE's Telegraph in 1985 he wrote an exemplary piece on the Dylan of the Infidels and Empire Burlesque period, 'The Truth in the Missing File', published three years after his book on Dylan's work, the excellent Voice Without Restraint: Bob Dylan's Lyrics and Their Background, which was published simultaneously in the US and the UK and was followed by a Japanese edition in 1983.

As a novelist and writer on other subjects he has published 15 books, including A Truth Lover (1973), Pagan's Pilgrimage (1978), The Double in Nineteenth-Century Fiction (1990), Imelda (1993), Ghostwriting (1996), The Sinister Cabaret (2001) and a French translation of his novel Imelda (2006).

[John Herdman: 'Attitudes to Bob Dylan', Akros no.30, Preston, UK, 1976; 'The Truth in the Missing File', Telegraph no.22, UK, winter 1985. Voice Without Restraint: Bob Dylan's Lyrics and Their Background, Edinburgh: Paul Harris Publishing, 1982; New York: Delilah Books, 1982; and Tokyo: CBS/Sony Publishing, 1983.]

heroes, special cowboy fondness for, and 'John Wesley Harding' [song] One aspect of American folk music's cowboy tradition is its special fondness for heroes, and Dylan comes to this on the John Wesley Harding album, as he reaches back into America's past for the secret strengths of her myths. The album is a 'retreat', a turning away, from the chaos of the modern urban burden; yet clearly it is a regenerative spirit that drives Dylan to search back as he does. He engages, in this album, in a desperately serious struggle to free himself, and so to free us, from the debilitating predicament our fragmented sensibility has placed us in: the predicament Dylan defined on his previous album, the druggy, urban, chaotic, compelling Blonde on Blonde. There, 'Visions of Johanna' sums up this mess: 'We sit here stranded / Though we're all doin' our best to deny it.' As Dylan comes, in John Wesley Harding, to the myths and extinct strengths of America, he explores the world of the cowboy as well as the pioneer. The man in the title song is a cowboy, and, indeed, a hero.

It is a modest exploration, in that the cowboy-outlaw is not an unusual subject for hero-treatment; but what a delicate, subtle portrait the song offers. It is all so simple, so straightforward (like the system of values we have come to associate with the cowboy world): a ballad that tells the story of its hero's exploits. Yet at the end we still have no idea what actually happened, nor any clear indication of the narrator's attitude. We get clues but no bearings. It was never like this when Tennessee Ernie Ford sang 'The Ballad of Davy Crockett'.

The song's economy of organization and language is noticeable at once. There is no use of simile and no reliance on images or symbolism. Following that, we notice a corresponding lack of what may be called 'moral centre'. Nine of the 12 lines provide what could be taken, at first glance, as testaments to the hero's worth and virtue: yet actually none is free from significant ambiguity—and these equivocations, collectively, have a piercing eloquence to offer. 'John Wesley Harding was a friend to the poor . . .' In what way? To what extent? The claim has, deliberately, no core behind its apparent bluntness. It refrains from contradicting the suspicion that Harding's name could be added to a long list of men whose lives and interests are spent in opposition, effectively, to the lives and interests of the poor but to whom it is advantageous to seem to appeal. Plenty of hero reputations depend upon this pretence. As for those two very reasonable questions raised by that first line: they are in no way answered by the rest of the song. 'All along this countryside he opened many a door.' We could put similar questions in response to that, and be met by a similar blank. The line opens no doors for us. It works, as intended, by yielding an echo which lingers throughout the song: the echo of a second empty claim. To it must be added the corresponding echoes of the other claims that confront us. As we meet them, the next is this: 'But he was never known to hurt an honest man.' Dylan chooses the negative form of expression; and the consciously reductive intention this reveals gets reinforcement from further negatives in the song; and it ends by giving us a pile-up of three of them: 'But no charge held against him could they prove / And there was no man around who could track or chain 'im down / He was never known to make a foolish move.' Not only is all this presented carefully in the negative, but it all serves to emphasise the deliberate vicariousness of the testimony we're given: 'He was never known to. . . . He was never known to . . .' Other lines are linked in such a way as to discredit any inference of virtue from them when they're considered together. He opened many a door but he was never known to hurt an honest man. That careful word 'but' gives the statements either side of it a cynical focus that the substitution of 'and' could have avoided had Dylan's intention been different (had Dylan's approach, for instance, been Hollywood's). And the following lines add nothing good to our picture of the hero's character: ' 'Twas down in Chaynee County, the time they talk about . . . / And soon the situation there was all but straightened out . . . / All across the telegraph his name it did resound.' The inferences to be made do not concern his heroism, his virtue or his good deeds. They concern the lesser strengths of his fame and reputation. There is, again, a consciously reductive intention on Dylan's part: to repeat, and give a collective weight to, the idea that Harding had a reputation for . . . and then the vague list: lending help, opening doors, refraining from injuring the honest, almost straightening out some utterly unspecified 'situation', not getting tracked down, and, lastly, looking after himself cleverly. This repeated insistence on Harding's reputation also casts a doubt on the veracity of what is being insisted upon. Thus Dylan trades on our methinks-he-doth-protest-too-much reaction, in order to increase further our sense of the empty centre of the story.

Two of the lines—but only two—work in a different way. 'With his lady by his side he took a stand' adds to those echoes of the unspecific in the way that other lines do, by that flamboyantly vague phrase 'he took a stand'; but it creates, with the other half of the line, an almost explicit condemnation. Within the cowboy ethic, the hero should neither have needed his lady by his side to give him his courage nor have placed her inside the danger-zone. The line 'He traveled with a gun in every hand' goes further. The wit of that phrase 'in every hand' serves quietly to highlight Harding's inadequacy. Such a reliance on his weapons suggests something discreditable. (As in that more recent folk saw: flash car, small dick.) In support of this, Dylan's sly phrase acts as a reference back to Dylan's earlier song 'With God on Our Side': 'And the names of the heroes / I's made to memorize / With guns in their hands / And God on their side.'

Yet it is not from these two lines of near-explicit criticism that 'John Wesley Harding' gets its power. This comes emphatically from Dylan's carefully constructed 'echoes of the unspecific': and these are indeed eloquent. In its three short verses, the song offers a keen critique of values pertinent not only to the 19th century cowboy's world but to the heirs of that bygone civilization in contemporary America. The clichés of thought exploded so precisely in the song are still in the way today; but Dylan has done battle with them. 'John Wesley Harding' joins with the rest of the album of that name to give us Dylan successfully engaged in the mature artistic attainment of reconstruction and revaluation: Dylan at his most seriously and intelligently creative. But of course even when he was far younger, and not being 'serious' at all, his irreverent, comic 'Hero Blues' questioned the motives of heroes and of those who wanted to construct them.

['John Wesley Harding' recorded Nashville, 6 Nov 1967; as of Apr 2005 Dylan has never sung it 'live'. 'Hero Blues' recorded 3 times (plus fragment), NY, 6 Dec 1962; performed at the New York Town Hall Concert, 12 Apr 1963 and re-recorded as a Witmark music-publishing demo, NY, May 1963. All these versions have circulated. So has a version recorded NY, 12 Aug 1963. So too, in extreme lo-fi, has the version privately recorded at the home of DAVE WHITAKER, Minneapolis, MN, 17 Jul 1963. Eleven years later, to everyone's surprise, Dylan chose it as the opening song of the opening concert of his huge 'come-back' tour of 1974 (Chicago, 3 Jan). And the next night (also Chicago). Then it disappeared again.]

Herron, Don [1962 -] Donald John Herron Jr. was born in Steubenville, Ohio, on September 23, 1962. A violinist, guitarist, steel-guitarist, dobro player, banjo player and mandolinist, he is currently a member of Dylan's Never-Ending Tour band.

He came out of the one of the key country bands of the 1990s, the Nashville-based BR5-49, named after an old phone number seen in a sketch on 'Hee Haw', signalling the unapologetic retro character of the band, which has been described as 'Gram Parsons-style country rock'. It was founded in early 1993 by Gary Bennett and Chuck Mead, guitarists and vocalists from the Pacific Northwest and Kansas respectively. They added upright bassist and ex-Hellbilly Smilin' Jay McDowell, drummer Shaw Wilson, also from Kansas, and Bennett's old friend Herron. They signed a record deal in 1995 and in 1996 issued an EP. Albums followed, as did tours; but after the release of a 2001 album, McDowell and Bennett left and the band broke up. Herron and others went back to Nashville and played with musical collective the Hillbilly All-Stars but re-formed BR5-49 (now reconfigured as BR549) in 2004 with a new bassist and singer-guitarist.

Then Bob Dylan asked Herron to join the Never-Ending Tour Band, and he became one of the several people brought in for the spring 2005 tour, beginning in Seattle on March 7.

Hester, Carolyn [1937 -] Carolyn June Hester was born in Waco, Texas, on January 28, 1937. Because she came from Texas, she gravitated to Norman Petty's legendary custom studio in Clovis, New Mexico, when she wanted to make a record—and, partly because she was very pretty, Norman decided to manage her. Her début album, Scarlet Ribbons, was recorded in July and August 1957, produced by Petty. Carolyn, on vocals and guitar, was 20 years old. She was accompanied by George Atwood on string bass and, on 'Wreck of the Old '97', by Jerry Allison on brushes and box.

Norman Petty's other act, BUDDY HOLLY, dropped in on the sessions and heard music that beckoned from a world beyond his own—the world of traditional folk music but also of inchoate New Left, civil rights, democratising and intellectual youthfulness. He followed her to Greenwich Village and moved into an apartment in what proved to be, unfortunately, the last few months of his life.

The musical influence was not just one way. Holly was a star and Hester a new kid on the musical block, and she appreciated rock'n'roll. When she and Bob Dylan met up on the folk scene in 1961, she was playing three sets a night at Gerde's Folk City, in the Village. Dylan was there listening one night, and as she told TERRY KELLY, 'I was down to my third set and . . . I'm saying "Buddy Holly taught me this song" and I start singing "Lonesome Tears" and the place had kinda thinned out and there were not many people, so Bob pulled his chair right up to the stage—that close—and said "Buddy Holly taught you that song?!"'

Accounts vary as to how Dylan came to play harmonica on tracks cut at the sessions for her third album, Carolyn Hester, made for JOHN HAMMOND and Columbia Records on September 29, 1961—i.e. before Dylan was signed to a record contract at all himself, and almost two full months before he went back into the same New York studios to make his own first album. (One account, possibly askew, is offered in Dylan's memoir Chronicles Volume One, 2004.)

What's certain is that the day of the Hester session was the very day ROBERT SHELTON's unprecedented rave review of Dylan's support-act performance at Gerde's Folk City was published in the New York Times, and in Hester's words, 'Hammond just went for it. He was trying to build a stable of folk singers at that time.' Hester had already been trying to help Dylan get gigs—she let him open for her at Club 47 in Boston not long after their Holly conversation—and out at Revere Beach she told him she had this Columbia session coming up, that she already had BRUCE LANGHORNE booked and was trying to get ODETTA's bass player, BILL LEE (father of Spike), and that Hammond was producing, and would he like to come along?

They rehearsed, with Hammond listening in, and then in the studio Dylan played harmonica on 'I'll Fly Away' (a gospel song performed by everyone from the Rev. J.M. Gates to ROY ACUFF, but written by ALBERT E. BRUMLEY, a white Oklahoman quartet singer and music teacher who became a professional gospel songwriter after this song's success), 'Swing and Turn Jubilee' ('a square-dance number associated with Jean Ritchie', according to DAVID HAJDU) and 'Come Back, Baby'. This last was a Walter Davis blues, cut in 1940, and became, post-war, the most covered of his records. Carolyn had asked Dylan to teach her some blues, he'd played her a large number of them on the spot, and this was the one she opted for. He taught it to her.

For some reason the resulting album, Carolyn Hester, was not released until mid-May 1962—two months later than Dylan's own début LP. (In 1961, however, she did see the release of her second album, also called Carolyn Hester, on the Tradition label.)

All three of the tracks recorded with Dylan on were included on the Columbia album. Thirty-three years after the sessions, when the album was issued on CD, an extra take each of 'I'll Fly Away' and of 'Come Back, Baby' were included as 'bonus tracks'. None of them have any merit beyond the historical one of having given Dylan his first chance in a professional recording studio.

At the time Dylan played on that Hester album, she was married to RICHARD FARIÑA. In David Hajdu's words, she was 'a womanly, voluptuous beauty with sculpted features' who was 'often asked if she was a movie star'. She had taken acting classes and even while performing in the Village was still taking voice and guitar lessons but by the time Dylan met her she was a widely liked and accepted performer. 'Carolyn was a contender, no doubt about it,' DAVE VAN RONK told Hajdu. When Gerde's had opened, on May 30, 1960, Hester had been its featured attraction. Fariña was merely a hustler and hanger-on. They'd been introduced by Robert Shelton (who was infatuated with Hester, according to her manager of the time, Charlie Rothschild) at the White Horse Tavern in the Village, and Fariña had aimed at her at once. Eighteen days after her Folk City appearance, she married him. By the time her Columbia album came out in 1962, he was aiming at JOAN BAEZ's 16-year-old sister MIMI instead. Hester arranged a Mexican divorce. In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan's own comments on the Carolyn Hester of this period are comically disingenuous. 'Carolyn was married to Richard Fariña, a part-time novelist and adventurer. . . . I thought he was the luckiest guy in the world to be married to Carolyn.'

In 1992, at the so-called 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration at Madison Square Garden, NYC, Carolyn Hester was invited to appear. JEFF ROSEN, in Dylan's office, phoned and said that since Bob had recently played harmonica for NANCI GRIFFITH on her recording of 'Boots of Spanish Leather' maybe she and Carolyn Hester could perform together. On stage, Hester handed Dylan a bunch of flowers someone had thrown from the crowd and afterwards attended the party at TOMMY MAKEM's. Subsequently she was invited out to California to be interviewed for the documentary 'videography' that Jeff Rosen was making about Dylan's life.

[Carolyn Hester: Scarlet Ribbons, Clovis, NM, Jul–Aug 1957, Coral 57143, NY, 1958; Carolyn Hester, nia, Tradition 1043, NY, 1961; Carolyn Hester, NY, 29 Sep 1961, Columbia CL1796, NY, 1962, CD-reissued (with 'bonus tracks') Columbia Legacy CK57310, NY, 1994. Quotes re Holly, Hammond, 30th Anniversary & 'videography' from interview by Terry Kelly, The Bridge no.16, Gateshead, UK, summer 2003, pp.8, 10 & 12–14. David Hajdu quoted from his Positively 4th Street: The Lives and Times of Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Mimi Baez Fariña and Richard Fariña, pp.32 & 99; Van Ronk quoted from Hajdu p.32; Shelton infatuation Hajdu p.37. Thanks to Ms. Hester for extra information by e-mail, Aug 2005.]

Heylin, Clinton [1960 -] Clinton Manson Heylin was born on April 8, 1960 in Urmston, Lancashire (Greater Manchester, UK). He is the Dylan biographer who started from the position of fan and collector. His interest in Dylan and his work long preceded the writing of his several books, and by the time the first of these was published, Heylin was a dominant figure in the world of Dylan fanzines and Dylan trainspotting. His knowledge is immense, his research formidable and his prose prolific. He has unearthed so much of the information we have about Dylan's recordings and his life, and has interpreted that information so forcefully, that had Heylin never interested himself in these subjects, the whole face of Dylanology would be different. It would also be less combative. Heylin's achievement as a Dylan researcher and biographer is such that his notorious belittling of, and quarrelling with, almost everyone else in the field is as unnecessary as it is crass.

Tracking Heylin's bibliography is made difficult by his giving every edition of every book a different or amended title. However, essentially the list is this:

His early work Stolen Moments: The Ultimate Reference Book set itself the blood-curdling task of documenting what Dylan had done on every day of his life up till Heylin's completion-date, and he followed up this triumph with Behind the Shades, which, unlike the previous big biography, No Direction Home by ROBERT SHELTON, has the virtue of paying Dylan's later years as much attention as the earlier ones. But as Robert Strachan notes in a scrupulously even-handed account (in The Making of a Rock Biography: Authority And Critical Space), 'Heylin deliberately misrepresents No Direction Home in order to undermine Shelton's biographical authority at the same time as establishing his own.'

The early Stolen Moments had been published, like most Dylan books in the 1980s and earlier, by a small non-mainstream publisher; but after editing The Penguin Book of Rock & Roll Writing in 1992, Heylin began a long term relationship with Viking, an imprint of Penguin Books. In 1995 his listings book Bob Dylan, The Complete Recording Sessions: 1960–1994 (a hardback), was published by the mainstream but small US imprint St. Martin's Press, but in UK paperback by Penguin (in 1996, slightly amended and under the different title Bob Dylan: Behind Closed Doors). They also published the US hardback and the UK paperback of Behind the Shades, and the UK editions of the revised, updated version, Behind the Shades—Take Two (published in the US by Morrow).

Heylin's other Dylan books include the 44-page booklet Rain Unravelled Tales, the much larger Rain Unravelled Tales (The Nightingale's Code Examined): A Rumourography, 1982 and To Live Outside the Law: A Guide to Dylan Bootlegs, 1989 (all effectively self-published); Saved: The Gospel Speeches of Bob Dylan, published in India by Chelsea Hotel habitué and avant garde art publisher Raymond Foye, 1990; and Dylan's Daemon Lover: The Tangled Tale of a 450-Year-Old Pop Ballad, 1999.

Heylin's articles on Dylan are too numerous to list, but he contributed copiously to the best Dylan fanzine, The Telegraph, as well as co-founding the organisation that published it and acting as news editor in its early years. He has written for all the major Dylan fanzines and extracts from his biographies have been serialised in the popular national press. His 'Profile of HOWARD ALK' was republished in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook in 1987, as was his detailed survey of the inadequacies of Bob Dylan Lyrics 1962–1985.

Heylin has also published biographies of Sandy Denny, VAN MORRISON and, most recently, Orson Welles; in 1992 he edited The Penguin Book of Rock & Roll Writing and is the author of From the Velvets to the Voidoids: The Birth of American Punk Rock (2005) and the excellent Bootleg! The Secret History of the Other Recording Industry, aka The Great White Wonders: A History of Rock Bootlegs (1995).

[Clinton Heylin: Rain Unravelled Tales, Sale, UK: Ashes & Sand, nia; Rain Unravelled Tales (The Nightingale's Code Examined): A Rumourography, Sale: Ashes & Sand, 1982; To Live Outside the Law: A Guide to Dylan Bootlegs, Sale: Labour of Love, 1989; Stolen Moments: The Ultimate Reference Book, Romford, UK: Wanted Man, 1988; Saved: The Gospel Speeches of Bob Dylan, Madras & New York: Hanuman Books, 1990; Bob Dylan, The Complete Recording Sessions: 1960–1994, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995, and as Bob Dylan: Behind Closed Doors, London: Penguin, 1996; Behind the Shades, London & New York: Summit Books, 1991; Be- hind the Shades—Take Two, London: Viking/Penguin & New York: Morrow, 2001; Behind the Shades Revisited, London: Penguin, 2003; Dylan's Daemon Lover: The Tangled Tale of a 450-Year-Old Pop Ballad, London: Helter Skelter, 1999; Bootleg! The Secret History of the Other Recording Industry, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995.

Robert Strachan, The Making of a Rock Biography: Authority and Critical Space, MA thesis in Popular Music Studies, University of Liverpool, 1997.]

Hibbing, Minnesota Bob Dylan: 'it's where I was raised an went t school . . . my youth was spent wildly among the snowy hills an sky blue lakes, willow fields an abandoned open pit mines. contrary t rumors, I am very proud of where I'm from . . .'

Hibbing is the least populous and the most important place in Dylan's Minnesota past. Up from St. Paul, old highway 65 is snowy by November. Flat, frozen fields, Dutch-roof barns, loblolly pines and stripped silver birch trees, Lutheran churches, dilapidated fencing, pick-up trucks more frequent than cars. A timeless scenery of telegraph poles and roadside mailboxes, the aluminium-grey road stretching out flat ahead; signs for Jumbo Leeches and Flathead Worms, snowmobiles for sale, 'MEAT RAFFLE every Saturday'. A hundred miles north of St. Paul you pass through McGrath, pop. 62, with its Catholic Church, Calvary Presbyterian Church and Pliny Graveyard. Then trailer-homes and more white clapboard than before, more and more picturesque old barns, grain-elevators like cocktail-shakers. The closer you come to the Iron Range towns, the narrower and emptier the road grows, and the taller the trees, and the more the banks of snow press in from the verges. The whole hushed place turns into Winter Wonderland, and cocooned inside it, Hibbing shines and twinkles like the set for an old Perry Como Christmas Special.

It would have been in Canada but for a mistake on an historic map. Deep in snow but easy to move around in, it epitomises pleasant, old-fashioned small-town life. It's not such a small town, either. At 186 square miles, its grid of leafy, spacious streets is the state's largest by area. The people are exceptionally equable, and make you welcome. It almost makes you wonder why Bob Dylan ever left.

He lived here from the age of six. To begin with, he slept on the floor in Grandma Florence's house; later, in the front room at 2425 7th Avenue East, his boyhood home, Bob practised in his first and nameless beat group, survived his Bar Mitzvah party and stared out of the window dreaming of escape. It was a mere couple of blocks' walk to Hibbing High School.

And what a school. You'd never know it from anything Dylan's let slip, but iron ore built Hibbing a school of palatial grandeur that cost four million dollars in 1920–23, with a sanitised medieval castle exterior in brick and Indiana limestone, hand-moulded ceilings, a 75-foot-long oil painting in the library, marble steps with solid brass handrails and, in the 1,825-seater auditorium, six Belgian crystal chandeliers now worth a quarter of a million each and a stage that can hold the Minnesota Symphony Orchestra.

In 1958, with his second group, the Golden Chords, Dylan stood hammering on Hibbing High School's 1922 Steinway Grand piano (breaking a pedal in the process) and shouting out rock'n'roll songs at the annual student concert . . . and got laughed at, up there on stage in an auditorium so lavish and ornate, and with such acoustic excellence, that it almost justifies STEPHEN SCOBIE's conceit that 'Every stage Bob Dylan has played on for the past thirty years has been, after Hibbing High School Auditorium, an anticlimax.' (See also next entry.)

Bob Dylan: 'A train line cuts the ground / showin' where the fathers an' mothers / of me an' my friends had picked / up an' moved from / north Hibbing / t'south Hibbing. / old north Hibbing . . . deserted / already dead / with its old stone courthouse / decayin' in the wind . . .'

Bobby often explored North Hibbing's ghost-town, where everyone lived before they moved them two miles south to dig out the ore they were sitting on. The whole place is just snow-covered ground, close to the edge of the vast, vast hole far down below, filled like a lake of iron-brown water. This is the world's largest open pit mine: 'the biggest hole dug by man' on the planet, as Hibbing loves to boast.

'Hibbing's got schools, churches, grocery stores an' a jail . . . high school football games and a movie house . . . corner bars with polka bands. . . . Hibbing's a good ol' town.'

Dylan's mixed feelings about Hibbing are expressed perfectly in that one last line from 'My Life in a Stolen Moment', and he and it have had a difficult relationship ever since he left. In fact Minnesota altogether has a problem with Dylan. They resent his having left: still resent his rudeness of 40 years ago. Minnesotans hear tell he was difficult despite being shown much tolerance; they feel he bit the hand that nurtured him and/or denied his roots. Invoking the stroppy teenager, they're determinedly unimpressed by the great artist.

In consequence, to the soul's delight and the professional eye's puzzlement, there is no exploitation of Dylan's incandescent name by the Heritage Industry. Look at how poor Liverpool exploits Beatledom: it's one of the city's biggest revenue sources. Yet until the last two or three years, Dylan remained conspicuously absent from Minnesota tourism bumph. Now there is an annual series of low-key events called 'Dylan Days', and the street he lived on has been renamed Dylan Drive (though East 7th Avenue still remains the official postal address).

Hibbing's 1990s coffee-table puffery 'On the Move Since 1893' managed only this: 'Some contemporary well-known natives include Rudy Perpich; Kevin McHale; Jeno Paulucci, founder of Jeno's Pizza; Bob Dylan, folk musician, songwriter; Roger Maris and Vincent Bugliosi, Charles Manson Trial prosecutor'. Thirty-five miles away, the Judy Garland Museum welcomes you to the Garland Birthplace Historic Home, Grand Rapids ('It's a swell state, Minnesota. . . . We lived in a white house with a garden. It's a beautiful, beautiful town', quoth Judy on the brochure in the Minnesota tourism press-pack); in Duluth, Dylan's birthplace home is disregarded; in Hibbing, the many pilgrims who come to the 7th Avenue house must simply decide whether to ring the bell and disturb the present owner or not.

When the Zimmerman house went on sale in 1989, the realtor had enquiries from all over the Dylan-fan world, and thought he'd make his fortune. This came to nothing, and Greg French paid $45,000 for the flat-roofed, two-storey 1940s property in Mediterranean Moderne style, not because it was Dylan's but because it was the best bargain in the neighbourhood at the time.

Once, a state tourism 'PR specialist' called, to ask Greg if he'd consider doing B&B. That was their big idea for the boyhood home of one of the 20th century's greatest artists. Meanwhile downtown there's only the bar-cafe called Zimmy's to cater to the swell of Dylan-visitors, a swell that cannot but increase.

This extraordinary non-exploitation might seem bizarrely nose-and-face syndrome: a collective sulking at least as immature as the Dylan who said 'You're boring, I'm off' four decades ago. Yet the communal hurt is quite misplaced. Those who actually knew him in the past—ex-classmates like Larry Furlong and Margaret Toivola—feel neither spurned nor uncomprehending of Dylan's quantum-leap away. More importantly, Dylan has written beautifully in poetry and song about these places and their wintry magic. In interviews too, he has often re-affirmed his pride in his formative Iron Range, North Country roots:

> 'I'm that color. I speak that way. . . . My brains and feelings have come from there. . . . The earth there is unusual, filled with ore. . . . There's a magnetic attraction there: maybe thousands of years ago some planet bumped into the land there. There is a great spiritual quality throughout the mid-West. Very subtle, very strong, and that is where I grew up'.

It seems a shame, a relapse into immaturity, that in the SCORSESE film No Direction Home, as emphasised by the title, Dylan appears to have returned to being as dismissive of the place as he was when he first got up and left—and certainly less balanced about its virtues than when he wrote those early poems quoted above. This relapse seems especially regrettable since, at least in one way, the gulf between his hometown's constraints and Dylan's restlessness was always illusory. For Hibbing was also the birthplace of Greyhound Buses, and the road from there to Duluth, where Dylan was born, was Greyhound's earliest route. It was from way up here that those routes spread out and beckoned. The far-off was part of the business of Hibbing.

[Dylan quoted from: 'A Message from Bob Dylan' (sent to the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee after his badly received Tom Paine Award Bill of Rights dinner speech of 13 Dec 1963); '11 Outlined Epitaphs'; 'My Life in a Stolen Moment'; 'The Playboy Interview: Bob Dylan—a candid conversation with the iconoclastic idol of the folk-rock set', Playboy, Chicago, Feb 1966.

By far the best and most detailed study of Dylan's Hibbing is Dave Engel, Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues: Dylan in Minnesota, Rudolph, WI: River City Memoirs—Mesabi, 1997. Also good are Stephen Scobie's Alias Bob Dylan, Calgary, Alberta, Canada: Red Deer College Press, 1991 & Alias Bob Dylan Revisited, Calgary: Red Deer College Press, 2003. For historical interest, see also Toby Thompson's Positively Main Street: An Unorthodox View of Bob Dylan, New York: Coward McCann & Geohegan Inc., 1971 (& London: New English Library, 1972).]

Hibbing rock'n'rollers Apart from John Bucklen and RIC KANGAS, Bob Zimmerman the aspiring Hibbing rock'n'roll star played with a number of other duck-tailed enthusiasts in various configurations—though perhaps his first outfit was formed with his St. Paul friends LARRY KEGAN and HOWARD RUTMAN from the summer camp he used to go to. They called themselves the Jokers, and though they aspired to rock'n'roll, they were basically just singing round the piano wherever they could find one. Rutman says their mothers made them sleeveless cardigans in red and grey, with JOKERS stitched across the fronts, and that they went on a Twin Cities Channel 9 TV talent show. Bob was only 14; it was early 1956. They played together off and on till spring 1958, but by then, up in Hibbing, Bob had more serious groups to encourage and boss about.

His first proto-rock'n'roll Hibbing ensemble never got as far as agreeing on a name (though HOWARD SOUNES says they were called the Shadow Blasters); they comprised Bob (on piano) plus Bill Marinac, Larry Fabbro and Charles (inevitably Chuck) Nara. DAVE ENGEL reports: 'Bob has known Bill Marinac, "always good for a laugh", since fifth grade.' He 'has learned string bass in a tamburitza band', and it is Bill who 'gets Bob together with Larry Fabbro, a trumpeter who is picking up guitar, and Chuck Nara, a clarinettist giving drums a try.' This is the group that steps out at the first of Dylan's school concert appearances—Bill on bass, Chuck on drums, Larry on guitar and Bob on the school's almighty 1922 Steinway Grand—and pounds out LITTLE RICHARD songs to a mixed response; it is April 5, 1957. In Larry Fabbro's yearbook, ECHO HELSTROM writes '. . . I really liked the way you played guitar . . .'

Then bad-boy school friend LeRoy Hoikkala (the only one still living in Hibbing), who played drums a little, got together with Monte Edwardson, who was 'a natural guitar player', and did some practising, and after a while Bob pushed in and said 'Hey, I'm playing piano, mouth-organ, harmonica and guitar; maybe we could get together'—and so they did, practising in the Zimmerman garage—and sometimes in the house because that's where the piano was—and this small unit became the Golden Chords.

This is the group Dylan played his second school concert with, on the afternoon of February 6, 1958, this time with everyone amplified, and extra mikes for his piano and vocals—and though they were on the bill, as a 'local rock'n'roll instrumental group', they were so loud and so indecorous—and Bob so vehement that in the middle of the second number he broke one of the Steinway's pedals—that Principal Pederson got Bob's English teacher, the splendidly named Boniface J. Rolfzen, to cut the power to the house mikes. This is the event that has passed into legend.

Undeterred, on Saturday March 1, 1958, they played and got paid for a one-off performance at the intermission of a Rock & Roll Hop for Teen-Agers at the National Guard Armory, billed as 'Hibbing's Own Golden Chords Featuring Monte Edwardson, Leroy Hoikkala, Bobby Zimmerman', and then played at the Winter Carnival Talent Contest, getting through to the final in the 'piano and song' category before losing to a tap dancer. They even got onto the Chmielewski Brothers' 'Polka Hour' on TV in Duluth. It didn't work out well—Bob was, well, too Bob—and the group began to fall apart.

The other Golden Chords wanted more work—wanted both to oblige the teenage hop audiences and 'to get somewhere'. They decided they'd be better off without the uncompromising Bobby Z., and then came an approach they couldn't resist. As Dave Engel writes, after the talent contest two junior college students, Jim Propotnick and Ron Taddei 'approach[ed] LeRoy and Monte. They recognize[d] in Monte Hibbing's best young guitarist, a versatile musician. . . . You can replace a singer easier than a good guitar player.' The four of them formed the Rockets, and earned terrific reviews in the local press.

Dylan turned to cousin Bill Morris, a drummer in Duluth, who brought along two others he'd been playing jazz with, Marsh Shamblott (piano) and Dennis Nylen (bass)—the Satin Tones, and they came up to Hibbing on weekends to practise at the Zimmerman house. Nothing came of it. Again, Bob was obdurate and wayward; he was 'just too wild'.

[Main sources: Dave Engel, Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues: Dylan in Minnesota, Rudolph, WI: River City Memoirs—Mesabi, 1997; interview with LeRoy Hoikkala, On the Tracks no.18, spring 2000; Howard Rutman testimony in Howard Sounes, Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, New York: Grove Press, 2001, manuscript p.44; 'The Shadow Blasters' p.45; 'The Satin Tones', p.55.]

'Highlands' [1997] Is the narrator of 'Highlands', the long final song on Dylan's 1997 album Time Out of Mind, a persona? GREIL MARCUS heard it that way, as speaking for a character living in some cruddy apartment building who doesn't get out much ('an older man who lives in one of Ed Kienholz's awful furnished rooms in the rotting downtown of some fading city—Cincinnati, Hollywood, the timeless, all-American Nowheresville you see in David Lynch's Blue Velvet—getting up and going for a walk, maybe for the first time in weeks. . . . The song is someone else's dream, but as Dylan sings it, you are dreaming it.') Or is 'Highlands', as for instance David Bowman hears it, the song in which we come closer than we've ever come before to walking around the world inside Bob Dylan's head: in which we hear Dylan 'finally share with us what it's like for Bob Dylan to be Bob Dylan . . .'? Is it persona or raw Bob Dylan? Even if you're with Bowman on this, that's not to say that 'raw' means artless. On the contrary, 'Highlands' is a most artfully wrought achievement and of a very high order.

Some say that 16½ minutes long is too long: more reasonable to say it's too short. The track never ends without sounding unfairly foreshortened, like an idyll snatched away. Bob Dylan has always been a talking blues maestro, to achieve which requires being in infinitely intelligent control of timing and phrasing; and he displays 99.9 per cent of that control on this tour de force (there are two tiny, minor fluffs, neither of which matters): and displays it with the crowning touch of the genuine maestro, that of making it sound easy, as he steers us through its twenty stanzas, alternating without a microsecond's hesitation between the 'otherly', aspirational 'My heart's in the highlands' chorus sections, with their magnificent recourse to formal poetic strengths, and the 'here and now' sections that seem—if they do—to walk you round Dylan's daily world as seen from inside his head, and which offer the perfect illusion of spontaneous composition.

The all-encompassing sweep of 'Highlands' is constructed with genius, fusing into one three-dimensional portrait the high and black comedy, the Dylanesque sarcasms and off-the-wall observations—all of which are plentiful, authentic and delivered as faultlessly as anything in his back-catalogue—and, set against all these, the recurrent expressions of yearning for a better version of himself and of the world, for a renewed sense of moral cleanliness as well as an unsullied terrain of natural grandeur, while all but confessing that what his eyes are raised to is never-neverland.

All this is performed with an unshakeable, wise, good-humoured authority that trusts the form even as it achieves a large expansion of its possibilities, that acts in good faith and addresses itself to an intelligent audience, creditably belying its writer-composer's claims to have lost his conscience and sense of humanity. In doing this, 'Highlands' acts as the best possible conclusion to the album, achieving, just as the final lines of the song do, a farewell bow of dignified, painfully gained, limited optimism, dragged back from the turbulent labyrinths of despair and decay.

'Highlands' begins by, well, setting the scene—the scene the singer envisages, yearns for, dreams of, aspires to. It does so exhilaratingly: 'Well my heart's in the Highlands, gentle and fair / Honeysuckle blooming in the wildwood air / Bluebells blazing where the Aberdeen waters flow / Well my heart's in the Highlands / I'm gonna go there when I feel good enough to go.'

One of the immediately striking things is how much better written it is than the Robert Burns poem it founds itself upon. ANDREW MUIR writes interestingly (in a 1997 fanzine piece, 'The Difference Between a Real Blonde on Blonde and a Fake') about the significance of 'My Heart's in the Highlands' (1790) for Burns' reputation, granted its 'triviality' yet its immense popularity, and about Burns having based his poem's beginning and end on 'a circulating folk source with a couple of stock traditional images thrown in'. Whatever the reasons, the Burns poem opens (and closes) with nothing better than 'My heart's in the Highlands, my heart is not here; / My heart's in the Highlands a-chasing the deer; / Chasing the wild deer and following the roe; / My heart's in the Highlands, wherever I go.' Its two middle verses offer nothing beyond a listing: 'Farewell to the' this 'and farewell to the' that—and the only imaginative or personal touch in the whole poem is the phrase 'wild-hanging' in 'Farewell to the forest and wild-hanging woods'.

Dylan takes the framework of Burns' poem (a frame that Andrew Muir argues is taken in turn from Scottish folk song). He also effects a reversal of Burns' implicit theme, which is of yearning to return to a real place, inhabited in the edenic past and in which he has left his heart—a heart formed by these known, loved, roamed-over, geographically specific as well as sentimentalised Scottish Highlands. Dylan instead yearns for are-they-aren't-they-Scottish? Highlands—his pseudo-geographic hints are contradictory—to which he makes no claim ever to have been, and which represent a dream-future in time and space, and not an idealised past.

The main thing Dylan does, though, is write of it imaginatively: that is, so that we see the idealised fantasy-place that calls to the contemporary, alienated, rootless citizen of today's urban/suburban USA, whose grasp of plant-life detail is shaky but whose ardour is real. Bluebells don't 'blaze'—especially in Scotland, where what are called bluebells are what the English call harebells: delicate meadow flowers, rather than the form of wild hyacinth that masses in the woods. But 'bluebells blazing' is not only a fine alliterative touch: 'blazing' sets the tone of how these Highlands are in the singer's mind. After the initial 'gentle and fair' the whole scene blazes with the singer's rapture (and perhaps with the restorative cleanliness that is next to Godliness). The energising 'Aberdeen waters' must flow sparklingly clean and bracingly cold. Lest this is getting too hiking-bootedly wholesome, the heady scent of honeysuckle blooms in the air.

Here again, botanical realism is not all it might be. As the British sculptor Andrew Darke writes: 'In selecting [English] bluebells and honeysuckle he has two of the most transporting scents that might come to you on a woodland walk. They are so powerful that is it like total immersion—for a first, brief moment (and the brevity is part of the power) they overwhelm and immobilise the mind and spread a balm of pure pleasure. But . . . in actuality it is unlikely that one could experience both on the same day . . . honeysuckle is later in the season.' Similarly, the fourth stanza's gaze is on the buckeye trees, but 'the buckeye—American for the horse chestnut—is not likely to be seen in the Scottish Highlands.'

Dylan's honeysuckle blooms inside that quintessential place of childhood mystery and exciting danger, the 'wildwood'. Impossible to have read Bruno Bettelheim on fairytales (The Uses of Enchantment, 1976) and not take the wildwood too as the emblem of inner confusion, lostness and unresolved desires. One way and another, it is not so much that the bluebells are blazing but that the singer's yearning blazes for the redemptive power of these imagined Highlands.

In accord with the aim of this opening stanza, the point about its last line—'I'm gonna go there when I feel good enough to go'—is not that it stumbles into unintended bathos, as the reader of the isolated stanza (A.S. BYATT, perhaps) might assume, but that its descent into this near-comic ungainliness, into this prosaic conversational mode both captures sympathetically the narrative tone of irresolution that makes clear how vague is his will actually to go to these Highlands, and guides us down into the unrarified air of the narrator's daily round, now introduced in the second stanza. Additionally, there is the neatly comic pun (a pun with a purpose, as good puns must have) that Dylan slips in with that 'when I feel good enough'. Behind the main meaning—'when I feel cheerier, or more energetically healthy'—loiters the alternative, that of 'when I feel I'm a good enough person to deserve to go', furthering our sense of the spiritual, redemptive nature of these yearned-for Highlands.

He starts with the problematic lines 'Windows were shakin' all night in my dreams / Everything was exactly the way that it seems / Woke up this mornin' and I looked at the same old page.' Are the windows shaking while he dreams, the noise intruding upon the dreaming, or are they shaking only in the dreams? Does everything seem the same in the dreams as in waking life (a fine touch) or does he, as the third line implies, wake more conventionally from twisted dreams to find tired normality restored? This latter is then expanded upon with the wrong kind of tiredness—not evoked by creative writing but enacted only by the tired writing of 'Same old rat-race, life in the same old cage'—and we move on to the second of the initial this-is-my-awful-life verses, which almost duplicates, but actually darkens, the 'Not Dark Yet' line about not looking for anything in anyone's eyes—'I don't want nothin' from anyone—ain't that much to take'—and then offers the precarious 'Wouldn't know the difference between a real blonde and a fake.'

This is a distinctly unpromising start to the grim story of the speaker's shrivelled husk of a life, with nothing to suggest the riches that are to come, and to prove wholly capable of counterbalancing the Highlands choruses. If it's hard to feel that some of this lazy sourness is not a fake, the feeling is soon dispelled. The hopeless, doomed plea 'I wish someone'd come and push back the clock for me' is said with a rueful quietness that is affecting, and then comes the second chorus, in which the Highlands are given one of their two most explicit heavenly touches, on the line 'That's where I'll be when I get called home' (a nice use of an old-fashioned gospel-song stock phrase—as indeed he also manages for his second such Christian allusion, which is to 'Big white clouds like chariots that swing down low').

Then we begin to enjoy the surprises and sly wit the song delivers, starting with the somehow innately comic prospect conjured by Bob Dylan singing 'I'm listening to NEIL YOUNG'. Part of the surprise here is a sort of stepping through the glass that normally divides the work from the person, or a breaking of some Dylan-imposed convention about what gets specified and what doesn't.

The last bad moment in the song's construction—and it only happens to British Empire ears—comes at the start of the next verse, when we get a disastrous pause after 'Insanity is smashing' and before 'up against my soul'. It's a poor line anyway, but only English jolly-hockey-stickism makes its first half comically incompetent. It gives way to the intentional sardonic comedy of the nicely put 'You could say I was on anything [pause] but a roll', with its funny, almost slapstick puns on drugs and bread rolls, and then the audacious lines about being so bereft of a conscience that all he can imagine he'd do with one if he had it would be to 'take it to the pawn shop'.

At that point the third Highlands chorus comes in, winging us with soothing, balm-giving grace from this gritty, dirty Los Angeles of the soul to the cleansing break of dawn and the deeply inviting 'beautiful lake of the black swan': a transformation that enacts exactly the sense of catharsis that we recognise from city-clogged experience as one of the rescuing powers of Wordsworthian nature and benign landscape.

So far the established pattern of the song has been to have a Highlands chorus, two verses, chorus, two verses, chorus. Now comes an extraordinary shift of pattern, which only reveals itself in retrospect. We now get seven verses, all spinning the vivid, ridiculous yarn of an encounter between him and a waitress in a Boston restaurant. This is so off-the-wall, so riveting, so sublimely told, so funny and at the same time so inspired an evocation of how it might feel to be the 'artist' being told peremptorily that you must come up with some 'art'; as Richard Harrington put it in a review of the album, their encounter is 'a caustic metaphor for the historically high expectations of critics.'

The tactical manoeuvring in their odd, shifting relationship is delineated step by conversational step, as they jockey for advantage in an encounter that is partly a flirtation, partly a tale about the narrator's myriad uncertainties having to gird themselves to repel the outsider's intrusions, and partly, as its setting of the forlornly empty restaurant on a public holiday so brilliantly evokes, a momentary, unhopeful effort by both people to wrest a little diversionary human contact while marooned by the emptiness of their lives.

It would be unpalatable to go through it phrase by phrase applying the butterfly-pins of critical exegesis, but its many, many highlights include his saying that she studies him closely as he sits down but immediately making clear that it's been mutual with the observation 'She got a pretty face and long white shiny legs'—those legs so comically described, as if she's either a horse or from another planet; and his choice of 'hardboiled eggs' as her choice of what he probably wants to eat—with its hint of a put-down, perhaps even an ageist put-down, and the silly follow-up of there not being any: or rather, of her claiming that there aren't any. Another hint of her contempt is subtly achieved too in the battle over whether he must draw her on the napkin, when she hands it to him and says 'You can do it on that', as if he's asked, and as if what he's asked is where he can relieve himself. Then there's the exquisitely made internal rhyme of 'napkin' and 'back an'' in 'Well she takes the napkin, and throws it back an' / Says "That don't look a thing like me".'

There's also the way that he brings in the language of the traditional white ballad to use as part of the elaborate push and pull of rudeness and politeness between them, when he contradicts her brusque dissatisfaction with his 'Oh kind miss'. This would be nothing special as mere surface sarcasm: what makes it delightful is that its smiling aside invites a comparison between their crude contemporary skirmishes and the elaborate courtship rituals of old.

There are also the quite brilliant detonations set off on his hilarious self-put-down of a retort to her challenge 'You don't read women authors do you?' (itself a refreshing, unpredictable capturing of the waitress' contemporary sensibility, 'made' in less than 'a few lines') and he says, like a reluctant schoolboy whose teacher has questioned his homework excuse: 'Read Erica Jong', pronouncing this 'Jong' instead of 'Yong' and still making for a long-suspended, joyously ludicrous half-rhyme with the other real name he threw into the song hours ago, 'Neil Young'. The whole gift of Bob Dylan giving us a cameo of feminist debate, and wholly free of any unpleasant reactionary sneering, is a delightful surprise, totally outside the range of subject matter we expect from him. There's also the uncanny fact that Erica Jong's terrible novel Any Woman's Blues (1990), actually includes the line 'he had scribbled a rough sketch on a napkin . . . Not my style at all.'

Then there's the slyly resourceful way that one of the many brushes with blues consciousness brought to this album occurs here, as he deploys, without the least elbow-nudging, one of the standard blues-song double-entendres, that of the pencil as the penis, with or without lead in it—which he takes into marvellous, surreal realms as the sparring moves from '. . . but I don't know where my pencil is at' (which also resonates with his hard-boiled-egg agedness) to 'She pulls one out from behind her ear.' A conjuring-trick indeed. (Of course 'lead in his pencil' belongs as much to English music-hall as to the blues world, but Time Out of Mind owes little to English music-hall and plenty to the blues, in which the image is used, for instance, by Bo Carter in his 1931 release 'My Pencil Won't Write No More'.)

Andrew Darke comments that the entire exchange 'is so silly and unlikely that it has a strong ring of truth about it.' The song takes us through it word for word, and we're so entranced by its clever and very contemporary, bleak dance of courtship—one with real adversarial edge—and so transfixed by what strongly suggests itself as this unprecedented tour of the world of yer actual Bob Dylan, that the time goes by and the story unfolds and we quite forget the existence of the other side of the song, and are taken by surprise when, after this six-minute spellbinding passage we're reintroduced to 'Well my heart's in the Highlands . . .' and we find ourselves transported once again, this time '. . . with the horses and hounds.'

As ever, the contrast of worlds is immense, wrought on this chorus specifically by the pre-20th century atmosphere, perhaps the medieval British atmosphere of twanging arrows and snapping bows and the 'sport of kings': one more fanciful version of the Highlands, to which is added a new geographical laxity, as he sings of being 'Way up in the border country'. The border country is not 'way up' but 'way down', below even the central lowlands, and thus as far from the Highlands as you can get without crossing the border and leaving Scotland altogether. (Dylan never claims that he is singing of Scotland. There are many places called the Highlands, from Kentucky to Kenya, and there are Aberdeens in Mississippi, Idaho and Washington.)

With a relapse into the cornered gloom of 'My heart's in the Highlands, can't see any other way to go' we're back to the remorseless sameness of daily life, except that he feels '. . . further away than ever before', an expression of disconnectedness echoed later still in 'I got new eyes: everything looks far away.' Before that, however, there is the surprising common-sense candour of 'Some things in life it just gets too late to learn', followed at once by one of those brief, affecting passages that it is impossible not to take autobiographically: 'Well I'm lost somewhere—I must have made a few bad turns'.

But the spiky black humour of 'Highlands' is not over. Lost, he sees, in a splendidly Dylanesque formulation, '. . . people in the park, forgettin' their troubles and woes / They're drinkin' and dancin', wearin' bright-colored clothes.' This is one of the great observations of this or any other Dylan album—the wonderful, strong-grain-of-truthful perception that our culture's garish predilection for brightly coloured clothes is just one long, pathetic attempt to escape our troubles. Playing further on this idiot vanity, as we trudge across the dreary street with him '. . . to get away from a mangy dog' he envisages saying to himself ('in a monologue': another clever small joke) the supremely withering 'I think what I need might be a full-length leather coat.' In a song that cascades with superlative vocal delivery, this is a high point of encapsulated contempt for the culture's emptiness. Adding a similarly clipped articulation of our common powerlessness, he gives comparable but sadder treatment to 'Somebody just asked me if I'm registered to vote.'

Four lines on and we swap it all, for the last time, for the metaphysical Highlands: 'Well, my heart's in the Highlands at the break of day / Over the hills and far away / There's a way to get there and I'll figure it out somehow / Well I'm already there in my mind and that's good enough for now.'

Dylan takes his bow of dignified yearning with one of the loveliest touches he has ever brought to anything. Throwing off the despairing 'further away than ever before', the deteriorated, stricken 'far away' of his 'new eyes' in the here and now, he regains the positive, glowing wonderment of that lovely line from English nursery rhyme and folksong, 'Over the hills and far away', singing this 'far away' incomparably beautifully: finding an infinitely delicate, fleeting tone that manages a rhapsodic regret, a momentary lyrical sigh of grace and adieu. It is the most beautifully understated thing.

Confessing to the never-neverland pull of these Highlands, it signals sad resignation that in truth he will never get there; but the warmth and tragic nobility that informs this sadness comes from its also being his loving farewell to the real, human world that once was ardently lovable and is now glimpsed again for a moment before receding, equally unreachable. To carry this admirable concentration of meaning so lightly and elegantly, he discards, briefly, the simple, relentless musical straight line that is so appropriate and right for the great unstoppable machine of the rest of the story, and with a fine enactment of ease gives this 'far away' a little rising and falling filigree of melody that floats off just a little way above the rest, like the curve of one of these faraway hills.

This nursery rhyme line is undeniably evocative by itself—you have only to use it without facetious knowingness to let its affectiveness come through. The British writer G.K. Chesterton described it as one of the most beautiful lines in all English poetry, and Peter and Iona Opie add, in their pioneering Oxford Dictionary of Nursery Rhymes, that 'as if in confirmation, Gay, Swift, Burns, Tennyson [and] Stevenson . . . thought well enough of the line to make it their own.' Aptly, for Dylan's purposes, its earliest printed use (1670, though possibly alluded to in 1549) comes from Scotland.

Its spell, its conjuring of a simple, peaceable, unattainable eden—its self-reflexive ability to transport us—comes partly from its having been, as the Opies put it, among the lines that form the 'first poetic memory' of childhood, so that that lost edenic rapture throws its softening golden light upon the one evoked by the line itself. Bob Dylan's use of it, therefore, goes to the heart of his song: it distils the unfailing yearning for what is lost, and catches the fleeting redemptive moment, a moment of contact with his better self, the self of loving, open hopefulness, which allows him—perhaps propels him—to end the song, and thus the album, on a note of good faith, albeit limited and fragile.

'Highlands' epitomises the best of Time Out of Mind: it deals with most of the album's prominent themes: endless, almost compulsive walking; desolation; lack of a sense of contact with other people; a suffocating sense of the hollowness of everything, and therefore the purposelessness of life; a looking forward to death, alternating with a wish that time was not running out; the conviction that long ago some crucial wrong turning was taken in life: one that meant the loss of true love; the conviction that there is little to say and ever less point to saying it; the exhaustion of feeling, mingled with a passionate sorrow for all this loss. It's not dark yet, but it's getting there. Yet 'Highlands' manages to draw the eye upwards to where the sky is still bright.

[Bob Dylan: 'Highlands', Miami, 13–28 Jan 1997. Greil Marcus: Interview magazine, Jul 1997; David Bowman, reviewing Time Out of Mind in Salon online magazine, US, 19 Sep 1997 (Bowman's novels include Bunny Modern, 1998). Andrew Muir: 'The Difference Between a Real Blonde on Blonde and a Fake', Dignity no.12, Welwyn Garden City, UK, Sep–Oct 1997. Robert Burns (1759–96), 'My Heart's in the Highlands', 1790, quoted from Muir, ibid. Andrew Darke, Gloucestershire, UK, 11 Apr 1999, letter to this writer; thanks to Sarah Beattie for bluebell information. Richard Harrington, 'This Dylan's No Wallflower', Washington Post, undated but c.Oct 1997. Erica Jong, Any Woman's Blues: A Novel of Obsession, New York: Harper & Row, 1990; napkin quote e-mailed to this writer by Andrew Muir, Jun 1999. Bo Carter: 'My Pencil Won't Write No More', NY, 4 Jun 1931. Peter & Iona Opie, The Oxford Dictionary of Nursery Rhymes, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1945, revised edn., 1951, p.2.]

Highway 61 Highway 61 Revisited meant exactly that: it was revolutionary and new, but it was also, had we heeded it, a clear signal that Dylan had revisited the world of the blues. (Other comparable signposts are discussed in blues, external signals of Dylan's interest in.)

Many bluesmen had been there before him, all recording versions of a blues called 'Highway 61'—a blues in which, ironically, one of the things that varies, puzzlingly and fascinatingly, is the described route of the highway itself! It is, though, above all, a blues that exemplifies the shared, fluid, communal nature of blues composition.

Roosevelt Sykes' unusually loose 'Highway 61 Blues' was recorded in 1932. The Sparks Brothers cut '61 Highway' the following year, in which Jack Kelly & His South Memphis Jug Band also cut 'Highway No. 61 Blues' and 'Highway No. 61 Blues No. 2', and, two days later, with violinist member Will Batts taking the vocal, another 'Highway No. 61 Blues'. MEMPHIS MINNIE's Joe McCoy (though he never recorded under this, his own name) cut 'Highway 61' in 1935. The pre-war blues singer and pianist Jesse James' only session (in 1936) yielded four tracks, including the unissued 'Highway 61'. Then Charlie Pickett cut his brilliant 'Down the Highway'—a geographically inaccurate 'Highway 61 Blues' by another name—in 1937. And Sampson Pittman, a levee-camp worker and 'excellent guitarist' field-recorded by ALAN LOMAX for the Library of Congress, cut 'Highway 61 Blues' in 1938.

It's odd that both Will Batts and Charlie Pickett sing that Highway 61 runs from Atlanta, Georgia, to New Orleans, because it doesn't go anywhere near Georgia and runs several times as far as such a journey would be. Perhaps Batts never did get very far along it, and perhaps Pickett just copied Batts' stanza.

At any rate this is also a song that carries on drawing people in the post-war period too, and does so both sides of, and heedless of, Dylan's own 1965 recordings. Speckled Red (Rufus Perryman) cut a spirited post-war 'Highway 61 Blues' (with New York City at one end: which is especially surprising since he was a pianist who had hoboed, in Paul Oliver's phrase, 'from the Gulf to the Great Lakes'). Furry Lewis, performing the song in his twilight years, has the route running from Atlanta, Georgia. Fred McDowell cut '61 Highway Blues' in 1959 and Memphis Willie B cut 'Highway 61' in 1961, the same year that Smokey Babe cut 'I Went Down 61 Highway'.

David Honeyboy Edwards cut 'Highway 61' in 1964, the same year that Fred McDowell returned to '61 Highway' in a version with an especially interesting lyric. It incorporates a stanza neatly fusing the highway with part of CHARLEY PATTON's 'Pony Blues'—'I'm gonna buy me a pony can pace, foxtrot and run / Lord when you see me comin' pretty mama I'll be on Highway 61'—and includes a verse that offers a perfect summary of Bob Dylan's mythic position in all this: 'I started school one Monday morning, I throwed my books away / I wrote a note to my teacher: "I'm gonna try 61 today!"'.

Nathan Beauregard (born at Ashland, Mississippi, in about 1869; died in Memphis in 1970) performed it, and splendidly, at the age of 99 at the 1968 Country Blues Festival in Memphis. His version of the 'longest highway I ever knowed' stanza has it running 'from New York City to the Gulf of Mexico.' (These late-60s Memphis Blues Festivals are written about with much passion and splendid rhetoric by Stanley Booth in 'Even the Birds Were Blue', in The Rolling Stone Rock'n'Roll Reader, 1974: 'a moving, depressing account of black bluesmen suffering the good intentions of their white admirers', as the book's blurb has it.)

James 'Son' Thomas was recorded singing 'Highway 61 Blues' on film in 1974. Sunnyland Slim cut a geographically correct version of the song (his expansive piano-work beautifully recorded) in 1983. Of especial interest as well as luminosity is Charlie Pickett's 'Down the Highway'. It is brilliant for its torrential guitar-work, determinedly individual vocal delivery and its utterly successful, restless fusion of the two. This is a small masterpiece, from a man who made only four sides of his own in his life, this being the last of them, spread over two days in August 1937 (though as a musician he also enhanced sessions by SLEEPY JOHN ESTES). Dylan uses this title for a Freewheelin' song, a song that seems aware of Pickett's, but takes it no further than that, except that both use as an ingredient the format 'this highway runs from A to Z'. Charlie Pickett's runs 'from Atlanta in Georgie down to the Gulf of Mexico'; Dylan's has him 'a-walkin' down your highway. . . . From the Golden Gate Bridge / All the way to the Statue of Liberty'. What's interesting too about this early Dylan blues is that his awkwardness within the form is something he turns to advantage: he uses it, giving the song white layers, city-ironic layers, as well as black. In fact the route he describes is a white one, but only because he's heading west-east in this instance. Dylan is describing here the route of the Lincoln Highway, the USA's first transcontinental highway, which opened in 1923 running between New York and San Francisco. (Later in the 1920s names were abandoned in favour of numbers. North-south highways were given odd numbers and east-west highways evens.)

Heading east-west is often thought of as primarily a white route too—blues writer Bill Ferris, for instance, notes that Route 66 was the white escape route, while Highway 61, south-north, was the black escape route; and certainly Route 66 was the migration path for the displaced Okies of the dustbowl 1930s, as personified by the Joads, who take this highway in Steinbeck's The Grapes of Wrath: 'Route 66 is the path of a people in flight . . .'—yet in 'Bright Lights, Big City: Urban Blues', Mark A. Humphrey writes that 'Industry was drawing blacks to the West Coast from the same Depression-ravaged states . . . that gave California its Okies. There were approximately seventy-five thousand black Los Angelenos in 1940. . . . By 1950 there were more than two hundred thousand . . .' (In 1985, as Bill Bryson notes in his fine book Made in America, 'the federal highway department removed all the Route 66 shield signs along its 2,200 miles. . . . Overnight this once great highway became a series of back highways and anonymous frontage roads.')

There is no mistaking, however, the significant route in Dylan's musical life. Jack Kelly's 'Highway No. 61 Blues No. 2' includes the affecting 'I am in dear love with 61, I say it from my heart'; ARTHUR CRUDUP's 1941 story of 'Death Valley Blues' also takes place out on Highway 61, while for Roosevelt Sykes '. . . it breaks my heart, to sing about Highway 61 / I felt so blue when I was out on that lonely highway.' But from among the many weary celebrations of this blues-soaked road two lines sum up its twin significance for Dylan. On the one hand 'That 61 Highway,' as Will Batts, among others, puts it, is the 'longest road I ever knowed'; yet as Charlie Pickett sings, 'Now the 61 Highway, you know an' it runs right by my door'. Bob Dylan's literal journey was, with a couple of diversions, east in stages to Greenwich Village. His existential journey was down Highway 61. He saw it run right past his door in Duluth, Minnesota: and the further he moved along it, the deeper he went into the world of the blues.

As it runs past Duluth, it is on its way from right up at the Canadian border, and it goes on down to St. Paul, through Red Wing along the Minnesota side of the Mississippi River, with Wisconsin on the other side. It drops down into Iowa, then into Missouri near Keokuk. Keeping south, always parallel to the Mississippi, Highway 61 passes St. Louis and then, skirting the corner at which the south-eastern tip of Missouri meets corners of Kentucky and Tennessee, it plunges down into the north-east tip of Arkansas, flowing on south till it meets that mythic city in the south-western toecap of Tennessee—Memphis, to reach which it finally has to cross the Mississippi River.

In Memphis it almost meets its sister-highway, Highway 51, which meets Beale Street and on which Graceland stands at no. 3764 in South Memphis. From there, while 51 runs due south, 61 first veers south-south-west, running down through the vast Mississippi Delta and eventually reaching Vicksburg, the first real town in 200 miles. Still running alongside the river, it crosses the state line into Louisiana south of Natchez, skirting round to the east of Baton Rouge and running on, past Lake Pontchatrain, into New Orleans and the Gulf of Mexico.

The young Bob Dylan's stretch of Highway 61, from Duluth down to St. Paul, is now a road so displaced by Interstate 35 that for most of its Minnesota stretch it's merely a county road today. It's a delight to drive down, therefore: it runs through real, scruffy towns, not strip cities, and now that it's so under-used except for local farmers' pick-ups, the constant eyesore of billboards has vanished. It runs through dolorous, fog-coloured forest, past little lakes with frozen edges and circles of ice around tiny islands of cliff and tree in the water, with small wooden jetties and tied-up boats: Coffee Lake, Moose Lake, Sand Lake. 'Twilight on the frozen lake / North wind about to break / On footprints in the snow / And silence down below,' as Dylan sings so beautifully on the best song on Planet Waves, 'Never Say Goodbye'. There are 10,000 of these frozen lakes in Minnesota.

Sometimes farmland asserts itself for a while and there are horses and big old barns and log-piles; more often the road is a dark, forlorn corridor with olive-green sides, such that it's always a surprise to find a clearing glimpsed beyond the trees. Inappropriately flimsy houses are camped from time to time along the road, their front-yard junk mixed up with their plastic decorative squirrels and fawns, lions and Santa Clauses. You have to dodge and weave and pay attention to keep a grip on 61 as its keeps getting entangled in interstates.

Across a pretty river lies Pine City, the least piney and largest place since Duluth. There's a whiff of the prairies here and on the other side of town there it is: prairie landscape instead of the Great North Woods. Easy to imagine Bob riding this highway; you can still find, on the Oldies Stations, the very music he would have had blasting out when he came down for weekends in the big city. And though you won't find some old bluesman's record of 'Highway 61', you might set the dial on your radio and chance upon Bob Dylan's old record of 'Highway 61 Revisited'.

Down in St. Paul, smart people hurry out of the street's icy wind into the warm Manhattan glamour of the Saint Paul Hotel, smiling as they adjust their overcoat collars. They're excited by winter: by its imminent, welcome drama. These people are proud that they endure this climate. Its heartland ruggedness, they like to think, puts its iron in their souls. 'I'm used to four seasons / California's got but one,' as the young Bob Dylan also sang, on the sessions for Bringing It All Back Home.

[Bob Dylan: 'California', NY, Jan 13, 1965; unreleased but circulated. Roosevelt Sykes: 'Highway 61 Blues', Richmond, IN, 22 Sep 1932, 1st vinyl-issued Mr. Sykes Blues 1929–1932, Riverside RLP 8819, Holland, 1960s. The Sparks Brothers: '61 Highway', Chicago, 2 Aug 1933. Jack Kelly & His South Memphis Jug Band: 'Highway No. 61 Blues' & 'Highway No. 61 Blues No. 2', NY, 1 Aug 1933 (The Country Fiddlers, Roots RL-316, Vienna, 1968 & Memphis Blues (1927–1939), Vol.2, Roots RL-329, Vienna, c.1971) and, with Will Batts' vocal, 'Highway No. 61 Blues', NY, 3 Aug 1933, Memphis Jamboree, 1927–1936, Yazoo L-1021, NY, c.1970; all 3 CD-reissued Jack Kelly & His South Memphis Jug Band Complete Recorded Works (1933–1939), RST Blues Documents BDCD-6005, Vienna, c.1991. Joe McCoy (as Hallelujah Joe & Congregation): 'Highway 61' Chicago, 15 May 1935, CD-reissued Charlie & Joe McCoy Complete Recorded Works Volume 1 (1934–1936), RST Blues Documents BDCD-6019, Vienna, 1992.

Jesse James: 'Highway 61', Chicago, 3 Jun 1936. Charlie Pickett: 'Down the Highway', NY, 3 Aug 1937, The Rural Blues: A Study of the Vocal and Instrumental Resources, 2-LP set, RBF RF-202, NY, 1964. Sampson Pittman: 'Highway 61 Blues', Detroit, 1 Nov 1938, I'm in the Highway Man, Flyright FLYLP542, Bexhill-on-Sea UK, 1980, CD-reissued The Devil Is Busy: Sampson Pittman, Laurie LCD 7002, Norwood, NJ, 1992. (That odd LP title I'm in the Highway Man perpetuates a mishearing by Alan Lomax from the 1930s of another field-recorded item, being the title he ascribed to a Frazier Family song-performance fragment also on the LP.)

Speckled Red (Rufus Perryman): 'Highway 61 Blues', nia. Furry Lewis: nia. Fred McDowell: '61 Highway Blues', Como, MS, summer 1959, Prestige 25010, c.1961; & '61 Highway', Como, 13 Feb 1964, Delta Blues, Arhoolie F1021, Berkeley, CA, 1965, CD-reissued Mississippi Delta Blues, Arhoolie CD304, El Cerrito, CA, c.1991. (McDowell re-recorded the song again with white back-up musos in Jackson, MS, Sep 1969, LP-issued on I Do Not Play Rock'n'Roll, Capitol ST409, NY, 1969.) Memphis Willie B: 'Highway 61', Memphis, 12 Aug 1961; Introducing Memphis Willie B., Bluesville LP 1034, US, c.1962. Smokey Babe: 'I Went Down 61 Highway', Scotlandville, LA, 18 Apr 1961, The Country Blues, Denmark, c.1962. David Honeyboy Edwards: 'Highway 61' Chicago, 17 Mar 1964, Ramblin' On My Mind: A Collectin of Train and Travel Blues, Milestone LP 3002, NY, 1968.

Charley Patton: 'Pony Blues', Richmond, IN, 14 Jun 1929, The Immortal Charlie Patton 1887–1934, Origin Jazz Library OJL-7, Berkeley, c.1963. Nathan Beauregard: 'Highway 61', Memphis, 20 Jul 1968, 1968 Country Blues Festival, Sire SES 97003, NY (Blue Horizon LP 7-63210, UK), nia. James 'Son' Thomas: 'Highway 61 Blues', Leland, MS, summer 1974, filmed for Give My Poor Heart Ease, Yale Media Design Studio & the Center for Southern Folklore, Memphis, directed Bill Ferris (ex-Director of the Center for the Study of Southern Culture, University of Mississippi, Oxford, MS), 1975. An extract was shown on BBC-2 TV's 'Arena' profile 'Highway 61 Revisited'. (Ferris re Route 66 said to the 'Arena' TV crew, as reported to this writer by programme researcher Debbie Roberts.) Sunnyland Slim: 'Highway 61 Blues', Chicago, 26 or 29 Jan 1983, Sunnyland Train, Red Bean 002, US, 1983/4. Arthur Crudup: 'Death Valley Blues', Chicago, 11 Sep 1941, Bluebird Blues, RCA Victor LPV-518, NY, 1965.

Stanley Booth: 'Even the Birds Were Blue', The Rolling Stone Rock'n'Roll Reader, ed. Ben Fong-Torres, San Francisco: Rolling Stone, 1974. Mark A. Humphrey: 'Bright Lights, Big City: Urban Blues', in Nothing But the Blues: The Music & the Musicians, ed. Lawrence Cohn, New York: Abbeville Press, 1993. Bill Bryson, Made in America, London: Secker & Warburg, 1994.]

Highway 61 Revisited* [album, 1965] Dylan's sixth album and his first fully fledged eagle-flight into rock. Revolutionary and stunning, not just for its energy, freshness and panache but in its vision: fusing radical electric music—electric music as the embodiment of our whole out-of-control, nervous-energy-fuelled, chaotic civilization—with lyrics that were light-years ahead of anyone else's, Dylan here unites the force of blues-based rock'n'roll with the power of poetry. The whole rock culture, the whole post-BEATLE pop-rock world, and so in an important sense the 1960s, started here. It isn't only 'Like a Rolling Stone' and the unprecedentedly long Armageddon epic 'Desolation Row': it's every song. It's the carving out of a new emotional correspondence with a new chaos-reality. There it all was in one bombshell of an album, for a generation who only recognized what world they were living in when Dylan illuminated it so piercingly.

[Recorded NY, 16 Jun, 29–30 Jul & 2 Aug 1965; released as Columbia CS 9189 (stereo) & CL 2389 (mono), 30 Aug 1965. In UK, CBS SBPG 62572 (stereo) & BPG 62572 (mono), Sep 1965.]

Himmelman, Maria [1961 -] Maria Himmelman was born Maria Lownds on October 21, 1961, the daughter of Hans and Sara Lownds. Divorced soon afterwards, Maria's mother married Bob Dylan in 1965 and Dylan adopted Maria, who thus took the surname Dylan and grew up as the older sister of their children JESSE, ANNA, SAMUEL and JAKOB. She married the singer-songwriter PETER HIMMELMAN in 1988. Under the name Maria Dylan she seems to have been production supervisor on the 1995 film Panther, directed and written by Mario Van Peebles, and line producer on the Whoopi Goldberg vehicle Theodore Rex (also 1995), directed and written by Jonathan R. Betuel. If this is not a case of mistaken identity, perhaps her production credits were essentially for legal work facilitating the films. Jakob Dylan has described Maria in interview as a 'part-time lawyer and full-time mom'.

[Jakob Dylan quote: 'Jakob's Ladder' by Gerry Hirshey, Rolling Stone no.762, NY, 12 Jun 1997.]

Himmelman, Peter [1960 -] Peter Himmelman was born in 1960 and raised in the St. Louis Park suburb of Minneapolis. Bob Dylan's son-in-law by being married to Dylan's adopted daughter MARIA (they married in 1988), he was a guitarist and vocalist first in high school band the Reflections and then, based on the West Coast (as he still is) in the group Sussman Lawrence in the early 1980s.

He left to become a singer-songwriter. 'There were some psychics in Minnesota,' he said, 'who told me that if I wasn't more true to my muse I would die . . . literally.' Under his own name he released his début album, This Father's Day, in 1986, followed by Gematria (1987) and Synesthesia (1989). A change of label resulted in Strength to Strength (1991), Flown This Acid World (1992) and Skin (1994). Then, on a different label each time, he issued Stage Diving (1996), My Best Friend Is a Salamander (1997) and Love Thinketh No Evil (1998). Since then he has released The Himmel Vaults 1 through to The Himmel Vaults 4, plus My Fabulous Plum, Unstoppable Forces, My Lemonade Stand and Imperfect World. Himmelman has also created film scores for many undistinguished movies including Dinner and Driving (1997), The Souler Opposite (1998), Liar's Poker (1999), Bill's Gun Shop (2001), Four Feet (2002) and Jews N the Hood (2005) and for television series including Disney's 'Bug Juice' and CBS-TV's 'Judging Amy'.

Himmelman, ludicrously, has been compared to ELVIS COSTELLO and BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN, but is also notorious for a certain kind of crowd-pleaser improvisation. One of his many record labels imagined it was a recommendation to put it like this:

'His fans are used to him concocting songs on demand. He's a wiz at improv, they'll tell you—give him a subject, he'll give you a song. Just like that. Himmelman's devoted following has known for years that, his critically acclaimed catalog of studio albums notwithstanding, this is one guy you gotta see live.' The example of 'on demand' songwriting skill and wit they cite (presumably the best they could find) was this: 'This is a song about steak, maybe the only one you will ever hear. / This is a song about steak, the child of a cow—and a steer.'

Dylan fans can judge how Himmelman comports himself on the only known occasion when he and Dylan undertake a shared public performance, which took place live on the CHABAD TELETHON television programme 'L'Chaim—To Life' in LA on September 24, 1989. It's a hilarious ten minutes, in which Himmelman, Dylan and HARRY DEAN STANTON perform together on three songs: 'Einsleipt Mein Kind Dein Eigalach', 'Adelita' and 'Hava Negilah' (truly). On the first of these, Dylan surprises everyone, not least his fellow-performers, by choosing to play the flute. On the second, he plays the recorder and shares vocals with Stanton. On the third song, he plays harmonica. The entire event, bizarre enough merely for its line-up and song choice, is made the more so by Dylan's eccentricity and spontaneity, which is unusually out-on-a-limb even by his standards. All the while, Peter Himmelman is struggling to act normally, to play the guitar and sing as if everything is OK. He fails of course—who can blame him?—but it's the manner of his failure that is so charmless. There's no pleasurable response to the live vagaries of the moment, no rising to the occasion nor any good-humoured surrender in its place: there's nothing from Himmelman but a petulant clumsiness and a good deal of self-regard; he sulks at being upstaged instead of being honoured to be on stage at all. His slob-adenoidal singing, his indifferent playing, but most of all his personal comportment: all is gracelessness.

If you want to give him another chance, or test him in a fairer circumstance (and one that's easier to access), go to his website—there is, naturally, a flash intro—click on Audio and scroll down till you encounter the live performance that he has chosen to offer of 'Like a Rolling Stone'. It says it all.

[Peter Himmelman: quote re psychics from his official Six Degrees record-label bio; quote re steak from Plump Records at www.plump.com; 'Like a Rolling Stone' heard online 13 Nov 2005 at www.peterhimmelman.com.]

Hinchey, John [1947 -] The author of strong and thoughtful critical writing on Dylan's work, John Joseph Hinchey was born July 8, 1947 at the Chelsea Naval Hospital, Massachusetts. He first heard Dylan in 1963 when a radio DJ failed to identify the singer after playing Dylan's 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right'. John and his brother agreed that it couldn't have been JOHNNY CASH, though they argued as to why; one felt it sounded too young for Cash, the other that it sounded too old. A proper process of listening to Dylan began in early 1965.

After gaining a PhD in English and American Literature and becoming assistant professor at Swarthmore College (1973–80), Hinchey began working for the Ann Arbor Observer; his first published work on Dylan was a blurb written in this ahead of Dylan's 1981 concert in Ann Arbor, Michigan. He is still this monthly news magazine's calendar editor and city government reporter.

A more substantial early piece formed the first of the booklets in JOHN BAULDIE's Wanted Man Study Series, written in 1980 and published (without any of the editing that Hinchey felt it needed) as Bob Dylan's Slow Train, 1983. He also published a provocative article about Dylan's Shot of Love album in the Telegraph fanzine in 1985, in which he appeared to argue that poor material had been deliberately included by Dylan as an artistically skilful way of communicating his angst. But then came his admirable self-published Like a Complete Unknown: The Poetry of Bob Dylan's Songs 1961–1969 in 2002. It is especially strong on the much-neglected song 'North Country Blues'.

Album-by-album essays that will form a second volume (through to Saved) have begun to appear in the fanzine Judas!, notably including a fine, substantial scrutiny of the Planet Waves album.

His critical position, he writes, is this: 'What I have to say about Dylan's poetry is simply a report on what it looks like, and feels like, from where I stand. . . . The form of criticism I practise is Emersonian . . .'

[John Hinchey: Bob Dylan's Slow Train, Wanted Man Study Series Booklet no.1, Bury, UK, undated but 1983; 'Shot of Love: Some Other Kinds of Blues', The Telegraph no.22, Bury, UK, winter 1985; Like a Complete Unknown: The Poetry of Bob Dylan's Songs 1961–1969, Ann Arbor, MI: Stealing Home Press, 2002 (quote is on p.12); 'Planet Waves: Not Too Far Off', Judas! no.12, Huntingdon, UK, Jan 2005.]

Hinton, Nigel [1941 -] Nigel Hinton is a British writer of prize-winning children's and adults' fiction, born in London on October 28, 1941. His adult fiction includes Heart of the Valley (1986); his books for teenagers include Collision Course (1976), Buddy (1980) and Time Bomb (2004). His work for younger children includes the Beaver Towers series. He has also scripted the BBC-TV series 'Buddy' (starring Roger Daltry, 1985) and written the screenplays for the movies Buddy's Song (1991) and, with novelist Peter Prince, Blood Ties (2007). He first listened to Dylan when given Freewheelin' in 1963 but 'didn't become passionate about him until 1969'. He has written little on Dylan (beyond his unpublished MA dissertation of 1975, University of Kent) but that little is passionate, sane, intelligent, fresh and alive. A letter to The Telegraph was reproduced in part on the cover of its first issue—'that's the odd thing about Dylan; he reduces me almost to the level of a screaming groupie, [I'm] anxious for details about what he eats for breakfast and for the latest photograph of him and, at the same time, [he] inspires me to a contemplation of the most crucial questions about Life and Art . . .' Later writing for The Telegraph included 'In Defence of "Joey"' and a pro-Knocked Out Loaded review, titled

'Into the Future, Knocked Out and Loaded', that also brought a keen analytic eye to Empire Burlesque (this essay was republished in All Across the Telegraph in 1987). More recently, for Judas!, he has written 'Lowdown and Disgusted: The Ballad of Jack Fate' and 'Angles and Triangles'—this last including a tracing of parallels and correspondences between the Blood on the Tracks song 'Buckets of Rain' and, surprisingly, the Thomas Hardy novel Far from the Madding Crowd.

(See also the entries Chronicles Volume One and 'Dignity'.)

[Nigel Hinton: letter, Telegraph no.1, Bury, UK, Nov 1981; 'In Defence of "Joey"', Telegraph no.14, Nov 1983; 'Into the Future, Knocked Out and Loaded', Telegraph no.25, autumn 1986; 'Lowdown and Disgusted: The Ballad of Jack Fate', Judas! no.5, Huntingdon, UK, Apr 2003; 'Angles and Triangles', Judas! no.10, Jul 2004. Thomas Hardy: Far From the Madding Crowd, 1st published serially, The Cornhill Magazine, 1874 & in volume form same year; its title taken from Thomas Gray's 'Elegy Written in a Country Church-Yard', 1751; a hit film, Far From the Madding Crowd, dir. John Schlesinger, was released in 1967.]

Holly, Buddy [1936 - 1959] Charles Hardin Holley, aka Buddy Holly, created some of the territory of rock'n'roll, virtually inventing the guitars-bass-drums beat group with composer-vocalist leader. His large body of timeless, unpretentious work, achieved in a very few years (like bluesmen such as BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON and ROBERT JOHNSON) was first given properly documented reissue by John Beecher and Malcolm Jones, with the 6-LP box set The Complete Buddy Holly in 1979–20 years after Holly's death.

He had more personal talent, charisma and potential than anyone except ELVIS PRESLEY. Even on his very early recordings, where the studio sound, the arrangements and the type of song featured all drew heavily on Presley's earliest Sun cuts, you could not but be aware of a very different talent feeling its way and testing its strengths. By the time he was having hits, he not only had a distinctive sound but also an integrity and an inquiring interest in country music and city blues. The famous Holly sound is on songs like 'That'll Be the Day', 'Peggy Sue', 'Heartbeat', 'Every Day', 'Listen to Me', 'Tell Me How' and so on. His fine later ones, with their plumper sound, include 'Peggy Sue Got Married', 'That's What They Say', 'What to Do' and the immortal record that was his latest release at the time of his death, Paul Anka's composition 'It Doesn't Matter Anymore' coupled with 'Raining in My Heart.'

Holly had played Duluth on the so-called Summer Dance Party tour of the mid-west—Duluth was on July 11, 1958—but when Dylan saw Holly perform, it was on the Winter Dance Party tour that began in Milwaukee on January 23, 1959. Dylan was in the audience at the Duluth Armory eight days later, just three nights before Holly died with RITCHIE VALENS and the Big Bopper in a chartered single-engined plane that crashed in the snow in the early hours of February 3, on its way to North Dakota. This was the rock-star death of the 1950s, the first such death of huge significance to the rock'n'roll generation. Hence its memorialisation in Don McLean's 'American Pie' as 'the day the music died'. (The earlier death, by Russian roulette, of R&B artist JOHNNY ACE, backstage in Houston, Christmas Eve 1954, is better known now than at the time, and Ace a lesser artist than Holly.)

The last things studio-recorded before his death were 'True Love Ways' and 'Moondreams', and they were oddly, beguilingly mellow—one even used an aspidistra saxophone sound (a tenor sax by Sam 'The Man' Taylor). But the hint that Holly might have been slacking off into popular balladland is belied by the evidence of his musical interests. He cut the only white commercial blues that could even touch Presley's best: 'Mailman, Bring Me No More Blues'. Written for Holly, it remains superb: one of those magic combinations of song, pace, conviction, sound, vocals, guitar-work (all Holly's) and mood. An undiminished, shimmering achievement. He could handle BO DIDDLEY and CHUCK BERRY songs too, adding something of his own in a way that showed rare understanding. 'Bo Diddley' and 'Brown-Eyed Handsome Man' make the point with a kind of raw panache. (Cricket Sonny Curtis reveals that he and Holly used to listen to Stan's Record Rack on the radio beamed all the way from Shreveport, Lousiana: 'That was a real good program that played the black music of the day.' Dylan, up in Minnesota, was listening to the same powerful station in the same period.)

The music on Holly's own songs is riddled with the clichés of the time but handled with intelligence enough to show that had he lived he would have readily discarded them. People talk automatically about ERIC CLAPTON and his ilk as 'the great guitarists' but there's a sense in which Holly was a great guitarist, boxed in by the restrictions of convention in his time. His lyric writing not only touched a generation but could have a poet's compression and economy. As British singer-songwriter Harvey Andrews argues: 'All the great [modern] songwriters . . . were influenced by Holly. When rock'n'roll first started, there was something about Holly that got them. They all liked Elvis and LITTLE RICHARD but Holly is the one that they related to. He was the first singer-songwriter, but we didn't know it at the time. His lyrics are incredible. One verse of "I'm Lookin' for Someone to Love" goes "Drunk man, street car / Foot slipped, there you are." Well, that's a book, a novel, a play and a film. Nine words and it's lyric writing of the highest order.'

If he had lived . . . GREIL MARCUS said that Buddy Holly would have joined Dylan for a duet on, say, 'I Don't Believe You'. That rings true, and true in part because of the similarities that exist in any case between the two singers.

Control is a main point of resemblance. It went missing from rock when the British beat-group boom got going in 1963, and suddenly a loose, ramshackle sound was considered good enough and singers weren't sure where they were throwing their voices and didn't care which notes they were going to hit. Many of the solo stars had known exactly what their voices were doing—even when they were ripping it up. Little Richard was wild, but he was always in control. Presley always had this same sort of precision. So did the EVERLYS and Jackie Wilson. Buddy Holly had it too. Control in Holly was a special thing, tantamount to integrity: a precision demanded by artistic considerations, and part of his greatness.

Dylan surely learnt a lot about such considerations directly from Holly. There are times when in both of them flashes of phrasing sound on first hearing like mistakes but aren't. They turn out to be more right than the expected alternatives that don't appear, and in demonstrating it both artists have taught you something.

You can trace the effects of this teaching, as Holly gave it to Dylan, right down to similarities of timing, phrasing, emphasis, pronunciation. Greil Marcus dealt very well with this. 'Dylan and Holly', he wrote, 'share a clipped staccato delivery that communicates a sly sense of cool, almost teenage masculinity,' and he cited Holly's performance on 'Midnight Shift'. There, says Marcus, 'the phrasing is simply what we know as pure Dylan': 'If she tells you she wants to use the caahhh! / Never explains what she wants it faaahhh!'

Marcus makes another but a connected point, in discussing some of the home tape-recordings of Holly's voice that were released, after his death, with backing tracks added: 'Sometimes, these ancient cuts provide a real sense of what rock'n'roll might have become had Holly lived. The same shock of recognition that knocked out the audiences at the Fillmore West when THE BAND . . . lit into Little Richard, takes place, with the same song, when the ghost of Buddy Holly is joined by the Fireballs for "Slippin' and Slidin'". . . . An agile, humorous vocal is carried by a band that knows all the tricks. They break it open with the Everly Brothers' own seductive intro, constantly switching, musically, from song to song, while Holly ties it together. The guitarist actually sounds like ROBBIE ROBERTSON, throwing in bright little patterns around the constant whoosh of the cymbals . . . it's certainly one of the best things Buddy Holly never did.'

There must be a good deal of similarity, albeit perhaps too intangible to document, for that idea to strike home so sharply. Obviously, the 'Midnight Shift' resemblance is tangible enough, and we have it on innumerable Dylan tracks from 'I Want You' to 'On the Road Again' and from 'Absolutely Sweet Marie' back to 'When the Ship Comes In'. The last of these may seem a strange choice, but Buddy Holly could have sung 'When the Ship Comes In'. It has all the right tensions, all the polarities of high and low notes, rushes and lapses, that Holly, alone among the pre-Dylan stars, could easily control. And Dylan's 'Odds and Ends', on the Basement Tapes, seems strikingly and wholly in the spirit of Buddy Holly & the Crickets records, while 'Maybe Someday', on Knocked Out Loaded, 1986, not only has that spirit and a very Holly title but some very adroit lines that Holly might have written if he'd been more daring in his lyrics.

Another commonality is an intangible additive in the voices. Holly's voice transcends the limits set by the words of his songs. On the page they may be trite, even fatuous but his voice lights them up, making them touching or thrillingly direct. Both Dylan and Holly suggest a level of emotion at work below the words, way out beyond the scope of the lyric. Holly shows it on, for example, 'True Love Ways'; Dylan shows it everywhere.

(For another potential connection between Holly and Dylan, see Clayton, Paul and Hester, Carolyn.)

In September or October 1980, when Dire Straits were playing some dates at the Roxy just after the release of their album Making Movies, Dylan was among those present at the Sunset Marquis hotel in Los Angeles, along with TIM DRUMMOND, MARK KNOPFLER, two members of BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN's E Street Band, the Dire Straits manager Ed Bicknell, two unidentified young women and music-journalist Mike Oldfield. This informal session, which has become referred to as 'the Knopfler Hotel Room Tape' included Dylan and Knopfler performing Buddy Holly's 'That'll Be the Day'. Unfortunately, Bicknell believes that no-one present taped this material. Dylan also performed 'That'll Be the Day' a number of times, sharing vocals with PAUL SIMON, on some of their double-bill concerts of 1999, beginning in Milwaukee on the 4th of July and finishing, many performances of the song later, in Dallas on December 18.

Recalling that tenor sax on Holly's 'True Love Ways', the pleasant surprise of a comparable saxophone at the end of Dylan's Oh Mercy track 'Where Teardrops Fall'—a pool of aural coloring encountered nowhere else on the album—acts as a fond tribute to the Holly recording.

Dylan acknowledged Holly's importance to him more specifically at his 1998 Grammy acceptance speech for Best Male Rock Vocal Performance and Best Contemporary Folk Album for Time Out of Mind (New York City, February 25), in which he also described having a sense of Holly's presence all through the recording of that album—almost 40 years after Holly's death. And within a year of this, Dylan also resumed performing Holly's great Bo Diddley-inspired song, the appropriately titled 'Not Fade Away', in concert, starting on the first night of the opening leg of the 1999 tour, at Fort

Myers, Florida, that January 26. (He'd first sung it as a surprise concert-opener at Hartford, CT, on April 19, 1997.)

In the end, perhaps the way to encompass what Dylan has done via Holly is to say that there's a strong positive level on which Dylan has effectively replaced him.

[Buddy Holly: the 6-LP box set The Complete Buddy Holly, MCA Coral CDSP 807, London, 1979; The Crickets: 'That'll Be the Day' (2nd, & hit, version), Clovis, NM, 25 Feb 1957, Brunswick 55009, NY (Coral Q 72279, London), 1957. Buddy Holly: 'Peggy Sue', Clovis, 29 Jun–1 Jul 1957, c/w 'Everyday', Clovis, 27 Jun 1957, Coral 61885, NY (Coral Q 72293, London), 1957; 'Heartbeat', Clovis, Jun–Aug 1958, Coral 62051 (Q 72346), 1958; 'Listen to Me', Clovis, 29 Jun–1 Jul 1957, Coral 61947 (Q 72288), 1958. The Crickets: 'Tell Me How', Clovis, May–Jul 1957, B-side of 'Maybe Baby', Oklahoma City, 27–28 Sep 1957, Brunswick 55053 (Coral Q 72307), 1958. Buddy Holly: 'Peggy Sue Got Married', NY, Jan 1959 (overdubs NY, June 1959), Coral 62134 (Q 72376), 1959; 'That's What They Say' and 'What to Do', NY, Jan 1959 (overdubs NY, Jan 1960), The Buddy Holly Story Volume 2, Coral LP 57326 (Coral LVA 9127), 1960 (and UK single Coral Q 72419, 1961); 'It Doesn't Matter Any More' c/w 'Raining in My Heart', NY, 21 Oct 1958, Coral 62074 (Q 72360), 1959; 'True Love Ways' and 'Moondreams' also NY, 21 Oct 1958; 'Mailman Bring Me No More Blues', Clovis, 8 Apr 1957, Coral 61852, 1957 (B-side of 'Words of Love', also Clovis, 8 Apr 1957), 1st UK issue on Buddy Holly LP, Coral C 57210, 1958, not a UK single until as B-side of 'Look At Me' (Clovis, May–Jul 1957), Coral 72445, 1961; 'Bo Diddley', Clovis, 1956 (overdubs by the Fireballs, Clovis, 1962), Coral C 62352 (Q 72463, London: different B-side), 1963; 'Brown-Eyed Handsome Man', Clovis, 1956 (overdubs Fireballs, Clovis, 1962), Coral C 62369 (Q 72459, London: different B-side), 1963; 'Midnight Shift', Nashville, 26 Jan 1956 c/w 'Rock Around with Ollie Vee', Nashville, 22 Jul 1956, Brunswick O 5800, London, 1959 (top 30); 'Slippin' and Slidin'', NY, Jan 1959 (overdubs Fireballs, Clovis, 1962), US B-side of 'What to Do', Coral C 62448, 1965 (UK B-side of 'Brown-Eyed Handsome Man', Coral Q 72459, 1963).

Tracks recorded Jan 1959 were solo demos by Holly, made in his Greenwich Village apartment, after he had broken with both the Crickets and Norman Petty, with 1959–60 overdubs by Jack Hansen, commissioned by Dick Jacobs (with whose 'Orchestra' Holly had recorded his last studio session, i.e. the NY, 21 Oct 1958 session). The Jan 1959 demo material was later re-acquired by Petty, who made different overdubs, using the Fireballs (Clovis, 1962–68) on this and other material. Through the 1960s and 1970s, therefore, with US & UK companies issuing different releases, the two different sets of overdubbed tracks were issued more or less haphazardly. The box set The Complete Buddy Holly contains both, plus Holly's undubbed original solo demo versions of some but not all these tracks. To the extent that some were not included—'What to Do' and 'That's What They Say' among them—the box set is mistitled.

Sonny Curtis and Harvey Andrews quoted from undated interviews by Spencer Leigh in Baby, That Is Rock and Roll: American Pop 1954–1963, p.88 & 90. Greil Marcus quoted from 'Records', Rolling Stone no. 35, San Francisco, 28 Jun 1969. Details re 'the Knopfler Hotel Room Tape' from Ed Bicknell in conversation with the present writer in c.Apr 1981 & 31 Aug 1995; the occasion is also described in Mike Oldfield's book Dire Straits, 1984.]

Homer, the slut* [fanzine] See Muir, Andrew.

'Honey Just Allow Me One More Chance' See Thomas, Henry.

Hooker, John Lee [1917 - 2001] John Lee Hooker was born a few miles south-east of Clarksdale, in the tiny community of Vance, Mississippi, on August 22, 1917. He became an influential, and very successful, post-war bluesman: a singer, guitarist and songwriter with a distinctive voice people either like or dislike strongly, and a shambling style that seemed as old as voodoo chants yet always managed to sound modern and knowing.

After an adolescence in Memphis, where he worked as a theatre usher, Hooker moved north to Detroit in 1943, played in the city's important black entertainment district around Hastings Street, and kept a home in Detroit until 1969, by which time he had achieved crossover hit singles in European hit parades as well as in the US. He first recorded in 1948, starting as he meant to continue with a sizeable hit, 'Boogie Chillen', and then between 1959 and 2000 released a staggering 77 albums. The titles of the earliest of these suggest his popularity with the folk-revival market: the first was Folk Blues and the next handful included The Country Blues of John Lee Hooker and The Folk Lore of John Lee Hooker. Ludicrously, granted his unmistakeably individual voice and style, many of these early records were made under pseudonyms for rival labels to Modern, the one that had signed him: pseudonyms like Delta John, Texas Slim, Birmingham Sam & His Magic Guitar and, as Tony Russell notes, 'flimsiest of all, John Lee Booker on Chess, a label for which he made some particularly compelling sides in 1950–51'. Nevertheless it was with Modern and under his own name that he followed up his first hit with 'Hobo Blues' and 'Crawlin' King Snake' (1949), and 'I'm in the Mood' (1951).

He has had no discernible impact on Dylan's style, yet he occupies a special place in his history: for it was a tangible step forward for Dylan when he was given support-act billing to Hooker for a two-week stint at Gerde's Folk City in April 1961 (the weeks of April 11–16 and 18–23), and named as such on the handbills. Dylan proudly sent copies of these back up to Minneapolis, to impress his friends. Dylan's friend Sybil Weinberger told the makers of BBC-TV's 1993 Arena Special 'Highway 61 Revisited' that in the early Village days, Dylan loved Hooker, and that whenever he was playing, Bob would be there.

In Chronicles Volume One, although Dylan makes no comment on Hooker, he does mention him in noting ruefully that his own harmonica playing was too basic to ever attract any comment, with the exception of one time 'a few years later in John Lee Hooker's hotel room on Lower Broadway . . . SONNY BOY WILLIAMSON was there and he heard me playing, said, "Boy, you play too fast."' That 'a few years later' probably means 'not long afterwards'. In 1985, Hooker said of Dylan: 'Bob is a beautiful person. A good, good man. Very sweet, very kind. I met him when I was playing in the coffee-houses. He wasn't famous then but he came to see me. We played some shows together and he'd come back to my place and we'd stay up all night playin' and drinkin' wine.'

Hooker went on to create band-backed 1960s R&B cross-over hits out of 'Dimples' (actually cut in 1956) and 'Boom Boom' (1962), and crossed too from the solo 'folk blues' of Dylan's Greenwich Village days to the electric blues mainstream of that decade's end. In the 1970s he was taken up by younger star names like Elvin Bishop and VAN MORRISON; for most of the 1980s he more or less disappeared, but turned up on stage for the encore of Dylan's concert with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS at Mountain View, California, on August 5, 1986 to perform 'Good Rockin' Mama' backed by all these rock musicians (augmented by AL KOOPER).

Not long after that Hooker made one of those unpromising albums that gathers up clusters of star guest performers, The Healer, in 1989—on this occasion CARLOS SANTANA, Robert Cray, Los Lobos, George Thorogood, Charlie Musselwhite and Bonnie Raitt (yielding, with her, a much-admired vocal duet revisit to his 1950 hit 'I'm in the Mood')—which turned out to become the biggest-selling blues album in history and was followed by the similarly stellar-supported Mr. Lucky (with Albert Collins, Ry Cooder, KEITH RICHARDS and Van Morrison).

John Lee Hooker died of natural causes at his home in Los Altos, near San Francisco, on Thursday, June 21, 2001. He was 83.

[John Lee Hooker: 'Boogie Chillen', Detroit, Sep 1948, Modern 20-627, US, 1948; 'Hobo Blues', Detroit, Sep 1948 or 18 Feb 1949, Modern 20-663; & 'Crawlin' King Snake', 18 Feb 1949, Modern 20-714, 1949; 'I'm in the Mood', Detroit, 7 Aug 1951, Modern 835, 1951; 'Dimples', Chicago, 17 Mar 1956, Vee-Jay VJ 205, US, 1956; 'Boom Boom', Chicago, late 1961, Vee-Jay VJ 438, 1962; The Healer, California, Jan 2 & Oct 1987 & Apr–May 1988, Chameleon LP 74808, US, 1989; Mr. Lucky, nia, Apr 1990–May 1991, Silvertone ORE CD 519. (There is a monumental Hooker discography online at http://web.telia.com/~u19104970/johnnielee.html, by Claus Röhnisch.) Hooker quote on Dylan: Brian Walden, 'Questionnaire: John Lee Hooker', Q no.85, London, Oct 1993. Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, p.257. Tony Russell quote, The Blues—From Robert Johnson to Robert Cray, 1997, p.69.]

Hornby, Nick [1957 -] Nick Hornby, born in Redhill in England on April 17, 1957, is a madly successful lad-lit novelist whose million-selling books are about boyish obsessiveness, focused on collecting records, following football, whatever, interspersed with comic scenes about their heroes' failures to 'get girls' / 'understand women'. This work culminates in the hit movie About a Boy, starring, naturally, Hugh Grant. To raise money for UK charity the TreeHouse Trust and US charity 826 Valencia, Hornby then wrote the book Songbook (US title, 2002), aka 31 Songs (UK title, 2003), which enthuses about 31 records rather than songs.

He is not a huge Dylan fan, and doesn't care much about the words, yet has a clearly authentic passion for music and an articulate intelligence, so his comments on Dylan's career and omnipresence in our consciousness are refreshing, the more so because he's too young to have been around when Dylan was young himself. The one Dylan track on his list is 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window', which he likes because it's 'mid-sixties, electric . . . but it's poppier and grungier than anything on Blonde on Blonde' and isn't over-familiar: 'If you can hear Dylan and THE BEATLES being unmistakeably themselves at their peak—but unmistakeably themselves in a way we haven't heard a thousand, a million times before—then suddenly you get a small but thrilling flash of their spirit, and it's as close as we'll ever get, those of us born in the wrong time, to knowing what it must have been like to have those great records burst out of the radio when you weren't expecting them, or anything like them.'

[Nick Hornby: Songbook, San Francisco: McSweeney's Books, 2002 & London: Viking, 2003. The film About a Boy, dir. Chris & Paul Weitz, screenplay Peter Hedges, 2002.]

Horowitz, David [1939 -] David Horowitz, born in Forest Hills, New York, on January 10, 1939, is a political analyst and journalist who wrote, among much else, the excellent book Free World Colossus: From Yalta to Vietnam, 1967, a compelling study of the Cold War and US imperialism.

He also wrote a pioneering early piece on Dylan's work—especially on its politics and on the song 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall'—in 1964. This article, 'Bob Dylan: Genius or Commodity?', was published in Britain in Peace News, which was a mouthpiece for the nuclear disarmament movement and was responsible, in the 1960s, for a mini-poster, handy for notice-boards and as a car-sticker, with the splendid motto 'Join the Army; travel to exotic, distant lands; meet exciting, unusual people and kill them.'

All this writing was done while Horowitz was a decent and scrupulous historian on the Left. However, he suffered a political conversion and now enjoys mega media coverage in the US as a combative campaigner on the Right. He has taken up the rôle of reactionary court jester, imagines that he is a useful and vibrant bête noir pestering the (now barely extant) American Left, partly by ranting away in his magazine Front Page and writing crassly populist books like Hating Whitey.

[David Horowitz, Free World Colossus: From Yalta to Vietnam, US: American, 1967, published UK as From Yalta to Vietnam, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1967; Hating Whitey, Dallas, TX: Spence Publishing, 1999. 'Bob Dylan: Genius or Commodity?', Peace News, London, 11 Nov 1964, reprinted in Richard Mabey, The Pop Process, 1969.]

'Horseman & the Twist-up Gang' [1965] This was the original title of the 850-word prose-poetry piece ROBERT SHELTON asked Dylan to write for the 1965 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL 'program book', and which Dylan sent on two neatly typed sheets (with minimal typed and handwritten changes), together with a handwritten note that included the incautious 'use it anyway you feel fit'.

Shelton duly 'corrected' some of Dylan's pronouns, replaced his characteristic ampersands with ands, broke the continuous piece into short paragraphs (his breaks not always keeping faith with the sense) and generally made it look both more readable and more conventional. His biggest intervention was to retitle it 'Off the Top of My Head'.

It duly appeared in the Festival 'program book', mostly on page 17 but with a small amount shoved back to page 59, where it sat incongruously alongside a photo of Julie Andrews playing her guitar in the mountains in The Sound of Music. The program was jointly edited by RALPH RINZLER and Shelton, using the same pseudonym, Stacey Williams, which he had used for his sleevenotes on the back of Dylan's first album.

[For a more detailed examination of the changes from 'Horseman & the Twist-up Gang' to 'Off the Top of My Head', see IAN WOODWARD's article 'Tracking Dylan 4', Isis no.122, Bedworth, UK, Sep–Oct 2005, pp.39–42.]

House, Son [1902 - 1988] Eddie James House, Jr. was born on March 21, 1902 on a Delta plantation at Riverton, Mississippi, grew up to become a Baptist pastor before the age of 20, initiating the drama of a lifetime's enacted pull between religious and secular passion. He learnt guitar only after returning to Mississippi from some years spent in Louisiana; in 1928 he was sent to Parchman Farm for mortally shooting a man, reportedly in self-defence, but was released within a year. He met up with the equally powerful CHARLEY PATTON and with Willie Brown, travelled with them to Grafton, Wisconsin, where on May 28, 1930 he recorded his classic début session—a session of ten tracks that proved him an originator of the dark and heavy Mississippi Delta blues style. He continued to play with Patton and without him, but never returned to the studios in the pre-war period. He was field-recorded in Mississippi by ALAN LOMAX in 1941 and 1942.

'The Jinx Blues Part One', one of his 1942 tracks, rages like this against the dying of delight: 'You know these blues ain't nothin but a low-down shakin', low-down shakin', achin' chill / I said the blues is a low-down old achin' chill / Well if you ain't had 'em honey I hope you never will. / Them blues, them blues is a worryin' heart, worryin' heart, heart disease / Just like a woman you be lovin', man, it's so doggone hard to please.'

It's typical of Son House (though also of Patton) that he should expand the lyric with these long, erupting, erratic surges of repetition. Another vocal effect he employs time and again, yet always effectively and without ever quite losing its element of surprise, is in not repeating or approximating the whole of the first line of a verse as the second line, but instead beginning that second line with an 'mmm-mmm-mmm' and then repeating only the end-portion of the first line, which often has a different resonance when divorced from its other half. Though he's by no means alone in doing it, this inspired, intelligent word-conjuring is one of the things that makes him great. He has a way, too, of using common-stock formulations yet always making his songs sound like works in progress, and he has a rare expressive intensity.

In 1943 House moved to the slums of Rochester, New York, where he gave up playing, sold his guitar and was eventually amazed to be 'rediscovered', let alone find that he was regarded by these strange young middle-class white people as a great artist. He recorded anew in Rochester in 1964, in Chicago later that year, in New York City in 1965 and a number of other times afterwards, the last being in London in July 1970. He played the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL in 1964 and 1965.

He is a giant figure in 20th century American music, the single most potent stylistic influence on ROBERT JOHNSON—who as a boy used to hang around him, listening, before he could play a note himself—a model for MUDDY WATERS and a creative, forceful performer in his own right.

To be specific, Johnson's 'Walking Blues' recycles 'My Black Mama' by Son House, who was himself calling it 'Walking Blues' in the 1930s before Robert Johnson used the title for his own song (the title 'My Black Mama' was because the 'black mama' lyrics House took as his starting-point came from one of his mentors, James McCoy); and House's 1942 field-recorded 'Walking Blues' re-emphasises this lineage. But the story doesn't end there. Extraordinarily, in 1985 the collector Mike Kirsling found 42 Paramount test-pressings in the roof of a house in Illinois, and more left out in the snow. (As he took them home he prayed 'Please God, don't let them be by white singers!': some were, some weren't.) Among them—it's almost too good to be true—was a Son House recording of 'Walking Blues' itself from 1930—indeed recorded the same day as his 'My Black Mama'—a record not known to have existed, and confirming the song as an item in House's repertoire at least six years before Robert Johnson recorded it.

Specifically too, Muddy Waters' first recorded side, August 1941's 'Country Blues', is also founded upon House's 1930s 'Walking Blues'. The similarity between Waters' bottleneck playing on this and Robert Johnson's on his 'Walking Blues' has been widely noted—but both are extremely similar to that on Son House's 'My Black Mama', and the field-recorded interviews with Muddy Waters make it clear that it was Son House who taught him bottleneck guitar. (All this is detailed in a 1981 article 'Really the "Walking Blues": Son House, Muddy Waters, Robert Johnson and the Development of a Traditional Blues', by John Cowley.)

Even in old age, debilitated and at times distracted, he was a person of great dignity. Among the Columbia sides made in 1965 is the gorgeous, touching 'Pearline', on which House sounds infinitely older than his 63 years but turns his frailty to transcendently poignant advantage, his clawing, arthritic slide guitar glistening like tears across the track.

Interviewed in San Diego in autumn 1993, Bob Dylan said: 'The people who played that music were still around . . . [in the early 1960s], and so there was a bunch of us, me included, who got to see all these people close up—people like Son House, REVEREND GARY DAVIS or SLEEPY JOHN ESTES. Just to sit there and be up close and watch them play, you could study what they were doing, plus a bit of their lives rubbed off on you. Those vibes will carry into you forever, really, so it's like those people, they're still here to me. They're not ghosts of the past or anything, they're continually here.' Indeed.

Son House moved to Detroit in 1976 and though he outlived almost all the rest, including many of his successors, he died there on October 19, 1988, aged 86.

[Son House: 'My Black Mama Part 1', 'My Black Mama Part 2', Grafton, WI, 28 May 1930; 'Walking Blues', Grafton, 28 May 1930, unissued until Delta Blues 1929–1930, Document DLP 532, Vienna, 1988; 'Walking Blues', Robinsonville, MS, 17 Jul 1942, CD-reissued Son House: The Complete Library of Congress Sessions 1941–1942, Travelin' Man TM CD 02, Crawley, UK, 1990; 'Pearline', NY, 12–14 Apr 1965, Son House—Father of Folk Blues, Columbia CL 2417, NY, 1965; reissued on 2-CD set Son House: Father of the Delta Blues: The Complete 1965 Sessions (produced by John Hammond), Roots N' Blues Masters series, Columbia Legacy 4716622, NY, 1992 (incl. re-recordings of, among others, Blind Willie Johnson's 'John the Revelator' & Patton's 'Pony Blues').

Robert Johnson: 'Walking Blues', San Antonio, TX, 27 Nov 1936, Robert Johnson: King of the Delta Blues Singers, Columbia CL-1654, NY, 1961.Muddy Waters (as McKinley Morganfield): 'Country Blues', Stovall, MS, c.24–31 Aug 1941 (field-recorded for the Library of Congress), vinyl-issued on the compilation Afro-American Blues and Game Songs, AFS L-4, Washington, D.C., 1962 & Polydor UK 236.574, London, nia, CD-reissued Rounder CD 1513, Cambridge, MA, 1999; also CD-reissued The Complete Plantation Recordings: Muddy Waters: The Historic Library of Congress Recordings 1941–1942, MCA CHD 9344, London, 1993.

For the 1985 Paramounts discovery story see Bob Hilbert: 'Paramounts in the Belfry', 78 Quarterly no.4, Key West, FL, 1989. John Cowley: 'Really the "Walking Blues": Son House, Muddy Waters, Robert Johnson and the Development of a Traditional Blues', Popular Music Vol. 1, ed. Richard Middleton & David Horn, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981.]

Houston, Cisco [1918 - 1961] Gilbert Vandine Houston was born in Wilmington, Delaware, on August 18, 1918. He became a singer, guitarist and songwriter, and was a minor figure in and around the WOODY GUTHRIE circle. Guthrie describes first encountering 'the Cisco kid' in his autobiography Bound for Glory (1943). They traveled together before World War II, till Houston joined the merchant marines. Dylan, in Chronicles Volume One, says that Houston had also played with Burl Ives at migrant camps during the Depression, and that in the McCarthy era of the 1950s he had a CBS-TV show dropped because of political pressure on the network.

Houston's album I Ain't Got No Home, recorded in New York City in early 1961, includes two songs Dylan performs, Guthrie's 'I Ain't Got No Home' and the traditional 'Waggoner's Lad', plus two traditional songs of tangential import for Dylan in the 1980s, 'Danville Girl' (Dylan's early, unreleased version of 'Brownsville Girl' is called 'New Danville Girl') and 'Streets of Laredo' (one of the 'Unfortunate Rake' cycle of songs, which lies behind Dylan's 'Blind Willie McTell'). Around the same time, Houston recorded another version of 'Danville Girl', under its common alternative title, 'The Gambler'. He also includes a version of one of the songs later included on Dylan's 1992 album Good as I Been to You, 'Diamond Joe'. Houston's version, which may have been the one picked up by Boston-based folkie Tom Rush and indeed by RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT, was included on his LP Cowboy Ballads, 1957, after being published in Sing Out! three years earlier. In 1965, Oak Publications issued the posthumous songbook entitled 900 Miles: The Ballads, Blues and Folksongs of Cisco Houston.

In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan describes the Guthrie-Houston connections and their records very straightforwardly, and then gives a sketch of the Cisco Houston he saw for himself around Greenwich Village, including his final performances, at Folk City: 'I was there to hear him. . . . He was a perfect counterpart to Woody and had a soothing baritone voice. . . . Cisco, handsome and dashing with a pencil thin mustache, looked like a riverboat gambler, like Errol Flynn. People said he could have been a movie star, that he once turned down a starring role opposite Myrna Loy.' Introduced to him at a 'bon voyage party' on the eve of his departure for California (a party given an extraordinary 11-page description), Dylan found him 'gracious, with a dignified air, talked like he sang.'

By now he was, as Dylan notes, 'a hair's breadth from death', and indeed he died of cancer on the West Coast, in San Bernadino, California, on April 29, 1961. He was 42.

He was commemorated in the songs 'Fare Thee Well, Cisco' by Tom Paxton, 'Cisco Houston Passed This Way' by his protégé PETE LaFARGE, and the poem 'Blues for Cisco Houston' by Tom McGrath.

[Cisco Houston: I Ain't Got No Home, NY, 1961, Vanguard VRS-9107, 1962; 'The Gambler', NY, c.1961, Railroad Songs, Folkways FA2013, c.1961; 'Diamond Joe', NY, 1957?, Cowboy Ballads, Folkways FA 2022, 1957. 'Diamond Joe', Sing Out! vol.4, no.4, March 1954. Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, p.63. Thomas McGrath, 'Blues for Cisco Houston', collected in Movie at the End of the World, Swallow Press, 1972.]

'how be it?' In that fine Slow Train Coming track 'Precious Angel', Dylan sings a gentle rhetorical couplet that asks us to acknowledge that there's a susceptibility to religious belief inside all of us: '. . . how be it we're deceived / When the truth's in our hearts and we still don't believe?'

Regardless of how we may wish to respond to that, we can recognise that Dylan's use of the phrase 'How be it' here is a pleasing echo of the rich plain-speaking of the King James Bible, in which, especially in Paul's epistles, the phrase occurs with zen-like, majestic, repetitive effect. Though Dylan's official songbooks print it as a three-word phrase, as above, the Bible has it as a single word, 'Howbeit'.

Collins English Dictionary, 1994, says of this only that it is 'archaic' before mis-defining it as meaning either 'however' or 'although'. In fact, of course, it means exactly what it says, ellipsed from the longer 'How does it come to be that?' What we shorten to 'How come?', the King James Bible shortened to 'Howbeit?'.

It is archaic: meaning that it is language characteristic of an earlier period and not in common use. Yet its clarity and simplicity make it a model of effective rhetoric, and Dylan's use of it here—in exact accord with its use in the scriptures—sounds to have arisen naturally from his inevitably meeting the word within the Word. That's howbeit he's in tune with it.

Howlin' Wolf [1910 - 1976] Chester Arthur Burnett was born on June 10, 1910 in West Point, Mississippi: a small town 30 miles south of Tupelo, and from there another 75 miles to Memphis. He moved west with his parents to the heart of the Delta when he was 13, and farmed on a plantation at Ruleville, close to CHARLEY PATTON's home-base near Cleveland, Mississippi, on Highway 61, driving a plough pulled by mules. Except for a spell in the army, he continued to farm, while performing at fish fries and juke joints through the 1930s and early 40s, turning professional only in the late 1940s.

In the blues-structured 'Man of Peace' (1983), when Bob Dylan comes in the seventh stanza to invoke images of imminent annihilation, he draws on the blues to do so for him. The opening line, 'Well, the howling wolf will howl tonight, the king snake will crawl', fuses two creatures long since appropriated into blues poetry: the howling wolf—which refers both to the mythic creature from the backwoods feared by rural blacks when darkness fell, and the fierce blues singer who took its name for his own, the great Howlin' Wolf himself—and the king snake that will crawl, which Dylan twists around but slightly out of BIG JOE WILLIAMS' threatening 'Crawlin' King Snake', made in 1941. Or perhaps the snake too comes to Dylan via Howlin' Wolf, whose 'New Crawlin' King Snake' came out in 1966.

That Dylan's images here might have come directly from the old rural blues songs—balancing the Big Joe Williams 'Crawlin' King Snake' there are two J.T. Funny Papa Smith cuts of 'Howlin' Wolf Blues' from 1930, one of which was a hit—but might equally have come to Dylan via their more modern incarnations by Howlin' Wolf himself, tells us something about the special value of the latter, and about the myth that there is a sharp divide between the acoustic rural blues and the electric city 'Chicago' blues.

Though he was one of the four or five real giants of the tough, electric Chicago blues, and certainly the roughest and vocally most ferocious, he grew up in the pre-war country blues world, and was a prime conduit through which much of this older blues music passed across into the new. While he was taught harmonica by SONNY BOY WILLIAMSON II, Wolf learnt the guitar and much repertoire from one of the most influential figures in the history of the blues, CHARLEY PATTON, and even played some dates with ROBERT JOHNSON in 1930. His importance as a custodian, as much as a moderniser, of this pre-war material is in part explained by the fact that he didn't record at all until he was 41 years old. His early sides were made at Sun Records in Memphis, blues capital of the South in which he had lived his whole life.

Most rural blacks who migrated north did so either in their teens or early 20s. It was exceptional that a man who had lived so long in the South should then move to Chicago, blues capital of the North, but Howlin' Wolf did so within two years of Sun Records' Sam Phillips leasing some of his first sides to Chess Records in Chicago. (MUDDY WATERS, his great rival, and five years his junior, was recorded as early as 1941, and moved to Chicago in the 40s.) Accepting a cash advance from Chess Records, he drove to Chicago: 'the onliest one drove out of the South like a gentleman,' he is quoted as saying.

A southern gentleman he remained. Wolf's 1952 'Saddle My Pony' is based in detail on Patton's 1929 'Pony Blues', and Wolf's 'Spoonful' on Patton's 'A Spoonful Blues'; 1952's 'Color and Kind', its remake 'Just My Kind' and 1968's 'Ain't Goin' Down That Dirt Road' all build on Patton's 1929 'Down the Dirt Road Blues'. Even Howlin' Wolf's biggest hit, 1956's 'Smokestack Lightnin'', a remake of his own earlier 'Crying at Daybreak', was in turn a restatement of Patton's 1930 'Moon Going Down'. A later 1956 session yielded 'I Asked for Water', based on Tommy Johnson's 1928 'Cool Drink of Water Blues', and 'Natchez Burning', a remake of a song recorded earlier by Gene Gilmore and Baby Doo Caston about a dance-hall fire of 1940.

Wolf's 1952 'Bluebird (Blues)', which he re-recorded in 1957 and re-fashioned two years later as 'Mr. Airplane Man', is a 1938 Sonny Boy Williamson I song (quite possibly via nearby Yazoo City singer Tommy McClennan: a singer whose vocal fierceness prefigured Wolf's and whose personal fierceness greatly exceeded it); 1952's 'Decoration Day (Blues)' is also from Sonny Boy Williamson I (though written by CURTIS JONES). In 1957 Wolf cut a splendid version of the 1930 MISSISSIPPI SHEIKS standard 'Sittin' on Top of the World', which Bob Dylan was to record first with Big Joe Williams; in 1966, the same year Wolf turned Big Joe's 'Crawlin' King Snake' into his own 'New Crawlin' King Snake', he also recorded 'Poor Wind (That Never Change)', which, to the tune of W.C. Handy's classic 'Careless Love', incorporated elements of BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON's 1926 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean', Papa Harvey Hull & Long Cleve Reed's 1927 'Hey! Lawdy Mama—The France Blues' and/or Fred McMullen's 1933 'Wait and Listen', and of the standard 'St. James Infirmary Blues'. The following year, Wolf cut 'Dust My Broom', which comes, via Elmore James or not, from Robert Johnson, who in turn had taken his title phrase from the lyric of Kokomo Arnold's 'I'll Be Up Someday'.

You get some sense of how 'country' Wolf looked in person too, through the eyes of these northern city record executives, when you read Marshall Chess recalling his sheer physical size: 'Whenever we shook hands, mine was a little nothing inside his huge hand. He could never buy shoes that were wide enough and he would cut the sides of his new shoes with a razor. You could see his socks sticking out.'

From 1959 or 1960 onwards, Chess was pressuring Wolf into recording not his own material but songs by the prolific Willie Dixon—but many of these, like the material Dixon had recorded as a member of the Big Three Trio in the 1940s, were also strongly based on country blues songs from the 1920s and 30s. While the label credits Dixon with having composed Wolf's 1961 hit 'The Red Rooster', Wolf himself said that the credit belonged to Patton.

When Howlin' Wolf's career and influence was at it peak, therefore, which was from the mid-1950s till the mid-1960s, he was as synonymous with Chicago as Muddy Waters—and yet he never really sounded like the city. The world he invoked, in his uniquely spooky, surreal way, was in essence that of the back roads, the Mississippi swamplands made mythic and primeval, not far from Robert Johnson's crossroads, in the nighttime of country soul. What he was bringing forward thunderously into the 1950s and 60s, and making accessible to the likes of ELVIS PRESLEY on through to THE ROLLING STONES, and thus to the pop-buying public, was a rich meld of country blues lyric poetry. Wolf's 1954 side 'Evil' was transmuted into Elvis' 'Trouble' just four years later. In 1964, 'Smokestack Lightnin'', reissued in Britain, reached the charts, and Wolf appeared on the TV series 'Ready Steady Go!' while he was over in Europe as part of the American Folk Blues Festival. In 1965, as special guest of the Rolling Stones, who performed 'Little Red Rooster', Wolf performed his early-1950s Sun record 'How Many More Years?' on the US 'Shindig' TV show.

By this time, Bob Dylan had already long been familiar with his work: which is why at times it is both impossible to tell, and perhaps unimportant to know, whether Dylan takes a line, or an image, or a flavour, from Howlin' Wolf himself or from somewhere in the earlier country blues, as Wolf had done in turn. In early 1962, on the unedited tape made for a New York radio, Dylan tells CYNTHIA GOODING that he knows the work of both Muddy Waters and Howlin' Wolf: and goes on to perform a country blues version of 'Smokestack Lightnin'' that sounds closer in style to Charley Patton than Wolf's does. This says much for Dylan's recognition that Wolf was essentially a country wolf in city clothing.

If Dylan had gained nothing from Howlin' Wolf except an early piece of repertoire, that would be interesting. However, it seems as clear as such things ever can be that there is some direct inspiration. First, it's unlikely that Dylan's absorption of the Charley Patton legacy was never through Wolf, his last great pupil. Second, there must have been a time in Dylan's youth when, as for so many, the comprehensible beat, electricity and audible recording quality of Wolf and Muddy Waters made for a far easier way into much of the blues than the 'old-fashioned', gruesomely lo-fi recordings of their pre-war country blues predecessors.

So, musically as well as lyrically, Wolf was a conduit. His early band included Ike Turner and JUNIOR PARKER—whose elegant, cool 'Mystery Train' was to be transformed in the same Sun studio, via Elvis, into a founding classic for rock'n'roll—while the main guitarist Wolf used from 1954 onwards was the consummate Hubert Sumlin, whose best work is amongst the finest electric guitar playing in the universe. He plays solos of divine, deranged descending notes, tense as steel cable, grungy as hot-rod cars crashing, and as piercing as God cracking open the sky. Howlin' Wolf brought Sumlin up to Chicago from the south. He hailed from the Delta too: from Greenwood, Mississippi (where Robert Johnson was murdered in 1937 and where Bob Dylan commemorated the murder of MEDGAR EVERS by singing 'Only a Pawn in Their Game' at a civil rights rally in 1963). Hubert Sumlin's influence is as plain as lightning on MIKE BLOOMFIELD—you can hear it on 'Maggie's Farm', Dylan's electric début performance at the Newport Folk Festival of 1965—and on ROBBIE ROBERTSON, as you can hear equally on the 1966 Dylan concert performances and the later album Planet Waves.

There is another Wolf-Dylan conjunction on Planet Waves too, and it inhabits the boundary between the written word and pronunciation. Early on in his sleevenotes to the album (long since vanished: see Planet Waves*, disappearing sleevenotes, the), Dylan is recalling, with a careening and savage impressionism, what the 1950s had felt like; and he writes of '. . . priests in overhauls, glassy eyed, Insomnia! Space guys off duty with big dicks & ducktails all wired up & voting for Eisenhower . . .' That pun on overhauls/overalls—clever because to perform the one you put on the other—may have come to him directly from Howlin' Wolf. In his 'Sitting on Top of the World', instead of 'overalls', Wolf sings the line that should include it as 'Had to make Christmas in my overhauls.'

Of course it may not come directly from Wolf: as so often, Dylan could have picked it up from any one of a number of blues records or performances or white rural idiom. This poetic ellipse has become common-stock among whites as well as blacks. It is not a universal Americanism, however. Just down the hills in Georgia, BLIND WILLIE McTELL, for instance, sings in his version of BLIND BLAKE's 'That'll Never Happen No More': 'Well it's Chicago women in the fall / Got to make your days in your overalls'—and sings the word in the straight, unpunning, one might say middle class, way. That freedom, that ability to pun, to make one word do two jobs—which need not be for a humorous purpose—is of course characteristic of Dylan, who usually exercises it, as Howlin' Wolf and others do there, orally rather than on the page, but whose Planet Waves sleevenote shows that he can manage it on the page too.

The same was true for Shakespeare, as CHRISTOPHER RICKS pointed out in a 1980 Australian radio broadcast about Bob Dylan. (Of course Shakespeare could do this orally as well as via flexible spelling, since most of his work was for the stage rather than the page.) Ricks gave an example taken from Dylan's 'Shelter from the Storm': 'He'll use his voice to get back some of the freedom which a poet used to have in the old days before spelling got finally fixed. I'm thinking of the way in which Shakespeare could spell the word "travelled" so that it included "travailed" . . . included worked as well as journeyed. So Dylan will sing "moaning dove" and then print "morning" . . .'

This illustration is especially interesting because it too can be found in Howlin' Wolf's work. When Muddy Waters' 'Still a Fool' (which as we've noted, Dylan knew) was issued by Chess, it was part of a triple set that also included Wolf's 'Moanin' at Midnight'. But this also ended up on Chess' rival label Modern—and was released by them under the odd title 'Morning at Midnight': a mistake of transcription that occurred because of Wolf's ambiguity with the very same words as Dylan. And just as Ricks picked up on it from 'Shelter from the Storm' simply because he liked it—as a pun it has, after all, no significant meaning in the Dylan song: it just sounds good—so too it's likely that Bob Dylan picked this up from Howlin' Wolf simply because he liked it. At least as likely as that he invented it à la Shakespeare.

A related feature of the blues that Howlin' Wolf distils as well as anyone is the warping of pronunciation to make a rhyme. Dylan's relish of this has led him to surpass defiantly simple examples like rhyming 'hers' with 'yours' in 1965's 'I Wanna Be Your Lover' by the spectacular rhyming of 'January' and 'Buenos Aires' in 1981's great 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar'. However, the pleasure of eccentric pronunciation in general and its use to make counterfeit rhymes in particular is a fundamental delight rock'n'roll picked up from the blues. If FATS DOMINO was good at it (as when rhyming 'man' with 'ashamed'), so was Howlin' Wolf. As with 'moaning/morning', in 1959's 'Howlin' for My Darlin'' he makes the verb and the noun of the title rhyme ('If you hear me howlin' / Callin' on my darlin'').

What this serves to remind us also is that Howlin' Wolf's records often built up the mythic, fairytale-beast connotations of the name itself. His song titles include 'Moaning at Midnight' and 'Crying at Daybreak'; 'Howlin' for My Darlin'' (a remake of 'Howlin' for My Baby' from seven years previously); 'The Red Rooster'; 'Tail Dragger'; 'I'm the Wolf'; 'Moanin' for My Baby'; 'Call Me the Wolf' and 'Howlin' Blues'. The last new album released in his lifetime was called The Back Door Wolf.

He had been given the name at the age of three, by his grandfather:

'He just sit down and tell me tall stories about what the wolf would do, you know,' he told an interviewer in 1968. 'Cause I was a bad boy, you know, and I was always in devilment. . . . So he told me the story 'bout how the wolf done the Little Red Rilin' [sic] Hood.' He goes on to recount a splendidly garbled version of the story, in which the fairytale and the existential reality of his own childhood—the woods and the backwoods—are bound up together:

'. . . the girl would ask him, "Mr. Wolf, what make your teeth so big?" He said "the better I can eat you, my dear." Then said "What make your eyes so red?" "The better I can see you, my dear." And so, you know, and then they finally killed the wolf and drove him up to the house, you know, and showed me the wolf. And I told him it was a dog. He said no, that's a wolf. I said well what do a wolf do? Say he howl: he say "ooh-wyooooh!", you know, and so I got afraid of this wolf.'

Granted Dylan's familiarity with Howlin' Wolf's records, and his own fusion of the singer's name with the beast-figure in 'Man of Peace', it isn't surprising that there should be special conjunctions between the Wolf and the album by Bob Dylan that is itself a glorious fusion of fairytale and nursery rhyme with the blues and the Bible, 1990's Under the Red Sky.

Specifically, we can recognise flashes of Dylan's '2 x 2' and '10,000 Men' in the chorus of Wolf's 'I Ain't Superstitious': 'Well I ain't superstitious, black cat just crossed my trail . . . / Don't sweep me with no broom, I might just get put in jail'; while another line from '10,000 Men', Dylan's joke-exaggeration of multiple negatives, 'None of them doing nothing that your mama wouldn't disapprove', goes far enough to be impenetrable in meaning but barely goes further in construction than the last line of Wolf's 1954 song 'Baby How Long': 'Ain't nobody never lived that didn't do somebody wrong.'

The Dylan song on Under the Red Sky that most successfully unifies children's song and folktale, intimations of Biblical retribution for our 'devilment' and the country blues world, is the sumptuously phantasmagoric 'Cat's in the Well'. This features the cat, the horse, the bull, the dogs and—dramatically, as the first omen that the innocent face imminent death—the wolf: 'The cat's in the well, the wolf is looking down / He got his big bushy tail dragging all over the ground.' Dylan doesn't say why his tail drags on the ground, but this is elucidated in one of Howlin' Wolf's best records, 1962's shudderingly powerful 'Tail Dragger'. Its chorus runs: 'I'm a tail dragger, I wipe out my tracks / When I get what I want, I don't come sneakin' back', and the first of its two irregular verses concludes with 'The hunters they can't find him / Stealin' chicks everywhere he go / Then draggin' his tail behind him.'

The other verse calls up some more inhabitants of the animal kingdom, as Dylan's song does: 'The 'cuda drags his tail in the sand / A fish wiggles his tail in the water / When the mighty wolf come along, draggin' his tail / He done stole somebody's dog.' So the wolf cannot be tracked, hunted down or stopped. The cat has no chance.

This is not the last of the lyric conjunctions between Dylan and Howlin' Wolf, but it is the greatest, as one piece of barnyard apocalypse draws strength and meaning from another, from 28 years earlier. And there's a general sense in which, because of Wolf's towering primitivism, the style he constructed, its psychic meld of electric power and old country darkness, if there had been no Howlin' Wolf, an album like Under the Red Sky would have been a different, thinner thing.

There's another general gift that Wolf and his contemporaries give to those like Dylan who come later and from another culture. To hear Wolf's massive voice singing 'Well, mama done died and left me, / Wooh, daddy done throwed me away' is to note the way that the age of the singer is so utterly unimportant to these bluesmen when it comes to the subject matter of their songs. They have no truck with our modern self-conscious ageism or apologism, and clearly when they sing about the lives of themselves and their peers, they experience those lives as unities. Furry Lewis as an old man, and Howlin' Wolf as a middle-aged one, still sing out about the childhood trauma of parental abandonment: they have no sense that they 'should have got over all that' in the contemporary way. At the same time, they still sing too about romantic love: they have no modern sense of the shame of being politically incorrect 'dirty old men'.

Likewise they can sing out clear and free about imminent death: they have no sense that this is aerobically incorrect, or 'not nice'. In 1961's 'Goin' Down Slow', which features what may be Hubert Sumlin's all-time best guitar solo, Howlin' Wolf proves himself a great singer about imminent death, which will certainly have recommended him to Bob Dylan.

Howlin' Wolf himself died in the Hines district of Chicago, on January 10, 1976. He was 65.

[Howlin' Wolf: 'New Crawlin' King Snake', Chicago, 11 Apr 1966, Change My Way, Chess LP 418, Chicago, 1977; 'Sittin' on Top of the World', Chicago, Dec 1957, Chess 1679, Chicago, 1958; The Back Door Wolf, Chicago 1973, Chess LP-50045, Chicago, 1973; 'Tail Dragger', Chicago, 28 Sep 1962, The Real Folk Blues, Chess LP-1502, Chicago, 1966, CD-reissued Chess MCA CHD 9273, US, 1987. Wolf's 'Red Rilin' Hood' story is on his spoken reminiscence re 'Ain't Goin' Down That Dirt Road (By Myself)', Chicago, Nov 1968, unissued till the 3-CD The Chess Box, MCA CHD3-9332, US, 1991.

Big Joe Williams: 'Crawlin' King Snake', Chicago, 27 Mar 1941, Big Joe Williams: Crawlin' King Snake,

RCA International INT-1087, London, 1970. J.T. Funny Papa Smith: 'Howlin' Wolf Blues No.1' & 'Howlin' Wolf Blues No.2', Chicago, 19 Sep 1930, 'Funny Papa' Smith: The Original Howling Wolf, Yazoo L-1031, NY, 1972; there's also his 'Hungry Wolf', Chicago, c.Apr 1931, same LP. Blind Willie McTell: 'That'll Never Happen No More', Atlanta, Sep 1956; Blind Willie McTell: Last Session, Prestige Bluesville 1040, US, 1961. Marshall Chess quoted from undated interview by Spencer Leigh, Baby, That Is Rock and Roll: American Pop, 1954–1963, Folkestone, UK: Finbarr International, p.50.]

Hudson, Garth [1937 -] Eric Garth Hudson was born in Windsor, south-west Ontario, Canada, on August 2, 1937, grew up in nearby London and had a classical training in music. He was the last of the future BAND members to join RONNIE HAWKINS & THE HAWKS, but after they split from Hawkins, Garth was in the group in the studios in Toronto when they recorded the instrumental 'Bacon Fat' in 1964, which was that rare thing, a Hudson-ROBERTSON composition.

For the main story of The Band and how they became that seminal American band of the late 1960s, see separate entry. Aside from the fact that he didn't sing, Hudson was as crucial as any other member to the group's sound—and not only to their sound but also to the sound Bob Dylan achieved when the Hawks went out behind him on the just-gone-electric tour of late 1965 and then again, including in Australia and Europe, in 1966. Garth Hudson's swirling, wondrous organ, his brooding genius at the keyboards, his arranger's ear, his solidity combined with imagination, his willingness to improvise, to stay below and to soar above—all this was essential to the tumultuous majesty of Dylan's live performances in that period.

Hudson was just as crucial to the very different sounds made in the Basement the year afterwards: especially since in large part it was Garth who tape-recorded those unique, informal sessions, and had the sense to look after, afterwards, all the dozens of unknown-about extra ones beyond those of immediate interest to Dylan's music publisher, and which only began to circulate decades later.

Hudson was also the musicians' musician—and actually gave the other Hawks music lessons—and when the Hawks became the Crackers became The Band, he was the multi-instrumentalist supreme in a group of multi-instrumentalists. If The Band introduced a small orchestra's worth of olde worlde instruments to mainstream rock music, it was Hudson who had introduced many of them to The Band. On the credits to the second album, The Band, their 1969 masterwork, Garth Hudson's credits take up two lines to everyone else's one. He plays organ, clavinette, piano, accordion, soprano sax, tenor sax, baritone sax and slide trumpet. And alongside the old he brought the new: always experimenting, and building instruments and amps of his own.

His amazing technique on his trusty Lowrey organ was, though, the rock solid basis of what was so unique about the sound he brought to The Band—and just as it had been there for Dylan '66, so it was there for the different purposes of Music from Big Pink. So much so that his confrontational yet infinitely pained solo organ intro to 'Chest Fever' developed afterwards into the separately named 'Genetic Method', and in live performance the thrill of finding how Hudson might seize this improvisational opportunity was always a concert high-spot.

Garth Hudson added something else to The Band, too: visually, he was the one who most looked the part in those image-building photos with the Civil War flavour; he was the mountain man with the 19th century beard. He was the most genuinely old-fashioned, the most sombre in demeanour. He gave The Band much of its gravitas.

By the time these first two great Band albums were released, Hudson had also recorded, and played on, sessions by the Indian musicians pictured with Dylan on the front cover of the John Wesley Harding album: sessions that would be released in 1968 as The Bengali Bauls at Big Pink.

Hudson had worked with Bob Dylan in the studios by this point too. The first occasion was on October 5, 1965, with the whole group; this session gave us two tracks issued 20 years later on Biograph: 'I Wanna Be Your Lover' and 'Jet Pilot'. It also gave us one of the most widely circulated and earliest bootleg tracks, the instrumental known as 'Number One'. A second 1965 studio stint (minus HELM) on November 30 produced the single 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?'—and has also now yielded the version of 'Visions of Johanna' released on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7, 2005. The now-Helmless Hawks went back in the studio with Dylan on January 21–22, 1966, when they helped create that quintessential mid-60s Dylan record, 'She's Your Lover Now' (finally issued on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991)—but when Dylan, Robertson and DANKO returned to the studio three days later, for Blonde on Blonde sessions held January 25–28, neither MANUEL nor Hudson were asked to attend.

After backing Dylan again on Planet Waves and the big 1974 comeback tour that yielded the double LP Before the Flood, Hudson didn't connect up with Dylan again in the studio. On stage they came close when the re-formed Band appeared at the so-called Dylan 30th Anniversary Concert in New York City in 1992, at which Garth played only the accordion on a disappointing rendition of 'When I Paint My Masterpiece', but then on January 17, 1993, he (and Helm and Danko) played with Dylan at President Bill Clinton's inauguration party, the so-called 'Absolutely Unofficial Blue Jeans Bash (For Arkansas)'.

The re-formed Band had been together nine years by then, but only started making albums the year afterwards. These served to confirm that Hudson had abandoned the Lowrey, and was interested instead in synths. Much of the other keyboards solo work seemed to go to Richard Bell. It seemed a shame.

By this time, Hudson also had another 20 years of credits on other people's albums behind him, including: Jesse Winchester's Jesse Winchester, 1971; BOBBY CHARLES' Bobby Charles and ERIC VON SCHMIDT's 2nd Right, 3rd Row, 1972; PETER YARROW's That's Enough for Me, RINGO STARR's Ringo and MARIA MULDAUR's Maria Muldaur, 1973; MUDDY WATERS' The Muddy Waters Woodstock Album and Poco's Head Over Heels, 1975; CLAPTON's No Reason to Cry, 1976; EMMYLOU HARRIS' Quarter Moon in a Ten Cent Town and VAN MORRISON's Wavelength, 1978; Hoyt Axton's Rusty Old Halo, LEONARD COHEN's Recent Songs and DAVID BROMBERG's You Should See the Rest of the Band, 1979; Don Henley's I Can't Stand Still, 1982; Marianne Faithfull's Strange Weather, 1987; Robert Palmer's Heavy Nova, 1988; Camper Van Beethoven's Key Lime Pie, 1989; and Robbie Robertson's Storyville and Graham Parker's Struck By Lightning, 1991. In addition, he had worked on many soundtrack albums from movies.

Hudson had released a sort of solo album back in 1980, Our Lady Queen of the Angels: music he had written and recorded to accompany a one-off project by sculptor Tony Duquette at the LA Museum of Science and Industry. Hudson released this on tape only on his own label. It was a rarity then; it's certainly a rarity today. But his first 'proper' solo album came 21 years later, with The Sea to the North: and it proved sumptuous yet edgy, playful but dark, virtuoso but soulful, crossing genres and times in six highly disparate tracks that make up a cohesive, thrilling whole (five Garth compositions plus an outrageous version of THE GRATEFUL DEAD's signature song 'Dark Star' that you might think steals it away from them in one audacious raid). It's the great album everyone knew Garth Hudson could make.

Since then, in bathetic contrast, we've only had Live at the Wolf, an album from a low-key concert billed at the time as 'An Intimate Evening with Garth and Maud Hudson', recorded on September 8, 2002 back in London, Ontario—which only offers Garth's grand piano, sounding decoratively beautiful but an insufficient aural meal, plus, on most tracks, the indigestible dumpling of Maud Hudson playing the grande dame concert-hall artiste—as if rock'n'roll had never happened: as if nothing had ever happened since uptown New York 1938 or thereabouts—emoting around with her fine, self-conscious, insincere and thus uninteresting voice. What she does with 'Young Blood' and Dylan's 'Blind Willie McTell' makes for an unpleasant experience, as is having to hear her own hopeless song 'You'll Be Thinkin''. You'll be thinkin' no thanks.

At the premiere of the re-cut Last Waltz in 2002, Garth showed up with two of the Bengali Bauls. He was also photographed standing alongside Robbie Robertson, looking ancient but real, his beard greyish white, smiling innocently and showing up Robertson's dyed black hair look for the vain artifice it is.

Garth will continue working, at whatever pace he likes, never denying the past but always journeying onwards through music, equipped with eclectic talent, wide curiosity and a capacity for disciplined practice not commonly found in the world of rock music: a music that would not have been the same without him in the period when it was at the centre of our culture and mattered most.

[The Bengali Bauls: Bengali Bauls at Big Pink, Buddah BDS 5050, US, 1968. Garth Hudson: Our Lady Queen of the Angels, Buscador Music EGH 770, US, 1980; The Sea to the North, Breeze Hill 0011-2, US, 2001 (CoraZong 255039, Europe, 2003). Garth & Maud Hudson: Live at the Wolf, Make It Real MIR006, Canada/US, 2005. For a full Hudson discography see http://theband.hiof.no/albums/hudson_index.html.]

Humphries, Patrick [1952 -] Patrick Humphries was born in London on August 11, 1952. He first became aware of Dylan's work when he heard 'Mr. Tambourine Man' on a pirate radio station and thought it was Donovan. He has written 20 books, from a history of Fairport Convention, published in 1982, through biographies of Nick Drake, RICHARD THOMPSON, PAUL SIMON and BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN to Tomfoolery: The Lives and Lies of Tom Waits in 2006. His two books on Dylan are Oh No! Not Another Bob Dylan Book, co-authored with JOHN BAULDIE, published in 1991 (re-titled Absolutely Dylan in the US), and A Complete Guide to the Music of Bob Dylan, published in 1995. In 2001 he was commissioned by Dylan's office to write the sleevenotes for the compilation album The Essential Bob Dylan.

[Patrick Humphries & John Bauldie: Oh No! Not Another Bob Dylan Book, Brentwood, UK: Square One Books, 1991, aka Absolutely Dylan: An Illustrated Biography, New York: Viking Studio Books, 1991. Patrick Humphries: A Complete Guide to the Music of Bob Dylan, London: Omnibus Press, 1995.]

Hunstein, Don [1928–] Donald Robert Hunstein was born in St. Louis, Missouri, on November 19, 1928, studied liberal arts at Washington University there and then, fearful of army call-up to fight in Korea, enlisted in the US Air Force instead. His squadron was sent to England, and visiting Paris he discovered the work of Cartier-Bresson, which prompted his career in photography. Discharged in spring 1954, within months he moved to New York City, where he learnt the business as a Pa-gano studio gofer, after which work for another photographer led to a Columbia Records publicity department job in January 1956. So it came about that he was the staff photographer who took the cover shot for Bob Dylan and, more famously, the iconic cover of The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan. This was taken after an amiable session, mostly on black and white film, in Dylan's West 4th Street apartment with and without SUZE ROTOLO, arranged by publicist Billy James (who was also present), so as to build up Columbia's stock of photos of an artist rapidly becoming 'hot'. As the light was threatening to fade, Hunstein suggested trying some shots in the street, with happy results, taken on one roll of colour film on a Hasselblad. Hunstein is certain, despite other claims, that his back was to West 4th Street and Dylan's apartment as he took the shot, and that Bob and Suze are walking down Cornelia Street.

Don Hunstein took his last Dylan shots in 1965: lovely shots at the piano. He ran the photographic studio Columbia created in 1966, until it closed in 1982; after four years of corporate work for CBS he went freelance. He has not 'gone digital' and now, at 77, he is 'somewhat more than semi-retired'.

[Source: Don Hunstein, phone calls from & to this writer 13 Mar 2006.]

Hunter, Robert [1941 -] Born Robert Burns in San Luis Obispo, California, on June 23, 1941, Hunter was a guitar-playing folk-scene friend of JERRY GARCIA's in the early 1960s, and was an early volunteer guinea-pig in Stanford University's psychedelic research programme (secretly CIA-funded). Paid to take LSD, mescaline and psilocybin, and to log his experiences, he found them a creative release. Thus he was ready and available when Garcia needed a lyricist for THE GRATEFUL DEAD. Early lyrics like 'China Cat Sunflower' didn't just sound as if written on acid: they were. Hunter was, generally speaking, Garcia's lyricist for most of the band's original songs; he therefore wrote, among much else, almost all the words on the crucial early albums Workingman's Dead and American Beauty. His best-known lyric is probably 'Dark Star'. A collection of his lyrics, A Box of Rain, was published in 1993. When Jerry Garcia died, in 1995, Hunter wrote a super-competent, rhyming 'Elegy for Jerry', which he recited at the funeral service.

His work with Bob Dylan was far less inspired than any of the above. Two lyrics quite rightly rejected by Garcia and the Dead were inexplicably accepted and turned into songs by Dylan: 'Ugliest Girl in the World' (copyrighted Dylan-Hunter 1987 jointly to Dylan's Special Rider Music and to Hunter's Ice Nine Music), and 'Silvio' (ditto for 1988). Both songs appear on Dylan's desperately unnecessary, reluctantly offered album Down in the Groove, where they were absolutely par for its course. (For details of Dylan's copious live coverage of 'Silvio', see the entry Grateful Dead, the. Just as redundantly it has been collected, since Down in the Groove, on both Bob Dylan's Greatest Hits Volume 3, 1994, and The Essential Bob Dylan, 2000.)

Hunter and Dylan still keep in touch now and then. They chatted, for instance, at some point in 2003. Hunter wrote in his online journal in October 2004: 'Last year Dylan told me he was writing his autobiography before he forgot everything. Said he got down to reading some of his biographies, which he hadn't done before, to refresh his memory about his own life.' (Which seems the least truthful thing Dylan has said by way of explaining what gets said in Chronicles Volume One.) Hunter added: 'The only thing he thought they got right was dates and situations and the rest was pretty much bullshit and interpretation compounded on previous biographies that were pretty far off the mark in the first place.'

Joining the age of the internet, Robert Hunter was the first webmaster of the official Dead website http://dead.net, and still runs it.

[Robert Hunter: A Box of Rain: Lyrics: 1965–1993, New York: Penguin Poets, 1993. 'Elegy for Jerry' seen online 23 Aug 2005 at http://hake.com/gordon/news.html.]

Hurt, Mississippi John [1893 - 1966] John Hurt was born in Teoc, Mississippi (too small to be on the map), on July 3, 1893 and grew up farming in Avalon, Carroll County; but he also became a highly distinctive, inventive finger-picking guitarist and a singer of sometimes strikingly violent songs delivered with a trademark gentleness and placidity. He was one of those who recorded in the 1920s—cutting eight sides in Memphis in February 1928 and a further 12 in New York in two sessions that December, of which in total 12 were issued—and then disappearing back into farm-work, to be 'rediscovered' decades later. He made no attempt to become a professional singer and was unchanged as a performer when 'rediscovered'. Contacted by a record-collector from Washington, D.C., Tom Hoskins, only in March 1963, he was on at Newport that July, becoming an instant star of the folk revival movement: performing in coffeehouses and other festivals, recording again after a 35-year gap, and influencing almost every musician who heard him. Including Dylan. He learnt and assimilated experience from many of the older songs and the older singers, and Hurt was one of them.

Dylan already knew Mississippi John Hurt's début 78rpm release, his 1928 recording of 'Frankie', before ever he arrived in New York. He knew it from its reissue on HARRY SMITH's anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC—it is one of that crucial set's 84 holy-relic tracks—and you might think that Dylan's own performance, decades later, namely 'Frankie & Albert' on the 1992 album Good as I Been to You, confirms that specific familiarity, recapturing something of Hurt's approach to the song, which differs somewhat from the general flavour of Hurt's work.

Mississippi John Hurt's last recording session was in 1966. He died in Grenada, Mississippi, that November 2. A deservedly well-known piece by the Georgia-based writer Stanley Booth, describing going to (and finding himself having to speak at) Hurt's funeral, includes this exchange about Hurt between Booth's girlfriend ('Christopher') and Furry Lewis:

> '"I loved him", Christopher said. "He was such a sweet little man, and he was a wonderful guitar player."
> "Yes," said Furry . . . "but he was sho ugly. I swear 'fore God he was."'

[Mississippi John Hurt: 'Frankie', Memphis, 14 Feb 1928, American Folk Music, Folkways FP 521-523, NY, 1952, later on, Mississippi John Hurt: 1928 Sessions, Yazoo 1065, US, CD-reissued 1990; this also contains his 'Stack O' Lee Blues', NY, 28 Dec 1928. Stanley Booth: 'Been Here and Gone: The Funeral of Mississippi John Hurt', republished in the collection Rythm [sic] Oil, London: Cape, 1992.]

Hutchison, Frank [1897 - 1945] Frank Hutchison was born in West Virginia in March 1897. He was the coalminer and singer whose hillbilly version of 'Stack a Lee' Dylan follows so closely—you might say recreates so affectionately—on the World Gone Wrong album of 1993. Dylan's sleevenote says with unDylanesque plainness: '"Stack a Lee" is Frank Hutchison's version', while his note about another song on the album, BLIND WILLIE McTELL's 'Broke Down Engine', manages to slip in allusions to several train songs, among them 'the train that carried my girl from town . . .' Hutchison's first record, cut in New York in the autumn of 1926, was indeed 'The Train That Carried the Girl from Town'.

Hutchison, a near contemporary of McTell, exemplifies the America of 'the invisible republic'. The 'first real white bluesman to record', in Charles K. Wolfe's words, he 'came from a rough, isolated community in Logan County, West Virginia . . . where miners both black and white found themselves living in company towns, fighting with company thugs when they tried to unionize. . . . In many ways, the miners led lives as desperate as sharecroppers in the Mississippi delta, and many . . . were drawn to the blues.'

Hutchison learnt his from two local blacks, railroad worker Henry Vaughn (from whom he learnt to play slide guitar with a knife) and one Bill Hunt, who was also able to pass on to him a wealth of 19th century songs. 'The Train That Carried the Girl from Town' alone influenced 'generations of hill country musicians'. Between 1926 and 1929 Hutchison cut 32 sides, concentrating on slide-based blues and offering white blues a grittily authoritative alternative seam to that so strongly hewn by JIMMIE RODGERS. Another Frank Hutchison song about a train, his 'Cannon Ball Blues', includes lines Bob Dylan uses on 'Caribbean Wind' and 'Man of Peace'.

Hutchison's own recordings of 'The Train That Carried the Girl from Town' and 'Cannon Ball Blues' are issued, along with the notes by Charles K. Wolfe, on the excellent 2-CD set White Country Blues 1926–1938: A Lighter Shade of Blue in the Columbia Roots n' Blues series. Not included, however, is Hutchison's version of 'Stack a Lee'. This is available, however, on—yes, you guessed it—the 1952 HARRY SMITH anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC: and to hear this 1927 Hutchison side is to recognise just how closely Bob Dylan follows it, in lyrics, melody, guitar-part, harmonica and, most importantly, in spirit, almost 50 years later. When you hear the Hutchison, you come to appreciate what a resourceful, knowledgeable, live-wire thing the Dylan recording really is.

Frank Hutchison died in Ohio in November 1945.

[Frank Hutchison: 'The Train That Carried the Girl from Town', NY, 28 Sep 1926; 'Cannon Ball Blues' NY, 9 Jul 1929, both CD-reissued White Country Blues 1926–1938: A Lighter Shade of Blue, Columbia Roots n' Blues 01-472886-10, NY, 1993; 'Stack a Lee', NY, 28 Jan 1927, American Folk Music, Folkways FP 251–253, NY, 1952.]

'I Forgot More' 'I Forgot More (Than You'll Ever Know About Her)' is a country classic, written and composed by Cecil Null, and on Self Portrait Dylan sings it much like ROY ORBISON might have done. JOHNNY CASH had recorded 'I Forgot More Than You'll Ever Know' in Nashville in 1962, for the widely known LP The Sound of Johnny Cash; but Dylan was almost certainly aware of the song much earlier. Dylan revisited it live in 1986, as a duet with TOM PETTY, at 55 concerts. His introductory remarks about the song to the audience in Sydney, Australia, perhaps reveal why he chose to include it on Self Portrait. 'Very seldom,' he said, 'do you hear a real song anymore. But we were lucky enough to grow up when you could hear 'em all the time. All you had to do was just switch on your radio . . .'

I

[Bob Dylan remarks to Sydney, Australia, audience, 24 Feb 1986. Johnny Cash: 'I Forgot More Than You'll Ever Know', Nashville, 10 Feb 1962; The Sound of Johnny Cash, Columbia CS 8602, NY (CBS BPG 72073, London), 1962, reissued, as it happens, the same year Dylan issued Self Portrait on the compilation Country Gold, Volume 2, Harmony 30018, US, 1970.]

'I Shall Be Free' / 'I Shall Be Free No. 10' Dylan based these early compositions on a cluster of songs exemplified by LEADBELLY's 'We Shall Be Free', recorded with WOODY GUTHRIE and SONNY TERRY in 1944. But these songs go back much further, pre-dating the era of recordings: '. . . stanzas of "You Shall Be Free" have been traced to the mid-nineteenth century,' writes John H. Cowley in a fascinating essay, 'Don't Leave Me Here: Non-Commercial Blues: The Field Trips, 1924–1960'.

Splendid early versions on record include two versions of 'You Shall' by the Beale Street Sheiks (i.e. the great Memphis figure FRANK STOKES plus Dan Sane) made in 1927.

Stanzas from 'You Shall' occur too in an early recording by Stokes' Memphis colleague JIM JACKSON. His 1928 'What a Time' has verses close to the Leadbelly-Guthrie-Terry version—and more to the point, rendered in what is ear-poppingly close to the style we think of as Dylan's on 'I Shall Be Free': not only in vocal delivery and feel but with the very same guitar strumming. You can't hear the Jim Jackson version without wondering whether Dylan knew it back then, though it had never been released on vinyl when Dylan cut 'I Shall Be Free' or 'I Shall Be Free No. 10'.

Dylan recorded 'I Shall Be Free' in 1962 for release on The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan (and again for Broadside magazine and a third time as a music-publishing demo, both in 1963). He recorded 'I Shall Be Free No. 10' in 1964 for Another Side of Bob Dylan (though this version is an edit of two takes, the longer of which was later included on the official CD Rom Highway 61 Interactive in 1995). He has never performed either 'I Shall Be Free' or 'I Shall Be Free No. 10' in concert.

Of course, the very fact that he calls the latter 'I Shall Be Free No. 10' has him confessing his knowledge of the old songs: he knows that there are many antecedents and variants and versions of 'You Shall' or 'I Shall Be Free'. And again, it's an example of how at the time, when this was new, we thought its title a bit of Dylanesque quirkery, whereas now we can see that it's yet another example of him walking the hallways of the old blues.

[Dylan: 'I Shall Be Free', NY, 6 Dec 1962, The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, 1963; NY, Mar 1963, Broadside Sessions; & NY, Apr 1963, Witmark demo (this version issued on the rare, untitled demo LP by Warner Bros. 7 Arts Music Inc., XTV221567, 1969); 'I Shall Be Free No. 10', NY, 9 Jun 1964, Another Side of Bob Dylan, 1964.

Leadbelly (with Woody Guthrie and Sonny Terry): 'We Shall Be Free', NY, May 1944; Leadbelly Sings Folk Songs, Folkways FA 2488, NY, 1962, CD-reissued as FA 2488, 1995. Beale Street Sheiks: 'You Shall', Chicago, c.Aug 1927, Frank Stokes with Dan Sane and Will Batts (1927–1929), Roots RL-308, US, 1968, and 'You Shall', Chicago, c.Sep 1927, Mississippi & Beale Street Sheiks, 1927–1932, Biograph BLP-12041, US, 1972. Jim Jackson: 'What a Time' (2 takes), Memphis, 28 Aug 1928, Kansas City Blues, Agram AB2004, 1980 (take 2) and Jim Jackson . . . Vol. 2, Document DOCD-5115, 1992 (take 1).

John H. Cowley, 'Don't Leave Me Here: Non-Commercial Blues: The Field Trips, 1924–1960', in Lawrence Cohn, ed.: Nothing But the Blues: The Music & the Musicians, New York: Abbeville Press, 1993.]

'I Wanna Be Your Lover' [1965] Several takes of this venomously surreal early electric Dylan song were recorded with THE HAWKS on their first day in the studio with Dylan—New York City, October 5, 1965. The song wasn't copyrighted until 1971, and all takes remained unissued until the Biograph box set in 1985; but a different take from the one offered there had circulated widely years before on early bootlegs, notably on Seems Like a Freeze Out and 40 Red White and Blue Shoestrings. These two takes have minor differences in the verses (in the use of words like 'and', 'but' and 'then') but the bootlegged version is the more assured in its vocal delivery.

As Paul Cable notes in Bob Dylan: His Unreleased Recordings, the chorus 'unashamedly rips off THE BEATLES' "I Wanna Be Your Man". . . . But it works because, whereas the lyrics of the first three lines are identical to the Beatles' song, the last line veers off at a tangent.' Indeed. The tangent has Dylan comically rhyming 'hers' with 'yours', as by an act of will, using his classic italicisation: 'I don't wanna be hers, I wanna be yrrrs!'

[Paul Cable: Bob Dylan: His Unreleased Recordings, UK: Scorpion/Dark Star, 1978, p.74.]

Ian & Sylvia Ian Tyson was born in British Columbia on September 25, 1933, and Sylvia Fricker in Chatham, Ontario, on September 19, 1940. Tyson turned to folk music and learnt to play guitar while recovering from injuries sustained as a professional rodeo rider, moved to Toronto in the late 1950s and there teamed up with Fricker. They moved to New York in 1960, played at the Mariposa Folk Festival in 1961 and were signed by ALBERT GROSSMAN and by Vanguard, releasing their début album (Ian & Sylvia) in 1962. They married in 1964.

Disparagement of all things Canadian is a tedious tack to take, and none is intended by saying that their becoming the best Canadian folk act of the time is not in itself an over-arching claim. They sang a mix of contemporary and traditional material, and with a detectably Canadian accent, which had its charm and differentiated them from a mass of other folk-revival acts. As Richie Unterberger puts it in the online All Music Guide, they 'helped expand the range of folk by adding bass . . . and mandolin to Ian's guitar and Sylvia's autoharp. Just as crucially, they ranged far afield for their repertoire, which encompassed not just traditional folk ballads, but bluegrass, country, spirituals, blues, hillbilly, gospel, and French-Canadian songs.'

As Mr. Unterberger also puts it, their albums 'can seem a tad earnest and dated today' but they have been 'overlooked influences upon early folk-rockers such as the Jefferson Airplane, the We Five, the Mamas and the Papas, and Fairport Convention, all of whom utilized similar blends of male/female lead/harmony vocals.'

Their stiff-backed, earnest delivery was of its time, and one of the things Bob Dylan arrived on the scene to abolish. In Ian's case it sometimes makes him sound like SEEGER of the Rockies, especially on a song like 'The Mighty Quinn', one of the many covers they made of work by singer-songwriters who seem to have admired them. (They had covered 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time' on their second album, Four, in 1963.) 'The Mighty Quinn' lends itself to fluidity, humour and a warm looseness, and doesn't accommodate the humourless declamatory manliness that Tyson brings to it, as he sings 'You'll not, see, nothing, like the, Mighty, Quinn' as if it's the national anthem. Indeed, it wouldn't be surprising to find that the Monty Python Lumberjack Song was inspired as much by Tyson as by an ensemble of the Mounties.

Beyond those influential harmonies, their strengths are Tyson's rich-sounding guitar picking, Fricker's resonant voice and their individual early songwriting. She wrote 'You Were on My Mind' (which the now-forgotten We Five turned into one of the first folk-rock hits) and he wrote 'Some Day Soon', which JUDY COLLINS has made a key piece of her repertoire. His best-known song, 'Four Strong Winds', was popularised first by Ian & Sylvia themselves, but later by a range of people, most notably fellow Canadian NEIL YOUNG.

Another Canadian, GORDON LIGHTFOOT, composer of 'Early Morning Rain', was 'discovered' by Ian & Sylvia, who had a near-hit single with the song, taken from their LP Early Morning Rain in 1965. They left Vanguard for MGM in 1967, after recording what might be thought a prefiguring of the late-60s interest in country music, the album Nashville, but their career declined, despite forming back-up band the Great Speckled Bird, which included Amos Garrett and BUDDY CAGE, and recording the album Great Speckled Bird with Todd Rundgren as producer. Their marriage and professional partnership ended in the 1970s. Ian Tyson moved into country music, returning to the subject matter of cowboys and rodeos and to Canada, where his work has continued to be popular. Sylvia made a number of less successful solo albums, including, in 1987, one titled You Were on My Mind (which the duo had already used as an LP title in 1972). The CD Ian & Sylvia: Best of the Vanguard Years includes 'The Mighty Quinn', 'Rocks and Gravel' and 'A Satisfied Mind' as well as 'Four Strong Winds', 'Some Day Soon' and 'You Were on My Mind'.

Dylan showed his fondness for Ian & Sylvia's repertoire just as their career was faltering, in 1967. Among the Basement Tapes recorded in upstate New York that year are warm versions of 'The French Girl' (a Fricker/Tyson composition), 'Song for Canada' (a Peter Gzowski & Ian Tyson song long listed mistakenly as 'One Single River' on Dylan discographies) and 'Four Strong Winds'. He revisited 'The French Girl' 20 years later when he and THE GRATEFUL DEAD rehearsed it—though they never went on to perform it in concert—in San Rafael, California, in May 1987.

In the summer of 1986, for a CBC-TV tribute to Ian & Sylvia for which the duo re-united and gave a live performance (televised that September) Bob Dylan filmed an extremely short speech (from an unknown location), which said, not exactly fulsomely: 'Ian & Sylvia, I wish I could be there where you are tonight, but I can't be, so I wish you good luck anyway and I hope to see you soon.'

[Ian & Sylvia: Ian & Sylvia, Vanguard, NY, 1962; Four Strong Winds, Vanguard VMD 2149, US, 1963; 'Early Morning Rain', nia, also issued on Early Morning Rain, Vanguard VSD-79175, NY, 1965; Nashville Vanguard 79284-2, US, 1967. Ian & Sylvia: Best of the Vanguard

Years, Vanguard 79516, US, 1998. Richie Unterberger, 'Ian & Sylvia' at All Music Guide, seen online at www.allmusic.com, 22 Apr 2005.]

'If Dogs Run Free' [1970] The way in which Dylan has revisited, live, in the 2000s, 'If Dogs Run Free'—a song that for 30 years he had shown no evidence of remembering at all after its original inclusion on the 1970 New Morning album—suggests a pleasing connection between that work and the "Love and Theft" album, which would not otherwise have been obvious. The live 'If Dogs Run Free' sounds markedly similar to 'Bye and Bye'.

Dylan describes how the studio recording of 'If Dogs Run Free' was achieved in one improvised take, starting from his lyrics and some AL KOOPER keyboard riffs, and embracing the improvised scat singing of MAERETHA STEWART (elsewhere on the album a back-up singer), in 2004's Chronicles Volume One (p.138).

'I'm a-Ridin' Old Paint' For this traditional song's relevance to Dylan, see folk music, American, Cowboy. This song was 'found' by Margaret Larkin, popularised by poet and folksong collector CARL SANDBURG in his important anthology The American Songbag, 1927, and republished by ALAN LOMAX in the Penguin Book of American Folk Song, 1964. (Penguins have always loved American folksong.) 'Rake and Rambling Boy', a traditional ballad on the first JOAN BAEZ LP [Joan Baez, Vanguard VRS-9078, NY, 1960], has a final verse that shares the 'I'm a-Ridin' Old Paint' format: 'when I die, don't bury me at all / Place my bones in alcohol'.

'I'm a-Ridin' Old Paint' also shares common stock ingredients with black song. An almost identical verse occurs in the middle of the splendid early 'blues' record by Papa Harvey Hull and Long Cleve Reed, 'Hey! Lawdy Mama—The France Blues' [Chicago, c. April 8, 1927; Really! The Country Blues, Origin Jazz Library OJL-2, NY, c.1961]. This isn't really a blues at all, but an effervescent jostling of disparate verses from the rich memory-banks of largely 19th century repertoire by these songsters: men already of a certain age by the time they came to record.

'In Search of Little Sadie' / 'Little Sadie' These two Self Portrait interpretations are based on an older song, which JOHNNY CASH recorded as 'Transfusion Blues' when he was with the Tennessee Two and as 'Cocaine Blues' on later recordings (one studio, one live with a prison audience). The storyline has remained much the same—it tells of an escape, arrest, trial and jailing. But while Cash plods through a lifeless narrative, congealing in his artificial manliness, Dylan ditches the worst platitudes, transforms others, by his timing, into wit, and fills his narrative with creative idiosyncrasy. While Cash versions have 'overtook me down in Juarez, Mexico' (a place already associated with Dylan in song, from 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues'), Dylan returns it to the line in the 1962 CLARENCE ASHLEY & DOC WATSON version, 'They overtook me down in Jericho'. In literal terms this is in South Carolina, not that far from another town cited in the song, North Carolina's Thomasville, but in Dylan's mouth, 'Jericho' inevitably offers, as Geoffrey Cannon wrote, 'an echo of his persistent references to places of abstract myth.'

Dylan's re-use of 'Jericho' makes allusion to something else from the Golden Oldie past, too. One of the little witticisms in the performance is the way Dylan's voice goes up and up as he sings the word 'down': and this is exactly what ELVIS and the Jordanaires do with the same word on their version of 'Joshua Fit the Battle of Jericho' on Presley's His Hand in Mine album of 1960, with which Dylan must be familiar.

This is not the only example of Dylan putting two versions of a song back to back. He does the same on the single of 'George Jackson' in 1971 and with 'Forever Young' on the 1974 Planet Waves album—and on Self Portrait he does it all over again with 'Alberta', which he calls 'Alberta No.1' and 'Alberta No.2'.

[Johnny Cash: 'Transfusion Blues', Nashville, 17 Feb 1960, Now There Was a Song, Columbia CS 8254, NY (CBS 62028, London), 1960. (Columbia Records cannot now trace a 2nd Cash studio recording pre-1970.) 'Cocaine Blues', Sacramento, 13 Jan 1968, Johnny Cash at Folsom Prison, Columbia CS 9639 (CBS 63308), 1968. Cash re-recorded it Nashville, 24 Apr 1979, Silver, Columbia 36086 (CBS 83757), 1979. Clarence Ashley (with Doc Watson): '(In Search of) Little Sadie', Chicago, Feb 1962, Old Time Music at Clarence Ashley's, Vol. 2, Folkways FA 2359, NY, 1963.

Elvis Presley: 'Joshua Fit the Battle', Nashville, 30–31 Oct 1960, His Hand in Mine, RCA Victor LPM/LSP-2328, NY (RCA mono RD27211, stereo SF5094, London, 1961), 1960; CD-reissued Amazing Grace: His Greatest Sacred Performances (2-CD set), RCA 07863 66421 2, London, 1994.

The retrospective LP by Bill Clifton and Hedy West, Getting Folk Out of the Country, Bear Family BF 15008, Vollersode, Germany, 1975, also includes 'Little Sadie' (London, 1972) and 'Mary of the Wild Moor' (London, 1972), a traditional song Dylan performed in 16 concerts 1980–81.

Manfred Helfert's comments re the Ashley version, seen online 1 Sep 2005 at www.bobdylanroots.com/sadie.html, were helpful here; thanks too to Jim Clements, The Bridge no.22, UK, summer 2005, p.36.]

'In the Garden' [1980] By the time we reach the 'Born Again' albums, Slow Train Coming and Saved, there is a marked decrease in the Dylan-Christ identification that was so clear and prevalent on Street Legal. The only example of it, and it is implicit, occurs on the Saved track 'In the Garden': 'The multitude wanted to make Him king, put a crown upon His head / Why did He slip away to a quiet place instead?' Dylan, if drawing a parallel here, is suggesting that he at least knows exactly why Jesus should have 'slipped away'.

'In the Garden' (the phrase itself is from John 19:41) actually centres upon two gardens, and two compelling sections of Christ's story: the episode in which Judas betrays Him to the armed gang of high priests and elders and their henchmen in the garden of Gethsemane and He is arrested (leading to His crucifixion); and the episode in which, when He rises again from the sepulchre 'in the garden' at Calvary, Mary Magdalene and then the eleven remaining disciples meet Him one more time in Galilee.

Like the title phrase 'in the garden', Nicodemus, the named character in the song's second verse, also serves to link the stories either side of the crucifixion, since he is there beforehand, asking Christ why a man must be born again (John 3:1–7) and he is there again afterwards, helping Joseph of Arimathaea to place Christ's body in the garden sepulchre (John 19:39).

Dylan's first verse deals with His arrest, in the course of which Peter slices off a high priest's servant's ear and is all for further swashbuckling resistance. (He is over-keen to prove his ardour because Jesus has just told him he'll deny Him three times before that rooster crows at the break of dawn.) Jesus now tells him to put his sword away: '. . . Put up again thy sword into his place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword' (Matthew 26:52) or 'Peter, put up thy sword into the sheath: the cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?' (from John 18:11). Dylan's next two verses follow and fuse texts respectively from Mark 2:9 & John 5:1–30 and from Luke 19:37–38 & John 6:15.

Dylan's last verse quotes from Christ's last words to the disciples after His resurrection (given in the final three verses of Matthew, i.e. 28:18–20): 'All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Amen.'

'In the Garden' has remained one of the evangelical songs Dylan returns to in concert; it is by far the most-frequently performed song from Saved, and by the end of 2003 he had sung it live 331 times (more than twice as many as the second-most-played number, 'Solid Rock'). Its début came on the opening night of the first gospel tour, in November 1979, three months before the studio recording. In 1986, on the long tour with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS, 'In the Garden' was jointly most-played song of all (jointly with 'Ballad of a Thin Man' and 'Seeing the Real You at Last'), and on the first leg of the tour, in New Zealand and Australia, Dylan took to introducing the song with a variable rap that always ran roughly like this one (delivered in Sydney, Australia on February 11:

> 'For lots of people MUHAMMAD ALI's a hero, right? Yeah. And Albert Einstein, he sure was a hero. I guess you could say even Clark Gable was a hero. Michael Jackson, he's a hero, right? BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN. I care nothing about them people though. None of those people are my heroes, they don't mean nothing to me. I'm sorry but that's the truth. I wanna sing a song about my hero.'

(For a variant see Jesus v. Springsteen.)

The song's most audacious outing was in 1987, when, in his début concert in Israel, Dylan chose to deliver this very specifically Christian song to his Tel Aviv audience.

[Bob Dylan: 'In the Garden', San Francisco, 1 Nov 1979; Tel Aviv, 5 Sep 1987.]

Infidels* [1983] Another ragbag collection of insipid material, hailed in the US as a great return to form on Dylan's part. This is the sort of work that makes Dylan's earlier 'minor' albums sound like masterpieces. In depressing contrast to Nashville Skyline, New Morning or Planet Waves, there is on Infidels generally no warmth, no unity and no sense that real music is being created and played for pleasure by people who know what they want. There is instead the unwelcome return of the portentous quality of the evangelical albums of 1979–80, while the production is half-hearted and irresolute. It is Dylan beginning to say that he doesn't really want to write songs or make records any more, and to behave as if it hardly matters whether an album is any good or not. This is not a welcome stance from a great artist. As with Shot of Love, its predecessor, it needn't have been this way: the sessions yielded important work excluded from the release, including what is perhaps Dylan's greatest single recording of the 1980s, the lapidary 'Blind Willie McTell'. Best of the released tracks: 'I and I' (though this admonishes you into feeling it's important, rather than claiming a place in your heart) and the album's one incontestable major success, 'Jokerman'.

[Recorded (though session information is unclear) NY, Apr and Jun–Jul 1983; released as stereo LP Columbia QC-38819 (in UK CBS 25539), 27 Oct or 1 Nov 1983.]

Ingber, Ira [1950 -] Ira Beard Ingber is a composer and multi-instrumentalist musician, playing guitar, mandolin, bass, keyboards and percussion, and a producer and studio engineer. He was born on March 29, 1950 in Minneapolis but grew up in LA where at 15 he recorded his own first song, playing a guitar that belonged to Don EVERLY. At 16 he was playing in the group the New Generation and had a record deal, but he went on to study music at Los Angeles City College, at UCLA and under conductor Joseph Valenti.

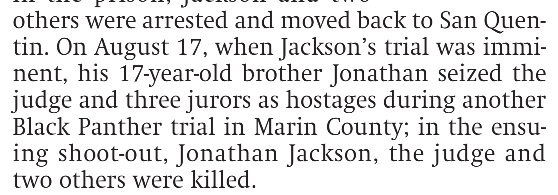
Ira Ingber is the younger brother of the Mother of Invention and Captain Beefheart's Magic Band member Elliot Ingber, aka Winged Eel Fingerling. Way back in 1968 both brothers played on an eponymously titled Fraternity of Man album (Elliot had co-founded that band), the group's song 'Don't Bogart That Joint' featuring on the soundtrack of the film Easy Rider, and in 1974 on Beefheart's album Bluejeans and Moonbeams. On both these, Ira played bass. He went on to produce for Lowell George and others, and then got a new record deal as part of the band the Pets, which included GREGG SUTTON and Jo Ann Harris and made the album Wet Behind the Ears in 1978. He re-involved himself with the Motherworld around the start of the 1980s, playing on the Grandmothers' albums Grandmothers (1981) and Lookin' Up Granny's Dress (1982).

Ingber says that he was then 'asked to form a band for Bob Dylan that led to the recording of [the] two . . . albums Empire Burlesque and Knocked Out Loaded.' This is overstating it somewhat, given that various musicians came and went over long periods of sessions for these albums, and he was not at the first session at all—but certainly he is the guitarist whose caressingly expressive, taut but intuitive electric playing enriches the unreleased 'New Danville Girl'—playing which is displaced when Dylan records his masterly recording of the revised lyrics, by this point re-titled 'Brownsville Girl', over the backing track. It may be that as it comes in after the third chorus of 'New Danville Girl', at once soaring and dignified, impassioned and restrained, simple and imaginative, there is no better electric guitar solo on any studio recording in Bob Dylan's work—yet on the re-make that is 'Brownsville Girl' it has to go, because this better-realised version of the song must single-mindedly occupy the cowboy and western genre, not criss-cross in and out of rock music signifiers. On the sleevenotes for Knocked Out Loaded, Ingber still gets a credit for guitar on 'Brownsville Girl' (and on his own website claims to have produced that track).

This exemplary solo was almost certainly recorded at an early Hollywood session for Empire Burlesque on December 10 or 11, 1984—and Ingber had first participated on the 7th, helping to record an uncirculated take of a 'Look Yonder', followed two days later by a similarly unheard song logged as 'Gravity Song'. Then came 'New Danville Girl'. He's also credited with playing on the album version of 'Something's Burning, Baby', recorded on the 14th, as was another uncirculated track, of 'The Girl I Left Behind' (which may not be the same as the old ballad of that name Dylan had sung so rivetingly on the 'Oscar Brand's Folk Song Festival' radio programme 23 years earlier, on October 29, 1961). Ingber also plays on an April 17, 1985 session, again in Hollywood, which yielded only two further uncirculated tracks, 'Too Hot to Drive' and 'As Time Passes By'.



After these mixed-success Dylan sessions Ingber went on to play on, among many other albums, Bonnie Raitt's Nine Lives (1986) and BRIAN WILSON & Van Dyke Parks' Orange Crate Art (1990s). In 2005 he made a new solo album, Here Is Where (released 2006), and when not in his own studio, plays LA club dates with his band the New Corvairs.

He has also composed many film scores, including for A River Runs Through It and Robert Altman's The Company, has recorded with both FRANK SINATRA and Cheech & Chong (though not together) and, disappointingly, turned out a good deal of music for advertisements, for everything from Kelloggs to Gatorade and the Chicago Mercantile Exchange.

[Ira Ingber: Here Is Where, Colonel Muscletone (with no stated catalogue no.), US, 2006. Fraternity of Man: Fraternity of Man, ABC S 647, US, 1968. Captain Beefheart: Bluejeans and Moonbeams, Mercury SRM 1-1018, US (Virgin V2023, UK), 1974. The Pets: Wet Behind the Ears, Arista 4154, US, 1978. Bonnie Raitt: Nine Lives, Warner Bros. 25486, US, 1986. Brian Wilson & Van Dyke Parks: Orange Crate Art, nia. Ingber's website is www.iraingber.com. Birthdate & full name data, Ingber e-mail to this writer 2 Feb 2006.]

interviews and the myth of their rarity It's always been a myth that Dylan interviews are rare: they average about one a month for all four and a half decades of his career. That's something over 500 interviews and press conferences given, written up and published, and in many cases recorded and/or broadcast or telecast. And since the mid-1960s almost every one is published prefaced by the claim that it comes from a man who rarely gives interviews.

Isis* [fanzine] See Barker, Derek & Tracy.

'Jack-a-Roe' [1993] See American Civil War in World Gone Wrong, the.

Jackson, George [1941 - 1971] Born in Chicago, and four months younger than Bob Dylan, Jackson moved to LA with his family at age 14. In 1960, aged 18, he was jailed for one-year-to-life for driving the getaway car for a friend who stole $70 from a gas station. The friend was released in 1963; Jackson stayed in San Quentin till 1969, when he was moved to Soledad. He joined the Black Panther party (formed 1966) in 1969, and his book Soledad Brother: The Prison Letters of George Jackson was based on letters to his family on the brutality and racism of the prison system. He spent long periods in solitary confinement. In January 1970, in a new bi-racial exercise yard, guards fired on fighting prisoners, killing three blacks; when a 'justifiable homicide' verdict was returned, a white guard was killed in the prison; Jackson and two others were arrested and moved back to San Quentin. On August 17, when Jackson's trial was imminent, his 17-year-old brother Jonathan seized the judge and three jurors as hostages during another Black Panther trial in Marin County; in the ensuing shoot-out, Jonathan Jackson, the judge and two others were killed.

George Jackson's trial was postponed until August 1971; on August 21, two days before it was due to begin, Jackson was shot dead by a San Quentin guard, allegedly while attacking guards during an attempted escape. His two co-accused, John Cluchette and Fletta Drumgo, were later found not guilty of the murder of the guard.

That Bob Dylan could still be directly touched by something so much from the urban world, despite the rural terrain he had been exploring since John Wesley Harding, was demonstrated swiftly by the single that he issued near the end of 1971, 'George Jackson'. Recorded that November 4, it was issued eight days later. This rush-release may have indicated Dylan's urgency to get its 'message' across: his first acoustic-guitar solo single since the pre-electric period (1961–64), it marked a surprise (and brief) return to 'protest' material. Yet the rush-release perhaps also indicated the song's 'lateness' rather than its topicality: it was recorded two and a half months after its eponymous hero's death.

Two takes were released—the B-side was the so-called 'Big Band version' (Dylan on acoustic guitar, harmonica and lead vocal, Dan Keith on steel guitar, LEON RUSSELL on electric bass guitar and KENNY BUTTREY on drums, with Joshie Armstead and Rose Hicks on background vocals), and Dylan's solo version was the A-side.

He starts the song very simply by declaring his response to events, and using the classic blues opening line to say so: 'I woke up this morning', and then tightening up at once into the particular and the special—personalising it: 'There were tears in my bed / They killed the man I really loved / Shot him through the head.'

It is exactly like the pre-1964 protest songs—even down to the formula of a guitar backing till the end of the penultimate verse, then a harmonica solo laid on top, then guitar alone again through the last verse, then back with the harmonica for the fade-out. What is not like the pre-1964 protest material is this: 'They were frightened of his power / They were scared of his love.' This is the post-mystic Dylan, the post-acid Dylan; and in the light of STEVEN GOLDBERG arguing that after Nashville Skyline Dylan's post-mystic politics would be reactionary, it is interesting to find these mystic traces in the middle of this committedly radical song. It's also interesting to see the way the end of the song shows Dylan's most BLAKEian simple language deliberately echoing one of George Jackson's most spirited (and unBlakeian) remarks. Jackson says in one of his letters that from now on, he's just going to divide people into the innocent and the guilty. As Dylan re-states this, it is Us and Us, not Us and Them: 'Sometimes I think this whole world / Is one big prison yard / Some of us are prisoners / The rest of us are guards.'

The story circulated in the music industry in the early 1970s that when Columbia Records in New York received a telephone enquiry as to whether a part of the royalties on Dylan's record of 'George Jackson' would be going to the Soledad Brothers, the reply was: 'We don't think so. They're not on our label.'

In 1975 another George Jackson book was published: Blood in My Eye (from a manuscript completed 'just a few days' before his death, said Penguin Books). On Dylan's 1992 album Good as I Been to You he included a version of a MISSISSIPPI SHEIKS song, the title of which he shortened to 'Blood in My Eyes'. Long or shortened, the expression may be unusual but is not unique. Pre-war bluesman J.T. Funny Papa Smith's 'Hungry Wolf' includes the beautifully 'Dylanesque', brooding lines 'With blood in my eye, and malice in my heart / In places I used to go . . .' There's also a 1939 record by Bill Gaither titled 'Bloody Eyed Woman'. George Jackson's text never explains the use of this title, but his meaning is clearly that blood—physical violence, revenge—is what he has his eye on. The book's dedication is 'To the black Communist youth—To their fathers—We will now criticize the unjust with the weapon.' Between the Sheiks' song from the 30s, and Jackson's title from the 70s, therefore, it's clear that the phrase itself has had some currency in black America. Dylan uses the phrase rather more opaquely in Chronicles Volume One, in which he says of his old Greenwich Village friend Ray Gooch that 'there was something special about him. He had blood in his eyes, the face of a man who could do no wrong . . .'

(See also radical political activity in 1960s-70s US, the strange disappearance of.)

[George Jackson, Soledad Brother: The Prison Letters of George Jackson, 1970 (Preface by JEAN GENET); and Blood in My Eye, 1975. Most of the above information on Jackson is taken from Edmund White, Jean Genet, 1992. Bob Dylan: 'George Jackson' c/w 'George Jackson', NY, 4 Nov 1971, Columbia 4-45516, NY, 12 Nov 1971.

Steven Goldberg: 'Bob Dylan and the Poetry of Salvation', Saturday Review no.53, 30 May 1970, collected in Craig McGregor: Bob Dylan: A Retrospective (1972, reissued as Bob Dylan, the Early Years: A Retrospective, 1990).

The Mississippi Sheiks: 'I've Got Blood in My Eyes for You', Atlanta, 25 Oct 1931, first vinyl-issued Stop and Listen Blues: The Mississippi Sheiks, Mamlish S-3804, NY, 1974, CD-reissued Stop and Listen, Yazoo 2006, NY, 1992. J.T. Funny Papa Smith: 'Hungry Wolf', Chicago, c.Apr 1931; 'Funny Papa' Smith: The Original Howling Wolf, Yazoo L-1031, NY, 1972. Bill Gaither: 'Bloody Eyed Woman', Chicago, 22 Oct 1939.]

Jackson, Jim [c.1884 - c.1937] Jim Jackson was born in Hernando, Mississippi, probably in 1884 (1890 used to be given), and probably died in the same tiny town 53 years later; but he lived, worked and recorded in Memphis in the 1920s and was famous for one of the biggest-selling blues hits of that decade, 'Kansas City Blues', which sold almost a million. In 1950s and 60s Memphis, when WDIA, the first all-black radio station, was championing the music of younger generations he wasn't remembered at all. Like his Memphis contemporaries FRANK STOKES and Furry Lewis, he isn't even mentioned in Wheelin' on Beale, Louis Cantor's history of WDIA: 230 pages on how this wonderful station gave blacks their own voice, abolished Perry Como in favour of B.B. King, and put the blues on the air—but no change for a bluesman of Jackson's generation: he was still excluded.

His musical sensibility was formed more fully than that of most blues singers by 19th century minstrelsy and ragtime, so that he was already sounding old-fashioned by the time he brought his very limited technical proficiency into the studios for the first time, in October 1927. It may be hard now to see quite where lay the appeal of his début recording (and biggest hit), 'Kansas City Blues': he has a vocal delivery so ponderous it borders on the comical, and a heavy, unvarying guitar strum to match, and you're likely to come to the end of listening to 'Part 1' with no great compunction to play 'Part 2'—and yet his voice has a resonance, a natural echo to its timbre, that fuses with his insistent mournfulness to create an unforgettable impression, an irresistible force.

Nothing is known of his later life; he is believed to have died in 1937 in Hernando and obscurity. For how he comes to dovetail into Bob Dylan's work, see 'I Shall Be Free' and 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune'.

[Jim Jackson: 'Jim Jackson's Kansas City Blues Part 1 & Part 2', Chicago, 10 Oct 1927, Kansas City Blues, Agram AB2004, Holland, 1980. Louis Cantor, Wheelin' on Beale, New York: Pharos Books, 1992.]

Jackson, John [1956 -] John Stigler Jackson was born in Nashville on October 23, 1956 and grew up to be a Nashville-based guitarist who stands six feet three inches tall. When he joined Dylan's touring band at the beginning of the first 1991 tour he was a virtual unknown—and was rumoured to have accepted a pay offer to match: allegedly offered, as a try-on, $500 a week, he accepted it, so placing all future Dylan musicians at a disadvantage before they started. Whatever the truth of that, Dylan had apparently seen him playing on stage with Joe-El Sonnier at the original Lone Star in New York, and knowing that G.E. SMITH was to leave, offered John Jackson the gig (though in the event there was a gap between Smith's departure and Jackson's arrival, filled by CÉSAR DIAZ and JOHN STAEHELY).

John Jackson had spent most of the 1980s playing in Nashville bands, the Practical Stylists and then his own John Jackson & the Rhythm Rockers, but Kathy Mattea also remembers that he had 'played with Sweethearts of the Rodeo when they were doing well, and before that for Terri Gibbs.' He was, says Ms. Mattea, her 'first real guitarist'. (Kathy Mattea is one of the artists who handles a duet with RALPH STANLEY on the same CD of special recordings as Dylan.)

In summer 1998 he was to be found playing guitar for the hugely successful Lucinda Williams, though a Dylan fan who saw one such concert reported that Jackson 'was quite overshadowed by her other lead guitarist . . . who is some kind of mad genius with a fat tone, incredible dexterity, and especially, excellent taste. J.J. stood out by playing a lot of slide.' (It's often reported that only Dylan, and thereafter Dylan fans, called him 'J.J.', but he'd been called that by Kathy Mattea too.) More recently he has played the music on the performance poet Minton Sparks' highly unusual album Sin Sick, and is currently playing in the Dylan-based musical The Times They Are a-Changin' by Twyla Tharp, which has sold out its three-month San Diego run and shows every sign of bringing Dylan's material to yet another large group of those weird people who say they like his songs but not his voice.

In his real Dylan years, Jackson stood out on stage by being very tall (and never taller than when alongside Bob Dylan) and, as many fans complained, by grinning a great deal. He arrived in the band just as Dylan was in his worst 1990s mode of being: January 1991 saw him appearing much the worse for wear many nights, and the new band itself wasn't great. As ANDREW MUIR wrote in Razor's Edge: Bob Dylan & the Never-Ending Tour: 'The opening show in Zurich on January 28th . . . featured "Bob Dylan's Dream" from his Freewheelin' days, which had not been performed for nearly 30 years—talk about whetting your appetite! . . . [but] for much of this early bout of 1991 touring . . . The band . . . were terrible. John Jackson did nothing but grin maniacally at the audience while playing the same thing on every song . . . and the drums sounded like a drum machine with a replay button that had got stuck.'

This was the band, and the Bob Dylan, who appeared at the Grammy Awards on February 20 in New York, playing an incomprehensible version of 'Masters of War' as Dylan accepted a Lifetime Achievement Award from JACK NICHOLSON. It was also the band Dylan left behind when he appeared at the Seville Guitar Legends festival that October. Yet at the end of that month, when another tour leg began, Dylan and the band went through a short golden period, when the drumming was rolling in a distinctive way, and the guitar-work was nicely grungy—and within this short sunlit phase came the really exceptional concert at South Bend, Indiana, on November 6, when Dylan even brought 'I'll Remember You' to life, so pressing his best expressive skills into the service of this empty and inauthentic song that he convinced you there really is something tangible inside it. That one night it was far better than it ought to have been. He shared with his audience a lovely unrestrained vocal searching; it was mannered but exploratory, his quick-witted good taste and instinct always in evidence. That night too, there was a fine 'Watching the River Flow' and a wondrous run of consecutive inspired performances on 'Shelter from the Storm', 'Early Morning Rain', 'Gotta Serve Somebody' and 'You Don't Know Me', this last managing to be both the ultimate prom band moment and an affecting tribute to RAY CHARLES.

Jackson can take a little credit for this, though overall he was not a strong contributor, and was easily intimidated by Dylan into never playing anything prominent or individual at all. Despite or because of this, he remained with the band all through 1992–96 and on until February 24, 1997, when he bowed out in Sapporo, Japan.

He is therefore in the band that played the four New York Supper Club sets on November 16 & 17, 1993, followed next day by the 'Late Show with David Letterman' performance of 'Forever Young'; for the wretched MTV Unplugged performance of exactly a year later; and for the fine European concerts of spring 1995, beginning with Dylan's Czech Republic début in Prague on March 11. He was also around to not be invited to play on the January 1997 sessions for Time Out of Mind, in contrast to his tour-band colleagues TONY GARNIER (bass) and WINSTON WATSON (drums).

Lagging behind only the phenomenally resilient Garnier, and steel guitarist BUCKY BAXTER (who joined only a few weeks after Jackson and outlasted him by more than two years), John Jackson has so far proved the Never-Ending Tour band's third-longest-serving musician. He had played a total of 590 Dylan concerts.

[Andrew Muir, Razor's Edge: Bob Dylan & the Never-Ending Tour, London: Helter Skelter, 1991, p.71. Quotes from Kathy Mattea, e-mail for this writer, 5 Feb 2006; re Lucinda Williams concert, unidentified posting dated 30 Aug 1998, online 9 Jul 2005 at www.expectingrain.com/dok/who/j/jacksonjohn.shtml; further detail from John Jackson, phone call from this writer 16 Feb 2006.]

Jagger, Mick [1943 -] Michael Philip Jagger was born in Dartford, Kent, England, on July 26, 1944 and dropped out of one of Britain's best universities, the London School of Economics, to become a ROLLING STONE in 1963. Though Jagger hung around a New York session for Blood on the Tracks in fall 1974, he and Dylan were never simpatico musicians or personalities, and played together without the rest of the Stones only once, at the concert to launch the Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame in New York City's Waldorf-Astoria Grand Ballroom on January 20, 1988, when among other hopelessly artificial musical moments there came the one when Dylan played inaudible guitar behind Jagger and BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN as they sang '(I Can't Get No) Satisfaction'. This was ironic, granted that at an abrasive and fleeting encounter between the two men 20 years earlier, Dylan told Jagger, truthfully enough: 'The difference between us is that I could have written "Satisfaction" and you couldn't have written "Tambourine Man".'

[Jagger & Springsteen (with Dylan on guitar): '(I Can't Get No) Satisfaction', NY, 20 Jan 1988; Dylan comment to Jagger related by Jagger in a Rolling Stone interview, 1968, nia.]

'James Alley Blues' See Brown, Richard Rabbit.

James, Skip [1902 - 1969] Nehemiah James was born on a plantation at Bentonia, Mississippi, on June 9, 1902. He was unusual in playing guitar and piano, and unique among pre-war blues musicians in regarding himself as an artist, indeed as a great one, without being told that he was by white blues-revival enthusiasts. And he was right. Had he never survived to be 'rediscovered', his reputation would be secure from his sole pre-war recording session, made in about February 1931 in Grafton, Wisconsin: a session that was prolific and of astonishing virtuosity.

One of the big cats of the genre, the unique Skip James made the crucial recording of a 'Special Rider Blues', after which Dylan named his primary music-publishing company. (Unlike the common blues term 'rider', the phrase 'special rider' is more special: it seems to occur in only four pre-war songs and by implication in a fifth. One of these is Skip James'.) James is also one of those whose old records saw early vinyl release on the pioneering blues label Biograph, the name Dylan chooses for his 1985 retrospective box set. But Dylan's inwardness with the blues is such that he cannot help but have imbibed things from this highly distinctive figure, and we can glimpse them all over the place in Dylan's work.

The only appealing thing about the Hearts of Fire filler-song 'Had a Dream About You Baby' is the comic yet stylishly lazy 'Late last night you come rollin' across my mind,' with its pleasant evocation of someone feeling this image move across from one side of their head to the other: an image that recurs between Dylan's unmemorable verses, so that it enacts the in-between of 'in one ear and out the other' (it's a self-reflexive text, even)—but it's at least as pleasurable hearing the same main phrase in Skip James' '4 O'Clock Blues', in which: 'Brownskin girl, she rollin' across my mind.'

On Dylan's nigh-perfect Blonde on Blonde performance of 'Pledging My Time', the melody, the gulping movement of the melodic phrases and Dylan's mysteriously ominous line 'Somebody got lucky, but it was an accident' may all echo 'Come on in My Kitchen' by ROBERT JOHNSON, from 30 years earlier, but while the restless melodic phrasing is Johnson's, the melody that inspires it is the same as 'Sittin' on Top of the World', and the Johnson line that Dylan's echoes—'Some joker got lucky, stole her back again'—is itself an echo of a line from Skip James' brilliant 1931 début recording, 'Devil Got My Woman'.

This is not the whole story: BLIND WILLIE McTELL's 'Stole Rider Blues', recorded at his first session (1927) includes 'I stole my good gal from my bosom friend / That fool got lucky, he stole her back again', which anticipates Skip James' 1931 'Devil Got My Woman' and Robert Johnson's 1936 'Come on in My Kitchen', and it would be hard to say from whom Dylan picked up the line—as Dylan sings his matching line, his 'accident' rhymes neatly with the 'back again' offered by McTell, James and Johnson—except that James' line, 'Somebody got lucky, stoled her back again', is the closest to Dylan's. And certainly Robert Johnson's line comes down from Skip James rather than from McTell (who may have picked his up from listening to Ida Cox's 'Worried Mama Blues', which predates all of them with its 'I stole my man from my best friend / But she got lucky and stole him back again', from 1923). 'Devil Got My Woman' is also the musical basis of another Robert Johnson song, 'Hellhound on My Trail', while Johnson's '32-20' is an almost verbatim reworking of Skip James' '22-20 Blues'.

These songs came to Johnson via his Jackson, Mississippi, contemporary Johnny Temple, an ex-protégé of Skip James, whereas for Dylan, James was accessible more or less directly; that is, he was both a figure of legend from the 1930s and one of the most important of the 'rediscovered' bluesmen in the couple of years immediately before Blonde on Blonde was recorded.

Another part of the same Skip James lyric becomes entwined in a different Dylan song, 'When I Paint My Masterpiece'—which was recorded, coincidentally or not, within a year of the first release on vinyl of the original 1931 James recording of 'Devil Got My Woman'. The 'wild geese' Dylan recalls himself following on a hilltop in 'When I Paint My Masterpiece' fly straight out of a number of old blues songs, in which they feature as a common-stock formulation. Whenever you hear the line 'I lay down last night, tried to take my rest' you can more or less bet that the next line will be 'My mind got to ramblin' like the wild geese in the west.' It occurs, for example, in BLIND BOY FULLER's 'Weeping Willow', which Dylan performed at the Supper Club in New York in 1993.

Sometimes the 'wild geese', with engaging grammatic licence, is singular ('my mind got to rambling like a wild geese in the west'). There are also several songs called 'Wild Geese Blues', as for instance recorded by Barbecue Bob, Alberta Jones and the theatrically masculine Gladys Bentley. Yet because of Skip James' vocal intensity, and because of a tiny one-word change he makes to the couplet, these wild geese fly most vividly and particularly out of 'Devil Got My Woman', so that the image works as a most poignant lunge of the imagination suddenly arising out of his beautifully evoked restless yearning. James sings: 'I lay down last night, tried to take my rest / My mind got to ramblin' like the wild geese from the west.' The more common 'in the west' is less moving, in both senses, than James' 'from the west': 'in the west' abolishes movement, leaving these birds, and the image, hanging motionless. Skip James' tiny change sets them flying across the sky, wild geese indeed, making the image one of visitational loveliness.

James was taught guitar by the unrecorded singer Henry Stuckey, born in the 1890s. James first saw him play in a Bentonia, Mississippi, juke joint in about 1908, and learnt guitar from him after Stuckey's 1917 return from World War I, using pieces like 'Salty Dog' and 'Stack O'Lee'. James' own wonderful piano-accompanied recording 'If You Haven't Any Hay Get on Down the Road' is based on a ragtime number Stuckey played on guitar as 'All Night Long', fused with the traditional 'Alabama Bound', learnt in James' youth from local fiddle-player Green McCloud. Stuckey, tracked down in 1965 by the blues collector and critic Gayle Wardlow, still refused to record, and died in 1966.

Skip James concentrated primarily on his own compositions, and continued to make many of them out of songs that were not really blues at all, but which he alchemised into blues by the sheer ingenuity of his wayward style. He also found his own eccentric, intelligent ways of enriching his guitar-work from his experience as a pianist, and vice versa. The brilliant, distinctive delivery James uses at the end of his vocal lines—an ostentatious yet felicitous filigreeing around the note—finds a pale echo in Bob Dylan's delivery on 'North Country Blues'. In full, skittering flight, as achieved by Skip James, it prefigures, among other things, Robin Williamson's Incredible String Band vocals. There is just one occasion when the radiant wondrousness of Mr. James crashes badly. His 1931 performance of '4 O'Clock Blues' holds a disquieting moment for those familiar with 1950s–60s British culture. There you are, entranced by his precarious, eerie genius when all at once the phrase his perilous falsetto offers is 'Goodbye my darling——', and he sounds exactly like Charlie Drake.

James returned to Bentonia in the late 1940s, went on the road again with his wife in the early 1950s but wearied of traveling and retired. The drama of his recording career lies in the fact that he had only ever done one recording session, the substantial one from 1931 that had yielded so much. Then, 33 years later, 'rediscovered', he appeared like a ghost at the 1964 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL, and was recorded there by Vanguard Records. The first of his four Newport songs was 'Devil Got My Woman' (and of the three others, two were also revisits to songs he had cut at his recording session of three decades earlier).

Peter Guralnick's 1971 book Feel Like Going Home is good on Skip James' 'rediscovery', and appears to give an eye-witness account of his triumphant performance at Newport. It is an account that recognises the agitation most of us can fall prey to in coping with the emergence of the much-loved, obscure artefact into clear accessibility:

> 'As the first notes floated across the field, as the voice soared over us, the piercing falsetto set against the harsh cross-tuning of the guitar, there was a note of almost breathless expectation in the air. It seemed inappropriate somehow that this strange haunting sound which had existed till now only as a barely audible dub from a scratched 78 should be reclaimed so casually on an overcast summer's day at Newport. As the song came to an end . . . the field exploded with cheers and whistles and some of the awful tension was dissipated.'

JON PANKAKE's colleague PAUL NELSON, reviewing Skip James' performance as issued on one of the festival LPs, wrote that "the rediscovered Skip James contributes four of the greatest blues performances . . . of recent years, his high, emotional falsetto singing and carefully considered guitar-playing setting a nearly impossible standard."'

James continued to record and perform after Newport—and not at all as a shadow of his former self, though it's expected that you should say so. To listen, for example, to his 1966 recordings for Vanguard's album Skip James Today! is to be astonished by the man's genius and chutzpah. He sounds like no-one else on the planet; he sounds ageless and in his prime; his singing is still eerily beautiful and his acoustic guitar-work is inventive and precise. Play Skip James Today! up against Bob Dylan's 1993 album World Gone Wrong and much as you might love the latter, the former rebuffs with shining energy the notion that blurred guitar-work or last-gasp vocalising is all you can expect from the over-50s; and the Skip James of 1966 was 15 years older than the Dylan of 1993. (James' album is also, you won't be surprised to learn, immensely better recorded than Dylan's.) Still, while one of these artists was recording Skip James Today!, the other was recording Blonde on Blonde. Can't complain.

His impact was felt widely in the blues-revival and 'rediscovery' period. Cream's 1966 début LP Fresh Cream included a version, albeit barely recognisable, of James' 'I'm So Glad' (said to have earned him only $6,000). Further James recording sessions followed in the 1960s, including a live concert recording from Bloomington as late as 1968, never released until it appeared on two separately issued CDs in 2002.

Skip James died of cancer in Philadelphia in early October 1969.

[Skip James: 'Special Rider Blues', Grafton, WI, c.Feb 1931, Mississippi Blues 1927–1941, Yazoo L-1001, NY, 1968 & Skip James: King of the Delta Blues Singers 1928–1964, Biograph BLP-12029, Canaan, NY, 1970; '4 O'Clock Blues', Grafton, c.Feb 1931, Skip James: The Complete 1931 Session, Yazoo 1072, Newton, NJ, 1988; 'Devil Got My Woman', 'Special Rider Blues' and '22-20', Grafton, c.Feb 1931, all on Biograph BLP-12029 (James' only pre-war recordings were c.Feb 1931; the Biograph album boasts the dates '1928–1964' because it includes a 1928 Chicago test pressing by someone else, wrongly attributed to James, and because it draws on a Falls Church, VA, session, 16 Dec 1964, at which James cut 22 sides. BLP-12029 uses just two: 'I'm So Glad' & 'Special Rider Blues'); 'Devil Got My Woman', 'Cherry Ball Blues', 'Sick Bed Blues' & 'Cypress Grove Blues', Newport, RI, 23–26 Jul 1964, The Blues at Newport 1964, Part Two, Vanguard VRS-9181 (mono) & VSD-79181, NY, 1965; Skip James Today!, NY, Jan 1966, Vanguard VLP 9219, NY, c.1967; Skip James: The Complete Bloomington Indiana Concert March 30, 1968, Part 1 & Part 2, Document DOCD 5633 & 5634, Austria, 2002.

Blind Willie McTell: 'Stole Rider Blues', Atlanta, 18 Oct 1927; Blind Willie McTell 1927–1935, Yazoo L-1037, NY, 1973 (issued in stereo!). Ida Cox: 'Worried Mama Blues', Chicago, Dec 1923. Robert Johnson: 'Hellhound on My Trail' (2 takes), Dallas, 20 Jun 1937; one issued Robert Johnson: King of the Delta Blues Singers, Columbia CL-1654, NY, 1961; '32-20 Blues' (2 takes), San Antonio, TX, 26 Nov 1936, ditto. (Another significant influence on Johnson, Kokomo Arnold, recorded 'Front Door Blues (32 20 Blues)', Chicago, 15 Jan 1935.) Blind Boy Fuller: 'Weeping Willow', NY, 14 Jul 1937; Blind Boy Fuller on Down—Vol. 1, Saydisc SDR143, Badminton, UK, c.1967. Bob Dylan: 'Weeping Willow', NY, 17 Jul 1993. Cream: 'I'm So Glad', Fresh Cream, Reaction, UK, 1966.

Peter Guralnick, Feel Like Going Home, New York: Outerbridge & Dienstfrey, 1971 (reissued London: Penguin, 1992). Paul Nelson, Sing Out! vol.15, no.5, NY, Nov 1965.]

Jean, Wyclef [1972 -] Nelust Wyclef Jean was born on October 17, 1972 in Croix-des-Bouquets, Haiti, moved with his family to the Marlborough Projects, Brooklyn, New York, at age nine and moved again, to northern New Jersey, where he attended high school, studied jazz and became proficient on the guitar. In 1987 he and a cousin and one of that cousin's classmates formed the group the Tranzlator Crew, but changed their name to the Fugees before signing to Ruffhouse Records in 1993. Their début album, 1994's Blunted on Reality, did nothing, but after that came The Score, in 1996, which included several hit singles and was in itself a phenomenal success, selling some 17 million copies. While its repertoire ranged widely, as Wyclef Jean's subsequent work has also done, it was firmly rooted in hip-hop and proved an unprecedented disperser of the genre.

